MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, his complaint was that there were two authorities having jurisdiction in the same poorhouse—the Board of Supervision and the Lunacy Commissioners. He complained of the expenses to which the Inspectors in Lunacy had put the ratepayers by insisting on pauper lunatics being better kept than ordinary paupers. As the expenses of the maintenance of these lunatic paupers had increased very largely, there was ground for interference. So far as he knew, the Report of Lord Camperdown's Commission had never been contradicted, and upon that he relied.

MR. RAMSAY said, that with regard to the lunatics having been put upon a superior dietary to the other paupers, it was well known to be essential that they should receive more nutritious diet than was usually given to paupers.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, it had been in contemplation to amalgamate these two Boards. He did not think, however, that there would be any actual reduction in the expenditure from so doing. As to the distinction between the two classes of paupers, it was clearly necessary that there should be such a division; and, so much was the importance of the distinction felt, that not long back the Government gave pauper lunatics in Scotland the same allowance as was made in England. He did not think that if the distinction between the two classes of paupers were abolished there would be much saving of expenditure.

(4.) £5,654 to complete the sum for the Registrar General's Office, Scotland.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. DILLWYN wished to know till what hour the Government intended to go on with Supply?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped the Committee would take two more Votes in Supply before Progress was reported.

MR. DILLWYN complained that they had already been in Supply between seven and eight hours. He objected to proceeding with the debatable Votes at that late hour.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY did not think that the discussion which would arise on the Irish Votes would conclude that evening in any reasonable time. The best arrangement would be to report Progress when they came to the end of the Scotch Votes.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON proposed to move to report Progress at the first Vote that gave rise to considerable discussion.

MR. RAMSAY said, that before the Vote was agreed to, he wished the hon. Baronet to consider the propriety of having something done with a view to putting Scotland on the same footing as England with regard to the grants for medical attendance and extra food for the sick poor, and for the education of pauper children. There should be some corresponding grant in Scotland for the maintenance of pauper lunatics in work-

Member for Haddington (Lord Elcho) had spoke of the expediency of employing the ships of the Royal Navy for the purposes of transport. He would undertake to say that every economy would be practised; but if his noble Friend were as well acquainted as he was with the present condition of Her Majesty's Navy, he would know well that a ship of war as now constructed was hardly capable of taking on board any addition to its proper complement of men. No doubt, it was possible on an emergency for a ship belonging to the Turkish Navy to take on board 3,000 to 5,000 men for a day and a night. They might be taken on board in that way for a short time; but when the period was extended to three weeks, it would be necessary to make proper provision for the men, and he was afraid that the class of ships of which Her Majesty's Navy now consisted could not be largely used for the purposes of transport. When he was in a position to do so, he would lay before the House all information with regard to the liability which the Indian Government had incurred with reference to the movement of the Indian troops and to the contracts which had been entered into with ship-owners for their conveyance.

MR. MUNDELLA would be perfectly willing to accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman that full information should be given on condition that at as early a period as possible the particulars of all contracts should be laid before the House. A case had been brought to his notice in which its Bombay agent telegraphed to an English house that the Government wanted transport. They wrote him to accept 18s. per month, but shortly afterwards he telegraphed back that he had got 20 rupees per month, or about double the amount he was instructed to take. If such things took place—and he had the information on the best authority—it was right that full particulars of the contracts should be laid on the Table of the House. He did not accuse the right hon. Gentleman of any extravagance; but they knew what took place in India—and especially in Bombay—at the time of the Abyssinian War. The evil traditions with reference to expenditure that hung about Bombay made it more than ever necessary to watch the expenditure.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. GOSCHEN wished to express his belief, that if the Government showed no reticence with regard to the contracts, there would be no disposition to oppose the Vote.

Vote agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS II.—SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS.

(8.) £4,754, to complete the sum for the Lunacy Commission, Scotland.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that before the Committee passed this Vote, he wished to call attention to the Lunacy Board. A good many years ago an inquiry was held, which recommended that the Lunacy Commission should be amalgamated with the Board of Supervision in Scotland. Paupers in Scotland were under a divided authority, the Board of Supervision had the control of the sane paupers, while the lunatics in the same poorhouse were in the charge of the Lunacy Commission. In consequence of that divided control, pauper lunatics were kept in a much more expensive way than the ordinary paupers. The Lunacy Inspectors had, for example, in one case with which he was acquainted, ordered that large mirrors should be placed in the common rooms of the lunatics. Altogether their interference had caused a largely increased expenditure in the maintenance of pauper lunatics in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had said that the matter was under the consideration of the Government; and he wished to ask whether the Government had yet come to a conclusion, and determined, with the view to economy, to transfer the duties of the Lunacy Commission to the Board of Supervision?

MR. RAMSAY observed, with reference to the statement that the paupers in the poorhouses were under the control of the Board of Supervision, while the lunatics were looked after by the Lunacy Commissioners, that the fact was that the Commissioners in Lunacy had charge of the whole of the lunatics in Scotland, whether paupers or non-paupers. The distinction between the Scottish system and that existing in this country was, that in England wealthy lunatics were under the care of Chan-

He did not think that Scotland had been well treated in that matter; and, therefore, in order to give the Government time to consider the matter, he would move to report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. He believed that no other step would be effective. There had been a promise made, two years ago, that something would be done, but no Progress had been made; and, so long as they allowed themselves to be put off by promises, nothing would be done.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. James Barclay.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped, that after what he had stated, the Committee would at least consent to take that Vote.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. RAMSAY said, he really thought they ought to have some assurance from the Government that the promise given two years ago would be acted upon. It was merely a vote of the House that was required; and if the hon. Baronet would undertake that the promise made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be fulfilled without reference to further legislation, he should be very sorry, indeed, to put the Committee to the trouble of a division.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the promise given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was one made upon a condition. An attempt had been made to carry out the engagements of that condition, and he felt that any pledge he might give them would be merely carrying out the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that he saw the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, and he wished to remind him of the promise he gave to the deputation that came up from Scotland two years ago, that the medical grant to the Poor Law Boards of Scotland should be placed on a similar footing to that in England. At the present time the grant was 18 times greater in England than was the case in Scotland. Some excuses had been made to the effect that the cases were not similar; but the responsibility of bringing in a Bill rested upon the Government, and he did not think it was fair to Scotland that, because the Government could not pass their Bill through, Scotland should be kept short of its fair and proper allowance. All that they asked was to be put upon a similar footing to England; and he hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would offer them some opinion on this point.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not quite sure what the point under discussion was; but he understood that it was with reference to a promise which he gave to a deputation from Scotland two years ago. What he understood then passed was that he admitted that the case was one that required consideration; that an alteration should be made, and that the medical officers should be placed upon the same footing as in England, but that that would necessitate an alteration of the law. And he was in hopes that that might have been dealt with by an alteration in the Scotch Poor Law to that effect. He thought the Bill was introduced in consequence of the visit of the deputation, but it had not made so much progress as it might have done, though he believed there was an intention to proceed with it.

MR. RAMSAY said, that the fact was that legislation was not necessary to do Scotland justice. He thought it would be very well if the amount to be paid to England, Scotland, and Ireland for local purposes could be estimated, because it was admitted that they received less money from the Treasury than England or Ireland, while they were twitted in that House with receiving a greater amount than they were entitled to. So long as monies were paid from the Imperial Treasury for local purposes, he thought it would be well if the people of Scotland were put upon the same footing as those of Ireland and England, for which purpose there need not be any change in the law whatever. He considered it would be advantageous to appoint a Select Committee to ascertain what proportion was paid to each of the three divisions in that Kingdom.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he certainly must add his emphatic protest against the delay which had taken place in not having already acceded to the request of the deputation, a request which was generally considered house schools. The same difficulty was felt in Scotland as in England—where to put them? The course adopted in England was pursued in Scotland, only that country not having the same population or wealth, the maintenance of the lunatics pressed very hardly upon the ratepayers. Therefore, Scotland asked for the same consideration as other parts of the United Kingdom. Nor did they get anything in aid of the education of pauper children, or any grant corresponding to their population or taxation, in aid of medical relief to the poor. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would introduce a measure for providing a grant in aid of the education of the children of the poor, and that some arrangement would be made to increase the grant in aid of medical relief to the poor to the same proportion as in England. At present, the amount allowed for vaccination in England was equal to the whole sum granted in aid of medical relief in Scotland.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he hoped that the hon. Baronet would also promise to have a revision of the sums voted for the medical service in Ireland, and that he would be able to give to the Irish Members a similar assurance to that which his hon. Friend had asked for.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON thought the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) must be aware that the difference between the two countries must arise very much from the difference between the Poor Law and its action in each country. There was more thrown upon the country in Scotland than in England under the existing Act, and all he could say was, that the subject was one well worth inquiring into.

MR. RAMSAY said, that the hon. Baronet appeared to be under some misapprehension. The sum of £10,000 was voted for the relief of the ordinary paupers in Scotland, while, in England, a sum amounting to about £180,000 was voted for the same object for which £10,000 was voted in Scotland. Now, what was wanted did not involve any necessity for a change in the law. It was in the practice that they wanted a change made in that respect. The fact was, that they gave to Scotland, in payment of medical relief, less than one-eighteenth of the sum that was voted in England.

Mr. Ramsay

MR. M'LAREN said, that that grant for Poor Law expenditure had nothing whatever to do with Lunacy. It was merely for the Poor Law workhouses in Scotland; and a few years ago a large deputation of Scotch Members of Parliament from both sides of the House waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to represent the great injustice that was done to Scotland in that matter as compared with England, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed with that representation. Accordingly, there was a Scotch Bill introduced to remedy that evil; but, like most of the Scotch measures, it was allowed to sleep, and, doubtless, it was sleeping still.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that that Bill had already been brought in by the Government, and it was proposed to leave that very question to the Bill. He could not promise to re-introduce the Bill that Session, but he hoped to do so before very long.

MR. PARNELL wished to support the demand which had been made by the Scotch Members as regarded the assistance to medical relief. The allowance that had been made to England was 18 times as large as that which was given to Scotland. His hon. Friend the Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had wished that the hon. Baronet should also direct his attention to the allowance made to Ireland. Now, he (Mr. Parnell) thought that Ireland was very fairly treated as regarded medical relief. It had always struck him that in the Estimates presented to Parliament the amount paid by Parliament to Ireland was one of the most advantageous Estimates presented; but he thought it would be fair to the Scotch to give them a larger allowance than they possessed at present.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he understood that the arrangement was that in England the Government paid one-half of the medical expenses of the Unions; but, in Scotland, a lump sum of only £10,000 was paid. Now, two years ago, a deputation had waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who then gave them an assurance that the amount would be increased. All that they asked was that the same treatment should be extended to Scotland as was enjoyed by England, and that the Government should vote to the Poor Law Board one-half of the medical expenses.

the case stood. The whole question which the House had to consider was, whether the bargain that had been made was a good one or not. The sum which had been advanced by the Government, in addition to the £40,000, was £39,068. Therefore, the whole amount of the debt was £79,068. The average amount of the tolls was £535 per annum, and there was besides a sum of £260 paid as a kind of rent-charge by the London and North-Western Railway Company, making altogether £795 a-year. From this had to be deducted the average cost of maintenance—namely, £185, leaving a net sum payable to the Government of £610. Now, what the House had to consider was, whether it was desirable to compound a debt of £79,000 for £10,000, when they were receiving at the present moment a net sum of £610 a-year. No doubt, as his hon. Friend had said, the cost of maintenance might be larger in future years; and he had, in fact, kindly furnished him with particulars, showing that the cost would amount to about £22 a-year more than it did at present. But the Government would still be left in receipt of a net sum of £580 a-year, and he must say that he thought, under these circumstances, they had made a bad bargain in offering to accept the sum of £10,000. These facts were now before the House, being contained in the Return which had been laid on the Table; and if the House thought it desirable that this debt should be compounded for the sum in question, he should certainly not raise any further opposition to the Bill.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MR. M'LAREN thought it was hardly reasonable that the House should be asked to read this Bill a second time at so late a period of the Sitting. He had, however, communicated with the Lord Advocate upon the subject; and he understood from him that if the Scotch Members would allow the second reading to pass just then without any opposition, the Government would undertake that on the Motion to go into Committee on the Bill an opportunity would be afforded for a full discussion of its provisions. The same remark would apply to the succeeding measure—The Lord Clerk Register (Scotland) Bill. He might just state that there were parties in the General Register and Subsidiary Offices who thought they would be injuriously affected by these Bills, and a deputation had, he believed, left Edinburgh that night for London for the purpose of seeing the Lord Advocate and the Home Secretary on the subject. However, he was not going to detain the House, and if the Government would accede to the suggestion he had made, he should not offer any further opposition to the second reading.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought the suggestion of the hon. Member for Edinburgh was a very reasonable one, and he was quite prepared to accede to it.

MR. DILLWYN said, he should like to know what was meant by this Bill? He did not approve of the practice of taking the second reading of Bills as a matter of course; because, afterwards, if any objection should be raised to a particular measure, the House might be told that it had already accepted its principle. It was of late very much in vogue to take the second reading of Bills, and have the discussion upon them on going into Committee. He thought that if any explanation of the principle of a measure were given at all, it should be made when the House was asked to read it a second time.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that with respect to the question of principle, he quite concurred in the opinion that had been expressed by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn); but in this case the whole thing was fully explained when he asked for leave to introduce the Bill, so far as the principle was concerned. He did not think he need go further into the matter at the present moment.

MR. FRASER MACKINTOSH must really ask the Home Secretary to reconsider what he had just said. He was present when leave was given to to be conceded at the moment. There was a very strong feeling in Scotland on this question, and that deputation represented opinion from all parts of the country. They asked for very few boons for Scotland, and nothing but what they believed was justice; and, therefore, he hoped that another year would not pass without an attempt being made by the Government to deal with that particular point, and render justice to Scotland.

MR. M'LAREN said, that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had stated the case of Scotland quite correctly. The fact was, that where Scotland got £1,000 for Poor Law medical purposes, England got £18,000; and yet, where Scotland paid £1 to the National Exchequer, England only paid £7; so that while Scotland paid one-seventh, she only received one-eighteenth. A Bill had been brought in, but a variety of things had arisen which had stopped its progress. For his own part, he was not at all satisfied with a Member of the Government getting up, and saying—"You may depend upon it this will not be lost sight of." It might be taken up many times, and it might not be taken up at all. There was no need for any alteration whatever in the law, and it was in the power of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to put an additional sum in a Supplementary Estimate for the purpose.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that since he had last addressed the Committee on the subject, he had examined the Returns, and could now speak very confidently upon the subject of the unfair treatment of Scotland in comparison with either England or Ireland. He did not think, on the other hand, that the remedy for the evil which he admitted existed ought to be postponed until some general Poor Law Bills could be brought in, but should be dealt with as quickly as possible.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow;

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

CONWAY BRIDGE (COMPOSITION OF DEBT) BILL—[BILL 150.]

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Gerard Noel.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the Return which was moved for by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) showed the actual amount of the indebtedness of the trustees of the bridge to the Government. The result of the proposals in the Bill would be to pay the sum of £10,000 to the Government in lieu of all indebtedness on the part of the trustees of the bridge, which indebtedness was being added to at the rate of nearly £1,000 a-year. It was thought a good bargain by the trustees to have transferred to them the future management of the bridge, whilst they paid at the same time, in discharge of all outstanding debts, the sum he had mentioned. The conditions on which the trustees accepted this were that they should reduce the toll, which was very oppressive, at once upon taking the management, and that any surplus receipts which might afterwards be made should be applied in further reduction of the toll. He believed that thus the public would benefit as well as the Government, who would at once get rid of a charge upon the country, and wipe off a debt which at present stood without any prospect of its being discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

MR. MONK said, he should only trespass upon the attention of the House for a very few moments. When this Bill was brought in, it was one nominally to compound a debt of £40,000, with interest, which had accrued since the year 1822 on the Conway Bridge, for a sum of £10,000. It did not appear upon the face of the Bill what was the amount of interest paid, or the cost of maintenance, and he, therefore, moved for a Return, which his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury at once granted. That Return was now in the hands of hon. Members. The hon. Baronet had explained pretty fairly to the House how

(The Lord Selborne.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD SELBORNE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the object of the measure, which had come up from the Commons, was to consolidate and in some degree amend the Bills of Sale Act of 1854 and the Bills of Sale Act of 1856. The greater part of the measure dealt with consolidation of previous legislation. By the 9th clause, it was enacted that every bill of sale should be registered within seven days instead of 21, as at present—otherwise, should be void as against trustees in bankruptcy, liquidation, or process of Court; and that any renewal of such registration, or subsequent bill of sale, of the same chattels for the same debt, shall be void. The other principal alterations proposed to be made in the law relate to mortgages of fixtures, and to securities upon personal chattels in the form of leases reserving rent. The Bill would, no doubt, require amendment in Committee.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.”

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON asked the Lord President whether in the Annual Reports of the Veterinary Department information would, in future, be given on the subject of foot-and-mouth disease, as well as on that of pleuro-pneumonia?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that the information on foot-and-mouth disease had been discontinued in the Reports in consequence of the difficulty and expense of compiling it. He would, however, endeavour to obtain the fullest information practicable.

Bill to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Friday next.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES— THE MILITIA.—QUESTION.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

LORD CAMPBELL, in rising to put a Question, and to move for a Return, according to a Notice on the Paper, said: My first intention was, before Easter, to have put the Question at 5 o'clock in the more usual, although less formal, manner. However, the noble Viscount, who for a short time has represented the War Office in this House, objected to that course, and it is very immaterial which of them is adopted. Indeed, the course which he preferred has one advantage not belonging to the other. It enables the commanders of Militia regiments to deliver their opinions to the House, as to whether it would be judicious to render their branch of the Auxiliary Forces more available for foreign service than it is at present. A Government might urge that unless the opinion of Militia officers was fully ascertained, they could not make up their minds as to the policy of what had been suggested. For instance, if commanders generally thought that recruiting would be more difficult when the sphere of the Militia was enlarged, it would not be prudent to enlarge it. If, on the contrary, it seemed to them that a remote contingency of foreign service would be attractive to the rural population, a change in that sense as regards the Force itself has much to recommend it. I venture to engage Militia officers to furnish information upon this and other points to-night; nor shall I be in their way for more than a few minutes. The prima facie ground for now considering whether the Militia should be only a domestic, or what is sometimes termed a sedentary, Force, occurs to anyone who recollects the time and manner in which the Volunteers, as they are constituted now, were brought into existence. The period was 1859. It was then considered that the French Government, however friendly it had been in the Crimean War, was uncertain in its aims, and, therefore, capable of enterprize in any possible direction. Some new defence at home beyond the Militia, which had been re-organized in 1852, was thought to be appropriate. So, down to 1870, the co-existence of the two Forces for aims completely insular, exclusively domestic, had a plausible excuse, although not, perhaps, a thoroughly convincing one. In 1870, that excuse may be considered to have vanished. Security from France became greater than it had ever been during the century. The system of confining two large Armies to the United Kingdom lost the basis it had formerly possessed. The question which then arose would naturally be as to disbanding one, or giving to the other greater elasticity. If the Militia were available abroad, Volunteers at home would be essential to replace them. But while the Militia is unavailable abroad, Volunteers, now that the danger which suggested their formation has passed away, can hardly urge their previous title to the expense which they involve. Now, the policy of employing the Militia in some degree on foreign service is not at all a new one. It was conspicuous in the Peninsula. Regiments volunteered and took their part in the campaigns. There is an Act of Parliament, the 54 Geo. III. c. 1, to regulate the new position they assumed, and Clode on the Military Forces of the Crown, has amply discussed it. The inconveniences, however, of such a fragmentary and precarious arrangement cannot be denied. It cannot possibly obtain one great advantage in diplomacy. The knowledge that so large a Force might join in any service the Executive required would lead to a desirable effect, although not a regiment quitted our shores. At present their moral value depends on their material exertion. It remains to defend the Return I move for. The number of effectives in the Auxiliary Forces illustrates the force now locked up; and, if given under the different heads of Militia, Volunteers, and Yeomanry, would show to what extent the two latter are sufficient for the object to which all three under the present system are confined. Let me add, in concluding, that, although the Question I put is, no doubt, a form of recommending to the attention of the Government a military change, it is only in connection with the difficulties of the Eastern Question I have urged it. It has been stated that a Congress at Berlin is likely to take place. Having resided during the adjournment in that capital, and become convinced by intercourse with diplomatic and political society that such a Congress only tends to war, I cannot reproach myself for bringing before the House at least one method or preparing for it. At the same time, I do not ask the Government to commit themselves to an opinion, if reluctant so to do, as to the use of the Militia. The Return, I trust, they will not hesitate in granting.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Return of the number of effectives in the Auxiliary Forces at the beginning of the financial year.—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

VISCOUNT BURY said, the noble Lord had brought this irrepressible question respecting the Militia before their Lordships at least four or five times this Session. First of all, it appeared in the form of a Question to Her Majesty's Government, as to whether they were disposed to make any change in the constitution of the Militia—which change the noble Lord had since shadowed forth more than once. The present Question had been upon the Notice Paper of the House at least six weeks, and during that period it had been several times altered in its form, and the day upon which it was to be asked, without the slightest consultation with those whose duty it would be to answer it. He must say that it would be more convenient for their Lordships if, in future, when the noble Lord gave Notice of a Question, he would study its form, and ask it on the day on which it was set down. As to the Question itself, he had no hesitation in answering it. The noble Lord asked whether they had in view any proposal for the alteration of the constitution of the Militia? Now, from time immemorial, the Militia had been enlisted for service within the United Kingdom. He would not follow the noble Lord into precedents of the time of George III., but he would state for the information of their Lordships that, by the Militia Act of 1875, sec. 50, it was enacted—garrison of Gibraltar, or any of them, such part of the Militia as may make a voluntary offer, duly certified by their respective commanding officers, so to extend their services, and as Her Majesty may think proper to permit to extend their services in consequence of such voluntary offers as aforesaid."

That was the basis upon which the Militia was now enlisted, and on which he hoped it would always be enlisted. During the last war, it was employed to garrison the Mediterranean, and the Militia were sent to Malta and Gibraltar with their own consent. The noble Lord now asked, in effect, if the Government proposed to change the character of that Force, and make the Militia available for foreign service everywhere without going through the preliminary of asking their consent? If any such fundamental change were made in the Militia, it would be necessary to release every militiaman from his engagements, and they would be in this position—that, instead of adding to the Defensive Force, they would really have no Militia at all. Her Majesty's Government were not going to advocate any such change. Indeed, there was no necessity for any such step, as, under present regulations, any militiaman willing to enlist for general service could be transferred to the Line, and receive a free kit for doing so. They were quite satisfied that the Militia, on its present basis, would satisfy the requirements of the country. With regard to the question as to the Returns of the effective Auxiliary Forces at the commencement of the financial year, if the noble Lord referred to the ordinary sources of information, he would find on their Lordships' Table a Return of the number of Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers; but, if he did not wish to trouble himself by doing so, he would inform him that in February, 1877, the total number of efficients on the dates on which the several regiments were inspected in 1877 were—Militia, 102,877; Yeomanry, 10,736; Volunteers, 193,026; total, 306,639.

LORD CAMPBELL rose to make some answer, but the adjournment of the House having been moved, was prevented from doing so.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Friday next, half past Ten o'clock.

Viscount Bury

CRIMINAL LAW — CASE OF THOMAS GRIFFITHS.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Thomas Griffiths, of Cymer, near Pontypridd, at present undergoing a sentence of three months' imprisonment with hard labour, (under an old Act of Parliament), for fraudulently and clandestinely removing his goods to prevent a distress for rent, the said removal having been (it is alleged) made openly at mid-day, and after an arrangement had been made with the wife of his landlord sanctioning such removal, on condition of his paying the rent by instalments of 5s. per week; and whether, if the facts are as alleged, he will cause the remainder of the punishment to be remitted?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that this was a matter over which the magistrates had perfect jurisdiction, because an offence was undoubtedly committed under the Statute 10 Geo. II. c. 19. There could be no doubt that the evidence which was presented to the magistrates justified them in giving the opinion which they did. The point about the payment of 5s. a-week seemed not to be supported by the evidence. The magistrates thought that it was right that two months should be given to the man either to appeal to Quarter Sessions or to pay the money. He neither appealed nor paid the money, and it was only after two months had elapsed that the commitment took effect. The magistrates had, however, no desire to be severe, and half the punishment would be remitted.

GRANTHAM COUNTY COURT—CASE OF MARGARET CARROLL.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of Margaret Carroll, who, on the 13th instant, was committed to prison for fourteen days by the judge of Grantham County Court for contempt of court because, as is alleged, she did not give an intelligible explanation of a fact of which, it was subsequently proved, that she could have had no knowledge; whether the judge is correctly reported to have said, in answer to a remonstrance—"I will read you people a lesson; you are not to come here and tell those abominable lies;" and, whether he will take any steps in the matter?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the attention of the Lord Chancellor had been called to this matter before the hon. Member's Notice appeared on the Paper. His Lordship put himself into communication with the Judge in question, and has received his explanation of the matter. There can be no doubt, I think, that the Judge exceeded his authority; but the Lord Chancellor has at this moment the whole matter under his consideration, and when I hear what he has decided, I will communicate the information to the House.

DOMINION OF CANADA—CANADA TEMPERANCE BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he can inform the House whether a permissive prohibitory measure, under the title of "The Canada Temperance Bill, 1878," introduced by the Government of Canada, has passed through the Dominion Parliament and received the Royal Assent; and, if so, whether he will lay a Copy of the Act upon the Table of the House, or provide a synopsis for the use of Members?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I do not know whether any such measure as the Canada Temperance Bill has passed the Dominion Parliament; but if it has, it would seem to be of a nature which would justify the Governor General in giving the Assent of the Crown to it, without reserving it for consideration by the Home Government. In that case it would in due time be sent home with other Acts of the Session, and, I believe, a copy would be placed in the Library of this House, but I have no copy of any such Act at present.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT, 1854—THE PORT OF CARDIFF.—QUESTION.

MR. PULESTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, as to the suspension of two pilots at Cardiff, Whether Howe, one of the suspended pilots, had a first-class certificate, and was acting on an experience of twenty-one years, when he declined to take a vessel out of Cardiff when, as he alleged, there was not sufficient depth of water outside the Bute Docks to enable him to do so with safety; and, whether the Board of Trade contemplates having the channel leading to the port of Cardiff surveyed by an independent authority, with a view to either reinstating the two pilots or confirming their suspension?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I find from the annual Pilotage Returns for the year 1857, that John Howe was then acting as a licensed pilot at Cardiff. I presume, therefore, that he has an experience of 21 years. The latest published Return shows that he was then a first-class Channel pilot. The Pilotage Board at Cardiff is constituted under the Bristol Channel Pilotage Act 1861, which gives to the Board of Trade no controlling power in the matter of pilotage, and section 336 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, the only section of a general Act which gives any power to the Board of Trade in these matters, only enables me to consider representations from pilots who complain of some specific bye-law or regulation, and gives me no power whatever to interfere in any other way between pilots and Pilotage Boards. I am not, therefore, in a position either to re-instate the pilots or to confirm their suspension. As to a survey of the Channel, the Board of Trade have no funds at their disposal for making the suggested survey; but we were informed early in the year that the Bute trustees, who originally out the Channel, were about to remove the obstructions that had grown up in it. As this subject excites considerable public attention, and is a matter of great interest to pilots generally, a most valuable and industrious class of men, I shall be happy to lay the Correspondence on the Table as soon as it is completed, if my hon. Friend will move for it.

THE CHARLTON CHARITY.

QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he can state how soon the awards of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland under the new Scheme of the Charlton Charity will be made public, and the money distributed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON): Sir, I have communicated with the Solicitors to the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland, with whom this matter rests, and I have been informed by them that they expect the whole matter will be concluded in a fortnight.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question of which he had given him private Notice. The House was, no doubt, aware that an important measure, the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill, had been under consideration in "another place," and, as it would probably come down to that House very speedily, he wished to ask, When the Government proposed to take the second reading; and to suggest that, in order to afford time for the consideration of the alterations made in it, the measure should not be taken before Whitsuntide?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he was unable to state when the Government would be in a position to take the Bill; but it certainly could not be before Whitsuntide, as the chief Business of the Government now was Supply.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — COUNTY GOVERNMENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,

Viscount Sandon

When the County Government Bill which stood for Thursday next, would be proceeded with? The Bill had been so frequently postponed that it might as well be put out of its misery at once.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he did not exactly know what the right hon. Gentleman meant by these expressions; but it was certainly necessary for the Government to proceed with Supply, and it was their intention to go on with Supply on Thursday. In all probability he should propose a Morning Sitting on Friday for the same purpose.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—IRISH UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MAJOR NOLAN: I wish to make a few remarks on what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said, and to do so in Order I will move the adjournment of the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that he would have to take a Morning Sitting on Friday. He was not, perhaps, aware, when he stated that, that the Irish Members, as represented by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), have a Motion on that day, to which they attach the greatest importance—perhaps more importance than to any other matter that they have brought forward this Session—namely, University Education. It is perfectly useless our coming here if we do not have an opportunity of debating this question. I should very much prefer to take a Morning Sitting on Saturday, and I should be willing to give up my whole holidays rather than give up the ordinary Sitting on Friday. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not persist in his intention, for if he does it will be my duty to oppose it. If any other day were taken, I should be happy to assist the Government.

THE O'CONOR DON, in seconding the Motion, said: The Motion which stands in my name for Friday is one in which the greatest interest is taken in Ireland, and it is important that the discussion should take place on that day. I do not wish in any way to threaten the Government, and I hope no language of that character may be used; but if they persevere in the intention that has been expressed, I am afraid it will not expedite Public Business. I would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that as this Motion is one in which so much interest is felt, and the importance of which the Government has admitted, whether it would be fair to take away from private Members the time which is usually theirs? We do not ask the Government to give us any time which the Government usually have; we merely ask that, on a question of this importance, they should not take away the time of private Members.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."—
(Major Nolan.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I can assure the House and the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken that nothing is further from my thought or that of the Government than to stand in the way of the discussion of the important Motion of which he has given Notice, and I hope it may be possible for us to take a fair discussion on the subject on Friday. But I must point out to them, and to other hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in this question, that really the fault that we are obliged to have recourse to this step will not lie with the Government. The House is perfectly well aware that it is essentially necessary for the Business of the country that we should go on with our Votes in Supply. They are perfectly well aware that the Government laid aside and postponed many measures of considerable importance, which they were now anxious to proceed with, for no other purpose than to give an opportunity for proceeding with Supply. They know that we took a Vote on account before the Recess, when we pledged ourselves, as far as we could, that we would not ask for another Vote of Credit, and to prevent our going to that necessity we have been proceeding with Supply night after night. But I am bound to say that we have come to the point that we shall be obliged to come for another Vote on account. Whether that be so or not, it is within the knowledge of all the Members of this House that the mode in which the Estimates have been opposed and questions raised upon them, renders it absolutely impossible for us to conduct the Business of the House satisfactorily. As matters stand all I can say is that if we make proper progress in Supply on Thursday I should not think of proposing a Morning Sitting on Friday. But it is in anticipation of our being in the same position as we have been several times recently that I have been obliged to give the intimation.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I suppose the right hon. Gentleman refers to the Motion which came on first on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair. But I would refer the Government to the fact that if any hon. Members have discussed the Estimates at greater length than is altogether according to the wishes of the Government that is a matter for which the hon. Members themselves are responsible. It has not been the intention of the Irish Members generally to obstruct the Estimates, and I, for my part, should object to the sins of particular individuals being visited on the whole Irish people. The Irish Members, however, have a right to discuss every Estimate that comes before the House. They have on a former occasion entreated the Government to take into consideration various important questions, especially relating to education—University Education and the Queen's Colleges. Year after year we have appealed to the Government to consider these subjects without result. We have brought forward Bills to remedy these grievances, but ever since the present Government has been in power we have not succeeded in passing a single measure of benefit to Ireland. It is, therefore, out of the question to suppose that Irish Members will consent to forego the bringing forward this Motion with respect to University Education, which Motion ought, indeed, to be brought forward by the Government itself, which has almost pledged itself to consider the matter. But every responsibility relating to Irish measures the Government have shirked. I have not joined in the discussions that have been raised recently; but it will be very unfortunate if the Chancellor of the Exchequer assumes the tone that he will endeavour to visit the sins of certain individuals whom he thinks have offended on the whole body of the Irish people. My hon. and gallant Colleague made a proposition which shows bond fide our intention in proposing to give up Saturday for a Morning Sitting. I believe we should all prefer to give up Saturday for a Morning Sitting rather than have this important discussion interfered with. The House would not desire anyone to hold out the semblance of a threat to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I hope he will take these remarks in good part, and understand that they only indicate the great importance we attach to this discussion, which ought naturally to come on on Friday.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY: The Chancellor of the Exchequer is anxious to have a Morning Sitting on Friday, which would mean postponing the discussion of the University Bill. I wish to note to the House that I have on the Notice Paper, before going into Committee of Supply, for Friday, a Motion on the subject of Irish Intermediate Education, and that will probably occupy three or four hours. There is one way in which the matter could be settled, and that is that the Minister who represents Ireland would, in half-an-hour, state on the first reading what he means to do with regard to what has been promised for four years on the subject of Intermediate Education.

MR. PARNELL: I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken a somewhat unfortunate method of expediting Supply. Unless he makes as much progress as he deems sufficient—I do not know how much that is—in the Irish Estimates to-morrow night, he says he will be compelled to take away from the Irish Members a portion of their evening in order to further the progress of those Estimates. In making that proposal, he is holding out to us the same sort of bargain he held out last year in regard to the discussion of the Queen's College Estimates. Last year he made a bargain with the Irish Members, that if they refrained from discussing those Estimates, he would give them a day for discussing the University Bill, and the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) accepted the compromise, and we got a day for the discussion, and much good it did us. The Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us now, in effect, if we refrain from discussing the Irish Estimates on Thursday night, he will allow us to have what belongs to us—namely, our evening on Friday to discuss the matter of University Education. I think that is a distinctly immoral proposition, and I, for one, do not in the slightest degree accept it. I refuse to refrain from advancing my views on the Irish Estimates in order to enable the hon. Member for Roscommon to retain that which he is justly entitled to, and I shall enter into no such compromise or bargain; but I tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he will not go into Supply if he takes a Morning Sitting on Friday. If, on the other hand, he takes a conciliatory course towards the Irish Members, and gives them that which is their due—namely, this Friday evening which they have obtained by the chances of ballot—I believe such a course will do far more to facilitate the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in obtaining Supply than any of those which I have heard him hold out to-night. I must really tell the right hon. Gentleman that the part of Henry VIII. does not at all become him. We read in English history that that King, when he wanted money for any purpose, used to stride about the House and say—"I will have your money or else I will have your heads." The Chancellor of the Exchequer has adopted a somewhat similar course, the only difference being that he strides into the House and says—"I will have your money or I will have your day." That is the threat which he holds out to the Irish Members, and is a threat to which they ought not to submit.

MR. CHAPLIN: I must also make a protest, and that is against the lecture to which the House has just listened. Hon. Members on both sides are, I am sure, prepared to bear testimony to the courteous and conciliatory manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer endeavours, on all occasions, and under the greatest difficulties, to conduct the Public Business. I hope, therefore, that he will not submit to the dictation which is attempted to be practised by a few of our number day after day. I impute no motives; but I believe the House perfectly well understands what is the object of those hon. Gentlemen who have recently discussed the Estimates in a manner so unprecedented. I trust that if, in future, the Public Business is obstructed, hon. Members on both sides of the House will rally round the Chancellor of the Exchequer and support him.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. BIGGAR: We have heard a very nice lecture, in cool style, from the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin); but I really do think if he would perform his duty to his constituents, he would be in his place and attend to the discussion of the Estimates, and see that the public money was properly disposed of. I have not been very long in this House, but I have some little experience of the manner in which Business is conducted, and I believe that fair limits have not been exceeded in the discussion of the Estimates. I raised a discussion the other night—

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out that the hon. Member is out of Order in referring to a former debate in this House.

MR. BIGGAR: I want to point out the mode in which a division was taken.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to discuss a Vote already taken.

MR. BIGGAR: I have this day received a letter from a correspondent in Scotland, pointing out a particular Scotch Vote, which, he says, was thoroughly unreasonable.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY rose to Order. The hon. Gentleman was disregarding the ruling of the Speaker.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled, under cover of a communication, to advert to a Vote passed in this House.

MR. BIGGAR: I contend that the time occupied in discussing the Estimates has not been wasted. As to the question of Irish University Education, it is a subject upon which the Irish people take a great interest, and it should, therefore, be fairly discussed. It is a question which cannot be shelved, and will not be shelved; and I do not think we have a right to go on our knees and beg as a particular favour for what belongs to us. This proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a sample of the way in which the Business is conducted by the Government. The Government get up discussions upon collateral issues, and, instead of occupying the time with legitimate Business, it is wasted. This is the universal experience of the way in which the time of the House is wasted.

M O T I O N S .

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (NEW CODE).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. PEASE, in rising to call attention to Clause 98 of the Act 33 and 34 Vic. c. 75 (the Elementary Education Act), and to Section "B," Article 7, of "Preliminary Chapter" of the "Code of 1878 of Minutes of the Education Department," and to the manner in which the Committee of Council on Education are taking action thereon; and to move—

said, there was a clause in the Act by which Minutes were to be in force only when they had been laid on the Table of the House for one month. And he thought that the Minute in the Code issued at the commencement of the year overrode the 98th section of the Act, which provided that the managers of any schools in a school board district, and not in receipt of an annual grant, might apply to the Education Department for a Parliamentary grant, which might, however, be refused in the case of "unnecessary schools." The assumption was that the grant would be made except in cases of misconduct and mala fides. He would, with the permission of the House, refer to several instances, which would show that the Education Department was unnecessarily strict in its inquiries into the school accommodation of districts, taking as the basis of an unnecessary school the mere fact of there being school seats in some other school. By this method, the children of Church attenders might be sent into Roman Catholic or Dissenting schools, or the children of Dissenters into National schools, the result of which was that the difficulty of carrying on the work of education in the country was increased. After alluding to various other schools in different parts of England, he said the strongest case occurred in Stanhope, a town in the county he had the honour to represent. In July, 1873, a deficiency of 920 in the school accommodation of the district was declared to exist. Before the close of 1873 the people formed a school board, which built five as complete schools as he had ever seen. He had the honour of opening two or three of them. In the town of Stanhope there was a very large Dissenting element, and the school board asked leave to build a school to accommodate 200 children. Notice, however, was given that besides the Barrington Church schools, a school which had been formerly closed, would be opened, and that another was also available; and the Department then held that there was sufficient school accommodation in the town. He had not one word to say against the management of the Barrington schools, to which he was himself an annual subscriber; but, practically, there was not a single Dissenting school in the place. The school board urged the Department to relax their rule, but they declined; then the Wesleyans, with their usual zeal, built a school to accommodate 200 children, and asked to be placed on the list for the annual grants. But the Department declined to sanction the proposed school, on the ground that such school accommodation for Stanhope was not required. The school, however, was opened, and the Government Inspector was pleased with the building and furniture, and said that the results of the examination were decidedly good. There were 182 scholars in attendance. In January, 1877, they again asked to be placed on the list for grants, and were again refused. He was told on good authority that about two-thirds of the people attended the Dissenting chapels. The cases which he had cited went to show that which he thought was indiscretion on the part of the Department in assuming too much local control. The effect of the Article in question was to make the power of refusing grants to certain schools compulsory, and to extend the operation of Clause 98 into non-school board districts, and he believed it was entirely beyond the powers of the Department, by an Article in the Code, to override the statute law. He did not advocate the total repeal of the 98th section of the Act of 1870. He thought it was right that the Department should have a certain amount of power, but it should be very cautiously exercised. He doubted if the powers the noble Lord was endeavouring to get were not illegal powers. It was not desirable that they should have too much centralized in Downing Street the control over the choice made by parents in this country of the schools to which they should send their children. It seemed to him that it made no difference to the State whether children were educated in a Board school, a National school, or a Roman Catholic school, provided they came up to certain Standards. The Code now on the Table was not, in his view, in accordance with the Act of 1870, and he thought that if the Education Department wanted further powers, they ought to come to the House for them by means of an Act of Parliament. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to direct the amendment of the New Code of Regulations of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, by the omission of Article 'b' of section 7 of the said Code."—
(Mr. Pease.)

MR. A. MILLS observed, that it was one thing to alter the Code, and possibly to deal with the 98th clause of the Act of 1870 so as to create what was called a free trade in voluntary schools, and it was quite another thing to arm an ambitious school board with the power of establishing a new school, even where sufficient accommodation had been provided. The hon. Member opposite had mentioned about 26 cases in which he thought the present state of the law and the action of the Department had worked injustice; but he would remind him that there were in England and Wales considerably more than 14,000 public elementary schools; therefore, the grievance, even if it existed in the cases named, was not a very large one as compared with the total number of schools in the country. If, however, the action of the Department inflicted wrong in only very few instances, of course, the wrong ought, if possible, to be set right. But he thought it was very undesirable that they should have constant changes in their Education Code, and still more in their Education Acts. His own experience was that the 98th clause of the Education Act of 1870 was a very valuable one. It said—

"If the managers of any school which is situate in the district of a school board acting under this Act, and is not previously in receipt of an annual Parliamentary grant, whether such managers are a school board or not, apply to the Education Department for a Parliamentary grant, the Education Department may, if they think that such school is unnecessary, refuse such application."

The sub-section of the Code, which the hon. Member wished to cut out, said that no grant was to be made for any school which had not previously received an annual grant if the Department thought such school unnecessary. Thus, the powers given by Clause 98 of the Act were simply incorporated in the Code in order to carry out the provisions of the clause. There was no difference between the 98th clause of the Act and the sub-section of the Code, and the two must stand or fall together. He hoped Parliament would not deprive the Department of its veto in regard to unnecessary schools, for the indefinite multiplication of schools would cause a deterioration of the quality of the education. It might be fair, even when there was sufficient school accommodation, to relax the rule, so that the Department might not exercise its veto. This might happen, for instance, where Roman Catholics, or Wesleyans, or members of the Church of England, having no school suited to their requirements, were willing to build one at their own cost; but, in cases such as that of the London School Board, where, at least, 10*d.* in every shilling was paid by the public, any such relaxation would be a change tending very much to the disadvantage of the public.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he agreed with the Resolution of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease); but, as he was responsible for the Act of 1870, he wished to say why he did so. He thought there was a great difference between the power to be given to the Education Department by the 98th section of the Act of 1870, and the power allowed by the Article of the Code. The section of the Act of 1870 said that in school board districts, and in them only, the annual Parliamentary grant might be refused for a new school if the Education Department thought that such a school was unnecessary. The Minute, on the other hand, said that no grant might be made in respect of any new school if the Education Department thought the school unnecessary. By the section the Department might use their discretion if they thought it unnecessary; but by the Minute, if they thought it unnecessary, they were bound to refuse it. There was a difference between the two, and an intentional difference. Besides, in order to guard against a too frequent use of the power of refusal, and to make it evident that its purpose was of a very special kind, for a special purpose, the section of the Act demanded that in each case a special Report should be made, showing the ground on which the grant was refused; but the Minute required nothing of the kind, and there was this other and great difference—that the section was confined to school board districts. The Minute introduced a perfectly new system into the Education Act, and, till it came before the House, he had no idea that the Department considered they had legally the power to assume to themselves the duty of deciding, with regard to every new school throughout the Kingdom, whether or not it was wanted. This, however, was what the Department was really doing. A great evil might follow on that new principle. He had always understood that the Vote was distributed in annual grants to all schools that fulfilled certain conditions laid down originally in the Code, and now, in the Act of Parliament, as to masters and buildings. Every school was invited to earn what it could, and that, briefly, was the principle on which the Vote had been apportioned among them. There was a provision against extreme cases; but, so little had he supposed the Department could take upon themselves the power to refuse a grant, simply because they thought a school unnecessary, that he had constantly, while refusing assistance from the funds of the Public Works Loan Commissioners, said that a school would have to be built, if at all, by the rates levied for the year. That, he had always thought, was a sufficient protection, and that he had taken to be practically the only power they had. He said—"You can build the school at your own expense if you think fit." If that screw were kept, they need not be uneasy that there would be unnecessary schools. He might think some schools not wanted, but if a school was once set up, he would never refuse the grant, except in cases of mala fides, against which provision was made in the Act. The new power was certainly very arbitrary, and, without entering into the merits of the special cases that had been brought forward, it was clear that in all these cases persons thought they had been hardly treated. His hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) seemed to suppose it necessary to check the action of school boards; but hon. Members must not support this Minute on the supposition that it would merely tell in favour of school boards. If this Minute were allowed to remain, it might be turned against any fresh denominational schools whatever. This he should be sorry to see, because he thought that taxpayers had a right to have a special denominational school if they fulfilled the conditions, and were willing to run the very severe risk of having to pay their share of the rates and subscribe to their own schools as well. He could not help taking a great interest in the actual work of the Department; and he did feel that, in undertaking to decide whether a school was wanted or not in any particular district, they imposed on themselves an amount of anxious labour of which they had little conception, while it would create heartburning and opposition in almost every district in which they exercised this power. There might be Departmental reasons for the change, but they could not be aware of the labour they were undertaking. With regard to the legal question, he thought, quite unintentionally, his noble Friend had somewhat strained the law. When he (Mr. W. E. Forster) was bringing in the Education Bill, he was of opinion that the Department had no power to refuse the annual grant to schools, and, therefore, thinking it necessary, in very extreme cases, that they should take that power, he put in the special section so often alluded to; but the very fact that the House passed it, was, to him, a very strong argument, if not a proof, that there was no power to go beyond that section. In Section 9, the Act laid down the conditions to be fulfilled by elementary schools, in order to obtain an annual Parliamentary grant. Surely, when they had decided by law that certain conditions should be fulfilled—which conditions were to be contained in the Minutes of the Education Department—it was stretching that section to say that the Education Department should have the power in their discretion to say what schools should be wanted or not. Surely, it was almost a mockery to say by Act of Parliament, that grants should be given on certain conditions, and then to say that really meant nothing at all, because the Department had the discretion of refusal. He hoped his hon. Friend would not push this matter to a division. It was a case which might fairly be left to the Government to consider. No doubt they would fairly consider it, and perhaps he was not asking too much when he asked them to give some consideration to the arguments he had brought forward. He would say one word with regard to the Scotch Act. New schools in Scotland were treated differently from new schools in England. The former merely developed the rate system, which was quite in accordance with the educational genius of Scotland. The provision with regard to new schools was that all new voluntary schools, or schools not public schools, should be refused a Parliamentary grant, unless the Department consented to a special grant to them, either from regard to the religious opinions of those who wanted them or the special necessities of the district. There was to be a special report in every case in which a grant was made to a new voluntary school; but there was nothing in the Scotch Act about refusing a grant to any public school, and he felt convinced, if it had been stated that in passing the Scotch Act power had been taken to give to the Education Department the discretion to refuse grants to any new school board school, such a provision would not have been passed. In the Scotch Code of this year, however, the Department had inserted a Minute in which they had taken the words in the Scotch Act, omitting only these words, "not being a public school;" and thus, by a stroke of the pen, the Department had taken on themselves the power to refuse grants to every new public school. The Department might have thought it advisable to make this change to prevent the multiplication of small schools. He did not think this change necessary for that purpose. He thought it better for the Department to rely on the obstacles to the erection of unnecessary schools arising from the expense involved in building and maintaining them than on the reports of its own officers. He believed that not one school in 1,000 would be started if not wanted. If, however, the Government, on a re-consideration of the whole question, thought it their duty to claim this power, in his opinion, the proper Parliamentary course incumbent upon them would be to propose an Amendment of the Act, giving them the additional power which they thought they ought to possess.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY approved of the Resolution brought forward by the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease), especially as there was no desire manifested to interfere with the 90th section of the Education Act. He trusted the Government would see that it had gone further than was necessary either to guard the public purse or in the interests of education. If they wished to avoid heartburnings, discontent, and dissatisfaction, they would have the law amended. If the hon. Member pressed his Motion to a division he should support him.

MR. RAMSAY thanked the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—and he thought the people of Scotland would be equally grateful to the right hon. Gentleman—for the remarks he had made with reference to Scotland. He hoped that, so far as Scotland was concerned, the Education Department would re-consider the matter, for the change made in the Scotch Code had set aside the provisions of the Act of Parliament. He understood that the Code should be framed in such terms as to carry out the express provisions of the Statute; but the omission of the words "not being a public school" virtually repealed one of these provisions, and, if so, involved such a change of the law as he thought it was not competent for the Department to make. He suggested that the hon. Member for Durham should not insist on a division, and hoped that the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) would admit that this subject deserved consideration, and that he would see that the Code should be altered so as to make it conform with the terms of the Act of Parliament.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, he entirely concurred in the views expressed by the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease), and in the object which he aimed at by his Resolution. The Government should find no difficulty at all in steering a clear way between the different courses which had been suggested. He, however, differed from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr.

W. E. Forster) and the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) on the distinction which they drew between the 98th clause of the Act and the 7th section of the Code. He thought the difference consisted in this—that the Act of Parliament was directory and the Code was affirmative. There was no essential difference between the two. He thought the principle of religious liberty should be the guide in matters of this sort, and he trusted that the Act of Parliament would be so interpreted by the Education Department as to enable them to give the necessary assistance to denominational schools, no matter what their religious character might be. There was one particular which should be kept in view—namely, that the principle of confidence which they extended in this respect to denominational schools, for which persons actuated by religious zeal and charitable motives made large sacrifices and considerable efforts, did not apply to board schools, which were not the offspring of religious earnestness, which involved no sacrifice on the part of the managers, but were institutions worked by means of the money of the ratepayers.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he wished very briefly to undertake the defence of this sub-section which had been called in question to-night. Having only recently acceded to his present Office, he would have been quite willing to leave its defence to his Predecessors who framed it; but he thought it right to state why, in his opinion, the House ought not to assent to this Motion. In doing that, he must acknowledge the temperate character of the speeches of hon. Members opposite who had addressed themselves to this question. The subject under discussion was somewhat larger than would appear at first sight. The sub-section had been placed in the Act for the purpose of asserting that a discretion was placed in the hands of the Privy Council in this matter. He was glad to find that all the great voluntary associations interested in the promotion of religious education had acknowledged that the past action of the Department had given satisfaction. Therefore, unless this sub-section indicated some departure from the principle upon which the Education Department had administered the grants, he did not see how it could give offence to any religious clared to exist. Before the close of 1873 the people formed a school board, which built five as complete schools as he had ever seen. He had the honour of opening two or three of them. In the town of Stanhope there was a very large Dissenting element, and the school board asked leave to build a school to accommodate 200 children. Notice, however, was given that besides the Barrington Church schools, a school which had been formerly closed, would be opened, and that another was also available; and the Department then held that there was sufficient school accommodation in the town. He had not one word to say against the management of the Barrington schools, to which he was himself an annual subscriber; but, practically, there was not a single Dissenting school in the place. The school board urged the Department to relax their rule, but they declined; then the Wesleyans, with their usual zeal, built a school to accommodate 200 children, and asked to be placed on the list for the annual grants. But the Department declined to sanction the proposed school, on the ground that such school accommodation for Stanhope was not required. The school, however, was opened, and the Government Inspector was pleased with the building and furniture, and said that the results of the examination were decidedly good. There were 182 scholars in attendance. In January, 1877, they again asked to be placed on the list for grants, and were again refused. He was told on good authority that about two-thirds of the people attended the Dissenting chapels. The cases which he had cited went to show that which he thought was indiscretion on the part of the Department in assuming too much local control. The effect of the Article in question was to make the power of refusing grants to certain schools compulsory, and to extend the operation of Clause 98 into non-school board districts, and he believed it was entirely beyond the powers of the Department, by an Article in the Code, to override the statute law. He did not advocate the total repeal of the 98th section of the Act of 1870. He thought it was right that the Department should have a certain amount of power, but it should be very cautiously exercised. He doubted if the powers the noble Lord was endeavouring to get were not illegal powers. It was not desirable that they should have too much centralized in Downing Street the control over the choice made by parents in this country of the schools to which they should send their children. It seemed to him that it made no difference to the State whether children were educated in a Board school, a National school, or a Roman Catholic school, provided they came up to certain Standards. The Code now on the Table was not, in his view, in accordance with the Act of 1870, and he thought that if the Education Department wanted further powers, they ought to come to the House for them by means of an Act of Parliament. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to direct the amendment of the New Code of Regulations of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, by the omission of Article 'b' of section 7 of the said Code."—(Mr. Pease.)

MR. A. MILLS observed, that it was one thing to alter the Code, and possibly to deal with the 98th clause of the Act of 1870 so as to create what was called a free trade in voluntary schools, and it was quite another thing to arm an ambitious school board with the power of establishing a new school, even where sufficient accommodation had been provided. The hon. Member opposite had mentioned about 26 cases in which he thought the present state of the law and the action of the Department had worked injustice; but he would remind him that there were in England and Wales considerably more than 14,000 public elementary schools; therefore, the grievance, even if it existed in the cases named, was not a very large one as compared with the total number of schools in the country. If, however, the action of the Department inflicted wrong in only very few instances, of course, the wrong ought, if possible, to be set right. But he thought it was very undesirable that they should have constant changes in their Education Code, and still more in their Education Acts. His own experience was that the 98th clause of the Education Act of 1870 was a very valuable one. It said—

"If the managers of any school which is situate in the district of a school board acting

this power, in his opinion, the proper Parliamentary course incumbent upon them would be to propose an Amendment of the Act, giving them the additional power which they thought they ought to possess.

community. The two points upon which the hon. Member had dwelt the most were—first, was this sub-section legal? and secondly, if legal, was it wise and expedient? Upon the first point, the Education Department contended that they ought to have the same discretion as to making these annual grants as they possessed before the passing of the Act of 1870, and which was merely strengthened by that Act. By that Act, the Education Department was made the instrument by which educational deficiencies of different localities were pointed out, and discretion was given to the Department to call upon the different localities to make good those deficiencies. The sub-section in question was inserted for the purpose of making it known that the Education Department would permit rivalry and competition among schools in all parts of the Kingdom, but within certain limits. Hon. Members who had spoken on this subject had made no suggestion as to the alternative action that should supply the place of that pointed out by this sub-section. In his opinion, the only other alternative action that could be adopted was that of free trade in schools. As regarded school board districts, the school boards were bound to supply the deficiencies of school accommodation, and in that case the Education Department could not consent to the establishment of denominational schools afterwards; but in non-school board districts the Department was willing, within certain limits, to allow competition between all classes of schools. If, however, free trade in schools were to be established as a general principle, essential changes must be introduced in the Act of 1870. By the Act of 1870, school boards were established for the purpose of exercising the primary duty of providing for educational deficiencies in the localities over which they had authority, and of even providing for prospective deficiencies in those districts; and, therefore, if it were not for the control of the Education Department over the school boards in the way of expenditure, the latter would have the power of establishing ad libitum as many schools as they chose. Under the Act, the Education Department had the right to refuse a grant to any school which, in their opinion, was unnecessary, and by the Act of 1873, the Department had the power of refusing any loan for a school which was deemed unnecessary. In nearly all the cases to which the hon. Member for Durham had referred the Education Department were bound to refuse the grant. An application was made for a grant for a school board school in the Stanhope district, and it was refused by the Department because they thought the school unnecessary. It was not, therefore, competent to the Education Department to give subsequently to a voluntary school what they had denied to a school board school. The cases to which attention had been called were cases in which the Department had acted in strict accordance with the sections in the Act of 1870 which were applicable to them, and no other course would be possible unless that Act was altered. He thought the House would agree with the opinion of the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) that it was not possible, at any rate, at present, to make any alteration in the Elementary Education Acts which had recently been passed. There might, perhaps, be found some means of relieving the managers of schools of a part of the difficulty of which they now complained, and he would undertake to re-consider that part of the section which referred to non-school board districts, with the view of defining, to a certain extent, what, in the opinion of the Department, would or would not constitute an unnecessary school. The only object of the Department in endeavouring to curtail the number of schools in any way was to promote efficiency. No one, he thought, who had the interests of education and of the schools at heart, would desire to see abolished the discretion entrusted to the Department in reference to the making of grants; but many who had studied the question might think that there should be some modification of the existing rules, and it was with a view to this that he would take the matter in hand, without, however, pledging himself to any particular course. He saw no insuperable difficulty in the way of making grants to bond fide schools which had been in existence for some little time, and which had a sufficiently large attendance, and he therefore hoped the hon. Member for Durham would not think it necessary to press his Motion to a division; if he did, he (Lord George Hamilton) would move the Previous Question, as he agreed with many of the arguments of the hon. Gentleman, but not with his conclusions.

Mr. PEASE said, he was satisfied with the assurance of the noble Lord, and would ask the House for leave to withdraw the Motion, which he had put upon the Paper in no spirit of hostility to the general scope of the Education Acts or the manner in which the Department had administered them.

Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD said, he regretted that this wholly unnecessary Minute was not to be withdrawn, for it was likely to cause great dissatisfaction. The Education Department would do wisely to recognize the absolute necessity of free trade in schools in all districts. As an advocate of denominational education, and at the same time of fair play, he believed that if they were to continue the denominational system, the law should be made equal in its operation to all forms of religious belief, and that no hard-and-fast line should be held by the Education Department in dealing with these schools.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I beg to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the question of Parliamentary Reporting. I do not know whether the House will think it desirable that I should occupy their time by any discussion upon this question. I should rather apprehend that it would be more convenient not to do so, and I will simply say that the object I have in view is moving the appointment of this Committee is not simply to consider the question which is involved in the recent new arrangement with Mr. Hansard, but I also propose that the Committee should consider any other arrangements, or the propriety of entering into any other arrangements, which may be thought desirable. I believe there are several hon. Gentlemen in this House who have paid a good deal of attention to this subject, and some have expressed a desire to bring before us their various views. No doubt, the matter is rather a complex one, and the objects are of a character which render it impossible to attain them all completely; because we desire to have correct reports, we desire to have full reports, we desire to have reports which shall not be unnecessarily or very long delayed in their publication, and we desire not to be burdened with a great mass of unnecessary matter. It is obviously very difficult to draw the line so as to attain the maximum good with the minimum of inconvenience; but I believe a well-selected Committee—one that will attend to the subject, and will receive evidence—may be able to do a very good service to the House. Without further remark, therefore, I will move for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider the question of Parliamentary Reporting.

MAJOR NOLAN: I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make this Committee a large Committee, and for this reason. There are two or three Irish Members who are very anxious to serve upon it. My hon. Colleague the Member for the county of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was the first to draw attention to this subject. Then, there is the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Dunbar), who is, I believe, the only Member of this House who has been in the Reporters' Gallery; and there is also the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), who has been a good deal connected with newspapers and reporting matters. These three hon. Gentlemen would be very competent to serve on such a Committee, and, therefore, I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will make it sufficiently large to include them.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to consider the question of Parliamentary Reporting."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

And, on June 17, Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Viscount CRICHTON, Mr. LYON PLAYFAIR, Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Mr. WALTER, Lord FRANCIS HERVEY, Mr. DUNBAR, Mr. HALL, Mr. MITCHELL HENRY, Sir HENRY WOLFF, Mr. BARCLAY, and Mr. MILLS:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

EPHING FOREST BILL.

LEAVE.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in rising to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the disafforestation of Epping Forest, and the preservation and management of the uninclosed parts thereof as an open space for the recreation and enjoyment of the public, and for other purposes, said, the House had had, on more than one occasion, the subject of Epping Forest before it. The old argument had been that inclosures were beneficial to the public; and, in consequence of an opinion of the Law Officers of 1853, the rights of the Crown over 3,000 or 4,000 acres had been sold, and the lords of manors had made a great number of inclosures. But, in the year 1860, an Address to the Crown was carried, expressing a hope that the sale of Crown rights over the Forest would be prevented. In 1865, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had a Bill passed, transferring the Crown rights from the Office of Woods and Forests to that of the First Commissioner of Works. Subsequent inclosures kept public attention alive to the subject; and in 1870 the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) carried an Address to the Crown, to the effect that the Common should be preserved as an open space for the enjoyment of the public—the first time that principle had been recognized in the House of Commons. As a result of that Address, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), brought in a Bill which he said would, by a compromise, secure the just rights of the public. The Bill was brought in late in the Session and did not pass, and, in the following Session, a Resolution adverse to the proposal of the Bill, which would, it was said, only secure 600 acres to the public, was moved by his right hon. Friend the Member for South Hampshire, and carried by a large majority. This was followed by a Bill appointing a Commission to inquire into the question, and the next year another Bill was passed, under which certain suits which had been instituted were stayed, save one called the City suit, in which the Master of the Rolls made a decree with respect to the right of the commoners in 1874. The matter was argued at considerable length before the Commissioners, and a preliminary Report was made in 1875. In 1877, a final Report was presented in the shape of a scheme which was before the Government at the commencement of the Session, and it then became a question with the Government how that scheme should be dealt with—whether it should be dealt with in the form of a Provisional Order, or in some other form. There were certain technical difficulties in the way of bringing the scheme forward in the ordinary form, and the Government had to consider what steps should be taken, anxious as it was that a final settlement should be made. The Act of 1871 contemplated a final settlement, and the Government thought that by introducing a Bill, without re-opening again the old difficulties, they might carry out the original intention. The Bill was drawn, and it handed over to the City the Forest to be preserved as an open space for the public for ever. Great care had been taken, and litigation would, it was hoped, be avoided. The Bill set up an arbitration to decide what were “gardens” and “curtilages,” and what should be paid to the lords of manors. The case was one for agreement between the parties interested. He believed that the Government scheme had met with considerable favour by all who had interest in the suit before the Master of the Rolls. The Bill, he hoped, would prove a permanent settlement of a long-vexed question. When it was printed, it would be found that the measure would carry out the principal recommendations of the scheme suggested by the Commissioners. The hon. Member concluded by moving for leave to introduce the Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE expressed his satisfaction that the Government had brought in this Bill, and hoped it might be a final solution of this most important question, and would permanently secure to the public this great open Forest, and an end put to one of the most gigantic systems of land robbery that there had ever been in this country.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. LOCKE said, that there had been great difficulty at first in approving the measure, and it might still be necessary to wait and consider what were its provisions.

COUNTY INFIRMARIES, &c. (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Meldon, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Errington.)

ORDER FOR SECOND READING DEFERRED.

MR. MELDON moved that the Order for the Second Reading be postponed to the 19th June.

MR. O'SULLIVAN moved, as an Amendment, that the Order be discharged. He wished to know whether it was in Order for the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) to pursue the course he had taken with regard to this measure? It had been before the House since July, 1876, when it was first introduced, and it related to a subject of great importance to Ireland; for they had many county infirmaries in that country, and—

MR. SPEAKER rose to Order, and remarked that on a Motion for the postponement of the second reading of the Bill, it was not competent to the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan) to discuss the merits of the Bill itself.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he bowed to the decision of the Chair, and would only say that he thought the hon. and learned Member for Kildare was trifling with the House in bringing this measure forward as he had done. As he had stated, it was first brought before the House in July, 1876, and had been re-introduced since; and yet when the day fixed for its second reading had arrived, and the Bill was the first Order of the Day, it was found that it had not been printed. He wished to ask whether the hon. and learned Gentleman was justified in such a course?

MR. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. Member that it is the constant practice of this House for Members in charge of Bills to be allowed to postpone the different stages of those Bills as unopposed Motions; and if debates were to arise on questions of that character, it would become highly inconvenient to the House. The hon. Member states that the Bill has not yet been printed, and I am bound to say that is a very good reason for the postponement of the second reading. At the same time, I wish to point out that it is the duty of an hon. Member of this House who obtains leave to introduce a Bill, and who fixes the second reading for a particular day, to have the Bill printed. Under the circumstances, the hon. Member will probably think fit to withdraw his Amendment.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, hon. Members had complained, with a certain show of good reason, of the appearance on the Paper on Wednesday last of two Bills with a kindred object. The hon. Gentleman was about to explain the circumstances under which this had occurred, when—

MR. SPEAKER said, the Motion before the House was the postponement of the second reading of this Bill, and the hon. Member must confine his observations to that Question.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he did not think it was fair of the hon. and learned Member who had charge of the Bill to be trifling with the House in that manner. The Bill would appear to have been put in the place it held on the Order Paper as a species of ambuscade in order that another Bill might be marched to the front, and he hoped the House would discountenance such a practice.

MR. MELDON explained that the only reason why the Bill had not been printed was that certain Returns which were moved for by the hon. Member for Carlow, which were of the utmost importance and had not yet been presented to the House.

MR. O'SULLIVAN thought he had discharged his duty in calling attention to the matter, and he would, therefore, withdraw his Amendment; at the same time, he was of opinion that the hon.

and learned Member (Mr. Meldon) had treated the House very badly in not having the Bill printed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday, 19th June.

COMMITTEE. [Progress 24th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA rose to move that a new clause, of which he had given Notice, be inserted after Clause 1. He said he trusted the clause would commend itself to the Committee's sense of justice and fair play; more especially as he believed it to be backed up by the almost universal public opinion of Ireland. For his part, he believed which the public opinion that had been brought to bear on the House, and which had influenced it in accepting the principle of the Bill, was rather that which was held by the upper classes, or what he might term the cream of Irish society, than that of the mass of the people, or that portion of them who were in the habit of frequenting public-houses. It was true that the majority of his own constituents had signed a Petition in favour of the Bill; but he thought the observations he had to make on the clause he was about to move were deserving of more consideration on account of this fact, than if his constituents, generally, had been against the Bill. He had taken some trouble during the last year or two in endeavouring to ascertain how public opinion in general was affected on this question, and he had found that, at least in those parts of Ireland in which he occasionally resided, the mass of the people were against the measure. The more respectable portion of the people—the upper classes, at any rate—approved of the principle of the Bill, and, of course, all the teetotalers, the strictly temperate people, and the Sabbatarians, were in its favour; but the grounds on which they supported the measure were hardly such as would commend themselves to the Committee if they were fairly stated, because they could not be held to be really conclusive on the subject. Well, for that reason, no doubt, Her Majesty's Government had deemed it their duty to move, or to suggest, an Amendment to the 1st clause of the Bill, and, for his part, he was perfectly contented with that Amendment so far as it went; but the clause, so amended, afforded a key to the legislation which he was about to ask the Committee to sanction. The Bill, as originally brought in, had found favour with the House; but the Government had procured the insertion of an Amendment, exempting five of the largest towns in Ireland—namely, Dublin, Limerick, Cork, Waterford, and Belfast—from the operation of the measure. Now, if the universal opinion of Ireland were in favour of such a measure as this—if the people, generally, would accept it quietly and with good humour, and believed it might be beneficial in its operation—he should have nothing to say against it; but this was not the case. On the contrary, the people had challenged the exemptions that had been made, not because they were exemptions, but because of their partial and one-sided character. For instance, those who lived in a number of the smaller seaport towns and watering-places, which were, at present, included in the general scope of the Bill, objected very naturally that the larger seaport towns and watering-places were exempted from the operation of the measure, and they objected, on the ground that their interests might be affected by the competition of favoured localities. With a view of remedying, in some degree, the inequality thus established, he proposed, that after Clause 1 the following clause should be inserted:—

(Other corporate towns and towns under town Commissioners.)

"All towns in Ireland other than those mentioned and provided for in Clause 1, and which are under the government of a corporation or of town commissioners, shall be restricted to the same hours only as those which apply to the city of Dublin until such time as the corporation or town commissioners of such town respectively shall by a resolution passed by an actual majority of the full number of members of the corporation or of the town commissioners in each case determine that such town shall come under the general provisions of the Act for the prohibition of sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday."

A friend of his had said to him, after reading the proposed new clause—"I am afraid this is only the Permissive Bill in another shape;" but he was happy to say that he had been able to satisfy his friend that the clause was not at all in the nature of the Permissive Bill. It was simply a clause giving permission to each town possessing a local government of its own to veto the operation of the Act as far as its own limits were concerned. This was all it amounted to; and if, in such places, the majority of the Corporation or Town Commissioners thought fit to place their district under the operation of the Bill, it would be competent for them to do so. The general result would be, that if the measure were carried into law, the Legislature, by passing his clause, would have harnessed to it the guardians of public opinion in each locality, and have thrown upon the authorities the responsibility either of carrying the law into effect, or of refusing to do so. He was by no means in favour of Sunday drinking; on the contrary, he thought that if society would agree to do so, it should be put down as nearly as possible. ["Hear, hear!"] His hon. Friends might mean those "Hear, hears!" to some extent as derisive cheers. ["No, no!"] Then, he was willing so to accept them; but he would add that there was no greater friend of temperance, or that which would promote temperance, in that House than he had been, nor one who had been more sincere and practical. He had presented the clause he was now moving to the Committee with the view of conducing not only to the cause of temperance, but also to the cause of good government, and in the hope of making the law as acceptable to the majority of the community as possible. Therefore, he asked the Committee to harness to this new legislation the Corporations and Town Commissioners of Ireland, and charge them with the responsibility of carrying it into effect. By doing this, they would only be giving a certain number of towns the right to decide whether they would, through their local representatives, give effect to the law which had found favour in that

House; and if that legislation should in course of time turn out to be effectual and generally acceptable to the country, no one would more rejoice at such a result than he should. He admitted that some of the arguments in favour of the Bill were unanswerable; but they were insufficient. There was no doubt that it would tend to promote decorum and a due respect for the Sabbath. Therefore, as far as externals went, the Bill was a good one; but, on the other hand, he had high authority for saying that the principle of Sunday observance might be pushed to an extent which no Christian authority would exact, and, therefore, as there were no religious dogmatic decrees against the opening of public-houses on a Sunday, he felt that it was pushing the Sabbatarian principle too far to say that for the mere purpose of promoting Sabbath decorum, and for that alone, Parliament ought to impose the restrictions contained in that Bill upon a people who did not sympathize so strongly with the measure or to the same extent as the majority in that House. There was, however, another point, which he thought the House ought to take into consideration before they decided on the rejection of his clause—the fact that, although the restriction on Sunday-drinking imposed upon the Scotch people by the Forbes-Mackenzie Act had tended to promote Sabbath observance in Scotland, it had not tended to promote the cause of temperance in the slightest degree. Sabbath decorum was very well as far as it went, and he would admit the force of the argument founded upon it, and he would aid it as far as he thought the bulk of the Irish people were willing to go. Personally, the measure as it stood would be no deprivation to him, nor to numbers of his friends who felt as he did; therefore, they had no selfish object to serve in saying—“Let the public-houses be open on Sundays as well as on other days;” but he argued that, inasmuch as the total quantity of liquor consumed in Scotland had considerably increased since the passing of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act, so that there was more drink purchased now in six days than was formerly drunk in seven, he held that it was too much to say that a similar measure in Ireland would have a contrary effect. He begged to move that the clause be added to Clause 1.

Sir Joseph M'Kenna

New Clause—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. MACARTNEY said, that the Amendment would cut away the most valuable portion of the Bill. There were a number of towns in Ireland which were incorporated, and in all those towns an agitation would be carried on for a considerable time, in order to prevent the Commissioners from carrying this law into effect. As regarded the Bill as it now stood, not only the real majority of the inhabitants of Belfast, but the Corporation of Belfast, were in favour of restriction. If the small towns of Ireland were to have this privilege, why should not the same rule be applied to Belfast? Would they accept a proposal for the same rule to be applied to the City of Cork? Would it be fair to apply this proposal to small places, and not apply it also to large towns? Hon. Members would do well, in proposing new clauses, not to bring forward proposals which cut at the principle of the Bill. That principle had been considered. The House had affirmed it on many occasions, and it was hardly fair to come forward with a new clause which would neutralize the Bill.

MR. MACDONALD said, he had no wish to interfere in this question of Irish Sunday closing, further than to say that the objection made to this clause seemed to invalidate what had been said regarding the unanimity of feeling in Ireland in respect to this Bill. If all Ireland were in favour of Sunday closing, this clause would be inoperative. It was clear, from the argument raised by the hon. Gentleman opposite, that he was afraid of trusting the people. While he repeated that he did not wish to interfere with Irish Sunday closing, the opposition to this proposal seemed to him to give abundant evidence that Irish opinion was not in favour of the Bill, or there would be no indisposition to allow the people in the various localities to choose whether they would have the principle of this Bill applied or not.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING was altogether opposed to any exemptions in this Bill; but, five towns having been exempted, he did not think the proposal of the hon. Member (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) was one which, in the point of view of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), he could refuse to support. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) had put forward an objection. He was really surprised to hear that objection come from him, because he had lately heard that all the towns in Ireland in the rural districts were in favour of this measure. The Town Councils, who would be empowered by a majority of votes to deal with this matter, were parties elected for the purpose of carrying out those measures which would be of benefit to the cities or towns they represented. Could there be anything more reasonable and rational than to leave to those who were responsible to the ratepayers or the people the decision of the question whether they were to have public-houses open on Sundays, or should close them at a certain time? He could conceive nothing more reasonable. With regard to this clause, his hon. Friend carried it too far; because, if he took the hours of keeping open public-houses in Dublin he would extend the time in some of the towns, and would have the public-houses open longer than at present. In the City of Dublin, he believed, the houses were open from 2 until 9.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, for the purpose of saving the time of the Committee, wished to say that his intention was, that in no case should the previous hours be extended. Therefore, if the House agreed to the principle of his clause, he should take care that words were added to provide that no extension should take place beyond the hours at present enjoyed. As he had already promised this, he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) would not waste the time of the Committee by slaying giants of his own creation.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING added, that he should certainly support the clause.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had taken no part in this Bill, and he had no intention to have done so. He was not favourable to the principle, but he was induced to support this Bill because he believed the majority of Irish Members were in its favour. With regard to this Amendment, it seemed to him that the Mover made out a very respectable case. An hon. Member (Mr. Macartney) had said that if this clause passed it struck at the principle of the Bill. It appeared to him that the principle was struck at when they exempted certain towns from its operation, as they had already done. This was one of the means that was taken to induce Members to withdraw their opposition to measures which ought to be considered in the general interest of the public at large. He, therefore, objected to freeing particular localities from the operation of general measures. What would be the consequence if the House refused the reasonable proposal now made, and which he could not in justice refuse to support? What would be the result in the case of corporate and other places? It would be giving to those towns who had got exemptions a material advantage over towns which, in point of attraction to visitors, were rivals to them. It seemed to him that would be an injustice to those towns. If, as the promoters said, the people of Ireland were unanimously, or almost unanimously, in favour of this Bill, what would be the harm of this clause? This clause would allow it to operate in the exempted towns if the inhabitants so willed it. If, on the other hand, other towns beyond the five were not to be exempted, it would be shown that exceptional legislation was forced upon them. He should have thought these great towns which had been exempted were the places of all others where this Bill was most required. He should have thought that in the small towns drinking could not be carried on to the disgraceful extent that it was in the large towns. He could not refuse to support the clause.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH said, the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) must forgive him, if he differed from his opinion on the views of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney). The hon. Member for Tyrone made this proposition—that if the principle of the proposal of the hon. Member for Youghal were accepted, then the five towns exempted from the Act should also have the liberty of accepting or refusing. He should like to know if the hon. Member who proposed this new clause, even if he were prohibited by the Rules of the House from making the proposal at this stage, would pledge himself to give liberty to the five great towns that were exempted from this Bill to vote themselves within its pro-

House; and if that legislation should in course of time turn out to be effectual and generally acceptable to the country, no one would more rejoice at such a result than he should. He admitted that some of the arguments in favour of the Bill were unanswerable; but they were insufficient. There was no doubt that it would tend to promote decorum and a due respect for the Sabbath. visions? The hon. Member (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had not touched upon that. If he made a proposal of that kind, he would find himself pretty stoutly opposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and by all the force he could bring to bear. For, undoubtedly, the acceptance of this clause would seem to indicate that the Permissive Bill had been accepted by Her Majesty's Government and in particular by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He did not think the support of the right hon. Gentleman would be given to the clause, inasmuch as it would entirely stultify what the House had done with respect to this Bill. The clause of the hon. Baronet would be a one-sided proposition, unless he said that the five great towns should have the power of voting themselves within this Bill, in which case he would undoubtedly be met with stern opposition by the occupants of the Treasury Bench.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, with regard to the proposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Richard Smyth), could only say he had no objection, but that it commended itself to him in every respect. The hon. Gentleman would do well to leave to Town Commissioners the responsibility of carrying this out in small as well as in large towns. He was prepared to vote for any Amendment to give to other towns the power of acceptance or rejection which he claimed for those not at present exempted. In saying this, he was speaking for himself alone. He would like to see the Bill passed in its entirety, if it could be so passed, with the good-will of the population; but he warned the Committee against disregarding the Petitions which had been presented to the House by persons who, as consumers, had a strong interest in the trade which would be affected by the Bill if it became an Act of Parliament.

MR. MACARTNEY said, it had been remarked that drowning men catch at straws, and this, in his view, was the position of the opponents of the Bill, who found themselves on their last legs, and were anxious to fight against time by reviving former discussions on questions which had, practically, been settled. If the question of the exception of the five towns from the provisions of the Bill were to be again discussed, the House might go on for 12 months without making any real progress with the Bill. He would ask whether it was in the least degree possible that the House would entertain the proposals contained in the Permissive Liquor Bill? and yet they were asked to pass the measure now under discussion, which was, to all intents and purposes, a Bill of that kind. If only differed in that its action was proposed to depend, not upon the votes of the population of the country, but upon those of their Representatives in Parliament. He, for one, thought the law ought to be the same all over the country, and that there should be no exceptional cases of exemption under the clauses of the present Bill. The supporters of the measure had only acceded, and that with great unwillingness, to the Government proposal for exceptions in the belief that if the Bill, in a modified form, were passed, there would be an overwhelming expression of public opinion in the country in favour of the repeal of the excepting provisions contained in it at some future day.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA advised his hon. Friend the Member for the County Tyrone to be more careful in his application of appellations, as otherwise it might be ruled that his phrases, like certain adjectives they had lately heard about, were out of Order. He denied that either the opponents or the supporters of the Bill were catching at straws. He should be inclined to admit, however, that the description would apply to Members who talked at enormous length against time, in order to defeat the wish of Parliament. With regard to what the hon. Member had said as to catching at straws, it was scarcely warranted. He observed that his hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone had disappeared from his place, and, as one might say, from the surface; and that kind of conduct, when a reply to what he had said was expected, certainly looked more like that of a drowning man catching at straws than anything that had been commented upon by the hon. Gentleman.

THE O'CONOR DON said, that the Committee had no reason to complain of the manner in which the Amendment had been brought forward, and he strongly deprecated the use, on the present occasion, of any adjectives or other words that could delay the progress of the

Mr. Richard Smyth

Bill by provoking any personal feeling. The Amendment had been proposed most reasonably and temperately, and he would willingly accept it, if he thought his doing so would forward the passing of the Bill and be really of advantage. But he could not take this view. In the first place, he thought it would very unfairly weight the Bill. The promoters of the measure had been taunted with having accepted the Government Amendment in reference to the exception of the five large towns, and had been told that such acceptance had very disadvantageously overweighted the measure. If that were so, was it likely that they would willingly consent to go further in the same direction? Another question of importance was, whether it would be wise to intrust the powers proposed to be given to the bodies which had been suggested as those proper to be armed with the powers in question. It was true that about nine-tenths of the Town Commissioners in Ireland had petitioned in support of the Bill; but its promoters had never suggested that their opinions should be regarded as final, and that to them should be intrusted the sole power of carrying out its provisions if enacted. The Petitions of the Towns Commissioners had been only quoted concurrently with those of other authorities and persons, and had not been singled out or alluded to as absolutely conclusive. Hitherto, the Imperial Legislature had reserved to itself the right to decide all questions with regard to the rules which were to govern the sale of intoxicating liquors; and he should like to know whether the House of Commons was prepared to accept an Amendment, the effect of which would be to transfer that power to Towns Commissioners and Corporations? Further, if the House of Commons were prepared to transfer its power as far as the sale of liquors on Sundays was concerned, what earthly reason was there why they should not extend such transfer to week days also? The promoters of the Bill were charged with being actuated by Sabbatarianism—a charge which he could not admit; but he certainly could not see any argument in favour of the Amendment, unless a Sabbatarian one, which would not apply equally to a proposal that Parliament should abdicate its functions, as far as the liquor traffic was concerned, on week days as well as on Sundays. Conceal it as they might, the Amendment involved the principle of the Permissive Bill; and if that principle were included in the measure before the Committee, there could not remain the least hope of its passing—at any rate, at present. If any part of the idea involved in the Amendment were to be adopted, he should prefer to go further than the Amendment did, and leave the matter to the votes of the people rather than to the dictum of the Towns Commissioners or the Corporations of boroughs and cities. The promoters of the Bill, in order to conciliate the Government, had loyally accepted their Amendment, excepting the five large towns, and upon them had since fallen the task of defending that Amendment, which they accepted unwillingly, and from motives of expediency. If now, then, the Government were inclined to adopt or accept the Amendment which had been proposed, he hoped they would insist on its being extended to the whole of Ireland. As far as he was personally concerned he could not accept the Amendment, in that it involved very serious considerations quite apart from the apparent scope of the Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the Government would object most strongly to the principle contained in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Youghal being applied either to the five towns which had on the Motion of his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson) been excepted from the proposals contained in the Bill, or to any other places in Ireland or elsewhere in the Kingdom. At the same time, he could not say that the hon. Member was not justified in raising the question, which involved a principle of much importance. He was rather surprised to hear his hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) speaking of drowning men catching at straws; because, as far as his memory served him, it was not the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), but the hon. Member for the County of Londonderry (Mr. Richard Smyth) who asked whether the Mover of the Amendment would object to its extension to the five towns included in the Government Amendment? He, therefore, thought that the charge of over-weighing the Bill by re-opening the question of the five great towns could hardly be laid at the door of the hon. Member for Youghal. When a deputation waited upon him in reference to this subject, he stated his objection to the Bill to be that it contained the elements both of Home Rule and of the Permissive Bill. The last of these objections was stronger against the Amendment than against the Bill itself.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING thought they would have the support of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who said his hon. Friend was quite right in bringing the question forward.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had simply expressed an opinion that the question was one which the hon. Member for Youghal was fully justified in raising. He had not said anything in its favour.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, accepting the correction, and adverting to the objection of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the Amendment on the ground that it was permissive, asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he would be inclined to accept the proposal if it were made compulsory in all towns of sufficient population and importance to be under the government of Commissioners or Corporations, and the hours were restricted to three instead of five? This would do practical justice, and would be taking a course of which no other towns could reasonably complain. If, after the expiration of some limited time, it were found that the Act did not work satisfactorily, it could be altered or repealed. His hon. Friend who had supported the exception of the five towns, knew perfectly well that the mayors of those towns had protested against their exception.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Amendment suggested could not be put until the Committee had disposed of the question as to whether the proposed new clause should or should not be read a second time.

MR. STACPOOLE said, his desire was to strike at and destroy the whole Bill, root and branch, for the reason that it was a Bill which had been framed for the purpose of coercing the people of Ireland.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, some confusion existed in the minds of hon. Members concerning this Bill, owing to a mixing up of ideas. It was thought that there was a too strong affinity between this proposed clause and the Permissive Liquor Bill which had been proposed for England. There was, however, a wide distinction between them to his mind. The Permissive Liquor Bill sought to enable the inhabitants of particular localities to bring themselves within the scope of a Bill which was to be passed. This particular clause sought to give the people of certain parts of Ireland the precisely contrary power, and to enable them, if they chose, to adopt the exception in their own favour which the Committee, by accepting the Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland, had already declared in favour of the five chief towns in the country. He would, if it would be more agreeable to the promoters of the Bill, agree to the limitation being fixed at three hours; but he could not give up his contention that towns other than the five included in the Amendment to the 1st clause should have the power of saying whether they did, or did not, wish to be included in the exception. He had not alluded in any way to the means which might be adopted—by the formation of clubs, and in other ways—for the evasion of the law if the Bill became an Act, because he was anxious that progress should be made with the measure, and that it should be passed in such a form as that it would meet with acceptance among the people of Ireland generally.

MR. FRENCH pointed out that the principle of the Permissive Liquor Bill was to enable the inhabitants of different localities to impose upon themselves a new law; whereas the clause now proposed was intended to enable the people living in corporate towns in Ireland to say that they wished the existing law to stand. He felt sure, speaking from personal knowledge, that the complete closing of public-houses in Ireland on Sundays would work incalculable mischief. It would not stop drunkenness, and would create a great amount of evil in other directions. There were in Ireland a great number of returned Irish Americans and other mischievous people, who would corrupt the people in the shebeens and other places in which liquor could be procured, who would not be able to do nearly the same amount of harm if the public-houses were open, and those using them were under the eyes of the police. Sunday was not a day on which a great deal of drunkenness existed in Ireland; and he felt sure that if the public-houses were allowed to be open during a few hours on that day, it would tend to reconcile the people to a Bill the principle of which was objected to by a very large number of them.

Mr. SWANSTON said, that although he had supported the Bill all through, he must point out the hardship that would arise from its operation, unless this Amendment, or something analogous to it, was adopted. In the County Cork there were a greater number of considerable towns than in any other county in Ireland—among them being Queenstown, an important port, and Fermoy, a military station of importance—and yet it was proposed that the City of Cork should alone be excepted from the operation of the Act. The result of this would inevitably be, that on Sundays the young men in the towns and villages near to Cork, instead of staying at home on Sundays, would go into the city for the purpose of getting drink. He should have liked to see the closing experiment tried for a limited period; but he could no longer support the Bill in its altered form.

Mr. KING-HARMAN said, he very much agreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down, that the exemption of the five towns, if justifiable in some respects, was to be thoroughly deprecated in others, and especially on the ground that it would bring the people in from the country on Sundays, and make those five large towns head-centres for drinking, so that they would become vast drinking shops for the rest of the country. If the clause of the hon. Member were passed, those drinking centres would be increased, and every small corporate town would be turned into a drinking shop, to which the country people would come in large numbers on Sundays, and probably break each other's heads before going away again. There was another objection, which was—though he wished to speak with every respect of the municipalities in Ireland, who were elected by a majority of the people—to be found in the following fact:—that a great number of those Towns Commissioners were gentlemen who were, more or less, interested in what he might call the liquor traffic. Some of them were the keepers of grocery stores, where intoxicating liquors were sold, and others were interested in the brewing or the distilling trade. Now, those persons were put in rather a difficult position when they were asked to decide between the interests of the people and the interests of their own pockets. It was rather difficult to decide what to do with that clause. For himself, he would vote against it, because he considered, if the Bill was a good Bill, it ought to have a full and fair operation, at any rate, for a limited time, in order to see what the result of its working was; and he did not think, if the towns proposed were to be available for drinking purposes on Sundays, the Bill would have a fair chance.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that his hon. Friend appeared to misapprehend what the nature of the operation of the clause would be. The hon. Member seemed to fear that the various corporate towns of Ireland might be made head centres for drinking; but he should bear in mind that the principle on which that Bill had been brought forward had been supported by those Towns Commissioners, nine-tenths of whom it was said had already petitioned the House in favour of the Bill. Now, he would throw down to the hon. Member the challenge of the nine-tenths against the one-tenth, and he would ask him if he would intrust the bodies who were so favourable to the measure with the power of the veto on the application of the Bill. The number was a very simple matter indeed. Nine-tenths might, for all he knew, have petitioned for the Bill, or, if his hon. Friend had said, nineteen-twentieths, he would have accepted the statement absolutely. But how were the signatures obtained? Why, in this fashion, the hon. Clarence Vere de Vere drove into a neighbouring village and called upon Mr. Simpson. Perhaps he wanted something from Mr. Simpson's shop, but perhaps not—however, he made a morning call. He entered into conversation with Simpson, and eventually produced a paper, saying—"Here is a paper, the object of which is to promote the cause of temperance. Do you know what we had to do at the Quarter Sessions last Friday?" Simpson replied that he did not, although very likely, he knew perfectly well. And then the hon. Clarence Vere de Vere told Simpson that they had to punish a man who was drunk and misbehaving himself as the people were coming out of church. Then, of course, Simpson, on being asked, signed the paper. What else could he do? That was all a kind of æsthetic performance. Another promoter of this measure would call upon a Bishop of the Catholic Church, or perhaps he might be a Bishop of the Protestant Church, and would say to him—"My Lord, I think, although we differ upon some matters, we both have at heart the common cause of society and of Ireland." But the hon. Member forgot to mention that, out of the three Realms that were ruled over by Her Most Gracious Majesty, the one that consumed the smallest proportion of intoxicating liquors was Ireland. Nevertheless, the promoter would dwell upon the fact that some unfortunate roué in Ireland had gone to the dogs, perhaps on a Friday or a Saturday. And then he would say—"Look at what has taken place in Scotland. I hear that the Rev. Mr. O'Keefe will tell you that the greatest possible decorum prevails now in Glasgow since the introduction of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act." And then he would say—"Let us both put our shoulders to the wheel, and see what we can do." And what did my Lord do? He thought, wished, and hoped, that he was doing something very right and good, and he accordingly signed the Petition. What did he know about it? He knew nothing about it;—not half so much as he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) did. He, somehow or other, had been under the impression that the people at large had got to believe that it was well that some restriction should be passed upon the drink traffic, and that Sunday was a very much abused day in consequence of their having greater leisure on that day. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had not resided in Ireland, except for a few months in the year, for the last 16 or 17 years, and then in country places, so that his knowledge was considerably restricted. But he took it for granted, at first, that the people of Ireland had accepted the principle of that Bill. He had, however, found out since then, that not only was that not the case, but that the very people, who, it was said, had signed Petitions in favour of the Bill, were not to be relied upon as having done so.

Sir Joseph M'Kenna

He would not describe the Bill as a Coercion Bill, because the Coercion Bills that had been passed to deal with Ireland had been of a far more restrictive nature than that Bill. He wished to deal with the Bill not as a Coercion Bill. He believed that it had been brought in with the highest and most laudable motives that could actuate a Member of that House in bringing in a Bill; but what he wished to impress upon the Committee was, that they should take care that the House should not be made a party to such legislation as was proposed on the faith of Petitions got up by people who had a regular and salaried organization for obtaining signatures to Petitions. It might be true that nine-tenths of the Towns Commissioners had signed the Petitions. If that were so, let them leave to them the responsibility of carrying the law into effect if they chose to do so. He would say that, if on the Report, his hon. Friends could show that his clause would give a greater licence in point of hours to certain corporate towns in Ireland than they now enjoyed, he would be perfectly prepared to amend it in such a way that no possible addition to the present hours should be granted. He hoped that the Committee would find it right to support the clause.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that he, to use the emphatic words of the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Stacpoole), also disliked this Bill, root and branch, and his most strenuous opposition should be given to it at every stage. He said this in order to remove all possible misunderstanding with regard to the course he proposed to take in reference to this Amendment. He saw no objection to the term, as applied to this measure, of a "Coercion Bill;" for though it was true that, in the ordinary political sense of those words, it might not be so, yet, to all intents and purposes, it was a measure of intended domestic coercion, since it was a Bill introduced by a certain body of persons—call them Sabbatarians, teetotallers, friends of the people, or what they would—the promoters of which were endeavouring to coerce their poorer neighbours, the wage-earning classes of Ireland; and, moreover, this was to be done through the combined efforts of people who, he ventured to think, knew very little of the wants and requirements of the labouring population, and who would not, themselves, be affected in the slightest degree by the proposed legislation. For these reasons, the Bill itself should have his most strenuous opposition; but there was another thing he disliked nearly as much, and that was any approach to the so-called principle of permissive legislation, by local option, on this subject either in England or in Ireland. Imperial legislation ought, if necessary, to take upon itself to say what was right, and to carry into execution that which was right and good. Therefore, although he should be willing to support the clause if he felt he could do so, yet, because it came so near the principle of permissive legislation, he found himself unable to vote either one way or the other—not that he shirked the responsibility, but because he was bound to oppose anything like such legislation in all matters relating to individual or domestic habits. He himself had, and could have, no personal interest in the drinking habits, or in the consumption of drink either in England or Ireland; but he was certainly opposed to all needless interference with the domestic habits of the poor. The labourer should be allowed to go to a public-house—generally his substitute for a club—at any reasonable hour, either on Sunday or any time else, so long as he conducted himself reasonably and respectably. Why deprive him of his reasonable refreshment on that day of the week, especially when it had been shown there was less drinking on it than on any other? If it were necessary to make any change, it would be far wiser to give more control to the magistrates than to put the power into the hands of the Town Councils. So far from being an admirer of these bodies as they were now constituted, he believed most firmly that no greater legislative mistake had ever been made, than that by which the present municipalities were formed. Time was when there was, perhaps, something in a Corporation; but, elected in the present fashion, the less the municipalities had to do with legislation of this character, so much the better for them all. If the principle were once admitted into this Bill, there was no telling where it would lead or land them, but clearly into complications of every possible kind. Let the House deal with the question if it pleased; but keep off permissive legislation, especially by Town

Councils. He was sorry not to vote for the proposed Amendment; but it must not be therefore understood that any of his objections to the measure had been in the slightest degree altered or removed.

MR. COLLINS said, he was afraid that a certain amount of confusion of ideas had been imported into the debate by the introduction of that unfortunate word “permissive.” He was as much opposed to the principle of the Permissive Bill as any hon. Gentleman in that House; but, in considering the Amendment before them, with all the objection he entertained to that principle of permission, he could not for the life of him see anything in the clause introduced by his hon. Friend which would influence his judgment in supporting that clause, even with the views he entertained upon the subject of the Permissive Bill. Now, with regard to the discussion which had taken place, it had been accepted and not contradicted, that nine-tenths of the municipalities of Ireland—and he believed the number of towns under municipal law in Ireland was 110 or 111—had petitioned the House in favour of the Bill; and, therefore, the supporters of the Bill could, at all events, calculate upon the support of at least nine-tenths of those institutions. But, then there was the question of the one-tenth, which might fairly and very properly be taken into consideration by the House. He would not say, nor would he contend for a moment, that the entire number on either side were absolutely in favour of the principle of the Bill or opposed to it. But he knew, from his own experience and knowledge of some of those towns, that a few of them might be very seriously affected, he did not say in their material interests so much as in their moral interests, by the introduction of that Bill. Now, to illustrate a view of that kind, he would take the case of the borough he had the honour to represent—that of Kinsale—and he would associate with that town, inasmuch as the interests of the two were so closely identical, the case of Queenstown, which was near Kinsale. He would not touch upon the material interests of those towns, but would confine himself to the moral effect of the Bill upon those places. Both Queenstown and Kinsale were seaport towns, and places of extensive resort on Sunday by the working classes. They left the larger town of Cork, and they engaged in excursions by land or by water to Queenstown and Kinsale. It was a matter of notoriety that in the case of the respectable people who left these large towns on Sundays for the purpose of recreation and enjoyment—it was a matter of certainty incontrovertible that there was no drunkenness—or, at all events, that the cases were very few of drunkenness—among excursionists, and that no objection on that score had been taken to them. Now, with regard to the moral effect—what would it be? It would be this—they gave an opportunity, by permitting the houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors in the larger town of Cork to remain open, to those respectable people of enjoying themselves in the ordinary way in town as they were now accustomed to do in the country. At present they went to the country for pure enjoyment, and not for the purpose of drinking; but if they found that in Queenstown or Kinsale there were no opportunities for taking the ordinary refreshment, which every Gentleman in that House or of a like position out of it would contend he had a right to take when it suited him. The effect upon those people would be that they would be prevented from enjoying themselves in the way that everyone in that House would endeavour to promote—that was to say, in a peaceful, respectable, and quiet way. They would be restrained, in fact, by the restrictions which were incautiously and injudiciously imposed upon them; and a great number of them would be constrained to remain in Cork, where they would be allowed to drink as much as they liked, and in that view he maintained a large amount of mischief would be done. He was not willing, for the mere purpose of obstruction, to interfere with the decision arrived at; but he would simply appeal to hon. Members, like the hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), and the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. King-Harman), not to be influenced by considerations such as those that they had put forward, that was in reference to the comparison of ideas engendered by the notion of permission in legislation upon the subject of the sale of intoxicating liquors, but putting that view aside, and simply upon the merits of the question, to determine upon the vote they would give that day.

Mr. Collins

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, he should certainly oppose the Amendment, as there was no question about it that, if drunkenness were anywhere on the increase, it was in the towns. He thought it was the greatest mistake possible to have yielded a hair's breadth with regard to the towns. One inevitable result of the concessions which had been made was, that in the large towns there would be rioting and drinking going on all the Sunday. The sort of compromise he should be willing to accede to would be to open the houses in country places, five miles from town. He thought that the very fact of having to walk five miles before obtaining a drink, and then walking five miles back, would be sufficient to deter people from going for the mere sake of drinking.

MR. P. J. SMYTH said, that the promoters of that Bill appeared to delight in surprises. The day before, and the day previous to that, the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors Bill was nowhere in the Order Book. To-day they came down to the House and found all the Orders swept away, and Sunday closing had the course to itself. The practice, he presumed, was regular; but he thought it needless to say it was extremely inconvenient. He should support the Amendment of his hon. Friend, but without at all being understood as approving in any way the permissive principle. There were two important towns with which he was connected concerned in that Motion. One of them was Athlone, which was a town situated partly in Roscommon and partly in Westmeath. It was a very important town, and especially the Westmeath portion of it. It had large fairs and markets, and military barracks with accommodation for 1,500 men. Moreover, the inhabitants of Athlone, to the number of 3,000, had petitioned against the Bill. That Petition was unimpeachable. Another important town in Westmeath was Mullingar, the capital of the county, which was governed by a body of Town Commissioners. That town had large military barracks, and had also, by a large majority of its inhabitants, protested against that Bill. They adopted a Petition against it, and that Petition was presented. That very Bill was once opposed, also, by Members of a Liberal Government; but it was supported by the Liberal majority of to-day. If he was not mistaken, the noble Lord, who was now the Leader of the Opposition, but who, at the time to which he referred, was Chief Secretary for Ireland, strongly opposed the Bill, and characterized it as class legislation. If it was class legislation then, it was class legislation now; and yet they had the strange spectacle presented to them of the bulk of the Liberal Party, its Leader and his followers, coming down to that House day after day, and night after night, to force through it that measure of class legislation—that measure which shocked every principle of Liberalism, and was opposed to every tradition of the Liberal Party. The noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition said he went by mistake into the wrong Lobby the other night in a division on the Bill, in which he found himself among its opponents. The noble Lord explained his mistake, as he had a right to do. He (Mr. P. J. Smyth) hoped he might be pardoned for thinking that the mistake was not in the act, but in the explanation. They had seen, also, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) there at 3 o'clock in the morning, aiding, as much as he could, in an attempt to pass the clauses of that Bill through Committee at an hour when fair discussion on them was an impossibility.

MR. E. J. REED rose to Order, asking the Chairman, whether the matters to which the hon. Member was referring were applicable to the clause under consideration?

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA submitted that the hon. Member was perfectly in Order, inasmuch as the question before the Committee was the propriety of extending to smaller, but corporate towns, what had already been conceded to the larger ones; so that the hon. Member was in no way attacking the principle of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the clause now before the Committee was one which, practically, raised the question of the propriety of applying the provisions of the Bill to all the smaller towns of Ireland; and upon such a clause it was not easy to exclude some discussion of the general objects of a Bill. At the same time, it was not usual to revert in Committee to circumstances which had taken place in the discussion of other clauses in the Bill, or to arguments used in such discussions, except in so far as they might be directly pertinent to the immediate objects of the clause.

MR. P. J. SMYTH said, that the principle for which he and the other opponents of the Bill contended, was the principle for which the Liberal Party contended a few years ago. They held that this was a Bill which affected the personal rights of man in society; and because they insisted on those rights being maintained by the House, they put on record their protest against the Bill. He did not intend to infringe upon the practice or the Rules of the House. But whatever might occur, he felt that they, at least, had been true to the great principles which should guide legislation in that House.

MR. SULLIVAN thought the hon. Member who had just sat down had hardly spoken to the question in charging hon. Members with gross inconsistency, in calling the Bill "class legislation," and in saying that the Liberal Party had changed their line in reference to it. The hon. Member now denounced the Bill as an outrage on the rights of man in society, and opposed to all true Liberalism; but there had been others besides the Liberal Party who had made flank movements on this question, and he would read what the hon. Member wrote in a letter in 1875 on this question to those who called a meeting in support of it at Athlone. He said—

"Sunday closing, as a branch of the temperance question, stands apart, and may be discussed on its own merits. In principle it has my cordial approval, and I should hold it in practice as a beneficent reform. I do not consider that the publican has, in the abstract, any more right to dispose of his goods on the Sabbath day than the butcher or the baker."

["Read on!"] Let the hon. Gentleman read the letter if he would. He (Mr. Sullivan) would not interrupt the hon. Gentleman. He had read from it an extract which covered the whole scope of the Bill, not with the view of proving that the hon. Gentleman had turned right-about-face in that or any other matter, but of showing the Committee how much weight should be attached to his words, when he charged hon. Gentlemen with holding one view one day and another view another day.

MR. P. J. SMYTH said, he had not a copy of the letter with him, and he could not therefore read it. He could only speak of it from memory, and as well as his memory served him, the circumstances were these—He was invited to attend a meeting in favour of Sunday closing, which was to be held at Athlone. He wrote declining to attend, giving reasons for being opposed to the object of the meeting. The passages read by the hon. and learned Member for Louth were true, and he remembered the letter containing them; but they referred to voluntary Sunday closing, and he repeated that if people chose voluntarily to close their houses, he should hail it as a good reform. In the letter referred to, however, he did distinctly express his opposition to Sunday closing by Act of Parliament. He trusted that this explanation would be received with satisfaction by the House. He did not retract a word he then wrote, but adhered to every one.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN observed, that a great deal had been said in reference to this question, on the one side and on the other, and feeling and unhappy differences had been exhibited both within the House and outside it, which he very much regretted. Any observations he might now venture to address to the Committee should not have for their object the creating of an acrimonious discussion, but that of bringing them to the consideration of the question before the Committee. On two occasions only, in the many years during which this question had been agitated in the House, had he ventured to intrude his opinions upon it, and only on one occasion—when the principle it contained was brought before the House—did he give his vote one way or the other. But times had changed since then. That great principle, as it seemed to him, was now a dissolving view. He was told there were persons who supported that great measure, as it was called, on one of two grounds—one, the strong interest which they took in the cause of temperance; and the other, the feeling which some expressed that the Lord's Day ought to be kept holy. Some gentlemen had sent him a circular on the previous day respecting the English Sunday Closing Bill, and they asked him to give his support to it on the same ground of keeping the Lord's Day holy. Not even to those gentlemen would he yield in holding that the due observance of the Sabbath was a thing most desirable; but they must not regard the great question of keeping the Sabbath Day holy with reference merely to the views held concerning it within the narrow limits of the British Isles. They must take a much wider view of it, and see how the same question was regarded in other parts of the world. If they did so, they would see that in both Catholic France and Protestant Germany views were held on this very question that were not in harmony with those of the gentlemen to whom he had referred. Allusion had been made in the course of these debates to the working of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act; but he did not think there was any Member of that House connected with Scotland who would say that the motive power which prompted the passing of that Act was temperance, and that Sabbatarianism had nothing to do with it. He mentioned those things en passant with regard to the view he took of the Bill in its mutilated form. No one would be able to go back to Ireland and say if this Bill passed—as pass it most probably would—that it was a Bill that had extended a great mercy to Ireland. For what did they see? They saw that on every platform on which a discussion was raised in reference to it, the state of the artizan population as regarded temperance had been the first consideration. And yet what was the result? Why, that in five of the largest towns in Ireland, where, if anywhere, the Bill should be put in operation, it would not be put in operation at all; and that while those who had promoted the Bill had declared they would accept nothing but justice, they had agreed to a compromise exempting those places, but imposing it on localities where no case had been made for its imposition. They had to consider that a Bill which had been promoted during several years for the accomplishment of a great social reform had been flung to the winds, the only five places in which it had been found to be at all necessary having been specially exempted from it; while they had a number of Gentlemen connected with an association in Dublin, wanting to cover a disastrous retreat by stating that the Irish counties which, on the authority of the Returns granted last year, were proved to be most temperate were really not so, thus attempting to unfairly defame the rural districts of Ireland. He heard people say they were anxious for great social improvements. If there was room for great social improvements—and he did not say there was not—they had a right to come there and express their opinions, and endeavour to enforce them, pushing them, if necessary, to the bitter end. But that was not for those who attempted to pass a coercive measure like this. It was not for men who said—"We wish to God circumstances did not render it necessary for us to make this demand on the Government, and to coerce an unwilling people, but stern necessity compels us," to take such a course. They had before them, not a coercive measure, having for its object the carrying out of a great social reform, but they had before them instead a number of Gentlemen anxious for the passing of a mutilated Bill, in order that, at the termination of the Session, they might be able to go back to Ireland and address excited meetings of people whose views were honest but unquestionably narrow, and say to them—"We have had a great triumph." A triumph! Where would be their triumph? The Returns showed that none of the counties—take, for instance, Leitrim and Limerick—in which the Bill was to be applied, were intemperate; but, in order to assure their triumph, these Gentlemen flung to the winds those Returns and branded those counties with disgrace. There were, of course, troublesome men to be found in every county, who were always ready enough to find fault with their Representatives. He came into the House many years ago, and had ever since endeavoured to represent fairly the opinions of his constituents; but he would not for a moment remain in the House if, for the purpose of catching votes, or to avoid being unpopular, he were to desert those on whom he felt that an unwarrantable attack had been made. One other observation he would make. Of all countries that in which over-legislation was least desirable was Ireland, and especially legislation of a coercive character, when Bills restricting personal liberty—which, unfortunately, too often were introduced into that House, were presented. Right hon. Gentlemen on both sides regretted their being obliged to do so, and attributed their action to unavoidable necessity; but where was the necessity here? There were, he knew, those who said—"Give us this Bill and we will soon bring in Sunday closing in the towns also." Hon. Gentlemen might think that argument had weight, and respect it accordingly. It had not for him any weight whatever. He regarded the Bill as a Bill not demanded for Ireland, and as not attaining the end for which it was brought in. The Petitions which had been presented prayed for a measure for the restriction of intemperance in the large towns, and had no connection with Sunday administration, and had been presented, not in favour of this, but of a very different Bill, and the House was called upon to forget its high position as a great legislative Assembly, and to become a whitewashing Committee to enable the promoters of the Bill to cover a ridiculous retreat. He wished to avoid all unnecessarily harsh language in speaking of the Bill, but in the shape in which it now presented itself to the Committee, he could only regard it as an imposture and a sham.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he entertained very strong opinions in regard to the Bill. He was glad to find that the promoters of the Bill, in addition to the days the Government had placed at their disposal for bringing forward the measure, had succeeded in inducing their Friends to give them up a Wednesday. If the Government would only find two or three days more, there might be some hope of getting out of Committee. With regard to the Amendment, it pointed directly to a question which the House was always willing to encourage—namely, the local government of towns. Both the Government and the Opposition were always willing to respect the opinions of the local authorities in the different towns, and all the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) asked was, that before the Bill was brought into operation, the opinion of the Town Council or of the Town Commissioners, as the case might be, should be taken, and their view ascertained as to the desirability of putting the Act in force. It was said that this would convert the measure into a sort of Permissive Bill. His own opinion was that it was nothing of the kind. A Permissive Bill gave power to this extraordinary character, which sought to interfere with the known habits and tastes of a large section of the people of Ireland. It was only fair, just, and reasonable to ask that, if a measure of that kind was to be sanctioned at all, a limit should be put to its duration. It had been established conclusively by the evidence which had been put before the House that the amount of drunkenness on Sunday was not, at all events, very considerable. Statistics adduced in the course of the discussions on this Bill, and extending over a period of five or seven years, had shown that not more than one in 1,000 of the persons who frequented public-houses on Sundays was accused or convicted of intoxication; and even that small number probably belonged to a class of men who, under any possible circumstances or conditions, would find means to possess themselves of opportunities of becoming intoxicated. In regard to the people of Ireland, his first contention was that those who had recourse to public-houses on Sunday were not addicted to intoxication. Anyone who had had experience of the habits and character of the Irish people knew that it was almost a necessity for them to have a reasonable amount of recreation and enjoyment on the Sunday, and that any attempt to interfere with their rational enjoyments would be resisted and looked upon as a very great grievance. If, in these days, persons had recourse to public-houses on Sunday for the purpose of obtaining simple refreshment, they need not necessarily be accused of impropriety or intemperance; and he asked, what would be the feelings of those people when they found that that House had by legislation taken away from them the opportunities of enjoying their Sunday refreshment which they had possessed for years past? This would explain the object of his clause. They were all liable to err. He had no doubt whatever that the promoters of this Bill were actuated by the very best intentions, and he would spurn the imputation that the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) and the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) were advocating what they believed to be a coercive measure, damaging to the interests and happiness of the Irish people; but he repeated that even his hon. Friends, with the very best intentions, were liable to err. He would not presume to say that they were wrong, and that the opponents of the Bill were absolutely right; but he would say, that in the circumstances it was fair to ask that if this measure was to be allowed to pass, it should be made tentative, and that it should be submitted to the country during a period of three years, in order to see the effect of it on the minds of the people, how far their prejudices or their tempers were compromised by it, and to what extent, if at all, they were likely to repudiate it. If, after three years' trial of the measure, the people, instead of finding it to be a wrong or injury, should declare it to be a great blessing, which had added considerably to their welfare and happiness, then the Gentlemen who had opposed the Bill, whether in or out of the House, would cordially associate themselves with those who had advocated it, and would not treacherously or improperly oppose the continuance of the measure. An idea presented itself to his mind, however, which led him to hesitate very much as to the policy of this legislation. Whilst they were proposing to deprive the people entirely of the inducements they at present possessed to enjoy themselves on Sunday in the open air, they were not, so far as he could see, making any attempt to open up fresh channels into which they might direct the people for purposes of enjoyment and recreation. Now, if this Act were to determine, as he proposed, in 1881, there would be many opportunities in the meantime of discussing its policy. More particularly there would be the opportunity afforded by a General Election, which at the best could not be very long deferred, of considering what were the advantages or disadvantages which had resulted from the measure, and he had no doubt that any new Parliament which might be summoned by the Sovereign would be influenced by the same earnest and patriotic desire as was the present Parliament to do all in its power to promote the interests of the people. It was therefore important that the new Parliament which, in 1881, might be called on to re-consider this question should have every possible means afforded it for arriving at a sound and sufficient judgment. In the interests of the people likely to be affected by this Bill, he asked that some limit should be number of Irish Representatives who were in favour of the measure. He had not thought it out of place to endeavour to show that there was not an overwhelming majority in favour of it. There were many townships surrounding the City of Dublin, and the result would be, if they passed the Bill as it stood, with the Government proposition to exempt the five large towns, and rejected this Amendment, they would prevent the people of Dublin from going beyond the city to take recreation on a Sunday. The principal place of recreation was the Phoenix Park; and if the Bill passed, the people who went there would not be able to obtain refreshment; whereas, if the Amendment were assented to, they would get it, and be able to return into the city after enjoying their holiday. If the Amendment were rejected, the result would be that every person who went into the Phoenix Park for purposes of recreation would be compelled to return to Dublin if he required refreshment. Surely, it was strange that they should be called upon to make a certain ring, and say to the people—"You may drink as much as you like within that boundary; but if you go outside of it you shall not drink at all."

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA thought his hon. Friend was labouring under a misapprehension. The clause now before the Committee would not have the effect his hon. Friend supposed, nor would such a restriction exist in regard to the neighbourhood of Dublin. As the Bill stood at present, the whole of the metropolitan district of Dublin was exempted, and all the people of Dublin would be comparatively well off. It was only to the other centres of Ireland that he wished to apply the same legislation. He had interrupted his hon. Friend, because he did not wish to remain passive while an impression was produced in favour of the clause which would be erroneous, and which was not one that he could himself sanction.

MR. O'SULLIVAN would certainly give way to his hon. Friend, and the views which his hon. Friend expressed in regard to the Amendment; but he was certainly under the impression that if the provisions of the Bill remained unaltered, they would affect the townships around Dublin, as well as the smaller and independent towns. So far as the Amendment was concerned, he had not heard a single argument against it. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) said that it would cause agitation; but was that a reason why the Committee should reject it? The hon. Member also asked if it would be fair to confine the Amendment to the small towns and not extend it to the large towns? He (Mr. O'Sullivan) was satisfied that those who were in favour of the Amendment would have no objection to extend it to the large towns; because he was quite sure that if the power of carrying out the provisions of the Act or not was placed in the hands of the Town Councils or Town Commissioners, they would act in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the people. He thought it was monstrous that because 2 per cent of the population of any particular place got drunk, the other 98 per cent should be punished. He should certainly vote for the Amendment.

MR. COLLINS said, that he would confine his remarks, as far as possible, to the clause which he had now to propose, and which had reference to the determination of the Act. It was to this effect—

"That this Act shall continue in force till the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, and no longer, unless Parliament shall otherwise determine; and, on the said day, all the provisions of any Act now in force regulating the hours of opening or keeping open of any premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday shall come into operation and take effect as if this Act had not been passed."

After the ample discussion which the principle of the Bill had undergone in the House, it was unnecessary for him to travel over the arguments which had been adduced on either side, except in so far as they bore on his proposed clause. The object of that clause, as appeared, indeed, upon the face of it, was to limit the duration of the Bill to a period of about three years from the time of its coming into operation. He was anxious to elicit the opinions of hon. Members upon a tentative measure of this extraordinary character, which sought to interfere with the known habits and tastes of a large section of the people of Ireland. It was only fair, just, and reasonable to ask that, if a measure of that kind was to be sanctioned at all, a limit should be put to its duration. It had been established conclusively by the evidence which had been put before the House that the amount of drunkenness on Sunday was not, at all events, very considerable. In the interests of the people likely to be affected by this Bill, he asked that some limit should be put on its operations. Although he had suggested that the limit should be three years, he was not wedded to any particular period; but it occurred to him that by that time the new Parliament would have assembled, and sufficient experience would have been afforded of the operation of the Bill to enable a final judgment to be formed upon it.

Clause—(Mr. Collins,)—brought up and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. FORSYTH said, that during the last and the present Session he had taken no part in the discussions on this Bill; but when the subject was introduced three years ago, he voted in favour of Sunday closing in Ireland, and he should continue to do so until the Bill had passed through all its stages. The principal reason why he supported the Bill was because he believed it to be asked for by a very large majority of the Irish people, and because it was supported by a great majority of the Irish Representatives in that House. He thought that in questions affecting the social well-being of Ireland—not political or Imperial questions—the Irish people themselves were the best judges of what would be most calculated to promote their interests. But he was bound to say that his opinion as to the unanimity of feeling, and as to the strength of the majority, had been somewhat shaken. He found that evidence was given before the Committee in that House which showed that there was a very strong feeling indeed in Ireland—by no means the feeling of the majority, but still a strong feeling—of a large minority against the operation of the Bill. And, considering the perseverance and ability with which this measure had been contested by the Irish Members, it was impossible not to see there was an influential minority in that House who were opposed to it. That being so, he had to ask himself whether it was or was not a fair thing to allow this measure to be tried as an experiment. On the one side, they were told that the greatest possible benefits would arise from the passing of this measure. That was his earnest hope, and partly his belief. On the other hand, they were told by those who ought to know something of the Irish character, that very great evils would arise from it; that the people would be discontented; and that drunkenness would not be diminished. It seemed to him that, under these circumstances, it was a fair proposal to pass the Bill for a limited time, only as a matter of experiment. It was just one of those things which could be determined far better by practice than theory. If those who, like himself, supported this Bill, were right, then the trial of it would show to demonstration that those who opposed it were wrong, and there would then be no difficulty in making the measure permanent. If, on the other hand, the predictions of those who opposed the Bill were right—if it turned out that drunkenness did not diminish, and that the Irish people were more discontented, then beyond all doubt this measure ought not to be permanent. As he understood, this question did not come before the Irish people at the General Election in 1874. Although he did not go so far as to say that this House was not to legislate upon any question which had not been made a kind of test question at a General Election, still, on a question affecting so much the habits of the people, their tastes and general well-being, he thought it was not unfair to ask that there should be an expression of opinion afforded to the Irish people at a General Election before this Bill was made permanent. He did not think the promoters of the Bill could be prejudiced by the Amendment, and therefore he should give it his support.

MR. SHAW entirely agreed with the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down, although he approached the Bill from an entirely opposite point of view. He opposed the measure, but admitted that there might be parts of Ireland to which it might apply with benefit; and, therefore, he could not see how it could injure either its promoters or opponents to let it be tried as an experiment. It was a serious thing to change suddenly the social habits of the people, as was proposed by this Bill; but if the measure worked well, if it did not lead to secret, illicit, household drunkenness, and proved acceptable to the people generally, then he should be most anxious to make it a permanent measure. Knowing, as he did, the South of Ireland, and well acquainted, as he was, with the habits of the people there, he doubted very much whether the Bill would not create more evils than it was intended to cure. The habits and customs of the people in the South were quite different from those of the people in the North. The people in the South of Ireland were not Sabbatarian. They attended their places of worship; but, after being at church, they did not think it the slightest harm to indulge in amusement; and all hon. Members must know that when men engaged in open-air sports they got thirsty, and that a good many could not quench their thirst from that pure, natural, and limpid stream which some hon. Gentlemen did not go beyond. There were hundreds of cases in the South of Ireland in which strong and vigorous men, after spending a couple of hours in a match at hurling, or in some other out-door competition, adjourned to the public-house, and drank their pint of porter or their glass of whisky and water, and no harm whatever was the result. On the contrary, drunkenness, in such places, was the exception and not the rule. In the City of Cork, in which he resided, he knew that two packs of harriers were kept up by young men, who went to their places of worship on Sunday morning; but who, between 12 and 1 o'clock in the afternoon, were to be seen trooping out to the suburbs for the purpose of hunting hares. He did not think there was a bit of harm in that. He would rather see those young men so occupied than see them engaged in card-playing and other evil practices. But if hon. Members suddenly did what the Bill proposed, and thereby upset and disarranged all the habits of the people, he feared that more harm than good might be the result. He was anxious to try the experiment; but in every social movement the great object of legislation should be to meet, as far as possible, the habits of the people; and to take the people with that movement, instead of acting hastily and extremely. They should anxiously endeavour to avoid driving the people into evil courses, or confirming them in such courses, by sudden and repressive legislation. He had really imagined that the Amendment under discussion had been, to some extent, accepted by the promoters of the Bill. He hoped that it would be accepted by the Government. He believed that the Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were wise men, moderate men, and men anxious to do the best they could in this case; and, if they agreed to the Amendment, he thought hon. Members might regard the Bill as passed. No doubt, there was one contingency which, even in the event of that agreement, might prevent such a consummation; and that was the contingency of a General Election. Upon that matter, he should like if some information were forthcoming from the Government Benches. Of course, should a General Election soon occur many measures would have to be abandoned; and, probably, this amongst the number. But if a General Election were not to come for some months yet, there was still time for a discussion of the Bill. Even in that case he would look upon the measure as already substantially passed.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he could not but admit that the Amendment had been placed before the Committee by the hon. Member for Kinsale, and by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, in a most temperate manner; and one which ought to command the attention of the promoters of the Bill. He desired to meet his hon. Friends in the spirit in which the Amendment had been proposed and supported; and, if those hon. Gentlemen would now undertake to say, on the part of the opponents of the measure, that they would allow it to pass and withdraw any hostility to it in its future stages, he, on behalf of its promoters, would accept the principle which was involved in the Amendment and permit the clause to be read a second time. But, at the same time, he should like to make one or two remarks with regard to the details of that Amendment. Three years constituted, in his opinion, too short a period. Three years would only lead to a continuous agitation during the whole of that time; and that would be a short period even for those who were engaged in the trade, a class of men against whom he had never said one word in the House. An agitation would be kept up during the whole of the three years, which could hardly fail to be prejudicial to the trade which those men carried on, and which would depreciate the value of their property. He quite understood the position which the persons to whom he referred occupied; he quite understood why they had acted as they had done upon this question; he believed that the members of any other trade in the country, if similarly circumstanced, would have acted in a similar way; but he held that a period of three years would be too short both in their own interests and in those of the public. At the same time, he was quite ready to admit the principle that the Act should be only of temporary duration; and that it should be tried as an experiment. He thought that the promoters of the Bill might claim a little more than the compromise he had suggested; but, still, they did not desire to do so. The Government, at the beginning of the Session, through the mouth of the then Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had told the House what they considered ought to be done in order that the Bill might pass, and what were regarded by them as the utmost limits of concession. Had the right hon. Baronet to whom he referred said—"We will not object to the passing of this Bill, but, on the contrary, we will give you facilities for its progress, if you allow it to be of a temporary character," the promoters of the measure would at once have accepted such a proposition. But the right hon. Baronet did not do that. He proposed, in lieu of it, that certain towns should be exempted from the operation of the Bill; and now, when a concession as to the duration of the measure was asked for, he thought the advocates of the Bill might fairly have pressed upon the Government that, in the event of any such concession being made, the Bill itself should apply to the whole, and not to a part of Ireland. But while he considered that those for whom he spoke might very fairly have put forward that request, he would not press it, if the Government did not make it of themselves. Were concessions, however, all to be made on the one side without anything being received in return—and not only without anything being received in return, but with the greater part of the time being occupied with a discussion, upon every new clause, of the principle of the Bill which had been debated over and over again? He had endeavoured to meet his hon. Friends in a proper spirit; and he hoped the result would be that a conclusion would be come to which would put an end to what must be an annoying and irritating subject to many in the House.

MR. KING-HARMAN said, that having given Notice of an Amendment somewhat similar to that of the hon. Member for Kinsale—an Amendment which he had not brought forward on a recent occasion in consequence of the lateness of the hour—he might be permitted to address a few words to the Committee. When he first mooted the suggestion that the Bill under consideration should be a temporary measure, he did so upon the ground that, although he had studied the question as well as he possibly could, although he was a resident in Ireland, and although he thought he understood the wishes and habits of the people, he could not make up his mind as to whether the measure would be fraught with mischief or with benefit to the community. He had admitted that a large number of influential bodies had petitioned in favour of the measure; but he had doubted whether those bodies thoroughly understood what the effect of the Bill would be if it came into operation. Upon those grounds he had hesitated—and upon those grounds he still hesitated—as to whether the Bill would be attended with the result which its promoters anticipated. If it should have the beneficial effect which some hon. Gentlemen appeared to expect, no man in all Ireland would more sincerely rejoice than himself. He desired the amelioration of his countrymen; he had not opposed the Bill in toto; but he believed that such an Amendment as that now under consideration might be adopted with advantage. Such a limitation as that proposed would yet be a very fair trial of the principle and action of the measure; and he, for one, was thoroughly disposed to accept the compromise which had been suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), but with one exception, and that exception was this—that he considered three years would be quite sufficient. He thought that every argument which could be used against three years would be capable of being used against five years. Three years, in his opinion, would test the measure thoroughly. A General Election would take place in the interval; and the general feeling of the people could then be elicited. His belief was that the inhabitants of Ireland would know sufficiently well, not in five years, but in five months, what the effect of the radical change contemplated by the Bill was likely to be. Petty sessions' records would show, the appearance of the people would show, the state of the savings banks accounts would show, whether the measure had been attended with the beneficial results which its promoters anticipated. But if, on the other hand, the inhabitants of Ireland were to be as damaged, as the opponents of the Bill alleged they would be, there would be disturbance and riot within six months. As to the agitation which had been promised by some timorous supporters of the Bill, he desired to point out that agitation would probably be got up all the same, whether the measure were passed for five or for three years. There was certainly no particular charm in three years, except this—and the advantage was not inconsiderable—that that period would bring the matter to a conclusion in a shorter time. If his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon would accept three years, he would engage, on his part, to support him heartily in endeavouring to pass the Bill through its remaining stages.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he regretted that he could not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kinsale. With reference to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Gentleman who represented Sligo, no doubt six months would suffice to show how the Bill worked; but he differed from his hon. Friend as to what would be a proper test of the opinion of the people. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of savings banks; but he did not think that the amount of money in those banks would be any test whatever. Last year, for example, there had been a bad harvest in Ireland; but next year there might be a good one, and the consequence might be that, while there might be a great deal more drinking than in the period immediately antecedent, there might also be more money in the savings banks. If this Bill were a good Bill, it ought to be passed in a chronic form, and continue to operate; but, if it were a bad Bill, it had better be debated and deliberated upon next Session, in the light of further information and experience. He did not believe that the plan which some hon. Gentlemen had advocated would apply any salve whatever to those who would be affected by the measure. What the hon. Gentleman desired appeared to be a mode of silencing those who would believe themselves to suffer under unfair restrictions if the Bill were passed, what would be urged, in effect, would amount to this—"Oh! this is only a temporary measure; it will come to an end in three years, and then Parliament is not likely to deal with it again under any circumstances whatever." That seemed to him to be a condemnation carried over three years, while an absolute verdict might be pronounced in one. He would deprecate very much the Bill passing through Committee and the House in such a form as to be the cause of future agitation in Ireland. He had no special desire that this should be a test question at the next General Election. He would rather say to his constituents—"I have done my best to make the measure a fair one all round. I have not been able to do so; but Parliament has passed the Bill, and, if the country is opposed to it, Parliament can repeal it." Towards that result the ordinary machinery would be set in motion without delay; and this would be better than allowing three years to elapse during which a fresh agitation might be organized. He was very sorry to differ from hon. Gentlemen with whom he generally acted; but he would be no party to any compromise whatever on this measure. He did not intend to offer any unfair opposition to the Bill—he did not think he had done so to any measure which had ever come before the House. He believed an examination of what had taken place in relation to the Bill would clearly show that the conduct of those who were opposed to it could not be termed obstructive. At the same time, when the measure was brought on at 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, it was surely not unreasonable or unfair to urge and claim that it should be postponed to another day. The Bill ought to be fairly dealt with; and, in his opinion, it ought either to be crushed out altogether, or passed in a chronic and not in a tentative form. A trial of the measure for three, four, or five years, would be, in the minds of many of those who would be affected by it, a sort of penal servitude for that period.

MR. BRUEN said, he had been exceedingly glad to hear the conciliatory

speech of the hon. Member for Roscommon. In that speech the hon. Gentleman had stated his own willingness, and the willingness of the promoters of the Bill, to accept the principle of the clause which was now under discussion if, on the other hand, those who objected to the measure were willing to abandon their opposition and allow the Bill to go through, with the modifications which had been already introduced into it. He had always supported the Bill as a tentative measure. On the one hand, he believed that a great deal of good would result from its being brought into action; on the other hand, he was afraid that considerable discontent might be occasioned in some places in consequence of its operation. He also believed that a great number of those who had given their signatures to Petitions in favour of the Bill had done so without completely realizing the effect which its passing would have upon the social habits of the people of Ireland. Entertaining these opinions, he had endeavoured to ascertain the truth of them, as far as he could, by conversations with workmen and with others who would be affected by the operation of the measure; and he thought it would be only fair that those classes who might consider themselves prejudicially affected by it should, if it were now passed, have an opportunity of stating any objections they might have to it before it was re-enacted and continued. Reference had been made to the prospect of a General Election. He did not wish that the termination of the tentative operation of the Bill should take place until a certain time after the General Election. As his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) had pointed out, it would be necessary to conduct an inquiry on the subject, to take evidence, and to find out what the result of the measure had really been. But, if the Bill was to terminate in three years, there would be no time for a new Parliament to conduct those proceedings. If, however, a period of five years were fixed upon for the tentative operation of the Act, there would be ample time for the conduct of such an inquiry as might be thought to be necessary. Not only so, but in five years the irritation which the measure might at first produce would have had time to cool down, and the subject could then be approached with greater calmness and with a larger amount of experience.

DR. BRADY said, he regarded the compromise which the hon. Member for Roscommon had expressed his willingness to accept as not only most creditable to the hon. Gentleman himself, but as most creditable to those who were acting with him; and he hoped that those who had hitherto so frequently and so bitterly opposed the Bill would now see it to be their interest and their duty to close with that compromise, and to act upon it. For his own part, he was quite satisfied that the great body of the people of Ireland were in favour of the measure. They had come to the conclusion that a measure such as that now before the Committee would conduce to the social and moral improvement of the community. He represented a county—Leitrim—in which there were 95,000 inhabitants, and which occupied an important position in the country. From the time that the Bill now under discussion came before the House, he had never heard from that county a wish expressed against its principle. He had never received a Petition against it, but, on the contrary, he had received several Petitions in favour of it. There was represented in his constituency a large body of the rural population of Ireland—people who would not be supposed to come under the influence of any agitation, and who, in reality, had not come under any such influence as regarded, or from, the promoters of the Bill. But he knew that in the county of Leitrim the clergy of all denominations were in favour of the measure. He had received letters from clergymen of the Church of England, from Presbyterian clergymen, and from Roman Catholic clergymen, all impressing upon him the necessity of supporting the Bill. Under those circumstances, he had great pleasure in seeing that there was even a prospect of this matter being brought to a happy conclusion; and he only hoped that the opponents of the Bill would be wise in their generation, and accept the compromise which had been suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he regarded the period of three years as quite sufficient. It did not appear to him that the promoters of the Bill were making any compromise; and he hoped that the Amendment which had been brought forward would be insisted upon.

MR. ALFRED MARTEN said, it appeared to him that there ought to be such a limitation of time fixed upon in regard to the operation of the measure as would allow both sides an opportunity of arriving at a calm and unprejudiced judgment as to the effect of the Bill. There could be no disguising the fact that the measure had excited a strong feeling of opposition. On the other hand, it was equally clear that, in other quarters, there was a strong feeling in favour of the Bill. He was a Member of the Select Committee which sat upon this subject; and evidence of considerable importance was laid before that Committee on both sides. He might mention one fact which occurred to him at the moment. It was brought out in the course of the proceedings before that Committee, that in some cases the Bishops had imposed the closing of public-houses on Sunday within their dioceses; but, in one instance, it appeared that a river separated one diocese in which no drink could be obtained from another diocese where drink could be had, and the people were in the habit on Sunday of crossing the river into that portion of the locality where the public-houses were open for the purpose of obtaining refreshment. That showed, at all events, that a considerable amount of feeling existed on the subject. He would suggest that, in all cases of this description, they should be guided, more or less, by precedent. He had been looking into the register of temporary laws, and he had found a great many such laws on almost every subject—amongst them one which he thought might afford a useful precedent. It might be within the recollection of the Committee that six or seven years ago, a great effort was made to enforce the better observance of the Act of Charles II. in regard to the Lord's Day, and a number of prosecutions were instituted by private persons, in order, if possible, to obtain that result. But what happened? Those prosecutions caused so much annoyance to various people—although they were instituted, no doubt, with the best of motives, the better observance of the Sabbath—that the Sunday Observance Prosecutions Act had to be passed. That Act, which imposed the restraint that no prosecution should be instituted without the consent of the chief of police of the district, was treated as an experimental measure. It was only allowed to remain in operation for one year at a time, and had to be dealt with annually. That was a good illustration of what he meant; and what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander. That was a restriction of the prosecutions by those who were anxious to see certain laws enacted in regard to Sundays, and he saw no reason why the precedent should not be followed, and a fair time—say three years—be fixed for the trial of the experiment of Sunday closing. He commended the suggestion to the favourable consideration of the hon. Member for Roscommon, who had conducted a long struggle in reference to this Bill with admirable temper and fairness.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, if he were to refer to any legislation as justifying the opposition to this clause, it would be that very Act for suspension of prosecutions, prosecutions which passed some time ago, and had been renewed year by year from the time of its passing. If that was a good law to enact, its operation ought to have been made perpetual. To pass an Act which had to be renewed annually, or at the end of any stated period, was to offer a premium to agitation pro and con. If the law was passed, the traders in intoxicating drinks in the excepted towns would acquire a vested interest in Sunday trading, which might involve great difficulty at some future time between themselves and Parliament.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, the Committee had allowed itself to drift into a discussion which might go on indefinitely with no real and practical result. The question was not whether the operation of the Act should be restricted to a particular number of years; but whether, broadly, the Committee would sanction any restriction at all—in other words, they were discussing the second reading of a clause, and not any detailed Amendments that might be proposed on it. As far as he was personally concerned, he thought a very strong—indeed, an almost unanswerable—case had been made out in support of the proposal to limit the duration of the Act. If ever there was a Bill.

to which such a principle should apply, he thought it was the present one. When it was first introduced it was said over and over again—and, as he believed, most sincerely said, and at that time really believed to be the case by its promoters and advocates—that the Bill was the result of an almost unanimous wish expressed by the Irish people; but, since then, it had been shown that there was a considerable amount of dissent from the Bill, and that a good many—several, at least—of the hon. Members who originally supported the measure were now among its most active opponents. He, therefore, hoped the Committee would assent to the second reading of the clause, and that afterwards a reasonable limit should be put to the duration of the Bill.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD thought it would be wise, after the clause had been read a second time, to fix the limit of duration at three years, instead of five. If the hon. Member for Roscommon would accept such a compromise, he would, if he did not gain the support, at any rate stop the opposition of several hon. Members, who had up to the present retarded the progress of the Bill.

MR. KIRK said, he believed that if the Bill were enacted for three years, there would be a re-action—a revolution, in fact—which would at the end of that time overturn the Act altogether. Its supporters were anxious to push on the Bill as quickly as possible in order to get it made into law in the course of the present Session, because they knew that there was growing up against it a very strong feeling of opposition. The hon. and learned Member for Cork—the largest county in Ireland—had said, and there could be no doubt as to the accuracy of his statement, that such a feeling was growing up among his constituents. He (Mr. Kirk) represented the smallest county in the country, and he could vouch for it that his constituents were largely animated by the same feeling. During the whole of the time he had represented the county, and he included the period of his canvass, he had only once been asked to vote for the Bill. The request was made by a clergyman, who had also been a water-drinker from his boyhood. In answer to the request, he set forth his views on the subject in a letter which he addressed to the rev. gentleman. On receiving the communication, the clergyman consulted with several of his parishioners, and when he saw clearly what might be the result of passing this Bill, he wrote a reply to his (Mr. Kirk's) letter, in which he said he would never again ask him to support the Bill. His own reasons for not supporting the Bill were, and always had been, that he believed very disastrous results would follow upon its adoption; that the improvement in the morals of the people the promoters expected to flow from it would not follow, and that a large and important section of the Irish people were opposed to it. If the promoters of the Bill believed that its results would be advantageous, and that the majority of the Irish people were in favour of it, there could be no reasonable objection on their part to its duration being limited; because, if their views were sound, it would be certainly re-enacted at the end of any period to which it might be limited. He admitted that he was in a minority, but he believed that if a plébiscite of the people of Ireland were taken, it would be found that a very considerable change of opinion had come about since the Bill was first introduced to Parliament. As far as the Petitions were concerned, it must be perfectly well known that those in favour of the Bill had been carefully got up by agents employed for the purpose, while no such means had been resorted to by those who were opposed to the measure. If agents had been employed to solicit signatures to Petitions against Sunday closing, the result, as far as that branch of the controversy was concerned, would have been very different. The promoters of the Bill ought to abandon the position they had taken up; because, if the mass of the people of Ireland were, as they were said to be, in its favour, the majority of Irish Members would be much larger than it was known to be at present.

MR. HERBERT said, he had all through supported the Bill, and was one of those hon. Members who sat up all night in order to assist its progress. He should still support the measure, but he appealed to the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) to accept the proposal to limit the duration of the Bill to three years. He represented a large constituency, and though among them he had heard nothing except praise of the Bill, he could not shut his eyes to the fact that there had recently been a strong re-action against it, and he therefore thought it would be well to give it a trial for a limited period, in order that the opinion of the Irish people might be further tested concerning it. He deprecated any course that would have the effect of making the Bill a strictly Party question, and hoped some means would be adopted to settle the matter amicably in the course of the present Session.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, any hon. Member who had listened to the debates on this Bill must have come to the conclusion that it was high time the question was settled in some way. An opportunity for such settlement was offered to the hon. Member for Roscommon, who had charge of the Bill, by the new clause which the hon. Member for Kinsale (Mr. Collins) proposed to insert in the Bill. He thought three years was quite long enough for the trial of a law which only affected part of the population of a country, and, in the present case, would mainly embrace the population in the rural districts, the Amendment adopted in the 1st clause having excluded the five largest towns in Ireland. If the Act were found to work satisfactorily, there would be no difficulty at the end of the three years in extending it to the whole country; if it were found to work unsatisfactorily, there could be no reason for keeping a part of the population of Ireland for longer than three years under the operation of a bad law.

MR. MELDON said, he differed from the hon. and gallant Baronet who had just spoken, and who seemed to think that the proposal of the hon. Member for Kinsale opened up a way to the settlement of the much-vexed question which formed the subject-matter of the Bill. The question of Sunday closing of public-houses in Ireland was not now on its trial for the first time. It had been tried in several very extensive districts, and, wherever tried, had proved successful in attaining the objects which it was intended to produce. It had been tried in the Diocese of Cashel, where the residents were people just as much disinclined to submit to coercion as any in Ireland, and had been found to be perfectly successful. His main objection to the limitation proposed was that it would create an agitation, which, if it went on until the next General Election, would produce most mischievous results. It might be to the interest of the present Government to support an experimental measure, as they could not prevent a Bill of some kind passing, because they might thereby conciliate, to some extent, the publican interest in Ireland; but he, for one, could not consent to any limitation unless, by consenting to it, he could be assured that all other opposition to the Bill would be withdrawn.

MR. ONSLOW said, one of the main reasons which had actuated the opponents of the measure was, that they did not wish to see the strong arm of the law come down upon the middle and lower classes and allow the upper classes to escape scot free by means of their clubs, and the ability to keep as much liquor as they might want in their own houses. He thought, therefore, that it would be only fair to give the Act an experimental existence, with a view to re-enacting it, if successful, or allowing it to lapse, if it were found not to be in accord with the wishes of the majority of the Irish people.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he had listened with great attention to all that had been said in opposition to the proposal of the hon. Member for Kinsale (Mr. Collins), and could not find any tangible ground for it. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had said that the promoters of the Bill had already made large concessions, but he should like to know what they were? They had certainly assented to the proposal of the Government to except five large towns from the operation of the Bill, but that could not be called a concession, because it was only done in face of the fact that a large section of the Irish people were against them, and that unless the exception was admitted they dare not face the country. That it was not a concession was shown by a statement in The Temperance Banner, the organ of the supporters of the Bill, to the effect that—

“The Sunday Closing Association do not approve the exception policy. We have consented to it simply at the point of the bayonet.”

As far as the probable effect of supporting the Bill was concerned, he was afraid that several hon. Members, whom he should be sorry to miss from the House, would lose their seats from the fact of their having disregarded the views of their constituents and supported the Bill. He could not accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Roscommon to adopt the principle of the proposal made by the hon. Member for Kinsale on condition of all other opposition to the Bill being withdrawn. He, for one, should not withdraw a single Amendment which he had placed upon the Paper, and some of which, if discussed fully and fairly, would occupy two or three days at least. For instance, the Amendment in reference to the compensation clause could certainly not be disposed of in less than a day, for he did not think Parliament would destroy the business of anybody without giving them the means of getting compensation. ["Question!"] He would say no more on this subject than that the Temperance Party were so intolerant that they would, if they could, prevent any hon. Member from expressing the least opinion contrary to their views. The hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had stated that the Sunday closing system wherever tried had been successful. What were the facts? In Tipperary, which had 16,000 inhabitants, the public-houses had been closed voluntarily for some years, and in the year 1876 the number of persons convicted of drunkenness there was 700. In the town of Newcastle West, where the population was 17,000 in number, the convictions for drunkenness in the same period were only 390. The explanation was that the public-houses being closed the people went on Sundays to shebeens, where they got bad silent Scotch spirit which sent them sick and nearly mad, and, in consequence, they had to go to the licensed houses on Monday mornings in order to get some good stuff to put them right. The result was that they got drunk, were taken before the magistrates and convicted. The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had stated that not more than 11 Irish Members of the House—he called them the Eleven of all Ireland—had ever voted for this Bill. This was an inaccurate statement, for it must be known to many hon. Members that as many as 22 Members representing Irish constituencies had voted in favour of the Bill. [Mr. SULLIVAN: No, no!] The hon. and learned Gentleman might say "no," but he said yes, and the Records of the House would prove that his statement was accurate. Well, what was the overwhelming majority of Irish Members that might have been expected in all the divisions that had taken place in favour of the Bill? Doubtless, there were two or three and twenty who were strongly in favour of the measure; but, taking all the divisions, there were 50 Irish Members who had voted for the Amendments, and yet the Committee was told that there was an overwhelming majority in favour of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. Member was wandering from the subject dealt with by the Amendment under discussion.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he was not introducing any new argument; he was merely following up an argument that had been already introduced; but if it were displeasing to the Committee he would not pursue it. He was anxious that the principle of the Amendment should be tried, because no doubt there would be a General Election before the period proposed by it would have expired, and if the measure were in force for three years, the question would be contested at the next Election. The Committee had been told that the Irish people were in favour of the Bill; he asserted that that House had never been more imposed upon than by being induced to believe that statement, and he could not bring forward a stronger fact in its disproof than that it had been shown that throughout Ireland the promoters could not get people to advocate the measure, and had, in consequence, been compelled to send over two Scotchmen as its champions. If the Bill were once passed there was at least one thing it would do, and that was that it would get rid of the Scotch and North of Ireland influence, which had been resorted to in furtherance of the measure. He had heard no arguments on the part of those who opposed this Amendment that should convince the Committee it ought not to be passed.

THE O'CONOR DON said, one thing was very evident to the Committee—namely, that those of his hon. Friends who opposed the Bill had not imbibed much of the "silent spirit" they had just heard of. They had been told that the promoters of the measure would not allow its opponents to speak at all, and yet the Committee had been occupied from almost ever since the House had met at half-past 12 o'clock until that moment — half-past 4 o'clock — entirely on the two Amendments that had been proposed. He should like to say a few words in reply to what had fallen from his hon. Friend who had just spoken (Mr. O'Sullivan). The hon. Gentleman employed a very curious mode of reckoning; he included in the number of the opponents of the Bill every Irish Member who happened to have voted against any clause in it on all the divisions put together; but, in the case of those who supported it, he only took the greatest number voting on any one particular occasion. He would, however, challenge the hon. Member to show any single occasion on which a score of Irish Members had voted against the view taken by the promoters of the measure. But he wished to come to the question really before the Committee. He believed those who were present at the time he had replied to the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) would bear him out in saying that he had met the proposal made to him in the most candid and straightforward way. He had expressed his readiness, on the understanding that the general opposition to the principle of the Bill was withdrawn, to accept the principle of the Amendment. He did not wish hon. Members to give any pledge to withdraw all opposition to parts of the Bill which they objected to; all he said was, that he would rather trust to the good feeling and sense of the Committee; and that hon. Gentlemen opposing the Bill should feel honourably bound, without entering into pledges, not to re-discuss the principle of the measure on every clause. That was all he could reasonably expect, and he had long since expressed his readiness to allow the clause to be read a second time. With regard to the particular figure to be inserted in the clause, whether it should be three, four, or five years, that was a matter which could be determined after the principle of the clause was settled. They might possibly then be enabled to arrive at a general understanding that would meet the views of hon. Members on both sides of the House. He hoped, therefore, the Committee would at once allow the clause to be read a second time, after which they could settle the duration of the limitation it affirmed.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA did not think the proposition made by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) quite fair. The true principle of the clause under discussion was one of time, and involved the exact time to be fixed. If the clause were read a second time without the time being fixed, it would leave it open to the Committee to introduce five or seven years, or even a longer period; and he regarded this as eminently unsatisfactory, for it would only entail a division on the clause and its probable rejection altogether. He had not been in favour of the clause at all. He had thought that the Bill had better stand or fall without a limitation; but so many of his hon. Friends on both sides of the House appeared to be in favour of accepting the principle of a limitation for three years, that he would not any longer oppose the clause if it were to be understood that three years should be the limit. But if it were left open to the Committee to alter that limit, he should insist on a division being taken, and would reserve to himself the right to take any course he might think best in the matter.

MR. P. J. SMYTH thought it well that there should be no misunderstanding on the point, and would therefore ask the hon. Member for Roscommon what he meant by "withdrawing the opposition to the Bill?" Did he mean that the Amendments now on the Paper should be withdrawn?

THE O'CONOR DON said, he did not mean that. He did not ask any hon. Member who had an Amendment which he thought ought to pass to withdraw it; all he meant was, that an understanding should be come to by which the length of time that was being consumed in these discussions should be shortened. The fact was, that they had had the principle of the Bill discussed over and over again by almost every hon. Member who had spoken. The debates had not been confined to the particular Amendment before the Committee, but had been directed to what was, in reality, the principle of the Bill. All he asked was that hon. Members should not discuss the principle of the measure, but that they would accept that as having been settled, and only deal with the Amendments as they were moved.

MR. P. J. SMYTH would like to ask whether the hon. Member for Roscommon would accept the limitation of three years? He (Mr. P. J. Smyth) regarded this as a fair and reasonable proposal. It came from an hon. Gentleman of very high authority, and he thought the hon. Member for Roscommon would act wisely in accepting it. The hon. Gentleman ought to regard the proposal as one that would facilitate the passage of the Bill, and he (Mr. P. J. Smyth) would add, that at no time in that House had a Private Bill received such facilities as this had received. For his own part, he could hardly be accused of having given a factious opposition to the Bill; and he would, therefore, say to the hon. Member for Roscommon, he hoped that he would accept the Amendment and its limitation of three years.

MR. HERBERT hoped the hon. Member for Roscommon would inform the Committee whether he would accept the term of limitation mentioned in the clause?

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN could not understand the course taken by certain hon. Members on that—the Opposition—side of the House, who evidently had not given the Bill much consideration, but who, probably for political reasons, thought that by grandiloquently appearing as Members of the Irish majority in the matter of this Bill they would be furthering other ends. ["No, no!"] An hon. Member below him said "No." He wished that hon. Member would get up and state how much he knew about the Bill, and how little he knew about the opinion of Ireland upon the subject. The reason he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had risen was to reply to the hon. Member for Roscommon, who had said that the Committee had been continually discussing the principle of the Bill. For his own part, he (Sir Patrick O'Brien) was free from this imputation, as he had not spoken above three times on the measure during the six years it had been before the House. He should like to ask the hon. Member for Roscommon, when he said that they discussed the principle of the Bill on each occasion that it was brought forward, how it could possibly be otherwise? At one time the Bill was intended to apply to the whole of Ireland, and to make people sober in the towns where drunkenness was said most to prevail. That Bill having been withdrawn, they had another on a new principle, and then they had a third on some other principle; and yet the hon. Member for Roscommon got up and said it was a shame to go on discussing the principle of the Bill, quite overlooking the fact that at every new Sitting on the subject the Bill exhibited a new principle. What, he asked, was the principle of the Bill now? Was it that its application was to be limited to a few counties in Ireland where there was no drunkenness? If this were so, he could well understand hon. Members opposing the measure, and fanatical people outside the House crying "Question!" for he knew that there were no fanatics in the House, and, of course, what he was saying could not apply to hon. Members. What, he asked, was the nature of the proposition of the hon. Member for Kinsale (Mr. Collins), and what was the answer to it? It was generally admitted that it was for the public to say what was their opinion about a great social change of this sort, and the Amendment asked that the Bill should only be enacted for a period of three years, when a new Parliament might pronounce upon its working; and the hon. Member for Roscommon told them to try this great panacea for the remedy of Irish grievances, before which every other question was as nothing, for an indefinite time. However, if it must be so, let them pass the Bill; they had had enough of it; they had discussed it ad nauseam, and now that it only referred to a few places in Ireland, and the drunken portion of the population had been excluded, let them carry the measure. The hon. Member for Kinsale said, let them carry the measure over the next Dissolution, and he suggested three years. And, putting aside all tall talk, of which they had already had enough on both sides of the House, and looking at the matter from a common-sense point of view, he asked, was there anyone, apart from Sabbatarians and temperance preachers who would say that it was not a fair proposal to allow the country to settle the question as to whether the measure had proved effectual, and a renewal was desirable? He hoped the Committee would support the hon. Member for Kinsale in his Amendment.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, the words of the Amendment were that the Act should continue in force until the 31st of December, 1881; when, unless Parliament should otherwise determine, the existing laws should again come into operation; and he wished to know whether the hon. Member for Roscommon would accept this limitation? It was useless to beat about the bush. The hon. Member for Roscommon talked of concession; but what concession had he made to any one Amendment? The fact was, that the opponents of the Bill had withdrawn six Amendments in order to conciliate the House and allow it to make progress with the measure at an early hour in the morning, and it was too bad for the hon. Member for Roscommon to say they had made no concessions. If they could not obtain a definite understanding from the hon. Gentleman on this question, it would be necessary to divide the Committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER understood that the hon. Member for Roscommon had given up any idea of entering into a bargain on this subject, and that the Committee was at that moment considering the question as to whether a limitation of a period not yet to be named should be adopted. Consequently, he thought that the questions which were being addressed to the hon. Member for Roscommon would be more appropriate after the clause had been read a second time.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH felt bound to say that he could not understand why his Friends below the Gangway persisted in requiring from the hon. Member for Roscommon a pledge that he would accept a limitation of three years. The hon. Member had conceded the second reading of the clause containing the principle of limitation to three years, and if the clause were read a second time, it would then have to be decided whether the period of three years should be struck out and another term inserted involving a longer period. The advantage of the clause as it stood was all on the side of those who contended for a three years' limit.

MR. MURPHY need scarcely say that he had taken no part in this debate—he alluded to the present occasion—and if the Committee would bear with him, he would only keep them from a division for a very few moments. When the House had voted for the second reading of the Bill, it had done so under the impression that a vast majority of the Irish people were in favour of it. ["Question!"] If he might be permitted to say so, it was a question of taste as to whether hon. Members should thus interrupt one who had hitherto abstained from saying one word during the debate. He understood the position to be this—the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) suggested that the new clause proposed by the hon. Member for Kinsale (Mr. Collins) should be passed, and reserved to himself the liberty of proposing an Amendment extending the time from three to five years. [An hon. MEMBER: Seven.] An hon. Member said seven years; perhaps some other supporter of the Bill would say 14; but he thought there should be some finality. He need scarcely say that he had always been opposed to the passing of a restrictive and compulsory measure such as this. He did not want to interfere with voluntary action; but he objected to a measure which he knew was not in accord with the opinions of the classes who would be affected by it. However, he was never opposed to the proper conduct of Business, or to anything that was really practical; and, although he could not bind himself not to oppose the measure, if on another occasion it should be the pleasure of the House to say it should not pass, he must certainly subscribe to the idea of the hon. Member for Roscommon that the new clause should be allowed to be read as it then was, and that they should afterwards discuss whether the period mentioned in it should be further extended. For his own part, he thought that three years would afford ample time for the country to judge of the necessity of continuing the measure; but this was a matter to be discussed after the principle of imposing a limitation had been settled.

Clause read a second time.

MR. SULLIVAN moved, in line 2, to leave out the words "eighty-one," and insert the words "eighty-five."

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. SULLIVAN thought his hon. Friend (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) a little precipitate, inasmuch as he (Mr. Sullivan), had not resumed his seat. Besides, while he had spoken but once that day, his hon. Friend had spoken 15 times. He thought the Committee had wisely decided that the Bill should be a terminable Bill, and the only question remaining on this clause was as between three years and seven years. He thought that anyone looking at this question practically would see that three years would be too short a term; while, on the other hand, there were several precedents for seven years. If he were to launch forth on the general question, he, too, could speak almost interminably upon it; but he thought it better to move his Amendment to the clause as briefly as possible.

Amendment proposed, in line 2, to leave out the words "eighty-one," and insert the words "eighty-five,"—(Mr. Sullivan,)—instead thereof.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in rising to move that the Chairman report Progress and ask leave to sit again, said, it was only fair to the Committee that he should explain the reason why he did so. He had no desire that the Business of the Committee should be in the least degree delayed, and although his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), had some warranty for saying that he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had spoken on several occasions during that Sitting, he had taken up no longer time than was requisite in addressing himself to the subjects under discussion. In the present instance, he thought the Committee had not had time to consider the principle of the clause. He had not been in favour of the second reading of the clause just passed, and he did not think that the limit of three years was a satisfactory one. In his opinion, next Session, or the Session afterwards, if the measure did not turn out to be a success, it ought to be repealed. His hon. Friends who usually acted with him had thought it best to accept a limitation, and the only period before them then was that contained in the clause; but the whole principle of that clause would be utterly set aside and subverted if the Bill were to be extended over the approaching Dissolution of Parliament, and, probably, over even the next subsequent Dissolution. He accepted the three years' principle unwillingly, and, if it were not assented to, he should persist in his Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persevere with his Motion, because he considered that the present was by far the most convenient time of any that was likely to be at their disposal for settling this question. There had been considerable discussion on the point already, and he thought the Committee was in a position to decide it. He must add that he was rather surprised to hear the promoters of the Bill making the suggestion which had been put forward, that the limitation of the measure should be seven years.

MR. SULLIVAN wished to say that he was not a promoter of the Bill, and that he had made his suggestion emphatically in disagreement with the too conciliatory views of his hon. Friends behind him.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, if the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had not been authorized by the promoters of the Bill, he presumed the hon. and learned Gentleman would not expect the Committee to support his Motion.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA offered, if the principle of three years were accepted, to withdraw his Motion.

THE O'CONOR DON thought the opponents of the Bill were pressing their views very hardly. They seemed to think that the promoters were to have no opinion at all as to the length of time the measure should be in operation. He had accepted the principle of the clause, because he thought that by so doing he should be met in a conciliatory spirit by his opponents. At the same time, he had distinctly stated that he thought three years too short a term; and what he would now venture to suggest was, that the limit should be five years. He believed that this would meet a great many of the objections on both sides. If the term were three years only, the agitation for the renewal or discontinuance of the measure would commence almost immediately; but if it were five years, the agitation would not begin until a short time before the expiration of the term. His desire was that the agitation should be put an end to, and he also wished to see the measure fairly tried. Five years would enable them to have a fair trial for at least two years of the existence of the measure, as no one would think it of any use to agitate during so long a period as five years, inasmuch as their energies would thereby be wasted; and, if during the two years of quiet they might thus expect to have, the feeling of the country were found to be against the measure, he had no doubt there would be no effort to re-enact it; while, on the other hand, if the feeling were in its favour, any agitation against it would be unsuccessful. Therefore, while having no fear as to the result of the experiment, he respectfully asked the Committee to accept his suggestion; and he would also ask the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), who, although a supporter of the measure, was not one of its promoters, whose name was not on the back of the Bill, and who had no responsibility whatever in making any proposal on the subject, to withdraw his Amendment, in order that the figures "1883" might be substituted for "1881."

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he could not withdraw his Motion on the understanding suggested by the hon. Member for Roscommon.

MR. MURPHY said, it was his intention to make some observations on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Louth provided it was fairly before the Committee. Another Motion being now before the Committee, he must postpone those remarks.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING assured the Committee that though he had always opposed the Bill, it was not his desire improperly to throw obstacles in the way of its progress. He wished to make some observations on the question whether the Bill should be passed for three or for five years; and, in his view, it would not be fair to insist on reporting Progress at that hour.

MR. KING-HARMAN pressed the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) to withdraw the Motion for reporting Progress. There was now a simple issue before the Committee—whether the Bill should be passed for three, five, or seven years.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

The O'Conor Don

MR. SULLIVAN asked the permission of the Committee to withdraw his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn? [Cries of "No!"]

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, two interesting discoveries had been made within the last few minutes. The Committee had been told by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Conor Don) that there was to be agitation in Ireland. He had understood from the hon. Member, on every occasion that the Bill had been hitherto under discussion, that the Irish people were all in favour of it. It appeared now that there would be agitation among the Irish people. He (Major O'Gorman) thought so himself; but he was glad to hear it from that quarter. The other discovery was, that the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) was not a promoter of the Bill. He (Major O'Gorman) understood the hon. and learned Member to have said at some public meeting in Ireland, or to have written in some public paper, that he hoped he would never see Heaven until this Bill was passed.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked the Committee to confine their attention, at present, to a somewhat lower level than that to which the hon. and gallant Member (Major O'Gorman) had called their attention. He would suggest that the withdrawal of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Louth was unnecessary at present. The Question to be decided at present was, whether the date 1881 should stand part of the clause. Whether that date should be replaced by 1885 would be a question for after consideration.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked, whether the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Louth was not to omit the date from the clause, in order to insert one which would be equivalent to prolonging the operation of the Bill for seven years, and whether this was not the Question that would be put?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment is to leave out "eighty-one," in order to insert "eighty-five." That amounts to two separate Questions. It is possible for the Committee to affirm the one without affirming the other. The first Question is that the words "eighty-one" stand part of the clause.

THE O'CONOR DON asked the Committee to vote with him for the omission of "eighty-one," not with the view of inserting the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, but with the view of inserting words which would limit the operation of the Bill to five years.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN wished to know whether, in the event of the hon. and learned Member for Louth not carrying his Amendment, it would be competent for the hon. Member for Roscommon to move that a different date be inserted.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the Committee decide to omit the words "eighty-one," it will be open to the Committee to insert "eighty-five," as proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Louth, or "eighty-four," or "eighty-three," or "eighty-two."

Question put, "That the words 'eighty-one' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 143; Noes 176: Majority 33.—(Div. List, No. 156.)

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question now is that the words "eighty-five" be here inserted.

THE O'CONOR DON moved that the words proposed to be inserted should be "eighty-three."

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Louth is before the Committee, and must either be withdrawn or negatived before other words can be proposed.

MR. SULLIVAN begged to withdraw his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN said, if the Amendment were withdrawn by permission of the Committee, it would be open to any other Member to move the insertion of other words; but, by the usual courtesy of the House, the priority of moving an Amendment would be given to the promoter of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE O'CONOR DON begged leave to move that the words "eighty-three" be inserted.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING complained that the front Opposition Bench had not assisted the minority to gain any concession. He thought they were much mistaken if they expected to gain much credit in Ireland for the course they had adopted; and he trusted that when that Bench did yield something to a large and influential minority, it would be remembered that they had, from beginning to end, supported a Bill which, in his opinion, was utterly opposed to the traditions of the Liberal Party. He hoped the Committee would now consider that if not three years, at least, some shorter period than five years, should be agreed upon. He would suggest that four years should be the period.

MR. STACPOOLE said, a fair compromise having been offered but not accepted, negotiation ought now to be at an end. He moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Stacpoole.)

MR. J. LOWTHER hoped the proposal would not be persisted in. There had been great complaints that the Bill was brought in for consideration at late hours. He himself joined in these complaints, and it would be wrong now to acquiesce in the proposition to report Progress. If any hon. Member objected to the term of years proposed by the hon. Member for Roscommon, he might move another term that would commend itself to the Committee as the more reasonable course.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING intended to move that it should be 1882.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not competent to move that until after the Amendment of the hon. Member for Roscommon has been disposed of.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, remarking that he might address himself to the general Question as there was a Motion to report Progress before the Committee, urged his hon. Friend (the O'Conor Don) to make a small concession by adopting the date suggested by the hon. Member for the County of Cork. Otherwise, it would be impossible, in the time left for debate, to make further progress that night.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Roscommon were carried, it would not be competent for the hon. Member for County Cork to move the insertion of 1882. He would take this opportunity of expressing his concurrence with the hon. Member for County Cork in the observations he had made. As one who had been a strong supporter of Liberal opinion in that House for over 25 years, he must express surprise at the manner in which, en bloc, the front Opposition Bench had gone against the expressed opinion of many men in the House who, in times of difficulty, had supported them.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, it appeared to him unfortunate if, when the Committee were upon a basis of compromise, some middle term could not be agreed upon. He suggested the 1st August, 1882.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the words 31st December were already adopted, and it would be impossible to go back to alter them.

THE O'CONOR DON thought the hon. Member for Londonderry had not fully comprehended the effect of his Amendment, which would be to make the period even shorter than was suggested by the hon. Member for County Cork. He presumed that he meant to suggest August, 1883. If a compromise of that kind would meet his hon. Friends, if they would consent that the Bill should continue in operation to the end of the Session which succeeded 1882, then he would not object to the compromise. That would be, say, four years, and a Session of Parliament.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING was not decided whether it was open to him to move an Amendment on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Roscommon. If so, he would propose the end of December, 1882.

THE CHAIRMAN directed that the hon. Member could say "No" to the Amendment, and if it were negatived, he could then propose his own words.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that if the hon. Member for Roscommon insisted on dividing on this, they might as well go on [with Progress. If the hon. Member would agree to insert December, 1882, the clause would be passed and the thing would be done. If not, it would be necessary to take the sense of the Committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, it appeared to him that the proposals of the hon. Members for Youghal, Cork, and Londonderry were exactly the same; and as the hon. Member for Londonderry had been a staunch supporter of the Bill, perhaps his suggestion would carry some weight with the promoters of the Bill. The hon. Member for Roscommon had suggested an Amendment which could not in Order be put; but did he think it worth while to endanger the passing of the Bill after all that had taken place for the sake of a question involving a few months? He understood the clause would be allowed to pass if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Londonderry were taken.

MR. O'SULLIVAN did not believe the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Stacpoole) would ask to report Progress. An element of dissension had been introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan). A great many Members thought the feeling of the Committee was in favour of the proposal of the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna); but when the front Opposition Bench was against them, it was impossible for them to carry their Amendment. The hon. Member for Ennis was quite right in introducing his Motion to report Progress. It was well known that the feeling of the Committee was in favour of the proposal of the hon. Member for Youghal, and yet no concession had been made; and, under these circumstances, the hon. Member for Ennis was quite right to proceed with his Motion.

THE O'CONOR DON held that he had made concessions. He had conceded the principle that the Bill should be terminable, and then an hon. Member moved to report Progress. He wanted to show that he was desirous of meeting the proposal now made. He would accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork County. He begged to omit 1883, and he would accept 1882.

MR. STACPOOLE thought the feeling of the Committee was decidedly in favour of three years. He would withdraw the Motion to report Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING proposed that 1882 be substituted for 1883.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Major O'Gorman.)

MR. J. LOWTHER trusted the hon. and gallant Member would not persevere. What was now before the Committee was an entirely new proposal, and was accepted by both Parties.

MR. SHAW hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would withdraw his Motion. It would give them an additional year to finish off the front Opposition Bench.

MR. O'SULLIVAN would ask his hon. and gallant Friend to withdraw. He thought they had gone so far that they ought to be satisfied.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, that the Bill was so vicious that he was determined by all the means in his power to exasperate the people of Ireland against it. He would prefer that the Bill should be deferred for an interminable period. [Cries of "Withdraw!"] He should not withdraw.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment (The O'Conor Don) agreed to.

MR. O'SULLIVAN moved to report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

PAROCHIAL CHARITIES OF THE CITY OF LONDON—THE COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When proposed Commission to inquire into the City Parochial Charities will be appointed; and, whether, if it is necessary that an Act of Parliament should be passed before such Commission is appointed, he can inform the House when the Bill will be introduced?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the matter had not been lost sight of. The necessary instructions had been given to the draftsman to prepare a Bill, which would be brought in as soon as possible.

LUNACY COMMISSION (SCOTLAND) — THE VACANCY.—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Lord Advocate, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to avail themselves of the present vacancy in the office of one of the Lunacy Commissioners in Scotland to reduce the cost of that department by abolishing the office, or otherwise, as referred to in the Report of the Commission on Civil Departments (Scotland), 1870, following on the evidence to that effect of the Lord Justice Clerk and other parties?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, I believe it will be found absolutely necessary to fill up the present vacancy in one of the Chief Commissionerships. The Report referring to this question makes no recommendation upon this subject, but contains a statement made by the Lord Advocate Moncreiff to the effect that it was his intention to abolish the office; but I may remind the hon. Member that after that Report was given in, a vacancy occurred in one of these Commissionerships, and the then Home Secretary (Mr. Bruce), with the advice of the Lord Advocate (Mr. Young), resolved to fill up the vacancy, and did so. That was challenged, I believe, by the hon. Member, but the Home Secretary said it was absolutely necessary for the administration of the Lunacy Laws, and, I believe, the duties attendant on the administration of these laws are more onerous at the present day than they were in July 1870.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND—OPENING OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the accounts of the opening of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland by the High Commissioners with a Royal salute and a body of horse, foot, and artillery; and if he will consider whether the time has not come when the practice might, with advantage, be discontinued?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I think, Sir, that the usual forms and ceremonies accompanying the visit of the Lord High Commissioners, as representing Her Majesty, were observed on the occasion referred to, and I see no reason why they should be discontinued.

PUBLIC HEALTH—ADULTERATION OF BEER AT MAIDSTONE.—QUESTION.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether there is any foundation for a report that several casks of beer brewed at Maidstone have been examined by the Excise authorities have been found to be adulterated and condemned and destroyed?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, I have made all the inquiries in my power relative to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, but I cannot find that there is the slightest foundation for it.

The Lord Advocate

PERSIA—VISIT OF THE SHAH.

QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Shah of Persia intends to visit this country, and, if so, whether his visit will be of a public character; and whether in that event Her Majesty's Government have in contemplation any arrangement for his reception?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I have to state that it is the intention of the Shah of Persia to visit this country. The visit will not be a public one; on the contrary, it is expressly desired by His Majesty that his visit shall be incognito, and it is the wish of His Majesty to inspect personally the many institutions and manufactories in this country, and study them in detail. It is the intention of the Government that His Majesty's desire shall be respected.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE CAPE—TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.

QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the want of Telegraphic Communication between this Country and the Cape of Good Hope; and, whether any steps are in contemplation with a view to such communication?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, recent events have specially directed the attention of the Government to the want of telegraphic communication between this country and the Cape of Good Hope; and, looking to the peculiar circumstances of the case, and the absence of any prospect that within a reasonable time any communication would be opened by private enterprise, we would be prepared to give our favourable consideration to a proposal for aiding in some form or another in the establishment of such telegraphic communication, provided the several Colonies interested agreed also to help in the work. Despatches to this effect were addressed by me shortly after my accession to my present Office to the Governors of the several Colonies affected, and, should the replies be favourable, I shall lose no time in inviting the attention of my Colleagues to a consideration of the details of the subject, in order that the best plan may be adopted to carry out the proposal, which I think is of the greatest importance to the interests of the Empire.

THE TURKISH LOAN OF 1855.

QUESTION.

MR. DODSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the sum of £77,448, which Her Majesty's Government were obliged to provide for interest and commission in consequence of the default of the Turkish Government to pay the dividend due in February last on the Turkish Guaranteed Loan of 1855, specially charged upon the Egyptian tribute, has been received in full, or to any and what amount, from the Turkish or Egyptian Government; whether the French Government has paid one moiety thereof; and, whether he can say when the Correspondence with the above-named Governments on the subject, which he informed the House on 19th March should be laid before Parliament as soon as it was in a fit state, will be presented?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am sorry to say, Sir, that the bulk of the sum of £77,448 has not yet been paid. The Porte gave instructions to the Khedive to pay the amount that was due, but the amount received from the Khedive has been somewhat less than £8,000. Why a further amount has not yet been paid I am not in a position to say, but communications are still going on with the Egyptian Government on the subject. The French Government have been advised by Her Majesty's Government of the position of affairs, and they have recognized their liability to pay one moiety. The French Government are prepared to pay the moiety on Her Majesty's Government sending in an account; but as we have been hoping to receive a further remittance from the Egyptian Government we have not yet put the claim in proper shape, and that, of course, will be a matter which will cause no delay between ourselves and the French Government. I am afraid that as the Correspondence has not yet been completed, it will not be advisable to lay it upon the Table of the House.

Afterwards,

MR. DODSON said, he wished to ask a further Question, of which he had not given the right hon. Gentleman Notice. It was, Whether the last instalment of the interest due on the Suez Canal Shares had been paid by the Khedive in full, and when the payment had been made?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid I cannot name the date, but it was paid in full.

SCOTLAND—THE BOTANIC GARDENS, EDINBURGH.—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he has received a Memorial from the Students of Botany in the Royal Botanic Gardens of Edinburgh, complaining that nearly 400 students have to study in a class-room which is only seated for 230; and, whether the Government intend to provide adequate accommodation for the public, which has shown its desire to pursue their studies in these public gardens?

MR. GERARD NOEL: Sir, a Memorial has been received from the Students of Botany in the Royal Botanic Gardens; but I am sorry to say that, owing to more pressing requirements, it has been found impracticable to take any steps to improve the accommodation in the class-rooms at Edinburgh. But I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that when the Estimates for 1879-80 are being prepared, the question shall be carefully considered.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. O'CLERY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having regard to the forthcoming debate on University Education in Ireland, Whether the Government intend to hold a Morning Sitting on Friday?

MR. BUTT: I think this Question might have been left to be put by myself or the hon. Member for Roscommon, who has charge of the Motion. I would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to interfere with the ordinary Sitting to-morrow. My hon. Friend has been good enough in my absence to submit this subject to the House. It is a subject exciting a great deal of attention in Ireland, and a full discussion of it is very desirable. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted to a deputation that waited upon him the importance of the subject, and I would press upon him that the discussion should be allowed to go on to-morrow. No one knows better than I do the difficulties which have been thrown in the way of the right hon. Gentleman. Still I trust to receive an assurance that to-morrow's Sitting will not be interfered with.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I can assure the House and both the hon. Members who have just addressed me, that I am fully conscious of the importance attached to the question of Irish University education, and I should be most desirous, so far as I could, to provide an opportunity for the discussion of the question. I am, therefore, most anxious that I may not be driven to the necessity of asking the House to meet here to-morrow morning. I wish, however, to state candidly to the House, what the position of Her Majesty's Government is in respect to the progress of Public Business. We have already had six nights' discussion of the Civil Service Estimates, and have been able to get through only 33 Votes. There are upwards of 100 Votes still remaining, and if we proceed with them with similar progress, we should require 18 nights to complete them. There are only 18 Mondays and Thursdays between this and the 1st of August inclusive, and if we obtain no other days than those for discussion of these Estimates, progressing in the same degree, we should find the whole time of the Government taken up upon the consideration of these Votes alone, making no allowance for the discussion of questions relating to the Army and Navy, to our foreign affairs, and to the various other subjects of legislation which must necessarily engage the attention of the Government. I hope, then, that the House will see that it is not owing to any grudging spirit on our part that we feel ourselves obliged to make stipulations for being afforded further facilities for the progress of the Government Business. I repeat, then, what I have already said, that if we can make sufficient progress to-night in the Estimates, I shall not ask for a Morning Sitting to-morrow. I am fully aware the Irish Members take particular interest in the issue of the discussion of the Irish University question and the Queen's Colleges in Ireland, and we must be prepared for a considerable amount of discussion upon that question. I have, therefore, so arranged this evening that, although I ask for a Vote on account—a count which I hoped to have avoided—the Government will not include in that Vote any relating to the Queen's Colleges in Ireland. I will, however, fix Supply Monday next again, and then take the main Vote for them. I hope hon. Members interested in the subject will be satisfied that they will thus be afforded a sufficient opportunity of discussing that Vote. I propose to take a Vote on account this evening for all the Services exclusive of the Queen's Colleges, and then to proceed with Class III., which relates to Law and Justice, the earlier Votes of which do not particularly affect Ireland, so that it is not likely they will require any full discussion on the part of the Irish Members especially. This is the position in which we stand. To-night we find that we are able to make a reasonable progress in our Estimates, we shall not have a Morning Sitting to-morrow. If not, I shall certainly be under the necessity of asking the House to grant us a Morning Sitting to-morrow.

MR. A. MOORE: Does the hon. Member for Roscommon intend to proceed with the Sunday Closing Bill to-night?

THE O'CONOR DON: It is my intention to proceed with it to-night.

MR. EYTON asked Mr. Attorney General, When he intends to proceed with the Bar Education and Discipline Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR JOHN HOLKER), in reply, said, he intended to proceed with this Bill at the earliest opportunity he could obtain, which, he feared would not be until after Whitsuntide.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

DISCUSSIONS ON THE ESTIMATES.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DILLWYN said, although he considered it inconvenient, he did not wish to raise any objection to a Vote being taken on account; but he must protest against the tone in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken with respect to the delay which had been occasioned by the discussions on the Votes in Committee of Supply. It could not be denied that there had been some obstruction, but the greater part of the discussions, so far as he had heard them, were, he believed, really bond fide, and many of the criticisms of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) were, in his opinion, very able and very much to the point. The Estimates were assuming enormous proportions, and it was, he maintained, essential to the public interests; that they should be fully discussed, in order that it might be seen whether the charge on the public could not be reduced; and with the view to secure that object, as well as to afford the Government reasonable facilities for the conduct of the Business of the House, he thought it might be well to appoint a Select Committee in the early part of each Session, to which the Estimates should be referred, and which should make a Report to the Committee of Supply on each class as it came up.

MR. PARNELL said, he might not be out of Order in referring to the reply the Chancellor of the Exchequer was good enough to give to the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) in regard to the Irish University Bill and the proposed Morning Sitting. On Tuesday last, he had ventured to predict that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer took a Morning Sitting he would get no Supply. His reason for that was that the Irish Estimates were the next Business, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been permitted to make considerable progress in Supply, these Estimates would have given rise to considerable discussion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had now skipped over these Irish Estimates and put down Class III., in which he felt very little interest, until the 14th Vote, relating to "Convict Establishments," was reached. It happened, therefore, that by the action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, so far as he was concerned, he should be able to facilitate the obtaining of Supply without any sacrifice of what he considered his duty. As regarded the general question of the impediments offered to the Government in the way of obtaining Supply, it had unfortunately happened that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had so frequently expressed his opinion on the conduct of Members who had criticized—he would not say opposed—the Votes in Supply, had been almost invariably absent from the House when the discussions on Supply were taken. The right hon. Gentleman must, therefore, have formed his opinions on the conduct of hon. Members on the reports—more or less vague—which had reached him from hon. Members who might have been equally ill-informed with himself. On one or two occasions in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer entered the House when Votes in Supply were being considered, they had been engaged in an unfortunate squabble of a personal character, which had been in every case created by some English Member who had not been present during the evening, and who, thinking that the time of the House was being wasted, got up in a flurry, and made charges of a disagreeable kind. That was the experience from which the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke, when he talked of the way in which Supply had been dealt with. He would submit to the right hon. Gentleman, as a fair-minded man, that if he wished to constitute himself a judge of others, he should, at least, sit in the House while Supply was being taken. If he could not, why should he speak in this rash way of the conduct of Members who had been in the House all the time that Supply was being taken? By far the greater amount of time in these cases was wasted in unseemly personal squabbles. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The observations of the hon. Member, imputing misconduct to hon. Members of the House, and stating that personal squabbles are carried on in this House, which are not corrected, are unbecoming, and I must call upon the hon. Member to be more careful in his expressions.

MR. PARNELL: But they certainly seemed to me to be personal squabbles.

MR. SPEAKER: If personal squabbles occur in this House, it is the duty of the Speaker or the Chairman, as the case maybe, to call to Order Members who are guilty of them. The hon. Member is not entitled to say that personal squabbles occur without their being corrected.

MR. PARNELL replied, that he did not say that personal squabbles occurred without their being corrected. On the contrary, the Chairman had very frequently corrected these things. He ventured to suggest to the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury at the commencement of the discussion of the Civil Service Estimates what the effect would be if that discussion which it was the duty of hon. Members to give them was even attempted, and his predictions had been verified. At the present moment, hon. Members who ventured to discuss the items of the Estimates were liable to an amount of ill-feeling which required more than ordinary courage to encounter. He would suggest that before next Session the hon. Baronet should consider the desirability of referring the whole of these Estimates to a Committee upstairs; and he believed, if a Committee had the opportunity of going through the items calmly and without heat, and calling the heads of Departments and others before them, they might reduce the Estimates by £5,000,000, or even £10,000,000, without any detriment to the public service; but, on the contrary, to its decided advantage. On the question why he, an Irish Member, should remain in the House and discuss Scotch and English Estimates, he might say that for some time he had confined his exertions to supporting measures promoted for the benefit of Ireland, which were, however, voted down by large majorities of English and Scotch Members, who frequently had not even listened to the arguments that had been used. He saw, then, that he was simply wasting his time, and he accordingly turned his attention to the Estimates, and endeavoured to check extravagance and stop sinecures, in the hope that he might in this way do some small good to those who paid taxes in Ireland. He was very well satisfied with the results that had attended his exertions since he had been in the House. He was sorry that the House had appeared, from time to time, to misapprehend his intentions and desires; but he was perfectly willing to live down the misapprehensions of the House of Commons, and he believed that it would some day admit that it had misunderstood him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am sure the House must feel very sorry to hear that the hon. Member considers himself a personne incompris, and that the services he has rendered to us have not been appreciated. I am certain that the general feeling of the House will be not to raise any personal discussion. What we meet for here is to discharge the Business of the country, not to discuss the merits of individual Members, or whether their action is or is not justifiable. I venture to apologize to the House for my own absence occasionally when the House was in Committee of Supply. I try to be here as much as I can. All that I have seen of the conduct of my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury convinces those who have been here that he is perfectly competent for the work. I venture to request that the House will be good enough to abstain from unnecessary digressions upon questions of a personal character, and that, as we seem to be tolerably agreed, the course suggested will be pursued. I have to thank my hon. Friends here, and on the opposite side, who did not persevere with Motions of which they had given Notice on going into Committee of Supply. At the same time, in the remarks I made, I did not all wish to intimate any objection to the hon. Members taking the proper and usual privilege which belongs to Members of this House to raise questions upon going into Committee of Supply. I expressed a hope that, in whatever discussions occur before going into Committee of Supply, there would be some consideration for the general conduct of Public Business. If a large proportion of the time is spent in discussing one or two items, that may render it impossible to discuss other items which may be of greater or equal importance. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) spoke of the inconvenience of taking Votes on account, and he said that Votes on which discussions ought to be held are brought on late in the Session, and that discussion could not then arise. If a great deal of discussion occurs, we are driven to that necessity. With regard to the suggestion that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee, I will merely say that that is a large subject which I will not discuss at the present moment. I hope the House will not allow itself on this occasion, and without due preparation, to be led off into a discussion on such a large and important question as that. I hope I have said nothing which can give occasion for a continuation of anything like a personal discussion. We have one object in view—namely, to proceed with the Public Business, and I hope it will be the general feeling of the House that we should now proceed with it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, it does not appear to me that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is in any way responsible for the discussion which has just been raised. I did not understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answering a Question which was put to him at an earlier period of the evening, to make any reflection whatever on the conduct of any Member of the House. All I understood him to do was to point out that, although there had been a considerable number of Sittings, very small progress had been made in voting Supply, and this made him propose a course which he admitted under ordinary circumstances would have been objectionable. For my own part, I do not think the right hon. Gentleman could have done otherwise than he has done. I hope that the advice given by the right hon. Gentleman may be accepted, and that the House will see that an undue amount of discussion on a limited number of Votes must inevitably, in the end, have the effect of hindering a fair and full discussion of the great body of the Estimates. Therefore, I trust we may be able to proceed without any unnecessary delay.

SIR ANDREW LUSK hoped the House would guard itself against running from one extreme to another. Money should not be voted away without seeing to its application. It was not a dignified course for the Government to say that they were at a standstill, and could not get along. They ought to adopt some means to enable them to do their Business, and there were various ways in which they could improve the present state of things, without interfering with a due amount of fair criticism, if they took the trouble to do so.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," agreed to.

CLASS III.—LAW AND JUSTICE.

(2.) £54,505, to complete the sum for Law Charges.

MR. GREGORY said, he had given Notice of opposition to the item for the London Bankruptcy Court; but he thought it would be more convenient if he brought up the subject on the second reading of the Bankruptcy Bill. His object in giving Notice to reduce the Estimates was to protest against the charge for that Court; but he would not bring the question forward now. He would reserve anything he had to say till the time he had mentioned.

MR. BIGGAR said, there was an increase in the cost of criminal prosecutions of £4,500. He should like to know on what principle these prosecutions were conducted? He should like to know, also, if the cost of the prosecution in the Bradlaugh case was included in the Vote, and, if so, upon what principle that cost was incurred, as the offence was not a police offence?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained, that these prosecutions were conducted by the Solicitor to the Treasury at the instance of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The case was submitted for the consideration of the head of the Department before the Solicitor General took it up, and nothing was done without the approval of the head of the Department. In some cases, it was for the public interest that the prosecution should be conducted by the Solicitor to the Treasury, and in others, from the magnitude of the case, it was impossible for it to proceed unless it were taken up by Government.

SIR ANDREW LUSK remarked that something might surely be done to curtail the length of these trials which often extended over 20 or 30 days. Surely the interminable speeches of counsel, for instance, could be cut down.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR JOHN HOLKER) said, the Government were not responsible for the Bradlaugh case. That was a prosecution by the City authorities, and the Government were in no way concerned in it. Undoubtedly, the detective case did last for a long time before the police magistrate, but that was not the fault of the prosecution. The counsel for the defence cross-examined the witnesses at enormous length, and so very much prolonged the proceedings. So far as he was aware, no time was wasted in these trials.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he was not alluding to the trial of the detectives, but to another case which was heard at the Old Bailey.

MR. MACDONALD said, he found that a clerk in these Estimates was paid £50 under one head, and £15 under another. He thought the Committee should put a stop to such a system. Would any man in business pay his clerks in such a way?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, it was found more advisable in cases like the one referred to, to select a clerk in the office, and let him do the extra work required. It was like a case where a clerk took charge of the office during the absence of its head, and received additional pay for that.

MR. O'DONNELL said, under section B, head G, there was a charge of £500 as paid in rewards. He should like to know whether that was really all that was paid for rewards in connection with the administration of justice in this country? It seemed to him rather a small sum, considering the area over which the administration of justice extended in this country. He thought the amount must be supplemented by money from some other source.

MR. RYLANDS said, there was a constant tendency to increase in this Vote. The gentleman in the service of the Crown appeared to be too much for the Members of that House. For instance, they now paid large salaries to the Law Officers; but that did not seem to diminish the expenses of the Vote.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, formerly the Law Officers were paid by fees; but that had recently been changed. The fees were now paid into the Exchequer, and the Law Officers received a salary. As to the Advocate General, he believed that an arrangement had also been come to recently with reference to that matter.

MR. GORST thought such an explanation would be exceedingly valuable if the hon. Baronet had told them how much the cash payments into the Exchequer had been; but, as it was, they did not know at all how they stood. As to the Advocate General, he should like to know if there had been an inquiry into the proceeds of his office, on which to base the salary?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the subject was one which had occupied his personal attention since he had been in his present Office. The custom hitherto prevailing had been for each Department to pay its extra receipts into the Exchequer, and the amount had been explained in a note at the foot of the Vote. That amount was always very nearly accurate, but not always a guide for the future. Instead of that speculative amount, he thought it would be better, in future, so to arrange the accounts that the actual amount should appear in the Vote. Each Department would then show, on the face of its Estimate, what were its extra receipts as compared with its gross expenditure.

MR. W. M. TORRENS wished, in justice to the Government, to bear his testimony to the fact that one item in the Vote had been increased from no fault of the Government, but entirely owing to the passage of a Bill through Parliament which was felt to remove a great and grievous hardship. The fact that the Queen's Proctor was at liberty to bring intervening suits in the Divorce Court, the costs of which, if they failed, were not liable to be paid by the Crown, was felt by both Houses of Parliament to be a system which should not be allowed to continue. The performance of the duties of the office by the Solicitor to the Treasury entailed a certain amount of extra expense in that Department.

MR. GREGORY thought the permanent staff of the office too large, and trusted the Secretary to the Treasury would look into the matter. Twenty-seven appeared to him to be a large staff for the work which was done, but that number had been increased to 29. There was an item of £450 for writers alone.

(3.) £138,097, to complete the sum for Criminal Prosecutions, Sheriffs' Expenses, &c.

MR. GORST wished to ask a question of the Government, in reference to the item for the repayment to counties and boroughs for their criminal prosecutions. It would, no doubt, be in the recollection of the House, that prior to the present Government coming into Office, a reduction was made in the amount paid for the expenses of criminal prosecutions, which threw upon the ratepayers of the counties and boroughs a burden which they thought an unjust one. Many Members of the present Government on that occasion distinguished themselves by the eloquence with which they brought this subject under the notice of the House. When they came into Office, one of the first things they did was to initiate a new system, by which, instead of repaying the counties and boroughs the actual cost incurred, they paid for the prosecutions which took place on a sort of computed average cost. This arrangement was followed by discussions in the House, in which it was pointed out that this rule, so far from removing, really perpetuated, the injustice which had been denounced, and that it inflicted on the counties and boroughs still greater losses. He had never seen a better instance than this of the power of the permanent officials. Here was a Government led by the officials in the Departments into doing the very thing they had denounced when in Opposition. This scheme was established for three years, and it was promised by the Government that the matter should be re-considered in the light of experience, and that a fair settlement of the question should be arrived at. But, under this average scheme, what was foretold had actually come to pass—the counties and boroughs had lost far more money than was lost under the unjust scale of the previous Government. Deputations from almost every county and borough in the Kingdom had waited on the Predecessor of the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury, and they had represented to him the loss which was incurred, and the unjust burdens which were laid upon the ratepayers by the operation of this scheme. He had the honour of being present at one of these deputations himself, and the hardship was admitted, the Secretary to the Treasury promising that the subject should receive the consideration of the Government, and that a fair settlement should be arrived at. He wished to ask the hon. Baronet whether, having had all these figures placed before him, and it having been proved that the counties and boroughs were mulcted in far greater sums than were entailed upon them under the previous scheme, the Government were prepared to propose any fresh arrangement for the next three years?

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, this was the second time the hon. and learned Member had brought this

suitability of some of the gentlemen who had been nominated, and in consequence of what was then said, the confidence of the public was so much shaken that very few cases were intrusted to the Official Referees. He saw no reason why this should have been so, but the fact remained. He could not contend that the Official Referees had done much work, because the contrary was the fact; but that was not their fault. They had been appointed under an Act of Parliament, and were ready, indeed eager, to do any amount of work that might be intrusted to them; but solicitors and other persons engaged in legal matters were disinclined, owing mainly to the discussions in that House on the question of their appointment, to intrust them with work, and they remained practically unemployed. Another reason why the business of the Official Referees was not extensive was, that the Act under which they were appointed did not give sufficiently wide powers of reference. If that defect were remedied, and the disfavour into which the Referees had fallen in consequence of the discussions in Parliament died away, he had no doubt that sufficient work would be found for them to do. The question now before the Committee, however, was one of expenditure, and he did not see how the office of Official Referee could be abolished, without some arrangement being made for the compensation of the office-holders. All he could suggest was, that if it were found that these gentlemen's time was not fully occupied, and if it should be thought that they were really and truly paid large salaries for doing a very inadequate amount of work, the best way of dealing with them would be—and he would only throw this out as a suggestion to the Committee—that these gentlemen should be utilized for other offices.

MR. CHILDERS said, no doubt it was true that the Government of the day was responsible for the Judicature Act; but that Act left all the details as numbers, salary, qualification and tenure of office to the Government under which the Act came into operation, and for these the present Lord Chancellor was responsible. The Government under whose auspices the Act was passed was in no respect responsible for anything else except the power granted to appoint so many officers as the Lord Chancellor and the Presidents of the Divisions of the High Court of Justice should decide. Therefore, as to the number and qualifications of the gentlemen appointed under the Judicature Act, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General could not shake off the responsibility of his Government. With respect to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the Official Referees, instead of being superseded, had a claim to other judicial appointments, he would remind him that those gentlemen were not in the position of holders of judicial offices, but were exactly like any other civil servants.

MR. WHEELHOUSE observed, that it had been said, with truth, that certain portions of an action only could now be referred to the Official Referees. If this arose from any defect in the Act under which they were appointed, why could not the Government propose a short Bill, to enable everything in an action to be referred to the Official Referees, and giving them full power to deal with all questions in dispute? Whether those gentlemen ought to be so intrusted was another question.

MR. MUNTZ said, that there would be no difficulty in referring all questions in an action to the Referees, if all parties consented. He would suggest that, when the offices became vacant, they should not be filled up. Were the services of the Referees now dispensed with, the country would have to pay them compensation, which would come to nearly the same thing as continuing their salaries.

MR. GREGORY observed, that if there was one thing he objected to in the Judicature Act, it was the power of compulsory reference. At the time the Act was passed, he protested against it as a great injustice; many other hon. Members also raised their voices against it; but the large majority on the other side of the House frustrated the Amendments they proposed on that and many other points. The Referees were constituted under the Judicature Act, and though, no doubt, they had been appointed by the present Government, the machinery with regard to them was regulated by the Act. He thought that discussion with reference to their appointment had arisen only in the case of one of them, the others being appointed sary that there should be some two or three years' experience of the working of the Judicature Acts before effect could be given to the recommendations contained in the Report of the Royal Commission. It was intended, after those two years had expired, to appoint a small Departmental Committee, which should inquire and report as to the working of the Acts. That Committee, he believed, had not yet been appointed; but it was still the intention of the Government to appoint it. It might not be found possible to effect all the economies that were desired; but the wishes of the Government tended solely in that direction, and they would, as far as possible, carry out such of the recommendations of the Royal Commission as were likely to bring about the necessary reforms.

MR. CHILDERS said, he was much pleased with the assurance on the part of the Government that the Report of the Royal Commission should be dealt with; but he must point out that, a year ago, the Government undertook that the Committee which had been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty should be appointed. It was five years since the Committee sat; four years had passed since the Royal Commission reported; one year had elapsed since the Committee who should consider the Reports of the Committee and the Royal Commission was promised; and yet nothing had been done. He thought the question was the more important and the delay more serious, because not only were the thorough changes which had been proposed delayed, but fresh appointments had been actually made on the old system, within the last few months. He certainly thought that four years was a long time to wait for the Government of the day to act upon the unanimous recommendation of a Royal Commission.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the Department of Clerks of Assize had not long since been made the subject of careful inquiry with a view to reforms, and he did not think the conduct of the Government in regard to the matter was fairly open to the charges which had been made to them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract in the course of the discussion.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. O'DONNELL pointed out that the Vote included a sum of £10,500, which was described as—

“Repayments to Sheriffs in England and Wales of Expenses incurred in providing Lodgings for the Judges on Circuit; Rewards in respect of extraordinary exertions in the furtherance of Justice, and other Expenses (including £240 formerly borne on the Consolidated Fund).”

He thought details ought to be given, instead of the Committee being asked to vote a lump sum.

Vote agreed to.

MR. RYLANDS complained of the amounts put down in the Estimate for the payment of the Official Referees. The amount put down was £6,000, and he believed the work done was quite incommensurate with the sum charged. He should be glad if the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury or some of the Legal Advisers of the Crown could suggest a way in which the services of the Official Referees could be utilized, and they could be made to earn their salaries.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, the hon. Member for Burnley seemed to be under the impression that the Law Officers of the Crown were responsible for the changes which had been rendered necessary by the passing of the Judicature Act. This was altogether a mistake. The Official Referees were appointed under an Act passed in 1873, when a Liberal Government was in power; and it would be remembered that, at the time, several hon. Members on both sides of the House strongly questioned the advisability of making the appointments. The objections were overborne by the Government of the day, and, as a consequence, it was determined to appoint Official Referees. When the appointments came to be made, there was a long discussion in the House as to the suitability of some of the gentlemen who had been nominated, and in consequence of what was then said, the confidence of the public was so much shaken that very few cases were intrusted to the Official Referees. He saw no reason why this should have been so, but the fact remained. He could not contend that the Official Referees had done much work, because the contrary was the fact; but that was not their fault. They had been appointed under an Act of Parliament, and were ready, indeed eager, to do any amount of work that might be intrusted to them; but solicitors and other persons engaged in legal matters were disinclined, owing mainly to the discussions in that House on the question of their appointment, to intrust them with work, and they remained practically unemployed. Another reason why the business of the Official Referees was not extensive was, that the Act under which they were appointed did not give sufficiently wide powers of reference. If that defect were remedied, and the disfavour into which the Referees had fallen in consequence of the discussions in Parliament died away, he had no doubt that sufficient work would be found for them to do. The question now before the Committee, however, was one of expenditure, and he did not see how the office of Official Referee could be abolished, without some arrangement being made for the compensation of the office-holders. All he could suggest was, that if it were found that these gentlemen's time was not fully occupied, and if it should be thought that they were really and truly paid large salaries for doing a very inadequate amount of work, the best way of dealing with them would be—and he would only throw this out as a suggestion to the Committee—that these gentlemen should be utilized for other offices.

Mr. CHILDERS said, no doubt it was true that the Government of the day was responsible for the Judicature Act; but that Act left all the details as numbers, salary, qualification and tenure of office to the Government under which the Act came into operation, and for these the present Lord Chancellor was responsible. The Government under whose auspices the Act was passed was in no respect responsible for anything else except the power granted to appoint so many officers as the Lord Chancellor and the Presidents of the Divisions of the High Court of Justice should decide. Therefore, as to the number and qualifications of the gentlemen appointed under the Judicature Act, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General could not shake off the responsibility of his Government. With respect to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the Official Referees, instead of being superseded, had a claim to other judicial appointments, he would remind him that those gentlemen were not in the position of holders of judicial offices, but were exactly like any other civil servants.

Mr. WHEELHOUSE observed, that it had been said, with truth, that certain portions of an action only could now be referred to the Official Referees. If this arose from any defect in the Act under which they were appointed, why could not the Government propose a short Bill, to enable everything in an action to be referred to the Official Referees, and giving them full power to deal with all questions in dispute? Whether those gentlemen ought to be so intrusted was another question.

Mr. MUNTZ said, that there would be no difficulty in referring all questions in an action to the Referees, if all parties consented. He would suggest that, when the offices became vacant, they should not be filled up. Were the services of the Referees now dispensed with, the country would have to pay them compensation, which would come to nearly the same thing as continuing their salaries.

Mr. GREGORY observed, that if there was one thing he objected to in the Judicature Act, it was the power of compulsory reference. At the time the Act was passed, he protested against it as a great injustice; many other hon. Members also raised their voices against it; but the large majority on the other side of the House frustrated the Amendments they proposed on that and many other points. The Referees were constituted under the Judicature Act, and though, no doubt, they had been appointed by the present Government, the machinery with regard to them was regulated by the Act. He thought that discussion with reference to their appointment had arisen only in the case of one of them, the others being appointed as a matter of course. The one to whom that discussion applied was appointed on the recommendation of the Lord Chief Baron to the Lord Chancellor. For his part, he had never expected that a great amount of business would be sent to these Official Referees, and he had not been disappointed. He thought that there should be an understanding with the Government that these appointments should not be filled up when they became vacant; or the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General might be adopted, and these Gentlemen might be gradually relieved, and placed in a somewhat similar position to the Masters, with regard to the conduct of references and arbitration. He believed that the gentlemen who filled these offices were desirous of working if the public would allow them, and it was not their fault that they sat idle in their offices. One of these gentlemen, who had been referred to by name, Mr. Russell, with whom he was personally acquainted, tried a reference of very great importance which his firm conducted. Mr. Russell threw himself into the matter with considerable zeal, and took a long journey into the South of Europe, in an inclement season of the year, for the purposes of the case. It became seriously ill in consequence. It was certainly one advantage of the system of Official Referees that they could move about anywhere to take evidence wherever necessary. That was a great convenience in the trial of causes submitted to them. But the system under which the fees were at present taken, and by which they were compelled to be paid before the matter could be proceeded with, was at once harassing and vexatious; while, at the same time, it was humiliating to the parties who had the conduct of the business, and, he ventured to say, was entirely unnecessary.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS remarked, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse) had expressed a hope that the Government would bring in a short Bill giving the Referees the same powers that were conferred upon the Courts by the Judicature Act of 1873. He was sorry to have to express a contrary opinion; he hoped the Government would do nothing of the kind. It was true there was an impression upon the part of the public, and of some of the Judges, that the power of the High Court of Justice, in referring cases to the Official Referees, was too limited by the terms of the present Act. The truth was, that that was an accidental omission. Those who took part in the discussion of the Judicature Act of 1873 would recollect that, as a matter of policy, the powers to refer compulsorily to the Official Referees were limited. He remembered that some of the legal Members of the House pointed out that there was no provision introduced into the Act empowering the Courts to refer compulsorily any cause to the Official Referees, but only a question in an action. All that was to be referred to the Official Referees were matters for investigation and report in an action. That might seem to be a technical distinction, but it was one of substance; and when a question was referred to them to investigate and report upon, the judgment upon the matter was to be given by the Court itself. Therefore, the full control of the action was kept by the Court, the Official Referee only having to report to the Court upon matters in dispute. Had he not been satisfied that the power to refer compulsorily to the Official Referees was limited to any question in an action, he should have objected to the appointment of those gentlemen. He did not think that the explanation of the small amount of business which had come to them was that actions were not sufficiently within their absolute control. What the cause was he did not know; but he thought it was really hard upon these gentlemen to enter into a personal discussion concerning them, when the matter had been fully discussed in former years. If they were not the best men that could be selected, it was yet harder upon them to rake the matter up; they had given up their Profession for the sake of serving the public, and he protested against the recurrence of a discussion which could not be for the benefit of anyone concerned.

MR. ALFRED MARTEN was bound to say, with regard to the observations that had been made upon the existing state of business before the Official Referees, that matters had much improved. For a considerable period very little was done by them, owing to the charges being fixed at too high a figure; but about a year ago a change was made, could not be validly urged against these Official Referees. His objection was really against arbitrators appointed for better or for worse by the parties. Such a Referee might, at the request of counsel, allow an adjournment; but the Official Referee could not do that, but had to sit de die in diem, without listening to any applications for adjournment.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), would venture to say that if the Stockbroker of the Chancery Division were not paid by salary his commission would come to a very much larger sum.

SIR HENRY JACKSON said, that everyone acquainted with Chancery business knew that hundreds of thousands of pounds were invested yearly in the purchase of different securities. Some of those investments were of a very minute amount, and must necessarily cause an enormous amount of trouble to those engaged in making the investment. He should like to say one word on the question of Official Referees. Everyone must feel that the present system was a confessed failure, though as to the cause of it people might have different opinions. There were some very unpleasant debates as to the qualifications of the gentlemen appointed; but, after full discussion, the House came to the conclusion that no further action was necessary, and he thought that the present question ought to drop. He could not help thinking that the real cause of the failure was this—that it was not originally intended that lawyers should be appointed Official Referees. The theory of the Referees was, that technical questions, such as the hon. Member for Cardigan (Mr. D. Davies) referred to—as questions of “quantum,” specifications of patents, chemical questions, and other matters of a technical character—should be referred to the investigation of persons who had scientific and technical, rather than legal, knowledge. In the clause of the Act of Parliament he found that it was not stated whether these Official Referees were to be barristers, or even lawyers at all. Their qualifications were left entirely open, and he could not help thinking that there had been some little miscarriage in the appointment of lawyers. It was well known that jealousy was felt by suitors with regard to compulsory references. Every suitor thought he had a right to have his cause tried by the Judge himself, and, certainly, a good deal could be said in favour of that idea. But the same objection to a reference would not occur if skilled technical Referees had been appointed to conduct the compulsory references. He hoped that some day, when there was a vacancy in these offices, the Government would not abolish them, but would appoint in the place of lawyers some technically skilled persons, who would be able better to carry out the intentions of the framers of the Act.

MR. ALFRED MARTEN observed, with regard to the superannuation allowances, that one of those gentlemen appointed was formerly Examiner in Chancery, and would not fall under the category mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers).

MR. BIGGAR wished to have an explanation of some items which he found at p. 169 of the Estimates. They were under the head of Salaries to the Lord Chancellor's Officers. He found a Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, Chief Clerk to ditto, Second Clerk to ditto, Third Clerk to ditto, Messenger, Secretary to the Lord Chancellor, Secretary of Presentations, Secretary of Commissioners of the Peace, Gentleman of the Chamber, Pursebearer, ditto for performing the duties of Sealer and Chaff Wax, Messenger of the Great Seal, and others. He would like his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General to explain the meaning of some of those offices, for it seemed to him that the salaries paid to the Lord Chancellor's officers were exceedingly heavy in proportion to the amount of business performed by them.

MR. O'DONNELL wished to protest against the employment of Official Referees. From all parties in the Committee he heard that they were excellent persons, very desirous of having something to do, yet finding no work. He begged to move to reduce the amount proposed to be voted by £3,000, which would relieve the Estimates of two of the Official Referees.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member propose to reduce the Vote or the item?

MR. O'DONNELL: The item.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £6,821, for Salaries of Official Referees be reduced by the sum of £3,000."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

MR. WHITWELL hoped the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would withdraw his Motion. It must be well known to him that a division would be perfectly nugatory, and they already had the assurance from hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that they would do the best they could to decrease the expenditure for the future.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS perfectly well recollected the discussion that took place in that House in 1873, when the original Judicature Act was passing. The clause appointing the Official Referees was supported on the ground that it would be well to appoint prominent scientific men as Official Referees to conduct references of scientific matters. The Lord Chancellor had not carried out that clause, of which he was not the author, and had seen fit to appoint barristers. It was no wonder their services were not so much sought after by suitors as those of scientific men would be in purely scientific cases. There was a very wide-spread suspicion and dislike of these "hole-and-corner" investigations. It was, however, a very hard thing to call these gentlemen the holders of sinecure offices, when they had to attend and be ready to perform their duties. It was necessary for them always to be in attendance at their offices, for they could never tell when they would be required. He begged to oppose the Amendment.

MR. CHILDERS joined in the appeal to the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) to withdraw his Motion.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he did not feel himself justified in withdrawing his Motion, but would be content if the Committee negatived it without a division.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. RAMSAY asked whether the Government had directed their attention to the Report of the Select Committee on Lunacy. Evidence was produced before that Committee to show that very great expenses were incurred by the employment of Visitors in Lunacy and the Masters in Lunacy. He thought that some attention should be paid to that evidence, and he hoped Her Majesty's Government would see its way to effect a junction between the jurisdiction in Lunacy of the Court of Chancery and the Commissioners in Lunacy, so as to unite the two bodies into one Department of the State, having charge of all lunatics. That system prevailed in Scotland, and economy would be effected in England by putting all lunatics in the charge of one Department. It was essential something should be done, as great expenses were incurred by the present system.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, that the Lord Chancellor's Offices numbered a great many Departments in the State, with different Secretaries who were absolutely essential for the performance of the work. The Secretary of Presentations took charge of that Department, while the Secretary for Commission of the Peace looked after another; and so on. With reference to the other Departments, he could not give the exact duties of each, but they were all necessary.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was not satisfied with the explanation. There was a Pursebearer, a Sealer, and Chaff Wax; and, unless he had some reasonable explanation of their duties, it seemed to him that the offices were sinecures. He would confine himself to moving that the Vote be reduced by the sum paid to the Pursebearer, Sealer, and Chaff Wax.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member for Cavan would not be in Order in making the Motion he proposed. The Committee had at present before it the Motion to reduce the item for the salaries of the Official Referees, and it would not be in Order to propose to omit another item while that was under consideration.

MR. BIGGAR thought that he would be in Order in proposing that the whole of the Vote be reduced. He should like an explanation as to the Clerk of Petty Bag, and the other officers.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) was afraid that he could not explain all these different items as they were not in his Department. The Sealer and Chaff Wax, he presumed, performed duties in affixing the Great Seal to all documents passing under it. No doubt, it would not be expected that the Lord Chancellor would himself affix the Seal, and he supposed the official referred to was charged with that duty. The office of the Petty Bag was one from which all original writs issued. He did not know the exact administration of the office, only that it was one that was actually in the performance of duties, and in no respect a sinecure.

MR. GREGORY wished to state that the office of Chaff Wax used to be a sinecure. There was a considerable revenue attached to it; but it was now abolished, and the holder received compensation. There were certain duties which had to be performed, and they were now executed by a person who received £100 a-year for affixing the Great Seal. The Pursebearer was the person who carried the Great Seal, and always accompanied the Lord Chancellor.

SIR ANDREW LUSK would ask the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to rest satisfied with the explanation.

MR. DILLWYN said, that a question had been asked as to the meaning of the Petty Bag office. So far as he could understand the hon. and learned Solicitor General, the explanation was that he did not know much about it. That did not seem to him satisfactory.

MR. PARNELL observed, that the office of Pursebearer had already been under the consideration of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into those offices. In the Report of the Commissioners there was a short passage which he would read—

“We are of opinion—and it is one shared by the present Pursebearer—that all of his duties, except that of sealing, may be done by the Gentleman of the Chamber, and that the sealing could be done by a messenger under the direction of that officer.”

Thus, the Commissioners gave it as their opinion that the duties of a Pursebearer could be performed by other functionaries, and £600 a-year saved to the country.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the Report of the Committee appointed by the present First Lord of the Admiralty had not come before the House; but it would be presented in a short time. Then the suggestions of the Committee would be considered with a view to the adoption of their proposals.

He must, however, remind hon. Members that, when it was proposed to abolish some of these offices, the question of retiring salaries to the holders of them had to be considered. Therefore, they must be very careful in adjusting any scheme to carry out the Report of the Committee.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the explanation as to the Pursebearer was satisfactory, and he would assume that the Government would do what was right for the public service in respect of that office, and that if the duties could be performed by some other officials, the holder of the office would be absorbed in some such way as proposed in the case of the Official Referees. As to the Petty Bag Office, no explanation seemed to be given, and he should be happy to hear something with respect to it.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON thought he had stated no alterations were to be made at present, because a Committee had been appointed to report upon the matter. The Department of the Petty Bag was one of those old Departments of the State, like the Pursebearer, the relic of an old system, and, in common with the others, would come into consideration in any fresh scheme that might be proposed. It would be impossible to do away with particular offices, except by the re-organization of Departments, and the subject, as a whole, had yet to be considered.

MR. BIGGAR said, that as he understood that these offices were likely, to some extent, to be re-constituted, he would not trouble the Committee any further in the matter; but if he lived for another year, and found that no reform was introduced with respect to the items to which attention had been drawn, he should feel it his duty to strenuously oppose the Votes, for many of the charges included in them appeared to him to be thoroughly preposterous.

MR. RAMSAY remarked, that no notice had been taken of the subject to which he had directed attention. He would appeal to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General seriously to consider the expediency of making some change in the administration of the affairs of lunatics, which came under the cognizance of the Court of Chancery. He thought that the facts which were stated in the evidence to which he had referred were sufficient to show that some change should be made. He did not say what change. Upon that point he offered no opinion; but some assurance ought to be given to the Committee that the subject would be seriously considered before this Vote was submitted to them another year.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he had to apologize to the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay), but really his point was covered by the reply which he had already given. These were all branches of the same Department, on which a Royal Commission, and, subsequently, a Committee, had reported; and the question of the re-organization of the Staff and duties of this, as of all the other branches of Chancery, would have to be considered at the same time by the Treasury.

MR. DILLWYN thought it was rather hard that when a plain question, as to what were the duties of the Petty Bag Office was asked, not a single Member of the Government was in a position to give a plain answer to it. Yet the Committee were called upon to vote a certain sum of money for the office. He thought that when his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who had threatened to move the rejection of this item, accepted the explanation of the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury—though that explanation was far from satisfactory, indeed, it was no explanation at all—that under the circumstances his hon. Friend ought not to be readily charged again with obstruction. He (Mr. Dillwyn) confessed that if he had proposed the reduction of the Vote, he should not have been disposed to act as his hon. Friend had done.

MR. GREGORY desired to point out to the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay), that the functions of the Masters of Lunacy had reference, to a great extent, to the management of the estates of lunatics; while the duties of the Commissioners, who had to visit the lunatics, were of a distinct character.

MR. RAMSAY said, he was fully aware of what the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gregory) had just stated; but what he had omitted to tell the Committee was, that the items to which attention had been drawn were justifiable either in the interest of the lunatics, or of the country. What he (Mr. Ramsay) contended was, that these estates ought to bear the expenses of management, including the expenses of any persons or officers who might be employed by the Lord Chancellor to look after them. He thought, moreover, that he had shown that the subject was one of pressing importance.

(5.) £47,440, to complete the sum for the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer Divisions of the High Court of Justice.

MR. GREGORY said, a vacancy had recently occurred in the office of Master of the Queen's Bench. He believed it had been stated by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, that the Report of the Committee upon Legal Offices was in the hands of the Treasury, and he (Mr. Gregory) hoped that before long it would be laid upon the Table of the House. He thought they might assume that that Report had some bearing upon such an office as he had mentioned, and it might be satisfactory to the Committee to receive some assurance from the Government that this office should not be filled up until, at all events, the Treasury had had an opportunity of considering this Report. Perhaps, his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury could give them some information upon the subject.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was afraid his answer would not be satisfactory to his hon. Friend. He could only say that the appointment was one which rested, not with the Treasury, but entirely with the Lord Chief Justice.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that, if he were not mistaken, power was taken in an Act, passed either last year or the year before, to suspend all appointments until it had been decided what course should be adopted with respect to the Report of the Commission.

MR. WHITWELL could not think that the Lord Chief Justice would fill up an appointment which he was given to understand would have to come under the review of the Treasury. He wished to ask, whether it was a fact that all expenses incurred in respect of Election Petitions were paid by the parties themselves? He had been under the impression that such was the case; but he found that the Vote included a considerable sum for defraying the expense of conducting such Petitions.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON thought, that if his hon. Friend would refer to the Act on the subject, he would find that the duty of defraying certain expenses was imposed by it upon the Treasury out of money to be provided by Parliament. These were the expenses put down in this Vote.

MR. BIGGAR said, it struck him that under the head of Clerks to the different Judges in the Queen's Bench Division, there was an extraordinary large number of persons employed. He should like to ask the hon. and learned Solicitor General what occupation there was for so many clerks?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD) believed that the clerks were not one too many with reference to the administrative business that had to be got through. The hon. Member did not sufficiently understand that, besides the business with which he was more familiar—namely, that which took place in Court—there was an enormous number of duties of a different character. Originally the clerks were paid by fees, and those fees were considered to be excessive. By an Act of Parliament fees were taken away, and the clerks were paid, not so very long ago, by salaries which were then fixed; but he believed it was the experience of all the learned Judges in their Chambers, that the number of clerks was by no means in excess of the requirements of the public service.

Vote agreed to.

(6). £70,274, to complete the sum for the Probate, &c., Registries of the High Court of Justice.

(7). £10,044, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Registry of the High Court of Justice.

MR. MACDONALD complained that here, again, they had officers filling two distinct offices, for each of which they received a salary. He should really like to know how it was they were able to perform the duties of both offices. He had no wish to waste the time of the Committee, but he must repeat that this was a matter which demanded their most earnest attention.

MR. MELLOR said, he entertained the opinion, that the more they obstructed upon these Estimates the more likely they were to arrive in the end at a satisfactory solution. He quite agreed with the remarks made by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald). It would appear that persons were appointed to office without regard being had whether the duties were sufficient to absorb the whole of their time or not. His own opinion was, that a person was appointed who was employed for a couple of hours each day, and that he was attached to some other Department with an additional salary to fill up his time. He found that in that House there was one party to trim the lamp, and another to light the fire; but on the principle which seemed to guide the Treasury in these matters, if the one man were to be employed to perform both duties he would receive two salaries, although he performed them within the day. He hoped that the hon. Member for Stafford would take a more decided course. Nothing was so objectionable to his mind as discussing these various points in the Estimates without coming to a division, and testing the opinion of the Committee upon them.

MR. MACDONALD said, he had again to ask the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury, what explanation he had to offer with respect to persons who were receiving as much as £200 a-year for one office, while they were paid large sums besides for services rendered in other offices? Unless this thing was explained, he should certainly follow the course indicated by the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Mellor), and divide the Committee on every one of these items, if it were to take six months to get through the Estimates.

MR. J. COWEN thought that some of his hon. Friends scarcely appreciated the position. Their judicial system was one that had recently undergone an entire change, and the difficulty arose in assimilating the old with the new. There were a large number of persons holding offices now who held offices under the old system, and they could not dispense with them without giving them compensation. The difficulty was to join the old and the new together. Now, as he understood, the Government had undertaken to inquire into the whole subject, and deal with it in a comprehensive manner, and if they did that, they would remove the objections which some of his hon. Friends had to the present system. There was no doubt that what they said had a good deal of force in it—namely, that many of these gentlemen were holding two or three offices, getting salaries for each, and doing comparatively nothing for them. But if that state of affairs was to be dealt with, it must be in a comprehensive and not in an isolated way.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained, that what the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) had said accounted for a considerable number of these cases. He would further point out that the result of employing some of these officers in doing work which appeared in the foot-note as work done without the Department was a saving of the public money. If that course had not been followed, the probability was that the work would have been done by some officer appointed for the purpose with a larger salary.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, that perhaps he might be allowed to inform the Committee why it was that such an increasing number of these foot-notes appeared in the Estimates. The fact was, that some few years ago the Committee on Public Accounts recommended that this information should be given, as they thought it very unfair that full information should not be afforded to the House. Formerly, no such notes were appended to the Votes, and it would have been impossible then, from the Estimates, to know what the emoluments of a public servant were.

MR. DILLWYN quite agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) that the foot-notes were a great improvement on the Estimates produced formerly; but what he urged some time ago upon the House, and what he would still continue to urge, was that an addition should be made to these foot-notes. He desired that in each Session, before the Estimates were placed in their hands, a tabulated statement should be prepared showing the names of all the officers who held different offices, with the salaries or remuneration attached to them. The House would then be able to see what it was doing. He quite agreed with what the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury had said. It might be a great advantage to the public service to have two separate sets of duties performed by an officer in one of the Departments; but, on the other hand, such an arrangement afforded an opening for very great jobbing and mystification. It might, in fact, be made a cover for sinecures, if not very sharply looked after; and a tabulated statement such as he had suggested would enable hon. Members to discharge that duty much more efficiently than they could at the present time.

MR. BIGGAR wished, before the Vote was passed, to call the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury to one item in it. He observed that in the case of the Registrar of the Court of Admiralty, that officer was also paid a salary as Wreck Commissioner—the two together, with that appertaining to another office, amounting to £3,000 a-year. As Registrar, he was receiving a salary of £1,600 a-year, and it seemed to him that was a very large sum to pay a man filling the position of Registrar, who had, he supposed, no judicial duties to perform.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained, that when the Wreck Commission was first started, the duties of that body were intrusted to the Registrar of the Admiralty Court, as being one of the ablest men who could be found for the position. He thought that, having regard to the nature of the duties performed by that gentleman, the Committee would not think that he was paid too much.

MR. O'DONNELL wished to say, with reference to the observations of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen), that he thought the general undertaking of the Government to take a survey of the whole subject did not relieve hon. Members from the duty of criticizing the Estimates, and pointing out what they considered as blots in them.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £8,142, to complete the sum for the Wreck Commission.

(9.) £28,945, to complete the sum for the London Bankruptcy Court.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked, whether he was not right in stating that the superannuations were equal to the whole amount of the salaries now paid in the Bankruptcy Court?

Mr. J. Cowen

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained, that though the pensions bore a large proportion of the total amount, they were gradually dying out.

MR. MACDONALD asked, why one of the clerks received £100 a-year in addition to his salary, and £20 a-year in the shape of an advance which was paid to him in common with the other clerks? What were the duties which entitled him to the extra £100?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was afraid he could not give the desired information; but, from its not appearing in a foot-note, he imagined that the £100 was for some special work done by the clerk in question. He would make inquiry.

MR. PARNELL asked the meaning of the item for Counsels' fees?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON imagined that there was still work required to be done by those gentlemen, although the office had been abolished.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £326,527, to complete the sum for County Courts.

MR. J. COWEN said, he wished to direct the attention of the Committee to the items in this account relating to the payment of County Court Registrars. When these Registrars were appointed, the design and intention of Parliament was that their salaries should not amount to more than from £800 to £1,000 a-year. That was the maximum it was then held that the Registrars should be entitled to receive. But it had so happened that, in consequence of the great increase which had since taken place in the business of the County Courts—an increase which at the time these salaries were fixed had never been contemplated by the Legislature—the salaries of the Registrars had been greatly augmented. He ought to state that the Registrars were paid partly by fees and partly by salaries, and the result was that a large number of them received incomes considerably in excess of the intended maximum. He found that there were 11 County Court Registrars in this country who were in receipt of upwards of £1,500 a-year; there were 10 who were receiving £1,200 a-year; and a considerable number—he did not know how many—who received upwards of £1,000 a-year. And not only did many of them receive incomes in excess of what was originally intended, but some of their incomes were very largely in excess. For example, the Registrar of the County Court of Birmingham received £5,150 in the shape of salary, and £2,451 in payments on account of clerk-hire. Thus, this officer, who was expected to receive from £800 to £1,000 a-year at the time of his appointment, was now receiving a sum that was much in excess of the salaries paid to the Speaker of the House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Prime Minister of England, and double the salary given to the Chairman of Committees. The Registrar of the Leeds County Court was in receipt of a salary of £3,636 and £1,365 for clerk-hire. The Registrar of the Newcastle County Court received £3,571 a-year, and £375 for clerk-hire. The Registrar of Sheffield had a salary of £3,348 and £1,000 for clerk hire. The Registrar of the Bristol County Court received £3,245 as salary, and £1,725 for clerk-hire. The Registrar of the Manchester County Court was in receipt of £2,768 salary, and £1,390 for clerk-hire. The Registrar of the Bradford County Court had an income of £2,596, and £596 for clerk-hire. He might add many more cases of a similar character to this list; but what he had already stated was sufficient to show that the sums paid to these officials were much in excess of what would be a fair and legitimate emolument for the duties discharged as well as of the income which Parliament originally intended them to receive. It seemed to him a great anomaly to place a man in the position of a County Court Judge with a salary of from £1,200 to £1,500 a-year, and to allow an officer of his Court, with nothing like his legal experience, sitting in an adjacent room and performing what was merely clerical work—at any rate, duties that almost any ordinary clerk could perform—to receive something like double the salary given to the Judge, and sometimes three times the amount; while, in a very large majority of cases, his income was greatly in excess of that of the Judge. He trusted that some attention would be paid to this matter by Her Majesty's Government, and that an arrangement would be made by which the salaries paid to Registrars should be proportionate to the duties they had to discharge than was now the case. He had no wish to deal hardly with those who at present held the office of Registrar. They had got their appointments, somewhat perhaps by accident, but still they held them, and if the arrangements for their payment should be altered, they would be entitled to compensation; but, in the case of after appointments to that office, it would not be difficult to arrange that they should not be paid anything like the sums they were now receiving. He did not propose to move any Amendment, or to ask for any reduction of the Vote, because he knew that that would be practically impossible. All he desired was to direct attention to this great anomaly; and he should be glad to hear some expression of opinion on the part of the Government, and, if possible, some assurance that they would devote attention to the subject. He was aware that Gentlemen in that House who belonged to the Legal Profession did not like to hear persons who were outside the Profession speaking on legal matters, and that whenever those who were outside the Legal Profession did touch upon such subjects, the rule was to treat them with a certain amount of indifference. Nevertheless, commercial men throughout the country were greatly interested in this matter; and, under these circumstances, he had taken the liberty of submitting to the Government and the Committee the points to which he had drawn attention.

MR. WHEELHOUSE was inclined to indorse pretty nearly everything that had fallen from the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) as to the anomalous position of County Court Registrars. No one who knew what were the duties of these gentlemen could doubt that the salaries and fees which made up their incomes were very much in excess of what was originally contemplated or thought possible. It was simply an absurdity to know that while none of the Judges had £2,000 a-year, some of the Registrars obtained twice that sum from their offices. He thought he could point out what was one reason for this. Since the passing of the Act under which the Registrars were appointed, the law had imposed upon these officers a second office—namely, that of District Registrar, to which was attached a considerable salary. He trusted that something would be done by which the two offices could be dissociated and kept distinct.

MR. WHITWELL said, it must be evident to everyone who had at all considered the subject that it was impossible for this Vote to be brought before the House, without some allusion being made to the subject touched upon by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen). It was a subject of which they had heard a good deal lately; but, whatever opinions they might have upon it, they ought not to forget that one of the causes of the increased amounts paid to the County Court Registrars was the enormous increase of business that had taken place in the County Courts; and, inasmuch as the Registrars were paid by fees over and above their specified salaries, their emoluments had shown a proportionate increase. One of the causes of this great increase of business was the extension of the Bankruptcy Act to the County Courts; and as there was a large amount of bankruptcy business done in these Courts, the Registrars derived therefrom an extra income. He hoped, however, that now the attention of Her Majesty's Government had been so strongly called to the subject, they would lend their aid in a very desirable reform by equalizing the payment of Registrars.

MR. MELLOR expressed a hope that, as the offices now held by the Registrars became vacant, the new appointments would be made at fixed salaries, without fees. This was the only judicious course Her Majesty's Government could take on this subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, the matter was one that would have full consideration on the part of Her Majesty's Government. At present, the arrangement under which the Registrars were remunerated was fixed by Act of Parliament, and there could be little doubt that when the emoluments of those officers were originally determined, the business of the County Courts was never expected to increase to the proportions it had assumed. The hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) had hit upon the real reason why the remuneration of the Registrars was apparently so much out of proportion to their duties. If hon. Members would refer, they would find an explanation of the present law upon the subject. By the Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, the Registrars were to be paid £120 for the first 200 complaints entered in the year, and £5 for every additional 25 complaints entered up to 1,000, and then £4 until the number reached 6,000; and out of this remuneration the necessary clerks were to be paid by the Registrars. If the number of complaints exceeded 6,000, the net salary was not to exceed £800, with £70 for clerk-hire. This was altered by a later Act of Parliament, which specified that on the occurrence of any vacancy in the office of High Bailiff the Registrar should perform the duties of High Bailiff, with a moderate scale of remuneration. It was never contemplated at that time that the number of complaints would exceed 8,000; but, as a matter of fact, the number of complaints frequently exceeded 8,000 in the year. The County Courts had proved to be rather a favourite tribunal, and the number of complaints had greatly exceeded what was originally anticipated. He was free to confess that the Registrars were at present remunerated to a far higher amount than was reasonable and fair. That was his opinion. The question, therefore, came to this—what was the remuneration to be? He must say he had been rather surprised to hear the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) complain of a disinclination on the part of the lawyers to hear observations on such subjects as these from persons outside the Legal Profession. For his own part, he (the Attorney General) never had such a notion, and he certainly never heard any such disinclination expressed by any lawyer in that House; while he might add that everyone was in the habit of receiving with favour any proposition that came from the hon. Member for Newcastle. The hon. Gentleman had recently introduced into the House a County Courts Bill, which contained suggestions that were received with the greatest possible attention by the House. He considered the proper mode of paying Registrars was by salary, and he should be glad if means could be devised to enable such a plan to be adopted. But there were many difficulties in the way of making such an arrangement. True, in large places, a reasonable salary might be easily fixed; but that would not be the case in small Courts. If the Registrars of these little districts had a salary, the least which could be paid them would be a great deal more than the work they had to perform warranted. However, he might say that the Government, being perfectly alive to the anomalies which existed under the present mode of payment, would grapple with the subject, and take some steps which would bring about a more satisfactory state of things.

MR. MELDON said, the fees paid to Registrars in England were enormous, and altogether out of proportion to the sums allowed in Ireland. Last Session, a County Court Act was passed for Ireland, under which it was provided that no Registrars should be appointed. But, on its being found that it was impossible to carry on the business of the Courts without such officers, the Government yielded, and consented to appoint them. But how were they to be paid? Seeing the large fees which were charged in England, it would naturally be supposed that the Irish Registrars, competent men as they must be, would have a fair and proper salary given them. The Government, however, gave no salary. After preventing the increased jurisdiction of the Courts being taken advantage of for some time, owing to their refusing to appoint Registrars, the Government said such officials might be attached to the Courts, but that the remuneration should be two or three guineas a-day for those days actually devoted to Court work. The result was, that the County Court Act was almost a dead letter in Ireland, owing to the shabby conduct of the Government towards the Irish—conduct which strangely contrasted with the proceedings in England. He was glad to hear the Attorney General say that he considered payment by salary the proper mode to remunerate Registrars; and he would take the liberty of suggesting to the hon. and learned Gentleman that, if in any measure he proposed such a plan for England, he should treat Ireland in the same way. Everyone admitted that it was of the utmost importance that the Irish County Court Act should be made popular as soon as possible; but, up to the present, everything had been done to make it almost inoperative.

MR. PARNELL said, the Treasury took all the fees in Ireland, whereas in England £300,000 were voted by Parliament to pay Registrars of the County Courts; besides which, probably, as much again was paid them out of the Court fees. This was very unfair to the Irish officials, and unless some alteration was made next year, he should mark his sense of such conduct by moving to strike out the whole Vote for English Registrars.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the hon. Member for Meath had fallen into an error in supposing that the English Registrars had salaries and fees as well. The fees would be found charged as extra receipts to the Exchequer, and these receipts were larger than the expenses—£414,000 coming from County Court work, and £67,800 from Bankruptcy business.

MR. MURPHY desired an explanation of the increase in the charge for stationery in the County Courts. He observed that £19,000 was asked for this year, as against £14,700 last year.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the increase of stationery represented the increased work in the County Courts.

SIR ANDREW LUSK expressed the pleasure he felt at having heard the Attorney General say he would endeavour to deal with the question of payment to Registrars. The County Courts were of great advantage to the smaller classes of litigants, and everything should be done to make them both efficient and popular.

MR. PARNELL did not understand the answer which the hon. Baronet gave to him as to the payments to English Registrars.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the Registrars paid by salaries had those salaries calculated on the scale of work done. Those salaries were covered by the fees, and though the scale might be altogether wrong, he desired to point out that double payments were not made, as the hon. Member for Meath seemed to suppose.

MR. PARNELL thought Registrars had a direct sum as salary, and a percentage on the fees. ["No, no!"] He could not see how it was otherwise, when they were told that the net salary of a Registrar did not exceed £700 a-year; whereas the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) had stated that the Registrar of the Manchester County Court had £2,768 a-year, and the Registrar of the Birmingham County Court, £3,566. He could not see how they could have so much, unless the salaries were augmented by fees.

MR. HERMON said, the whole question of payments to Registrars was under the consideration of the Committee on the three County Courts Bills which had been introduced into the House. He thought the whole subject might be discussed when the Committee reported.

MR. J. COWEN explained, that the figures he had quoted appeared in a Return made to the House last year.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. WHITWELL said, he was sorry to have to propose a reduction of the Vote. This Registry had now been established for several years, but little or no business had been transacted in the Court. Very few deeds had been registered, very few titles had been rendered indefeasible, and what had been done was done merely for the benefit of a few individual landowners. The whole amount received to the credit of this Court during the year was £995 5s. 6d., and yet the expenditure was no less than £5,418. The time had arrived when the Committee ought to express its opinion as to the undesirability of continuing at a constant expense a scheme which had proved to be an utter failure. He begged to propose to reduce the Vote by £4,422 15s. 6d., which was the difference between the amount of the expected receipts and the sum expended.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that there was a certain inconvenience in proposing to reduce the Vote by that particular sum, and he suggested that the hon. Member should propose to reduce the Vote by some other sum, so as to raise the question of principle.

MR. WHITWELL thereupon moved to reduce the Vote by the sum of £3,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,068, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Land Registry."—(Mr. Whitwell.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, the Act of Parliament relating to Land Registry was passed in 1875. It was not then expected that the benefits of a registry of title would be immediately apparent to landowners, and it was not anticipated that the measure would be at once a complete success. It was, in fact, admitted by everybody who was concerned in the passing of the Act, that some considerable time must elapse before its provisions would be appreciated by the country, and before those persons who were possessed of land would take advantage of its provisions. He would admit fully and freely to the hon. Member who had moved to reduce this Vote, that up to the present time no great amount of business had been done in the Land Registry Court. It was true that the business transacted last year exceeded to some extent the amount of business done in previous years; but still, it must be admitted that, up to the present time, the number of titles registered had been comparatively insignificant. But the question of the registration of titles was one of the greatest moment and importance. It had been discussed over and over again in Parliament. Bills had been brought forward by eminent lawyers, and some measures had been passed on the subject. Notably, a measure was passed in 1862, which was advocated by the late Lord Westbury, than whom, he supposed, there had scarcely ever appeared a man of greater power and grasp of intellect, and more capable of dealing with a subject like this. But the great difficulty lay in this point. Everybody admitted it would be an immense advantage if they could have a satisfactory and efficacious registry of titles to land. It would simplify the transfer of land, and also cheapen it to a very considerable extent. But then came this very difficult problem, with which those who agreed to the proposition he had just mentioned were obliged to deal—namely, how could an Act be framed that would provide for the efficacious registry of titles, unless they made registration of titles compulsory? That was the difficulty which had presented itself to the mind of everybody who had endeavoured to deal with this question. The desire of those who had brought forward measures on this subject was to pass an Act which would be effectual, and which, at the same time, would not be tyrannical. When Lord Westbury passed his Bill into an Act in 1862, it was thought to be a compulsory measure, but it turned out not to be so. The scheme was to elaborate. The question of boundary came in, and the scheme required a machinery which was too complicated. Whatever the reason of the defect might be, the result was that the Act was never much resorted to. It was thought, in 1875, that that Act might be very considerably improved and amended, and that a new system might be inaugurated which, without being compulsory, would do the work well. The most eminent conveyancers and other persons who had the greatest possible amount of knowledge of real property law, came to the conclusion that a measure might be enacted which would have the desired effect without being compulsory. There existed in this country the strongest objection to a measure which would compel people to register their titles, whether they liked to do so or not; because, when men had landed property, they, of course, did not wish to put on the register a title which might be defective. If their title were a good one, they could not improve it by putting it on the register; but if it were a bad title, they would, by putting it on the register, proclaim the fact to all the world. However, the Members of that House, and of the other House, who took an interest in this matter, thought they understood it better than anyone else. Accordingly, in 1875, they proposed a scheme, and introduced a Bill, which was passed into law with, he believed, the assent and approval of his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell). At all events, the great majority of the Members of both Houses of Parliament approved the measure, and it therefore became law. It was so complicated a measure, that he should not endeavour, on the present occasion, to explain its provisions. Indeed, he did not know whether, if he made the attempt, he should be successful; but this he knew—that no one who spoke when the Bill was being passed into an Act ever imagined that it would work efficaciously all at once. It offered certain advantages to a landed proprietor who chose to register his title. If he chose to register a title that was defeasible, that title would, in process of time, become a good title. It was thought the advantages held out by the Act to the community of landed proprietors would induce them ultimately to avail themselves of its provisions. This might—and he hoped would—eventually happen, although on this point he expressed no opinion of his own. Certainly, the provisions of the Act had already been resorted to by gentlemen who possessed a considerable portion of land, which they wished to turn into building plots. In such a case, they resorted to the provisions of this Statute, because, by doing so, they were enabled to make at once a good title to anybody who wanted to buy a little building plot, and, consequently, they got a higher price than they otherwise would for the land they offered for sale. This subject had been very recently investigated. Not many days ago, on the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Denbigh Boroughs (Mr. Watkin Williams), the attention of the House was drawn to it. Like many other people, his hon. and learned Friend had a plan of his own which was the very best that could be adopted, and he suggested to the Government that they should consent to the appointment of a Select Committee which should go into the matter thoroughly and ascertain whether, if they could not have a satisfactory registration of titles, it might not be possible to have a satisfactory registration of deeds. Her Majesty's Government thought it desirable that the subject should be investigated to the fullest possible extent, and agreed to the appointment of a Select Committee, which would have the benefit of all the ideas of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Denbigh Boroughs, and of any other Members of Parliament who might choose to go before it. That Committee had now been appointed, and he submitted to the hon. Member for Kendal that it was not quite fair, at such a time, to move to reduce the salaries of the officers who had been appointed in the Court of Land Registry. Those gentlemen, it should be remembered, had been appointed by Act of Parliament. They had left their ordinary professional pursuits to serve in these offices; and, at all events, while the matter was being considered by the Select Committee which the Government had consented to appoint, it was not very reasonable to ask the Committee of the Whole House now to reduce this Vote by £3,000, or by any other sum. If the Select Committee, after investigating the whole matter thoroughly, should arrive at the conclusion that it was useless to have a registration of titles, they would, of course, say so; and if they came to the conclusion that a registration of deeds would be effectual, it might be thought that such a scheme might be carried out by the staff which now existed in the Court of Land Registry. Indeed, he had heard that one of the gentlemen who held an office in this Court saw no difficulty whatever in carrying out, without any additional expense, a scheme for the registration of deeds, and was, in fact, in favour of such a scheme.

MR. M'LAREN wished to call the attention of the hon. Baronet the Secretary to the Treasury to the contrast between the present Vote and that for the Registry of Deeds in Scotland. In the present case, three-fourths of the expenditure was lost, or made up by the public. In the case, however, of the Registry of Deeds in Scotland, the expenditure was £36,000, while the income was £44,000. Therefore, the landowners of Scotland paid every farthing of the expense of registration, and also a surplus of £8,000 a-year. Hon. Members from Scotland contended that the surplus was illegal, being contrary to the clauses of the Act of 1867, and that the fees ought to be reduced; but, on the present occasion, he merely desired to draw the attention of the Committee to the contrast between the English and the Scotch Vote. The lowest clerk in the English Land Registry received from £250 to £350 a-year; whereas some of the clerks in the office at Edinburgh, who had been 13 years in the Government service, got only £90 a-year.

MR. GREGORY observed, that in England they had only a registration of titles, while in Scotland there was a registration of deeds. He believed the Scotch system worked very well, and he hoped that some evidence as to its working would be given before the Select Committee which had just been appointed to inquire into the registration of land in England. The gentlemen who held office in the Court of Land Registry possessed great abilities; but the failure had been caused by the difficulties presented by the system itself. A Royal Commission found that Lord Westbury's Act contained principles which were antagonistic to its effectual working. First of all, it required an indefeasible title—namely, one which they could force on an unwilling purchaser. It required, too, that notice should be given to every adjoining owner or occupier of land. That, of course, involved raising every possible right relating to a boundary. A fence, a ditch, a right of way, or any other right, which, perhaps, had been dormant for centuries, was immediately aroused by a notice of this description. Such a notice put a man upon his rights, and he must either litigate in defence of them, or else abandon them. Again, Lord Westbury's Act required that when a title was once placed upon the register, it should always be kept there. Consequently, if an owner wanted to cut up his land into small portions, every one of those portions must pass through the register. That process was expensive, and it constituted another objection to the registration of land. Subsequently, another Act of Parliament was passed, which provided for the registration of defeasible as well as indefeasible titles. That Act had been in operation for about four years. A certain number of titles, but not a great many, had been registered under its provisions. It should be borne in mind that although there were in this country very few titles which could be upset, yet, at the same time, there was scarcely a title which would pass a strict investigation without requiring a good deal of explanation; and all this naturally involved expense, which people did not care to incur. If it were determined to establish a registration of deeds, the existing machinery might be employed to carry it out. Of course, he could not answer for the recommendations of the Select Committee; but what he himself contemplated was that this Land Registry Office might be made the centre of a system of registration for the whole country. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that, in the circumstances, his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal would not press to a division his Motion to reduce the Vote.

MR. RAMSAY understood that the object of his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal was to point out that the Committee voted a sum of money annually for the maintenance of a Department which was practically of no use, and also to suggest the expediency of abolishing it altogether. His hon. Friend accordingly proposed that the Vote should be reduced by the sum of £3,000, in order to raise the general question. He thought the remarks of the Attorney General and of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Gregory) were sufficient to show that unless registration was, in effect, made compulsory, past experience indicated that it was useless to continue this system of registration at all. It had often struck him that the people of England were induced to adopt a cumbrous complicated system in order to attain an end which could have been attained much more easily if they had availed themselves of the experience of other parts of the Kingdom. The Scotch system of registration of deeds was not a matter of legal obligation, but was practically compulsory, because used as a means of additional security. He could not see how there should be any hesitation in adopting a system whereby all deeds or prospective deeds should be registered. Each purchaser in that case acquiring any portion of land or real estate would register it for security, and in the case of succession to land the deed could be registered in the same way. He believed that if there were a system of registration of that nature in this country, the number of transactions would be such as to require a very large and increased establishment. They had been told that in Scotland the amount of fees collected was greatly in excess of the expenditure; but it was to be remembered that the number of transactions was much more limited than in England. He hoped, therefore, that before another year had passed, some definite proposition would be placed before the House to secure the prospective registration of all deeds.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, in the West Riding of Yorkshire there was a system which, if the owner of the land pleased, might be used for the registration of his deed. It had the advantage of being so far compulsory, inasmuch as that if the register did not contain an account of the particular transactions to which the land was last subject, any other person who had transactions with the land subsequently might register and take priority of the person who had not registered. This registry had been in operation for a century and a-half. There was a registry in each Riding of the county, and in the case of one in the West Riding there was the additional advantage of a thoroughly well-kept index. There was no difficulty in searching, and the registry, which had practically become almost a registry for titles, was, for business purposes, nearly perfect. What was really wanted, according to his view, was rather a registry of transactions than of titles, since such registry became eventually a registry of titles also. In dealing with this question, he considered one of the first duties of the country was to take the example of the West Riding of Yorkshire.

MR. RYLANDS remarked, that if the Vote passed it would be under protest. He did not suppose his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell) would press his Motion to a division. If the Vote passed that evening, it should be clearly understood that it would not be brought forward next year in the same shape. He hoped the Committee, when it came to the consideration of this matter, would deal with it in a very broad and decided way. What had been done had only been to touch the fringe of a very great question. He believed the country would not be satisfied unless there was some system of compulsory registration of titles. This would greatly facilitate the transfers of land; and he hoped that if the Committee passed the Vote that night some different system would be adopted, or that the Committee would not be pressed to pass it next year.

SIR ANDREW LUSK asked, why the Land Registry Office, which had been shown to have failed entirely in its operation, should be continued? He objected to the adoption of the Scotch system, which was well suited, no doubt, to Scotch requirements, but was not wanted in this part of the Kingdom, where there was a dislike to registration.

Mr. Wheelhouse

He thought that this Office, which everyone admitted to be a dead failure, should not be continued.

MR. MELDON thought it had been demonstrated that this system, or this attempted system, had been a failure, and that being granted, there was no use in continuing this Vote year after year. It had been said that there were other experiments to be tried in the way of registration of land, but he thought the continuance of the present system would only endanger the success of any other measure that might be produced. Large experiments had already been tried, and the system in Scotland and Ireland had been perfectly successful; but it was to be remembered that in Ireland they had a system for recording titles as well as deeds. He asked, why should the Committee continue this wanton expenditure of money in trying to keep up a system admitted by everyone to have failed? He considered the discussion of that evening would be eminently useful, and hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal would go to a division, and take the opinion of the Committee as to whether this expense should go on.

MR. WHITWELL had no intention of raising a discussion upon the question of land titles in general. It had been admitted that Lord Westbury's Act of 1867 had failed, and that the Act of 1875 was also a failure; but, as the Attorney General had pleaded for a respite only, he thought the poor Court must have it as far as he (Mr. Whitwell) was concerned, on the full understanding that execution be inflicted next year, unless it could really show such good arguments as would induce the House to continue its existence. The Attorney General had said he believed the Court was a convenience to some parties who had registered their titles; but he must say that the House did not vote money for the benefit of individuals, and, therefore, that argument was inapplicable.

MR. M'LAREN said, there had been no failure with regard to the registration of deeds in Scotland, where the moment a man purchased property of any kind, be it great or small, it was registered; and, unless it were registered, there was no security at all, because the person who sold it to him might fraudulently go and sell it to another, and if that person who had no moral title should put it on the record, he could secure the property.

MR. BIGGAR asked if the Committee were to continue a system of spending money to the extent of £5,000 or £6,000 a-year? They had been told that the fees of the Court were very high, and that being the case, the amount of business transacted by the three clerks must be merely nominal. He thought they would be only doing their duty by doing away with the whole establishment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. WHEELHOUSE hoped the Government would take some steps to regulate this Vote, at all events, as far as the Metropolitan district was concerned. The City of London nobly took upon itself its own expenses in this matter. He admitted that the Courts did their work thoroughly, fairly, and well; but he did not, and never could, understand upon what earthly principle the Metropolitan district was allowed to take all the expenses of stipendiary magistrates, salaries, and the providing and re-building of courts out of the Imperial fund of the Exchequer, dealing with them as a question of Imperial expense and revenue; whereas, if any one of the country districts required stipendiary magistrates, the town itself was rated for the purpose of providing both the buildings and the salaries. He thought the fairest plan would be to deal with the question of stipendiary magistrates in the country in the same way as they were dealt with in the Metropolitan districts. At all events, what was fair for one was fair for another. The present system, as regarded the country districts, was the most unfair system possible. Supposing that they had Courts and stipendiary magistrates in Leeds, they would be paid for out of the rates of Leeds; but, in the districts around London, it was a totally different thing. If it were right for one district to have this money, it was right for the other. The county districts were called upon to pay not only their local rates for this purpose, but their contribution to the Imperial Revenue for Metropolitan purposes. He thought that, in fairness, the Metropolitan ratepayers should pay for their own police courts, as was done by the ratepayers of Leeds. One thing or other was right for both; but a divided payment could not be right for either. In his opinion, the expense which appertained to the country districts for these Courts ought to be paid from the Imperial Exchequer; and he hoped the time was fast approaching when they would have but one system, and that system a fair one.

MR. WHITWELL pointed out to the hon. and learned Member for Leeds (Mr. Wheelhouse), that the Courts did not cost any money, but made a profit over the expenses, no less than £18,000 having been received as fees.

MR. O'DONNELL asked, if there were any sum included under this head, intended as a special remuneration to that police magistrate who lent himself to the sham inquiry into the case of Sergeant M'Carthy? ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The expression used by the hon. Member for Dungarvan cannot be allowed to pass, relating, as it does, to a process of law. I, therefore, call upon him to withdraw it.

MR. O'DONNELL was not aware that the inquiry was a process of law, and could not regard it as anything but a "sham inquiry."

THE CHAIRMAN: I distinctly called upon the hon. Member for Dungarvan to withdraw the expression used. The course now taken by him is disrespectful to the Committee and inconsistent with the usage of Parliament. The hon. Member having failed to withdraw his words, I must submit the conduct of the hon. Member to the Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not know whether the Committee is competent to deal with this question, or whether it will be necessary to refer it to the House; but it is quite clear that it would be improper, if you, Sir, consider a particular expression as out of Order and not consistent with Parliamentary usage, that it should be allowed to pass. If the hon. Member for Dungarvan will withdraw the expression, which I think he must have used inadvertently, not being aware that it was not a proper Parliamentary expression, of course, we need take no further action; but if the hon. Member declines to withdraw, it will be necessary that we should move to report Progress, and submit his conduct to the House.

MR. PARNELL felt very strongly on this point himself, and certainly agreed with the sentiment expressed by the hon. Member for Dungarvan. It had, however, been ruled to be out of Order. The people of Ireland also considered that this inquiry was of the nature described by the hon. Member. ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member, that he must not enter into a discussion of the merits of that question. I understood the hon. Member to rise for the purpose of speaking to a point of Order.

MR. PARNELL thought the point of Order had already been ruled by the Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: I laid down what I believed to be the Rule of this House with regard to the language to be used in this House. I called on the hon. Member for Dungarvan to withdraw an expression which he used, and which I considered unbecoming. The hon. Member having refused to withdraw that expression, the Chancellor of the Exchequer rose and further called upon him to withdraw. I expected that the hon. Member would at once have withdrawn that expression; but as the hon. Member for Meath rose, I presumed he was going to speak to a point of Order.

MR. PARNELL said, the ruling of the Chairman was that it was not in Order to make that charge—namely, a charge of "sham inquiry"—against a judicial process. But the inquiry was not a judicial process. It was true that a judicial process had taken place in Dublin, but that was in the form of a coroner's inquest; but the inquiry directed by the Government was not a judicial process.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I rise to Order. I understand the question before the Committee is not what was the character of the inquiry, but whether the hon. Member for Dungarvan, having been called upon by the Chairman to withdraw a certain expression, ought or ought not to accept the ruling of the Chair, and whether the ruling of the Chair is or is not to be supported?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER had inferred that the question of this inquiry was to have been brought forward at a later stage. With reference to the point of Order, it seemed to him that the Chairman had looked upon the expression "sham inquiry," as not merely reflecting upon the police magistrate who conducted it, but upon the Government who authorized that inquiry.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not in Order for the hon. Member to enter into a discussion on the expression which I called upon the hon. Member to withdraw, as appearing to me improperly applied to a legal proceeding conducted by a public official. I must now again call upon the hon. Member for Dungarvan to withdraw that expression.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had great respect for the ruling of the Chair, and the reason he objected to withdraw was that he thought the Chairman was not acquainted with the real facts of the case. Out of respect for the ruling of the Chair, he would withdraw the words "sham inquiry," and for "sham" would substitute "unreal"—the unreal inquiry. He would ask if there appeared in this Vote any special remuneration to the police magistrate who lent himself to the unreal inquiry into the death of the late Colour Sergeant M'Carthy? ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The words I ruled to be out of Order were "lent himself to a sham inquiry." It was not merely "sham inquiry" that I objected to, but the imputation cast upon a judicial proceeding by the expression that a magistrate had lent himself to a sham inquiry.

MR. O'DONNELL: What I say now is, that it was an unreal inquiry.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not for me, but for the Committee, to say how far the explanation of the hon. Member for Dungarvan is satisfactory to the Committee.

MR. DILLWYN asked, where and how, in the case of an hon. Member being convinced that an inquiry had been improperly conducted in any part of the country, such inquiry could be impeached except in that House?

THE CHAIRMAN: The House would have abundant opportunities of censuring even the conduct of the Judges of the land by a distinct Motion to that effect. It is only my duty, as Chairman, in preserving Order in discussions in Committee, to protect, as far as I can, the Committee from any random expressions implying gross misconduct in the magistracy in the country. There is no question that any hon. Member can bring forward this matter in the form of a Motion.

MR. HOPWOOD, with all respect to the ruling of the Chair, ventured to ask whether there were any limits to the freedom of speech with which hon. Members might debate on any subject? They found fault with the Estimates. They did not wish to do so in rude language, which would provoke retort and cause a breach of Order; but he appealed to the Chairman, for whose conduct in the Chair all had great respect, and would ask whether an Amendment, made in deference to the ruling of the Chair—respectfully, and, as he believed, unreservedly, made—was not sufficient to satisfy the dignity of the House and the Chair?

MR. O'DONNELL wished to add, that if remuneration of this nature appeared in the Vote, he should have felt obliged to challenge the Vote, and the statement he had made had no casual reference to any official, but contained the pith of his objection to the Vote. ["Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the hon. Member for Dungarvan appeared to be under a misapprehension. Objection was taken not merely to the words "sham inquiry," but to the statement that a London magistrate had lent himself to improper and illegal inquiry. The hon. Member would, no doubt, see that the best course for him to adopt was to retract the whole expression.

MR. SULLIVAN sympathized with the question the hon. Member for Dungarvan wished to raise. He had evidently used a phrase merely to strengthen his argument, without intending to make any remark hurtful to a public functionary. Such an idea was, no doubt, quite foreign to the mind of the hon. Member, although the words conveyed a natural inference which appeared to infringe on the amenities of debate. His hon. Friend had, therefore, better withdraw them. He himself believed the inquiry to be unreal to a certain extent. No doubt, the magistrate acted in good faith; but there were circumstances surrounding the case which made it unreal. He, however, strongly advised his hon. Friend to withdraw the words objected to.

MR. BIGGAR considered that the hon. Member for Dungarvan was justified in using the pointed language he had employed, and he did not think anything the hon. Member had said was of sufficient importance to occupy so much of the time of the House or to give rise to a formal Vote of Censure. He was not a critical judge of peculiar modes of expression; but in this case too much had been made of the words used by his hon. Friend.

MR. O'DONNELL: To put an end to this dispute, if you will allow me, Mr. Raikes, although I still believe you are under a misapprehension with regard to the view I should have, if necessary, developed, I beg to withdraw the whole expression.

MR. PARNELL said, they must have an answer to the question, whether any of this Vote was to be spent in defraying the expenses of the unreal inquiry into the death of Colour Sergeant M'Carthy?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON replied, that this Vote covered the salaries of the police magistrates of London, and the salary of the magistrate in question was included, but there was no addition to the sum voted last year.

MR. PARNELL asked, that when a Supplementary Vote was brought forward, whether the special amount for the expenses of this magistrate in connection with the inquiry would be indicated?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Certainly; I have nothing to conceal in this matter; and should a Supplementary Estimate be necessary—I do not think it will—the Vote will appear in its proper place.

MR. PARNELL: Then, if no Estimate is necessary, these expenses will be paid out of some other Vote; and, if that is so, I am determined to take a division on every Vote which has any possible reference to this inquiry. It will save the time of the Committee, if the Government will let us know which Vote these expenses come under.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER moved to report Progress. This matter had been described by the Chairman as a legal inquiry, and as the matter was an important one, he wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he regarded the inquiry into the death of Sergeant M'Carthy as a legal inquiry or not? The magistrate went to Dublin and took evidence, but he did not take it on oath. In his opinion, they could not have a legal inquiry without evidence upon oath. He would not go an inch further until that question was answered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Connor Power.)

MR. SULLIVAN also would like the Secretary of State for the Home Department to state in what form the expense of the inquiry would be brought before the House. If the present time was not the proper occasion on which to discuss the matter, when would their opportunity come? He wished to be real and earnest, and would not take up the time of the Committee then, if they could have a fair and legitimate opportunity at another time.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that these Estimates were prepared before Parliament actually met, and included all the expenses thought necessary; but the question of the inquiry into the death of Sergeant M'Carthy arose afterwards, and these Estimates, therefore, had nothing to do with that inquiry. He need not say anything in defence of the magistrate appointed to make the inquiry, because he stated at the time the name of the gentleman to whom he should refer the matter, and no objection was made, or could have been made, by anyone. Of course, it was not a legal inquiry, for there was not a person in England who could have, under the circumstances, taken evidence on oath, except a special Act of Parliament had been passed for the express object. The gentleman he selected to make the inquiry was fully competent to do so, and he should be prepared to defend him when the proper time came.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: That clearly establishes the fact that the Chairman was incorrect in his description of the proceedings as a legal inquiry. ["Order, order!"] Yes; the Chairman described it as "a process of law," and the Secretary of State for the Home Department now says it was not a legal inquiry. ["Order!"]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER ventured to submit that it was impossible to conduct their Business, if their Chairman were to be subjected to such remarks. The hon. Member would see that his observations were of such a character that he ought to withdraw them.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. PARNELL asked, out of what funds were the expenses of this inquiry to be paid? He did not understand how such an inquiry could be held without expense, and he wanted to know where the money was to come from?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the Vote which was then before the Committee had been prepared before the inquiry into the death of Sergeant M'Carthy was even asked for; but that was hardly the time to discuss what the future Estimates of the Government would be. He would take care that when the proper Vote came before the Committee the matter should be shown. The present Vote did not, and could not, contain any reference to this particular matter. It referred to the salaries of the magistrates in England, and the expenses of police magistrates were charged on the Consolidated Fund.

(13.) £295,190, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police.

MR. DILLWYN wished for some explanation as to the increased amount of the Vote.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON remarked, that at first the police expenses were raised by rates, but now a portion of the cost was paid out of the National Exchequer.

Vote agreed to.

(14.) £870,948, to complete the sum for Police Counties and Boroughs (Great Britain).

MR. WHITWELL had hoped that this Vote would have been modified, and that the Secretary of State for the Home Department would have been able to find time to deal with this question.

Mr. O'Connor Power

The amount asked for was an enormous sum, and the number of police in many places was far above the number really required.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the matter had occupied the serious consideration of the Government, but the increase in the number of police arose from the centralization of the populations in large towns. The Home Office endeavoured to get the Returns of the Police from all parts of the Kingdom by the end of the October Quarter, and then a comparison was made upon which the Estimate was founded. There was, however, a natural growth of the police force, in consequence of the growth of the population in large towns; but he hoped that the system now adopted would, by degrees, bring the wants of the different districts under the control of the Home Office, and then a great saving would be effected.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY drew the attention of the Committee to the question of the Scotch police. In many parts of Scotland there were more police than were wanted; and it was, in his opinion, a mistake, on the part of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to regulate the number of police by the population. It was a melancholy fact that, notwithstanding the augmented grant, and the additional order which prevailed throughout Scotland, the number of policemen was steadily increasing; and that at a greater rate than the ratio of the population. It was also a remarkable circumstance, that, in the county which he had the honour to represent—Forfarshire—the inhabitants were now paying—or, at least, were paying last year—as much for the police force as they did before there was any grant given by Government at all. He desired to impress upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department the necessity of exercising a vigilant check upon the increase to which he had referred. If that increase went on at the rate it had been doing of late years, it would very soon absorb the additional Government grant, which would then, instead of being a relief to local burdens, be found to be no assistance whatever.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he must remind the hon. Member who had just spoken that he had alluded to a case which did not appear on the Estimates at all. There was no grant given to localities in which the police had not reached a certain standard. At the same time, he thought the Committee would thoroughly agree that the proportion of one policeman to every 3,000 of the population—except in places where the people were of the most orderly character—was somewhat insufficient. As to Scotland, more applications had been received from that country itself for an increase of men than from almost any other part of the United Kingdom; and he was afraid it was in resisting some of those applications, that the Home Office had made itself a little distasteful to certain localities.

MR. HIBBERT said, he could bear testimony to the fact that the Home Office had tried in every way to keep down the increase in the police force to which allusion had been made. From the position he held in connection with the Lancashire magistrates, he knew that those gentlemen thought they had great reason to complain of the Home Office, because of the difficulties it had placed in their way in obtaining an additional number of constables. In that case, the application for an increased force did not come from the Chief Constable of the county, or from the Government Inspector, but from the local authorities spread over various parts of Lancashire. But, while it was only fair and just to the Government to say that they had tried as much as possible to keep down the number, he desired to remark that he did not think they should lay down a rule that there should be a certain number of policemen to the population. Population differed in different portions of the country; and some districts were more orderly than others, and could do with fewer policemen.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, there was no such fixed rule as the hon. Gentleman appeared to imagine. There was a certain ratio which was regarded and acted upon as much as possible; but it necessarily varied throughout boroughs and counties.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he did not blame the Government for the gradual increase which had taken place in this Vote; but he desired to point out the moral of their policy in giving a large additional grant to the police force in various parts of the country. Many hon. Members well knew—he knew perfectly well—places where, up to a certain time, the local authorities were quite content with a smaller number of police than they now possessed; but whenever the tempting bait of the Government paying half, or whatever the sum might be, was held out, Town Councils in different parts of the country said—"Oh, it does not matter now; the Government provide so much!" To people who spoke in that way must be added those timid persons who said—"Here we are, 1,000 of a population, and there are only two or three policemen to protect us." In that way, the Vote was gradually increasing under the influence of strong temptation.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, there could be no doubt that, in the old days, there was a great indisposition to supply additional policemen, and many of his Predecessors had had to use strong efforts in order to school some districts up to the proper mark. When this extra Vote came into operation, it was determined that, as far as possible, the effect of the Government grant should not be in any way to increase the applications for police from the various localities throughout the country; and before he came into Office his Predecessors had forced upon local authorities the necessity of keeping up their forces to the proper standard. It was quite true that formerly it was thought there ought to be a policeman to every 1,000 of the population; but that was all past and gone. That was not the rule or standard by which the Government now acted, in any shape or form. They took into consideration, not only the population, but the area over which that population extended; and, if hon. Gentlemen opposite had only witnessed the amount of pressure which had been brought to bear, not by Inspectors, but by the localities themselves, in order to an increase of the police force, they would not only have had some idea of the amount of labour which the consideration of their applications entailed, but they would have found that the number of those applications which had been made and refused was enormous. No doubt there had been an increase in the Vote; but it was to be remembered that there had also been an increase in the population. Then, again, in former days, it was only necessary to certify to the Treasury that the police were efficient; but now there was not only a certificate of efficiency required, but a certificate setting forth that there were not more men connected with the force than was absolutely necessary. He knew one borough in Lancashire where there had been a great fight on this subject. It was suspected that the authorities of that borough were making a sudden application on account of the increased Government grant; and it was pointed out to them that, in that case, either their police force must have been inefficient before, or they were attempting to make a raid upon the Government. There had been, as he had said, a great fight; and it was only after the most strict and careful scrutiny that that borough received any increased grant at all.

MR. MACDONALD said, he observed that in 1877-8 the Inspector of Scotland was paid £700. Now, the Estimate asked for was £850, showing an addition of £150. He should like to have some explanation in regard to this increase.

MR. RAMSAY thought that if on no other ground than that of simple fairness, the paying of an efficient public servant in Scotland at the same rate as a similar public servant received in England amply justified itself.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the salaries of the Inspectors in England had been raised from £750 to £850 a-year, in consequence of their having been long in the service, and of the increased amount of work which they had to perform. When that was done, the Scotch Inspector, whose duties were equally arduous, and who was equally a valuable public servant, was placed on the same footing as his English brethren. Previously, the Scotch Inspector had been in receipt of £50 less than those gentlemen.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY, adverting to the point which he had formerly raised as to the state of matters in Scotland with regard to the police force, said, that while the local authorities were the best judges as to the number of men necessary to preserve peace and order in the different boroughs, those boroughs were much tempted to increase that number in order to obtain the Government grant. That view of the case was confirmed by the last Report of the Inspector General, who also pointed out that in some places the policemen did not get sufficient wages, and that in others their clothing might be better, and so on. All this, of course, tended to increase the cost of maintaining the force, and constituted, it might be, a mild, but still a very effective, form of compulsion. Local authorities were, practically, told—"If you do not attend to these matters we will be obliged to declare you inefficient, and you will get none of the Government grant."

MR. ROWLEY HILL remarked that the system of subventions in aid of local rates was soon bearing the fruits anticipated by those who opposed such aids by the central Government—namely, in promoting local extravagance. Formerly, when the local funds were charged with three-fourths of the cost of maintaining the police, it was difficult for inspectors to induce local authorities to provide sufficient men to render the force efficient; but now, when the Treasury paid half the cost of the police, the Home Secretary informed the Committee that it was needful to curb the disposition of the local authorities to employ an unnecessary number of police, and thereby to make a raid upon the Treasury.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. PARNELL said, that were it not that there was a Royal Commission now sitting to inquire into the whole system of the discipline, the management, and the working of the Penal Servitude Laws, and also into the desirability of instituting some independent system of inspection other than that which now existed, he should have felt it to be his duty to take a division against the whole of this Vote. He had been for several years—ever since, indeed, he first looked into the question of punishment by penal servitude, and the method of its administration—very much impressed with the strong necessity which there was for reformation. Of course, he did not intend to deny, in the slightest degree, that the subject was a very difficult one. At the same time, he could not think that the way in which the Penal Servitude Acts had been framed, or the manner in which they had been carried out, had been calculated to diminish the inherent difficulty of the whole question. Hon. Members knew that in the old times prisoners in England were exceedingly badly off—as, indeed, they were in most other countries as well. The labours of Howard were most successful in bringing about a reformation in sanitary conditions; but he ventured to think that, in some respects, the treatment to which prisoners received into those penal servitude establishments had been exposed in their own time, and within the last few years, exceeded in atrocity any to which Howard had directed his attention with so much benefit. With regard to those establishments, he had always insisted on two pressing wants—namely, the want of independent inspection, and the want of greater guarantees and safeguards, laid down by law, for the proper treatment of prisoners, and for securing them against ill-usage by the warders or other persons to whose authority they were intrusted. No one who had compared the Statutes which governed the penal servitude establishments with those which governed county and borough gaols, could have failed to notice the great difference which existed between them in those two respects—the question of inspection and the question of statutory guarantees. The reason for that was very obvious. The county and borough gaols were part of an old English system. The method in which they were managed had grown up to be an institution, and had extended itself with the institutions of the country. In fact, it was part of the local life of England. But penal servitude establishments were on an entirely different footing. They were instituted when transportation was abolished, in order that places might be found to which prisoners who were under that sentence might be sent; but, instead of the careful guarantees with which legislation had surrounded the health and good condition of prisoners in county and borough gaols, they found in the penal servitude Acts an entire absence of any such safeguards or checks. He believed it was owing to this that there had been so many instances, within their own knowledge and recollection, of horrible treatment to prisoners confined in those convict establishments. His attention had been directed to this question in a very special way; because, owing to the faulty condition of the law of this country, it was not possible for them to make any distinction in the treatment of political prisoners who were sentenced to penal servitude and the treatment of prisoners who were convicted of other crimes and offences. That being the case, it so happened that when there was any disturbance in Ireland—when there was any attempt at insurrection, however moderate its dimensions might be—there was a batch of prisoners sentenced to penal servitude for life, or for a period of years, and those prisoners were sent off to Chatham or Portland with the commonest and most ordinary convicts. That, he thought, was a great mischief. It brought discredit on the Government of the country in the first place; and, in the second place, it forced men of pure minds, who in no way required that which was designed for ordinary convicts, to undergo an amount of suffering and discipline which could do them no good, and which could only tend to brutalize them—if, indeed, such natures could be brutalized. He had seen men who had been convicted of political offences and sentenced, as the case might be, to five, seven, or ten years' penal servitude, associated with the worst criminals. The men to whom he referred were men of amiable and gentle dispositions, whom one would almost think it a pity to shut up at all, or to submit to any corrective discipline. But it so happened; and he dealt with the question as he found it. He knew—and other Irish Members knew—that men who had been convicted of political offences had to herd with murderers and wife-beaters; and any hon. Member who took part in voting money to maintain such a system as that, lent himself as an accessory to a state of things which should not exist. As he had already stated, there was a Royal Commission sitting on the whole question; and he was, therefore, content for the present year to await the result of that Commission. But there were one or two features in the present Vote which he could not pass over in silence. They were features which showed that certain individuals who were in authority over those prisoners had scandalously and shamefully carried out their trust, and that they were not really fit for the common exercise of the functions which they were supposed to perform. He observed that the salary of the Surveyor General of Prisons and Chairman of Directors was put down at £1,000, and already two Votes on account had been made. He altogether objected to the conduct of this official, and therefore begged to move the reduction of the salary by so much as had not yet been voted.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must name the precise amount by which he proposes to reduce the Vote.

MR. PARNELL thought there had already been voted about four months' salary, and therefore he would propose to reduce the Vote by £600. He did so for this reason. Without going into the merits of the M'Carthy case, he would incidentally remark that he looked upon the Surveyor General of Prisons and Chairman of Directors as, in a considerable sense, responsible for that man's death, because he refused to forward to the proper quarter the recommendation of the medical officer of Chatham Prison that M'Carthy ought to be sent to Woking Invalid Prison. M'Carthy was consequently left at Chatham Prison, when, according to proper medical authority, he ought to have been sent to Woking.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS only wished to say a few words on this matter. He quite admitted that as far as the Penal Servitude Acts were concerned, when they were first started, the whole thing was a matter of experiment. Transportation had been given up, and it was necessary to find a substitute, and this was done by passing the Penal Servitude Acts. Those Acts had now been in existence for a considerable time, and from matters brought under his notice, he considered he was justified in allowing an Inquiry into their operation. Therefore, he appointed a Commission, and he was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman say he would not fully enter in the Acts until the Report of that Commission had been made. He believed it would be a Report drawn up with very great care; and certainly its authors were Gentlemen who were thoroughly competent to deal with the subject. He had not risen, however, so much for the purpose of making these observations, as to refer to some remarks which had fallen from the hon. Gentleman with regard to a gentleman who had long served the State in many offices, and who, he believed, had acted most thoroughly well in all he had done. He did not believe there was a higher-minded or better public servant in England than Sir Edmund Du Cane, Surveyor General of Prisons; and he (Mr. Cross) would be unworthy of his position if, for one moment, he allowed the observations of the hon. Member to pass unnoticed, and refrained from saying that a more hard-working, more humane, and more devoted public servant was not to be found than Sir Edmund Du Cane.

MR. O'DONNELL did not wish to enter into a disputation about the humanity of the official in question, but would confine himself to referring to the remarkable error of judgment which he committed in refusing to forward to the proper tribunal the recommendation of the competent medical authority that Sergeant M'Carthy ought to be removed from Chatham to Woking. Instead of doing his duty, he left the dying man to his fate. To say the least of it, this was a serious error of judgment, and threw unpleasant light upon the manner in which that prison official discharged his duty. Therefore, just as the right hon. Gentleman felt himself compelled to get up and defend Sir Edmund Du Cane, so his hon. Friend the Member for Meath had a right to say that, in his opinion, and that of the majority of the Irish Members, this official had been guilty of conduct which called for the most earnest protest.

MR. HOPWOOD would not refer to any particular official, for he did not pretend to say there were not as distinguished and eminent gentlemen at the head of the Convict Departments as were to be found in any other Departments of the State; but he ventured to think that their rules and regulations very often led to unfortunate results, and it was much to be regretted that they placed such a degree of irresponsible power in the hands of the warders. If a prisoner committed a breach of prison rules, however slight, and the warder complained of it, the convict was sentenced to "three days' cells;" and very often he never complained for fear of having that punishment increased. They ought to endeavour to prevent suffering of that kind, when their desire was to reform.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. HIBBERT, before the Vote itself was agreed to, desired some explanation as to the Colonial Convict Establishments. He saw that this year the grant had been increased, which had not been the case for many years. He should like to know the cause of this increase. He had always understood that the number of persons who were in the Colonies, and who had been transported there, was gradually decreasing, and, therefore, that the grant became less every year. Now, however, he found that they were called upon to make an additional grant. His own opinion was, that the best thing they could do would be to come to some agreement with the Colony to get rid of the grant altogether.

MR. WHITWELL would also like to draw attention to the same subject. It appeared that they had 300 prisoners in Western Australia, and their expenses amounted to no less than £31,000, or over £100 for each prisoner. For these prisoners there were no less than 14 chaplains, which seemed to be out of all proportion, especially when he found they only needed one surgeon. There were 29 warders, and the cost of superintendence was double that of victualling. He joined with his hon. Friend in hoping the Government would come to some agreement with the Colony to put an end to the annual grant.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON could assure the Committee this was a subject which had now for some time occupied the attention of the Home Office and the Treasury, with a view to seeing whether something might not be done to do away with this large item. The amount was being gradually reduced, and the staff diminished, because the convicts died. What was the cause of the particular increase this year he could not at present say.

MR. PARNELL directed the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to an item in the Vote for payment to a Coroner. He had always understood that a Coroner was a functionary to a great degree independent of the Government. He had never known of a Coroner being paid by the Government. He supposed this Coroner was the Coroner for the county. He received £150 from the Government, for extra duties thrown upon him by reason of Dartmoor Prison being in the county. This was a most improper application of Government money, and he trusted that it would not be continued.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON believed that this sum represented the contribution paid by the Prison for inquests held by the county Coroner. The prison authorities did not contribute in any other way to the salary of the Coroner.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that the money ought to be paid to the Grand Jury of the county. It was most objectionable, and even dangerous, that a Coroner, who ought to be independent, and to be able to put his finger upon, and denounce, abuses, should be in the pay of the Government, who, so to speak, owned the prisons. The money should, at all events, be paid through the rates.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS was not at all satisfied that it was not so paid; but he very much agreed with the hon. and learned Member, and he would look into the matter.

MR. RYLANDS pointed out that this was the only prison in connection with which there was a charge for a Coroner.

MR. PARNELL said, he was informed, though he could not say whether his authority was a very good one—he had no reason, however, to doubt it—that at inquests in these convict prisons the juries were often composed of employés of contractors, tradesmen, and other persons having dealings with prisons. That was very improper, and appeared to him to indicate too much laxity in these matters. As the Secretary of State for the Home Department had said he would inquire into the question as to this Coroner's payment, he would not pursue the subject.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry to trouble the Committee with another division; but he felt that he could not allow the Vote to pass without protesting once more against the conduct of one of the highest medical officers of the service. He referred to Dr. Burns. He did not wish to go into the old story of Daniel Reddin. He would only say that Dr. Burns was officer of the prison in which Daniel Reddin was tortured with a galvanic battery, to find out whether he was malingering or not. Reddin was now a confirmed paralytic, and he (Mr. Parnell) believed Dr. Burns was greatly responsible for his state. He had never found out anything to his good. He moved to reduce the Vote by the amount of Dr. Burns's salary—£450.

Motion made, and Question put,

The Committee divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 213. Majority 195.—(Div. List, No. 158.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOT pointed out, that the Committee was without any information about the prisons transferred. The number and names of the prisons were not given in the Estimate in the hands of hon. Members, nor were the names or numbers of the prisons that were to be given up stated. The Government must have had some difficulty in preparing correct Estimates for the present year; but the Committee ought to know the estimated cost of each gaol during the last year, so that it might have been compared with the cost of these establishments in future years. The Estimates for conveyance and escort of prisoners seemed small. He understood that the Government were going to pay the cost of conveying prisoners backwards and forwards to different gaols, and if this were so, the Estimate seemed a very low one. There was also good reason for asking how the sum of £25,000 for new buildings was going to be laid out, and upon what prisons? He also wished to know when the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross) intended to give some intimation as to the time at which the different localities would be paid by the Government for the gaols they had taken over? This account might be a very complicated one; but the Government ought to give this information as soon as possible.

MR. RYLANDS thought it natural that much interest should be felt in the first Estimate under the new Prisons Act. That Act had been recommended to the House on the ground that it would lead to an important saving in the expenses of prisons, and a greater profit on prison labour. There was now some evidence to show that those who thought the Secretary of State for the Home Department too sanguine, were justified in the opinion that the public advantage anticipated from the Act was not likely to be realized. The right hon. Gentleman anticipated that he would save £50,000 a-year in the cost of prisons. On this first year, the entire saving anticipated by the Department in the most favourable circumstances was only £27,000. As expenditure in Government Departments had a tendency to increase from year to year rather than diminish, this saving was not likely to continue. Upon prison labour, the right hon. Gentleman expected to obtain a similar advantage; but as the extra receipts now estimated were stated at £60,000, the profit expected must be considerably less than £50,000. The average cost of prisoners all over the Kingdom was of great interest. It had been represented by Government as enormous under the old state of things; but he had shown that in Lancashire, prisoners were maintained at the rate of £17 per head. In 1876-7, the cost was £27 per head for all the gaols under the control of the local authorities. That included all the small gaols which were so badly conducted, as well as the large gaols conducted like those in Lancashire. The result of the change which had been made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department was, that while the average cost of each prisoner throughout the Kingdom was, prior to the passing of the Act, £27 per annum, it now amounted to £25 4s. He quite concurred, he might add, with the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) as to the expediency of having much fuller information laid before the House on the subject than was furnished by the present Estimates. With regard to the Act itself, he thought if even it turned out that it worked somewhat economically, it was far from being a satisfactory measure; but he must confess that he had no great expectation, looking at the Estimates before the Committee, that it would be productive of economy.

MR. HIBBERT said, he did not wish to discuss the policy of the Prisons Act. What he had risen to suggest was, that if not inconvenient, the Government should postpone the Vote, in order that they might be in a position to give the Committee more detailed information with respect to it. It was of the utmost importance that, in dealing with the Vote for the first time, the Committee should be made acquainted with what had actually been done under the Act; but, as matters at present stood, they knew little beyond what the number of prisoners was. Now, there would, in his opinion, be great advantage in having before them a statement, showing the number of warders and officers of every description employed in connection with their prisons, and giving an account generally of the way in which those prisons were managed by the Government.

MR. ASSHETON expressed his regret that the Committee, owing to the absence of the necessary information, were not in a position to form a judgment as to whether the Government had or had not carried out those financial reforms which they promised would be the result of the passing of the Prisons' Act. He should like, he might add, to know why it was that the very onerous duties of Chairman of the Board of Directors of Ordinary Prisons and those of the Chairman of the Directors of Convict Prisons were discharged by one gentleman? So far as he could see, it would give any one person enough to do to perform the former duties properly.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS thought it was perfectly natural that the inquiries which had just been addressed to him should have been made. He would answer them as far as he was able; but it was absolutely impossible for him to furnish the detailed information which was asked for, inasmuch as the whole system of prison management was in a transition state. During the past year, 37 prisons had been closed in England, and seven or eight more would probably be closed within another month. That process, as the Committee would at once perceive, involved a change of warders and other officers, and a great many local arrangements which could not be put on paper until next year. By that time he hoped to be in a position to place the Estimates before the Committee in such a way that they would be able to ascertain for themselves what had really been done. He might observe that the Estimate which was now submitted to the Committee was less than that which had been put forward when the Prisons Act was under discussion, and next year he expected it would be found that a considerable saving had been effected under the new system. At all events, the account would be set forth as clearly as possible, so that hon. Members might form their own conclusions. He, for one, had not the slightest fear of the result. As to the new buildings which might be required, no Estimate could be given for the first year, and he might also state that arrangements were being actively made with respect to the payments for discontinued prisons. In answer to the Question of his hon. Friend the Member for Clitheroe (Mr. Assheton), he could only say that the point to which it related had been fully argued when the Prisons Bill was before the House, and that it was deemed wise to keep in view the desirability of having the authorities of the two classes of prisons amalgamated. The staffs of both were, as far as possible, being worked together to save expense; and, in order to accomplish that object, it was thought advisable that one gentleman should be the Chairman of the two Boards to which his hon. Friend alluded.

MR. WHITWELL felt that it was out of the question that anything like detailed information could be laid before the Committee this year on the subject of the Vote. Indeed, he was surprised that so many details had already been supplied.

MR. MACDONALD, referring to the item of £500 a-year for remuneration to the Secretary for personal services, asked what was meant by such services, of which he regretted to find mention made repeatedly throughout the Estimates.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the personal services rendered in the present instance were connected with the organization of the new system under the operation of the Prisons Act.

MR. PARNELL should feel it to be his duty at some future time to direct attention to the new Rules for the regulation of prisons. As to the general question he was of opinion that, perhaps, one authority would be sufficient for the management of the two classes of prisons.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the Rules to which the hon. Gentleman referred had now been in force for some time, and that their operation was being narrowly watched by the Government, with the view of seeing whether they could not be amended. Immediately after Whitsuntide he hoped to be able to lay upon the Table Supplementary Rules for the purpose of meeting certain deficiencies which were found to exist.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding £183,665, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879, for the Expense of the Maintenance of Juvenile Offenders in Reformatory, Industrial, and Day Industrial Schools in Great Britain, and of the Inspectors of Reformatories."

MR. W. HOLMS pointed out that in Scotland advantage had been taken of the Industrial Schools Act to, perhaps, a greater extent than in any other part of the Kingdom. While, however, the allowance per week for each child in England and Ireland was 5s., it was only 4s. 6d. in Scotland. That, he thought, was not fair to the latter country; he believed the increased expenditure in England arose very much from the want of economical management. There was no good reason, he contended, why Scotland should be placed in that respect on a different footing from either England or Ireland.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the circumstances of Scotland were somewhat different from those which prevailed in England. In the former country, for instance, the children could be fed on a diet of oatmeal, which was not found to answer in this country. The cost of maintenance was, therefore, greater in the one country than in the other.

MR. RAMSAY thought the grant should either be reduced in England or increased in Scotland. There was no good reason to justify the difference which existed in the payments made for the support of industrial schools in the two countries.

MR. W. HOLMS moved that the item for those schools in England be reduced by the sum of £7,000. The question was one which he could assure the Government created a considerable amount of irritation in Scotland, where the maintenance of the children cost quite as much as in this country, though the management of the schools was more economically conducted.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £103,000 for Industrial Schools, England, be reduced by the sum of £7,000."—(Mr. William Holms.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped the hon. Gentleman would not divide the Committee on the question, which, he might inform him, was under the consideration of the Government. He would remind him that these industrial schools had conferred upon the country some of the greatest benefits of modern times, and that it would be a pity that anything should be done which would interfere with their usefulness.

MR. M'LAREN ridiculed the idea that the expense of living was smaller in Scotland than in England and Ireland. Those who advanced that argument might just as well say, upon a comparison of the Northern with the Southern counties of England, that it cost more to keep an agricultural labourer in Yorkshire than it did in Devonshire. Each lived upon his earnings, which were very different. It had been proved with regard to Scotland, not that the expense was less, but only that the expenditure was ground down to a lower degree.

MAJOR NOLAN hoped that Irish Members would vote with the Scotch Members on this question, because the argument had frequently been used against the former that the cost of maintenance in Ireland was lower than in any other part of the Kingdom. That argument had been advanced with regard to the salaries of Civil servants, who were paid less in Ireland than in England; and the same contention had been made in refusing to increase the remuneration of national school teachers. It was the policy of hon. Members from Ireland to have the cost of maintenance considered, in the Estimates, as equal all over the Kingdom. He should vote with the Scotch Members, not because he wished to starve poor children either in England or in Ireland, but as a protest against the scale of maintenance being varied in different parts of the Kingdom.

MR. SULLIVAN hoped the Scotch Members would not vote at all. He understood that the promise made from the Treasury Bench was entirely satisfactory. He objected to the Vote, for the reason that they could not improve the Scotch child by pinching the toes of an English boy or girl.

MR. PARNELL said, although Scotch Members had charged Irish Members with obstruction the other night, he should support them in their objection to this Vote, because he thought they were taking a practical course in ventilating a Scotch grievance at that moment. If they felt they were not fairly treated, it was perfectly open to them to move the reduction of the Vote.

MR. RAMSAY said, that, while it might be true that the Scotch people fully appreciated all that had been said in commendation of their industrial schools, the fact of their appreciation could be no reason for the State giving them less for maintenance than was given to similar institutions in England. He had no desire to have the children pinched or starved. He deprecated any such result; but he did not think it was at all likely to follow from the reduction of the Vote. When the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Sullivan) spoke of the favourable consideration promised by the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), he seemed to have forgotten that this was not the first occasion on which the subject had been dealt with in Committee of Supply. Scotchmen had before waited upon one of Her Majesty's Ministers for the purpose of pressing this claim. If it had been the first time, he would have been glad to accede to the suggestion that there should be no division; but, under the circumstances, he was not inclined to ask the hon. Member (Mr. W. Holms) to withdraw his Amendment, because they had no other means of pressing upon the Committee to place Scotland in the same position as England with regard to this question of maintenance.

MR. FRENCH was inclined to support his Scotch Friends, because he thought they had been hardly dealt with. It was all very well to say that the Scotch child cost less; but that might be the result of better management of the schools. He hoped they would be managed in Ireland and England as well as they were in Scotland.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY would like to have a distinct assurance from the Government as to the course they intended to take, for he thought a clear case was made out that injustice had been done to Scotland. The two countries—England and Scotland—ought to be put on an equal footing. If it were understood that the Government would re-consider the question, he should be inclined to ask the hon. Member (Mr. W. Holms) to withdraw his Amendment; because a Motion to reduce an English Vote did not seem a good way to obtain a boon for Scotland.

DR. CAMERON said, what Scotch Members wanted was equal distribution of State aid. Therefore, he did not think that a case had been made out to induce his hon. Friend (Mr. W. Holms) to withdraw his Amendment. He hoped the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) would undertake to give the matter serious consideration, and not allow it to be put off from day to day, without anything being done, which had been the case, to his knowledge, for many years.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he had endeavoured to assure hon. Members that he would consider this question with a view, if possible, of getting rid of the grievance complained of. He could only leave it to the Committee to accept that assurance, which he now repeated.

Mr. Ramsay

MR. W. HOLMS disclaimed any intention of obstructing the Business of the House, as had been suggested by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell).

MR. PARNELL explained, that he had made no charge of obstruction. He had merely said that the hon. Member (Mr. W. Holms) was doing that which Irish Members had been doing who had been charged with obstruction—a charge which they positively disclaimed. He had wished to imply that the hon. Member was within his right.

MR. W. HOLMS had only said that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Parnell) had made a suggestion implying that he had taken an obstructive course. He ventured to think that if Irish Members were as economical of the time of the House as Scotch Members, Business would proceed much more rapidly than it did. After the assurance from the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), he would not press his Amendment.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH called attention to the small contribution of the parents towards the maintenance of their children at these industrial schools. Valuable as these institutions were, their cost was very large, and the proportion paid by the parents, he found, did not amount even to one-tenth of the sum expended. Their contribution did not exceed 3d. a-head per week; whereas each child would have cost them from 2s. to 3s. per week if kept at home. A few years ago, attempts were made to remedy this disproportion; and he wished to know whether those endeavours had succeeded, or whether the matter was still under the consideration of the Home Office?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON agreed with the noble Lord as to the necessity, as far as possible, of making the parent liable for the maintenance of the child while he was at the institution; but the noble Lord was quite aware that the difficulties were very great, first, in the magistrates ascertaining the amount which the parent could contribute; and, secondly, the difficulty of collecting the contribution. In consequence of the adoption of a new system, the sum collected had considerably increased.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING directed attention to the item for the Training of Boys in Ships. In England there were 774 children for whom 6s. a-head per week was allowed, and in Scotland the number was 706, for whom the same rate of contribution was given by the State. But, so far as Ireland was concerned, not a shilling was allowed for industrial training in ships, because they had no training ship on the Irish coast. There was formerly such a ship at Kingstown, but it was removed, and remonstrances were made in consequence of its removal. Boys had to be sent a considerable distance to one of these training ships, and their parents were obliged to pay the expense of the journey. He wished to know from the Government why the ship had been removed from the port of Kingstown, and why Irish parents were denied facilities which were enjoyed by English and Scotch parents? Unless he received an explanation of this anomaly, he must move the reduction of the Vote by the sum which 6s. a-head per week for 774 boys would represent in the Estimates.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON believed that the ships in which these 774 boys were trained were at the charge of the local authorities, and the 6s. per head was a contribution in aid of the efforts of the local authorities. The same rule applied to Scotland. The local authorities in Ireland had not, he believed, attempted to establish this mode of industrial training. He supposed the hon. Member (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) referred to some training ships which were maintained on a totally different footing. There were three forms of industrial training—namely, the Reformatory, the Industrial School, and the Training Ship; and towards the cost of training the boys in these institutions the Government contributed, in certain proportions, towards local effort. With regard to the removal of the ship from its moorings at Kingstown, the hon. Member's Question on that point was one which his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. W. H. Smith) would be better able to answer. All that he could himself say on the subject was, that no Treasury grant applied to such a ship at Kingstown.

MR. PARNELL inquired when the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) proposed to report Progress?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON was reluctant to trespass upon the patience of the Committee, for they had been very industrious that evening; but he should like to conclude the English Votes before reporting Progress. There were two more Votes to consider.

MR. HIBBERT asked a question respecting the Extra Receipts which, in a Vote, were estimated at £5,500, to be obtained from Unions for the maintenance of Lunatic Patients. He was under the impression that all the patients in this Asylum, with perhaps a few exceptions, were criminal lunatics, and as such they should be paid for by the State, and not by the Unions. The charge made to Unions was no less than £60 for each lunatic. He wished to know whether a plan could not be adopted by which lunatics, not of a dangerous character, might be sent to the County Lunatic Asylums, where they could be retained at a cost of from £20 to £25 per head?

MR. RAMSAY complained of the excessive charge of £60 for every lunatic detained at Broadmoor, and compared it with the institution at Perth, where the cost did not exceed £28 a-head per annum. He contended that there was no reason why they should continue to support an institution like that at Broadmoor at such a high rate as £60 per head per annum; and, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department would do well to consider the suggestion of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) as to placing the bulk of the criminal lunatics in the ordinary County Asylums. Broadmoor compared unfavourably with Perth Asylum with regard to the charges incurred in the medical department, and there was no healthier establishment than that at Perth. He did not know how long the Committee were going to vote these annual sums, in support of extravagance, which benefited neither the criminal lunatics nor the community generally. Although he attached no especial value to anonymous communications, he had received one respecting the administration of affairs at Broadmoor Asylum which was worthy of consideration, because there was a prima facie case against the management of that institution. He hoped the Secretary of State for the Home Department would give the Committee some assurance that progress would be made in remedying the defects in the management.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, no more females were now sent to Broadmoor. The Asylum was only used at present for the detention of males. With regard to the question of construction, he thought Broadmoor Asylum was altogether a mistake. It had been built most extravagantly, and in such a form as rendered it almost impossible to make it economically useful. When the Estimates came in on a former occasion he sent them back, with the intimation that unless they were reduced he should not present them to the House. They had accordingly been reduced by £50,000. If they amounted to the same sum this year, he should return them again. That was the only way in which he could reduce the Estimates. Unless a sufficient reduction could be effected, he thought that Broadmoor had better be turned to some other use. It would hardly be possible to keep the inmates there at as small an expense as at Perth. With reference to the item of £5,500, which represented the receipts from Unions for the maintenance of patients, he feared he could not give, at that moment, the explanation desired by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert); but the sum received this year was, he believed, less than last.

MR. HIBBERT explained the purport of his previous remarks. If the persons detained were criminal lunatics, they ought to be paid for by the State, and not by the Unions; but if the time of their imprisonment had come to an end, and they still continued lunatic, though not of a dangerous character, then they might be remitted to the Unions from which they came.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that had constantly been done.

MR. RAMSAY had taken the trouble to visit Broadmoor Asylum, in company with a gentleman who had no superior as a judge of lunacy questions. Their opinion was that nothing in the form or construction of the building could render necessary or justifiable the great cost that had been incurred. Therefore, the sooner the Secretary of State for the Home Department submitted to the House a proposal to repeal the Act under which Broadmoor Asylum was established, the better.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL—[Bill 44.]

(The O'Connor Don, Mr. Richard Smyth, Mr. Charles Lewis, Mr. James Corry, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. Dease, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Radmond.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 29th May.]

(In the Committee.)

MR. O'SULLIVAN reminded the Committee that they were engaged all the previous day on this Bill, and thought that the promoters would not deny that the discussion upon it was fairly conducted. But there still remained six Amendments on the Paper to be discussed, and he would ask whether it was reasonable or fair that they should be asked, after 1 o'clock in the morning, to resume the consideration of a Bill of so much importance? He believed there never was a Bill which had received so large an amount of consideration at the hands of hon. Members on both sides of the House. The promoters first secured a day for themselves, they then got two days from the Government, and they induced their Friends to give them another day—making, in all, four days, which had been solely devoted to the discussion of this Bill. Yet the hon. Members who had charge of the measure were not satisfied without attempting to force it on at that hour in the morning. He was not prepared, however, to proceed with his Amendment then, and he begged leave to move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Sullivan.)

Mr. Ramsay

THE O'CONOR DON thought that his hon. Friend the Member for the County of Limerick had given the strongest possible reasons why they should proceed with the Bill. He had shown to them the great amount of time which had already been occupied in its discussion; and, therefore, he had taken away from himself and his Friends any ground whatever for objecting to making progress. It was perfectly true that the Bill had received an amount of consideration in Committee that very few measures of this character usually received. It had now been in Committee for a very long time; they had spent days and nights in its consideration; and unless the House were determined to throw away all the time that had been spent upon it, he thought it was perfectly evident that they must proceed with it even at such an hour as that at which they had arrived. The Amendments remaining on the Paper were very similar in character to those which had already been amply discussed; and, therefore, he must press upon the Committee to persevere and endeavour to get rid of the Bill once for all. He considered that when the supporters of the Bill accepted the proposal which came from their opponents, that it should be a temporary measure, they would not be met any longer with that kind of factious opposition which had detained them already so very long in the consideration of the measure.

MR. ONSLOW said, he could promise the hon. Member for Roscommon that if he intended to go on with the Bill that night, he would stay there as long as any Gentleman to oppose such a proceeding. He would appeal to the Committee whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not given every reasonable facility for the passing of the Bill this Session? Under these circumstances, was 20 minutes past 1 o'clock a proper hour at which to take the discussion of a measure of this vital importance? They had an ample discussion on the previous day; and although he, for one, did not think that very much progress had been made on that occasion, yet there were hon. Gentlemen opposite who thought otherwise, and he would ask them, therefore, to be satisfied, and not to press the Bill at that unearthly hour of the morning. He would appeal, in the greatest sincerity, to the hon.

Member for Roscommon to postpone the further consideration of the Bill in Committee until after Whitsuntide, when he could assure him that he, as an opponent of the measure, would give every consideration to it.

MR. FRENCH was sorry to have to oppose his hon. Friend and Colleague; but he did think it was unreasonable to ask the House to proceed at that hour with any Bill which was likely to give rise to a long discussion. There were some Amendments which had yet to be moved to the Bill, the discussion of which would occupy a long time, and he was not himself prepared at that moment to say whether he would vote for or against them. He would also remind his hon. Friend and Colleague that he had that day to bring forward a Motion in reference to a subject in which Irish Members took a great interest, and that was an additional reason why they should not go on with the Bill at the present time. If they attempted to proceed, it would only end—he was going to say in a squabble, but he believed that was not a Parliamentary expression—but in a wrangle, which would hardly reflect credit upon the House.

MR. R. POWER hoped that the hon. Member for Roscommon would not refuse to listen to the appeal of his hon. Colleague. Really, the promoters of the Bill had done a great many extraordinary things; but none had been more extraordinary than the bringing on a Bill of this description at half-past 1 o'clock in the morning. If the senior Member for Roscommon consulted his own interests, and particularly his health, he would not persevere in that course. The hon. Member had a most important Motion down on the Notice Paper for that day, and he was sure that it would take him two hours to explain fully to the House the various bearings of the very delicate question that was involved. If he forced this Bill on now he would not be in a position to do justice to that question. The first clause to be discussed was one which raised the whole principle of the Bill, and which would have to be discussed at great length. If they went on with this Bill, they would get into a most unseemly scrimmage. [An hon. MEMBER: Why?] He would tell the Committee why. Because there were a number of hon. Members who were determined that the Bill should not be proceeded with at that unseasonable hour, and they would continue to divide the House upon the Motions to report Progress, and that the Chairman leave the Chair. He was anxious that his constituents should know the opinions which he entertained on this question, and hon. Members were all aware that no reports were ever furnished to the papers of what occurred after half-past 12. He was reluctant, indeed, to waste his eloquence on the desert air. He observed that one-half the Members of the House were half asleep, and the other half ought to be asleep; and he would, therefore, really appeal to the good sense, the generosity, and the great constitutional principles which governed his hon. Friend's conduct in this matter, and ask him not to go on with the Bill at that hour of the morning. It would do no good to its supporters, and they might depend upon it that these proceedings after half-past 1 o'clock, did not tend to raise the House of Commons in the estimation of the country. He would appeal to his hon. Friend to consider this, and allow them to go home to bed quietly and soberly.

MR. BARING thought that hon. Gentlemen who asked the hon. Member for Roscommon to give way were asking the House to stultify itself. The House had, over and over again, by large majorities, expressed a decided opinion in favour of the Bill. It was of no use for hon. Members who opposed the Bill to say that they had new arguments to bring forward. Their arguments were worn threadbare. An hon. Member had just told them that the whole principle was to be discussed, as if they had not done that usque ad nauseam, and had not repeatedly affirmed the principle of the Bill. Did their opponents suppose that any arguments which they might now bring forward would induce the House to retract its opinion in regard to the measure? What they were asking them to do on the present occasion was to place themselves in a position which would reflect no honour upon them either in or outside the House.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped they would be permitted to proceed with the first Amendment, and when that was disposed of the Committee would consent to report Progress. He was by no means satisfied that his hon. Friends behind him would agree that he ought to make this proposition at the present stage; but this was not a reasonable hour at which to commence Business. He hoped hon. Members would agree that when the first clause was disposed of, Progress should be reported. If hon. Members would agree to that, he would vote against reporting Progress now, and would do his best to go on with Business.

COLONEL NAGHTEN said, that on behalf of "the front Opposition Bench," as the right hon. Member for Greenwich, who took so great an interest in this Bill, was unfortunately prevented from being present, he thought that was sufficient reason for reporting Progress.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he did not think it was treating the House fairly. [Several hon. MEMBERS: Go on, go on.] The new clause he had to move was as follows:—

"Total closing not to be carried out in any town or parish in Ireland until it is first ascertained by a vote of all the householders in each parish that the majority of the people are in favour of such total closing."

He did not suppose that those who had charge of the Bill would object to that clause coming on for discussion. He expected strong support from the advocates of the Bill. It was not a Permissive Bill, because this clause would give power to allow people to prevent its coming into operation by voting against it. It was contrary to the permissive principle; but, at the same time, his clause would give power to the people to say whether the Bill should come into operation or not. If the Committee thought fit to discuss this Amendment, he would propose to the hon. Member for Roscommon that Progress should then be reported.

New Clause, — (Mr. O'Sullivan),—brought up, and read the first time.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you leave the Chair. I should like the hon. Member for Roscommon to look at the Bill now and compare its present condition with what it was when he first introduced it. At that time it was a respectable-looking baby; but, contrary to all the laws of nature, it has become an absolute abortion, and it is his own Bill; for, miserable as it is, one of the chief supporters has denied all participation in its pater-nity. We never will allow this measure to pass. Nothing on earth will induce us to do so; and, if it were necessary, we propose remaining here until this day month, rather than suffer the measure to become law. I beg, Sir, to move that you do leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Major O'Gorman.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not persevere in the Motion that the Chairman leave the Chair. They ought not to persevere with the proposal of the hon. Member for County Limerick. They had already decided on the principle which the clause contained. The clause would allow to municipalities the right of taking themselves out of the operation of the Bill. It would be stultifying the Committee if the Committee were to give all the towns and parishes, as well as the municipalities, the power they had already refused to the latter. He had done everything he could to make the Bill a good one; but he was not going to do anything to stultify the Committee, and therefore he hoped the clause would be dealt with.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 106: Majority 88.—(Div. List, No. 160.)

Question put, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked, whether it was in Order to put the Question before there had been any debate upon the clause?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was not a point of Order, and he had put the Question properly.

MR. ONSLOW begged to move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would look over the Division List on this proposal, on the following morning, he would find that some of his greatest supporters had voted in favour of that being done. As one of the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman, he could assure him that he should use his humble efforts to prevent the Bill from passing. The Bill should never have been brought forward at all; and, considering the opposition which it had met with, and the concessions which its promoters had made, he thought the hon. Member for Roscommon might very well have said—"The Bill is not the same as that which I first introduced, and therefore I will withdraw it." He should endeavour to thwart the measure in all its future stages; and he appealed to hon. Gentlemen whether, in all these circumstances, it was advisable to go on with the Bill? Why cumbereth it the Session? Why not cut it down at once? Why ask hon. Members to stop up, night after night, discussing it, instead of allowing them to get home peaceably to their beds?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he certainly felt, with his hon. Friend who had just spoken, that it was a very good thing to get to bed; but he desired to point out to the hon. Gentleman, and to other hon. Members, what the position of the Government was with respect to the Bill, and what had happened in regard to it. The Bill was one which, in its original form, was adopted by a very large portion of Members from Ireland, and by a majority in the House. The Government felt themselves unable to accept the measure in the form in which it was thus presented; but, having regard to the manner in which it was supported, they undertook to consider it, and to propose certain Amendments which, if they were accepted by its promoters, would induce them to give such facilities as they reasonably could for the further progress of the Bill. Well, the Bill was introduced; the Amendments proposed by the Government were accepted; and the measure had been gone on with since that time. It had been very fully discussed, and discussed, no doubt, at considerable inconvenience to some hon. Members. He mentioned that as a proof that, at all events, a large number of hon. Gentlemen were anxious to carry the Bill. He did not say that there was any undue interference with the proceedings of the House, when hon. Gentlemen sat up night after night for the purpose of promoting a certain measure; but their doing so certainly showed that they took a deep interest in the Bill which was under consideration. Well, the advocates of this measure had not only accepted the Amendments which had been originally proposed by the Government, but they had also accepted a very important Amendment which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowther) had advised them to adopt, limiting the operation of the Act to a certain number of years. Under these circumstances, and having arrived at this stage, he did not think that anyone could fairly find fault with the promoters of the Bill for endeavouring to conduct it in such a manner as they considered best. On the one hand, he was afraid that he was not in a position to offer them very much in the way of facilities; and, on the other hand, he did not feel that he had any right to interfere with their liberty of judgment as to the way in which they should proceed with the Bill in its remaining stages. He would suggest, if he might, to hon. Members who intended to propose new clauses or Amendments that, instead of delaying, it would be more reasonable on their part to move those clauses or Amendments at the present stage, so that the opinion of the Committee might at once be taken upon them. Or, if they did not do so now, they might reserve to themselves the right of doing it on Report. He certainly thought it was not at all to be wondered at that the promoters of the Bill, having gone through so much, and having been supported by a large number of Members in bringing the measure to the point which it had now reached, should be anxious to proceed with it and to carry it forward.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA deprecated the adoption of such a course as that of merely proposing dilatory Motions to the effect that the Chairman should report Progress, or that the Chairman should leave the Chair. At the same time, he hoped that, after the Amendment which stood next on the Paper had been dealt with, the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) would consent to Progress being reported.

MR. SHAW said, that so far as he was concerned he was disposed to make a concession to the hon. Member for Roscommon, if the hon. Gentleman would make a concession to him. At the same time, he did not hesitate to say that the hon. Member had acted very fairly in making concessions during the progress of the Bill, and he did not think that, in that respect, the opponents of the measure had any ground whatever for complaint. He had an Amendment on the Paper; but he was perfectly willing to withdraw it at the present stage, and bring it up on Report, if the hon. Gentleman could give him any assurance that Report would come on at such a time that the proposition could be fairly discussed. It had been said, however, that Report would be put down for the first day after the Whitsuntide Recess, and that he regarded as quite unreasonable. Those for whom he spoke had no wish to prolong discussion on the Bill. They could now do but little good by sitting up in the House night after night and debating it. The only two Amendments of any consequence which remained to be disposed of, were that of which he had given Notice and that which the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. P. J. Smyth) had placed upon the Paper with regard to compensation; and, as he had already indicated, if any assurance could be given in respect to time, he would be willing to reserve his Amendment until the Report.

MR. ONSLOW said, he desired to ease the minds of any hon. Members who might be troubled with reference to the Report. It was his intention to move, when the Report came on, that it should be considered that day three months. He considered that it was quite unjustifiable to ask the Committee to continue sitting at that hour of the morning (10 minutes past 2 o'clock), for the purpose of endeavouring to make some progress with the Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER hoped that the hon. Member who was in charge of the Bill would, when he thought of the interests which were at stake, see his way to affording an assurance that due Notice would be given, in order that there might be a fair discussion on Report.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he could not really understand these appeals which were made to him. An appeal had been made to him on a previous occasion, to the effect that if he consented to make this a temporary measure, further opposition to it would be withdrawn. ["No!"] He had consented to the principle of the Amendment which had been proposed in that direction; but he had only done so to find that, instead of the concession having any effect, he now met with the same opposition as before. His hon. Friend talked of his naming a day for the Report, as if he had at his disposal the remaining days of the Session. The day when the Report might be taken was not a matter within his discretion. He could not, except by consent, bring it on after half-past 12 o'clock; but, the Bill having met with such persistent and consistent opposition, its promoters had no other resource open to them than that of endeavouring to take advantage of whatever chance they could get. Hon. Gentlemen could stop Report being proceeded with after the hour he had mentioned; and they knew what likelihood there was, until the Government gave the promoters of the Bill another day, of it coming on at an earlier hour. In these circumstances, he could only tell his hon. Friends distinctly that, whenever he found an opportunity of bringing it forward, he should feel obliged to take advantage of that opportunity. What good, however, could possibly result from these constant wrangles in the early hours of the morning? So far, the concessions which he had made had not had the slightest effect in reducing the opposition to the Bill; and, at the present moment, he did not know that there was any real offer before him. If his hon. Friends would say that they would allow the Bill to pass through its remaining stages, and be reported to the House, then that would be some ground for asking him not to take advantage of every chance which might be afforded him of getting on with the measure; but, so far as he understood, there was no such proposal before him or the Committee.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that while he had suggested at a previous Sitting that the operation of the Act should be limited to a certain number of years, he had done so upon the merits of the proposition itself, and not in connection with any supposed understandings or agreements respecting other portions of the Bill, of which he had no cognizance, and which were not then before the Committee. As to the remarks that had just been made respecting the fact that he (Mr. J. Lowther) had not taken part in the last, or, in fact, it might have been added, all the recent divisions, he must enter a protest against the doctrine it was attempted thus to lay down—namely, that by the granting of facilities in respect of time which the Government had loyally carried out, they were bound, also, to record their votes in favour of a Bill for which they were in no sense responsible; and he must emphatically protest that he could not be expected to be attached to the triumphal car of the hon. Member for Roscommon at all hours of the morning, and to walk through the Lobbies in constant divisions upon a measure of which he had frequently expressed his disapproval. With regard to the proposal of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw), he did not understand that hon. Gentleman to wish any specific day mentioned for consideration of the Report on the Bill. What he understood the hon. Member to object to was a particular day on which he did not think the Report ought to be taken up; and that was the first day after the Recess. It would be unreasonable to expect the hon. Member for Roscommon to name a day when the Report would be dealt with. That hon. Gentleman had not command of the time or the arrangements of the House.

MR. SHAW said, he had intended to point out that it was not advisable to take the Report before the expiration of a certain period. There would be but a short Recess; Irish Members had long distances to go, and they had a good deal of business to attend to within a limited period.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he had exerted himself on the previous day with the hon. Member for Roscommon in order, if possible, to meet the views of the more reasonable section of the opponents of the Bill; but now, whenever a compromise was suggested, the latter hon. Gentlemen appeared to be desirous of having it all their own way. There were surely two sides to a compromise; and if the supporters of the Bill mentioned a day, as a matter of fact, before which the Report would not be taken, would there be an undertaking given, on the part of its opponents, that the threat of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) would not be carried out? If no such undertaking were forthcoming, and if the advocates of the measure were to be met with implacable opposition, there was no course open to those who supported the Bill except to push the measure forward by every means in their power, and thereby vindicate their own self-respect and the position and honour of the House.

MR. SHAW could only say what he had said before; and, in doing so, he spoke for himself alone. As far as his Amendment went, he was now willing to take it off the Paper and to bring it on upon Report, and he would strongly recommend other hon. Members to adopt a similar course. At such an hour as that it did not appear to him that there was any prospect or possibility of discussing Amendments with any degree of satisfaction.

MR. ONSLOW said, that the remarks which he had made appeared to have been somewhat misunderstood. All he had intended to say was that it was his purpose to oppose the Bill on Report.

MR. DICKSON suggested that the opponents of the measure should allow the Bill to pass through Committee that night, on the understanding that the discussion on the remaining new clauses should be taken on the Report, and that the Report itself should not be proceeded with before the 17th of June. On such an understanding as this, the measure might now be reported pro forma.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he regarded the proposal of the hon. Member as very reasonable, and he hoped that it would be agreed to.

MR. ONSLOW said, that on the distinct understanding that those who objected to the Bill would have an opportunity of opposing it on Report, he asked leave to withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday, 17th June.

TENANT RIGHT (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 31.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MACARTNEY said, that this measure was one of great importance to Ireland. He had given Notice of two new clauses which it was his intention to move; but the Committee could not be expected to discuss them at that late hour. Moreover, the Irish Members had all left the House under the impression that the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill did not intend to bring it on. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the noble Lord would allow Progress to be reported.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW also trusted that the Committee would agree to Progress being reported. He had two Amendments to bring forward which really touched the principle of the Bill.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next.

THE GERMAN NAVY—DESTRUCTION OF THE IRON-CLAD "DER GROSSER KURFÜRST."—QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked the noble Lord who represented the Admiralty in that House, Whether he could give their Lordships any information as to the reported loss of a German ironclad?

LORD ELPHINSTONE: I am sorry not to be in a position to give a full statement of details with regard to this unfortunate loss to the German Navy. The facts are simply these—The German iron-clad Squadron, consisting of the Prussen, König Wilhelm, and Grosser Kurfürst, left Wilhelmshavn on the evening of the 29th instant, for Plymouth, en route to the Mediterranean. The Squadron was observed passing Dover at 8.45 A.M.; and at 9.50 A.M., when about seven miles S.S.W. of Folkestone, a collision took place between the König Wilhelm and the Grosser Kurfürst in the endeavour to avoid a collision with a merchant vessel. The Grosser Kurfürst appears to have sunk at once, and the König Wilhelm to have been severely damaged. The Coastguard at Folkestone and Sandgate rendered immediate assistance; and, on the unfortunate occurrence being reported to the Admiralty, orders were sent to Portsmouth for the Lord Warden and Hercules to proceed to Folkestone at full speed to assist the König Wilhelm, and a powerful tug was also ordered from Sheerness for the same object. The Coastguard officers reported that between 180 and 200 of the crew have been saved, and about 300 lives lost. Orders have been sent to Portsmouth for dock accommodation to be prepared for the König Wilhelm, and she is now on her way to that port. She is reported to be making water fast. The Grosser Kurfürst is like our Monarch; tonnage, 6,663; guns, four 10-inch Krupp, in two turrets. The König Wilhelm is a broadside iron-clad frigate; tonnage, 9,425; guns, 26 Krupp.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, if it be not regarded as presumptuous in one who for 40 years was politically connected with the late Earl Russell in Parliament, I would ask a Question of which I have given private Notice to the noble Earl the First Lord of the Treasury. It is, Whether Lord Russell's political and personal claims are such that the public would not be unwilling to make some recognition of the services of so distinguished a statesman whose name has so long been associated with the political history of the country? I have reason to believe that Her Majesty's Government, sympathizing with that feeling, have anticipated the purpose of my inquiry, and that there have been some communications—I do not know precisely what they have been—with the family of the deceased Earl. Perhaps the noble Earl the First Lord of the Treasury will state to the House what has been the nature of those communications, and what has been their result?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, Her Majesty, and Her Majesty's Government, felt they were only expressing the general feeling of the nation, when they offered that the interment of that great statesman whom we have lost should be public, and that he should be buried in the shadow, as it were, of that venerable Abbey where in youth he was educated, and where the greater part of his eminent career was passed. It was, of course, impossible to come to any decision on the subject without making ourselves acquainted with the feelings of his family, and with the desire, were it expressed, of the departed himself. I will not say I regret it, because I am sure the result has been brought about by sentiments and considerations with which we must all sympathize, and which all of us must respect; but, within the last few minutes, I have been authoritatively informed that the widow of this illustrious man declines the public mark of the veneration of the Nation, in consequence of the express declaration in the will of Earl Russell that he should be buried with his family and ancestors at Chenies, in Buckinghamshire.

TELEGRAPHS BILL—(No. 77.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was a simple one—namely, to determine the rights of the Post Office in respect of the establishment of telegraphic lines on undertakings authorized by special Act of Parliament, to lay down regulations in respect of compensation and fine for injury to telegraphic lines of the Post Office, and to provide for other such matters. He thought it right to bring in the Bill, in consequence of a wish expressed in their Lordships' House last year that such legislation should be embraced in a general Act rather than in special clauses of particular Acts of Parliament.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

TRURO BISHOPRIC BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to make provision respecting the foundation of a Dean and Chapter for the Bishopric of Truro, and the transfer to the Cathedral Church of Truro of a Canonry in the Cathedral Church of Exeter; and for other purposes connected therewith—Was presented by The Lord Bishop of London; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 103.)

PRIVATE BILLS.

QUESTIONS.

NAVY—NAVIGATING OFFICERS. QUESTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any (and if any, what) steps have been taken or are in contemplation to do justice to the old navigating officers of the Royal Navy, now that the navigating duties have been thrown open to all executive officers, and thus young navigating sub-lieutenants become on promotion the seniors of navigating staff captains and commanders, under whom such lieutenants had only recently served and acquired the knowledge of their duties.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I am hardly able to admit that the old navigating officers are suffering under the injustice suggested in this Question. No right or privilege has been taken away from them, and the Admiralty is careful not to place old navigating officers under the command of young officers who have been subordinate to them as navigating officers before promotion. The case of the navigating officers is now under consideration, and the interests of the older navigating officers will be duly considered.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—AGRICULTURAL MODEL SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD POWER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he is aware that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have discontinued several of the Agricultural Model Schools throughout Ireland, and advertised for sale the buildings and farms used for the purposes of agricultural instruction; and can he state under what circumstances and for what reasons such course has been taken by the Commissioners?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, this is a subject which does not come within the jurisdiction of the Irish Government, as sales of the farms have been carried out by the National Board of Education, under instructions from the Treasury. This course is in accordance with the Treasury Departmental Committee, of which the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. W. H. Gladstone) acted as Chairman, which inquired into the National Board during the years 1873 and 1874. With regard to the reasons which are advanced for these sales, I may say that these farms were originally instituted for the purpose of affording instruction in good farming throughout the country. The expectation that they would effect that object, unfortunately, has not been fulfilled, and the scheme, having proved a failure, has been abandoned.

INDIA—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT. QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS asked the Under Secretary of State for India,

Whether it will be possible to submit to the House his annual Financial Statement at an earlier period of the Session than has been usual in former years?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, that at the present moment it would be impossible for him to say when the state of Public Business would admit of his introducing the Indian Budget. He was sorry not to be able to give a more definite answer; but he might remind the hon. Gentleman that twice during the present Session there had been full and very interesting discussions on Indian Finance.

ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICE RE-ORGANIZATION BILL—CLERKS OF ROYAL ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.
QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Civil Clerks of the Royal Engineer Department are to be included as regards superannuation in the terms offered to War Office Clerks; and, if not, if he will state on what grounds those clerks are deemed not to form a branch of the War Office, nor to come under the operation of the Superannuation Act?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, the clerks of the Engineer Department are not included in the Admiralty and War Office Re-organization Bill. The circumstances of the reduction in the Engineer Department are wholly different from those in the two Offices named in the Bill. The number of clerks in the Engineer Department to be reduced is comparatively small, and the retirement, in their case, will not be compulsory. Even had it been otherwise, the scale of compensation would certainly not have been applied to them. The unit of extra compensation was fixed with reference, among other things, to the loss of prospect which compulsory abolition of office entailed, and it does not follow that the same unit would be adopted for an Office in which the maximum pay is £270, as in one the maximum of which is £800.

THE GERMAN NAVY—DESTRUCTION OF THE IRON-CLAD “DER GROSSER KURFÜRST.”—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether any detailed information had been received respecting the loss of the German iron-clad “Grosser Kurfürst?”

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I am sorry to say that the news which has appeared in the newspapers with regard to the loss of a fine German ship this morning in the Channel, is correct. The German iron-clad Squadron, consisting of the Preussen, König Wilhelm, and Grosser Kurfürst, left Wilhelmshavn on the evening of the 29th instant, for Plymouth, en route to the Mediterranean. The squadron was observed passing Dover at 8.45 A.M.; and at 9.50 A.M., when about seven miles S.S.W. of Folkestone, a collision occurred between the König Wilhelm and the Grosser Kurfürst in an endeavour to avoid a collision with a merchant vessel. The Grosser Kurfürst appears to have sunk at once, and the König Wilhelm to have been severely damaged. The Coastguard at Folkestone rendered immediate assistance; and, on the unfortunate occurrence being reported to the Admiralty, orders were sent to Portsmouth for the Lord Warden and Hercules to proceed to Folkestone at full speed to render assistance. The tug Sampson was also ordered from Sheerness for the same object. The Coastguard officers report that between 180 and 200 lives have been saved, and about 300 lost. A dock will be ready at Portsmouth, and the König Wilhelm is on her way to that port making water fast.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND).
RESOLUTION.

THE O’CONOR DON, in rising to call attention to the condition of University Education in Ireland, and to move—

“That in the opinion of this House, the present condition of University Education in Ireland is most unsatisfactory, and demands the immediate attention of Parliament with the view of extending more generally and equally the benefits of such education,” said, he thought that no apology was needed either for the subject to which he desired to direct the attention of the House, or for the mode in which he asked the House to express its opinion. As a rule, he was not an advocate of abstract Resolutions; but he felt that, from various circumstances, it was necessary for him to raise the question in that form. The Resolution characterized the present condition of Irish University education as most unsatisfactory, and probably no hon. Member would maintain that it was satisfactory; for, if it were so, the conduct of previous Parliaments and Governments would have been wholly unjustifiable. During the last 20 years, there had been scarcely a Government in Office that had not practically admitted that the condition of University education in Ireland was unsatisfactory, and required to be dealt with. Within his own Parliamentary memory, he had seen three successive Governments attempt to deal with the question, and admit that it was one that required to be dealt with. If all the attempts and failures in connection with the question were taken into account, they would, he thought, show that if there were difficulties in dealing with it, it at all events required to be taken into consideration. In order to prove that the grievance existed, he need not go further back than the date of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) in introducing his Irish University Bill. All who heard that speech were carried away by its magic eloquence, and it was believed that the great master mind which had settled the Irish Church and Land questions was about to settle also the University question. It was never imagined that five years afterwards the question would be in precisely the same position as then. He had no desire to enter at any length into a consideration of the causes which led to the failure of the attempt made by the late Government to settle this question. He believed that in introducing their Bill they were actuated by the best intentions. The blame as to the failure of that measure had been placed on the shoulders of the Irish Roman Catholics. Those who had pursued that course were scarcely justified in the view they had thus expressed. When the Bill was introduced, they all believed that it would not only pass that House, but that it would give satisfaction to Ireland. He might say, that for some considerable time afterwards there was an intention on the part of great numbers who had hitherto advocated the cause of the Roman Catholics in this particular question to give the Bill a fair and candid support. A very great disappointment certainly did seize them when they came to consider the Bill apart from the magic eloquence with which it was introduced. When they were asked to record their votes, they were asked, in the words of his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, to record them in favour of a measure for extending and strengthening the principle of secular and mixed education, and not in favour of removing an injustice and inequality of which they had complained. The Government later on, on that night, instead of repudiating this statement, practically endorsed it. They therefore found themselves compelled to vote against the Bill, and against a principle which could not give satisfaction to Ireland. Whether they acted wisely or foolishly, the fact still remained that the Roman Catholics of Ireland still laboured under the disadvantage and injustice. If he asked the House to consider what had since been done, what answer could be given? If must be simply "Nothing." It would be idle to imagine that the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), dealing with the constitution and government of Trinity College, could in any way be said to remove the injustice and grievances, the existence of which was admitted. He hardly thought that his hon. Friend himself would hold such an argument. If the principle involved in the Bill was carried out in practice and at once, it would not in any way meet the grievance of which he now complained. It would simply amount to establishing in Ireland another secular College and University. Nothing had been done in satisfaction of the request made in 1873. After the change in the Administration, mainly in consequence of the defeat of the measure, a feeling of despair seemed to come over the Irish people with regard to the question. The Government, which succeeded to Office mainly in consequence of the failure of their Predecessors to deal with this question, perhaps very wisely, but not very boldly, elected to leave it alone.

But grievances of the description which had been proved to exist in 1873 could not rest long without being brought before the public, and the Irish Members came to the conclusion that they ought not to bring this question before the House without being in a position to lay before the House some plan of their own. Several Governments had attempted, but had failed, to deal with the question, and they felt bound to lay before the Government some scheme which would meet the requirements of the case. Accordingly, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) was requested to take the matter up and to lay a scheme before the House. There were few men in Ireland more capable of dealing with this subject than his hon. and learned Friend, who was himself a distinguished member of the University of Dublin, and who thoroughly understood what University education ought to be, and also what the Roman Catholics of Ireland might justly claim. His hon. and learned Friend placed before the House the year before last, in a most convincing speech, a Bill which proved that he had given to its consideration all the force of his great mind. Certain Amendments having been made, the Bill was again introduced last year, when a very interesting debate took place; but the Government objected to the Bill, without giving any indication of their own intentions on the subject, and it was summarily rejected. In these circumstances, what course was open to the Irish Members but the one he now ventured to ask the House to adopt? To introduce such a Bill again, or any other Bill, would be merely trifling with the subject, and the Irish Members were determined that this question should not any longer be trifled with. They were determined that if equality be not established by recognized institutions of which the public could conscientiously avail themselves, it must be established in some other way. If they were not to have concurrent endowment, they must have disendowment, and if they were not to have equality by levelling up, they must have equality by levelling down, and that resolution had already shown itself in the action of the Irish Members this Session. The action which they would feel bound to take might, perhaps, be disagreeable; but they were determined to press upon Englishmen the injustice and inequality from which they suffered. What was the condition of Irishmen in regard to University education? He would refer to the most convincing speech of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, who told them in 1873 that there were 145 Catholic students in Arts in the whole of Ireland—namely, 100 at Trinity College and 45 at the Queen's Universities; and that, although the Catholics numbered three-fourths of the population of the country, they only furnished one-eighth the students in Arts. He was quite ready to admit, in a poor country like Ireland, they might expect that a great many students would be looking to advance themselves in different professions; but the right hon. Member for Greenwich had pointed out that, taking the whole course of University training, the condition of the Irish Roman Catholics with regard to University education was of a most miserable description, there being only 784 students in all classes, compared with about 4,000 in Scotland, although the population of Ireland was nearly double that of Scotland. That was the state of affairs in 1873. But the condition of things had not improved since then, for it appeared from a Return furnished this year, that the total number of Roman Catholic students in Arts on the books of the three Universities were—Belfast, 1; Cork, 23; Galway, 24; making 48 in all; and that the number of degrees conferred upon Roman Catholic students in Arts during the past 10 years was only 72. He quite admitted that in a country like Ireland they ought not to look solely to the course of Arts in forming an estimate of the educational acquirements of the people. He therefore extended his researches to all branches of University training. And what did he find? During the past 10 years only 218 Roman Catholic students had received a degree of any description whatever in the Queen's University—that was to say, an average of about seven each year to each College. He asked the House to consider whether that was a satisfactory state of things in these Colleges, which were established expressly to meet the wants of Roman Catholic students. Coming to the purely mercantile view of the question, he would ask the House to remember that there were hundreds of young men growing up every year and passing the time when they should receive educational assistance. Who could be surprised if, seeing themselves placed at a disadvantage, as compared with Protestants, on account of their religious convictions, these young men were embittered against the institutions of the country? He believed that the refusal of that House to deal with the question in the past arose from an unreasonable fear of ecclesiastical influence. 'In point of fact, however, they had not succeeded in inducing the Roman Catholic youth of Ireland to go into the only institutions which they had left open to them. The end which they had in view, no doubt, was that the youth of that country should receive a University education in those institutions which hon. Gentlemen thought best, and which were conducted on principles of which they approved; but they had been trying for hundreds of years to induce the youth of Ireland to obtain their education in those places, and the result of all their efforts had been either that young men did not receive education at all in them, or that they procured it elsewhere under the most exclusively ecclesiastical control which could well be imagined. He asked any reasonable and sensible man to consider whether that was a wise course to pursue. How could hon. Gentlemen suppose that by following out such a course they would in any way weaken that ecclesiastical influence of which they appeared to have such dread? Why, the adoption of such a course was of all others that which was most calculated to defeat the ends they had in view, and, instead of leading to that independence of mind which they desired, and which they thought would be interfered with if they recognized the just wishes and claims of those of whom he spoke, would actually force upon Ireland that which they themselves thought would be disastrous to her. For centuries they had tried a system of persecution in Ireland, and endeavoured by force to separate the Irish laity from the Irish clergy. Yet the result was, that at the present day there existed no country in the world where ecclesiastical influence was so strong. It was a great mistake—a mistake which had always been made in regard to Irish education, alike in its University branch and all others—for Parliament to endeavour to protect Irish Catholics from their ecclesiastical superiors against their will, for the consequence of the attempt would be exactly opposite to that which Englishmen desired. Let the House treat the Irish Catholic laity as sensible and reasonable men; let it leave them to deal with the questions which might arise between their clergy and themselves; and in that way a feeling of independence would spring up which could never be created if they were to be treated as children. So long as that House treated them as children, they would find them a discontented, dissatisfied, and rebellious people. That was the result of the course of conduct carried on by successive Governments. The House had been impelled, by the insane fear of ecclesiastical influence, to refuse what they otherwise would grant. If hon. Members could get rid of this, the thing would be settled. He did not for a moment suppose that the Catholic Hierarchy of Ireland desired to establish a dominant or unjust influence over education, and even if they entertained such a desire, he did not believe they would be able to give effect to it. The Bishops were far too rational and sensible to desire such a thing. As a matter of fact, they had not attempted to prevent the spread of knowledge in those educational institutions over which they had absolute influence. For example, he had often heard addresses delivered by the students of the Catholic University on St. Stephen's Green, Dublin; and, if he had any fault to find with those addresses, it was that they went rather too far in the sense of independence. Undoubtedly, the Roman Catholic Hierarchy had a right to a certain amount of influence. In questions of faith and morals they had the right to interfere, and the Catholics of Ireland were determined not to send their children to any educational institution in which that right was not recognized. As an acknowledged grievance and injustice existed, it was the duty of Parliament now, just as much as it ever had been, to deal with it; and hon. Members could release themselves from the responsibility, by pointing out that a course which they deemed unwise was taken by those who formerly represented Ireland in the Imperial Parliament. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the present condition of University Education in Ireland is most unsatisfactory, and demands the immediate attention of Parliament with the view of extending more generally and equally the benefits of such education,"—(The O'Conor Don,)

MR. LOWE said, that the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Conor Don), in his very interesting and moderate speech, had given an account of the causes which had led to the resignation of the late Government. The causes, as far as he (Mr. Lowe) understood them, were simply these. The late Government attempted to found a system of mixed University education, so that Protestants and Catholics should not be educated at different Universities. They failed in persuading the House to adopt that system, and the hon. Gentleman said that he and his Friends had some share in that result. But there was little use in dwelling on that matter now. At all events, he rejoiced and always should rejoice, that the then Government had the courage to grapple with the question. No question was more worthy of its consideration, and if they lost Office on that account, he could not imagine their losing it in a better cause.

"'Tis better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all."

He had himself spoken on the subject last year; but, in order to evince, as far as he could, his hearty good-will in this matter, and his desire to see something done as far as might be in the direction in which the hon. Member wished to go, he would like to say a few words on the question before the House. He thought the case of Ireland was hardly fairly stated, when they spoke only of the difficulties of University education. The hon. Member would hardly deny that the difficulty lay deeper still, that it went lower down. University education was the completion and the finishing of the edifice, and pre-supposed that a great deal had been done before that education began. Now, one of the greatest wants of Ireland was the want of secondary education, the want of good schools throughout the country in which the youth could be trained, so that they might come properly qualified to the University. He believed that the first step, therefore, which should be taken was, not to found any new University, even if they could do it, but to lay the foundation, if it could be managed, of thoroughly good and sound secondary schools before dealing with University education. The difficulty was that those schools did not exist; and, in his opinion, there was this further difficulty, that it was almost impossible for Government directly to found them. It was with this as with other things, people worked just as they were obliged to do so, and in proportion as they were relieved from the necessity of working they neglected to work. The wise way to promote secondary education in Ireland would be, not for Government to put its hand into its pocket to found secondary schools, for the effect of that would be that those schools would rely from their foundation too much on Government support, and would become lazy and inefficient. All educational institutions thrive just in proportion as they had strong motives for teaching to the best of their power. Anything they did to interfere with that motive would do great mischief, instead of promoting the end in view. That being so, what were they to do? The Motion of the hon. Gentleman was so carefully guarded and so moderately worded, that he would not have the least difficulty in voting for it, and he could not imagine that many Members of the House would have any difficulty in doing so. But he feared that voting for this Resolution would not promote very much the object in view, unless some practical plan were hit on. Last year, they had a plan that a Catholic University should be founded and endowed out of moneys received from the disestablishment of the Irish Church—he believed it was proposed that £440,000 should be appropriated to that object. He did not wish to enter into any sectarian dispute on the subject; but the hon. Member for Roscommon and his Friends must be perfectly well aware that if the present Government were ever so willing to do anything of the kind, it would be perfectly impossible to carry any such measure through the House. It would be only running their heads against a wall even more disastrously than the late Government had done. It was really not worth while arguing the question; but everyone who knew the state of feeling in England, Scotland, and a part of Ireland, must know that if any Government, constituted as this Government was, were to attempt to carry such a measure, it would be surely running upon its own destruction. Well, then, what could be done? Something, which he took the liberty of urging last year, and he apologized to the House for doing so again—it was that they should recur to what was part of the plan of the Government four years ago, that they should take so much of the plan as involved no sectarian difficulty. The late Government failed, because they tried to unite Catholics and Protestants in one system under a mixed Board. It was of little use to ask any Government either to renew that scheme, or to found out of public funds a purely Catholic University. He would not argue whether it would be good or bad to found such a University in Ireland; all he said was, that it was not in the power of that House to do so. What they should endeavour to do was to make it worth people's while to found these secondary schools, by offering such prizes and endowments as would induce parents to send their children to them. What they could not do directly, they might do indirectly. Having got rid of the difficulty of teaching, they should have an examination for young men, and Government should be willing to supply very liberally funds and rewards for those students who might have shown fair proficiency in their examinations, so that by scholarships they might be enabled to go to whatever University their parents might select for them; and, when they came to be examined for their degree, they should act with equal liberality, and give those young men, who showed that they had acquired a sufficient mastery of the subjects in which they were examined, exhibitions, or something of the kind, lasting for seven or eight years, which would enable such young men to get a fair start in life. This plan would not only be a great advantage to poor and deserving young men, but it would have another advantage almost as great, because, as soon as it was known that there were these prizes to be obtained, there would be a strong desire among the parents to have their sons thoroughly well grounded; and thus, without getting into any trouble about religion, or saying whether education in Ireland was to be mixed or not, but simply by rewarding young men, who had shown themselves to be possessed of a proper amount of knowledge, they would raise up a large class of secondary schools in Ireland. If there was any chance of hon. Gentlemen being able to work out any of their schemes for University education, he would not have troubled the House with these remarks. But, as they were going on from year to year with woeful retrospects, without a hope or a chance of anything being done, he did put it to Irish Gentlemen, whether it was not wiser to grasp what was in their reach, than to go on year after year proposing schemes that could not be granted, and mourning over grievances which it was out of their power to remedy? Surely, such a course would be wiser than to go on urging what could never be granted, and thus embittering those feelings of animosity and hatred between the two countries which had prevailed so long? No man was more anxious than he was to do what was possible for the promotion of Irish education, and no man would rejoice more sincerely to see something really practical effected without either Party obtaining a triumph over the other.

MR. BLENNERHASSETT: No one can have heard the speech in which my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) brought this question before the House without feeling that that hon. Member, representing, as he may fairly claim to do, the Roman Catholic opinion of Ireland upon it, approached the subject in a practical and moderate spirit. His object evidently was not to magnify, or to expatiate upon a grievance, but to make a solid and earnest contribution to the discussion of a question of great importance and of no little difficulty. In the same spirit, though approaching the subject from a somewhat different point of view, I am desirous, if the House will permit me, to make a few remarks. The position of the great Catholic population of Ireland in relation to this question has been clearly defined by my hon. Friend who is able to speak with all the authority of a trusted exponent of Catholic opinion. He will have performed no slight service if he has enabled the House to thoroughly grasp and comprehend the attitude of the Irish Catholic mind in relation to this matter. But the religious aspect of the question—important as it is—is only one side of it. Apart from the distinctive feelings and interests of members of the Roman Catholic Church, there are considerations involved in it which are of the utmost magnitude and importance—considerations of national welfare and advancement which appeal every whit as strongly to Protestants as to any Catholic in Ireland; considerations of liberal culture and academic reform which commend the subject to the earnest attention of every friend of education without distinction of creed or party; and considerations of freedom, of conscience, and reasonable liberty, which strike deep down to the very foundation of the principles on which our public policy is founded. With every one of these aspects of the question, the religious difficulty is mixed and intertwined. Still, it is by no means necessary to approach the subject from the point of view of any particular school of religious opinion to grasp those broad and clear principles of equal justice and respect for conscientious conviction, by the light of which alone we shall be able to see our way through the difficulties which encompass it. These difficulties have hitherto proved insuperable. One attempt, especially, to grapple with them, undertaken from the highest motives and with generous intentions, has had a disastrous result to those who staked the fortunes of an Administration on its success. It has been said since then that this is a question which no Government and no Party will venture to touch, and which is destined to remain a monument of our unwillingness or incompetence to legislate on an Irish question of first-rate importance. I cannot think that this conclusion will be adopted by Parliament or sanctioned by public opinion. The greater the difficulty the greater the glory. Many a success is only the last term of what has looked like a series of failures. It would be a reproach to the statesmanship of our time to acquiesce in the continuance of a state of things which is indefensible, mischievous, and unjust. Nor would the solution of the Irish University question be difficult if the only possible conditions of its settlement were recognized and boldly acted upon. The hon. Member for Roscommon has pointed out the effect of the existing state of University Institutions on higher education in Ireland. It is beyond dispute that the great body of Irish Roman Catholics are excluded from the intellectual and material advantages of University training and degrees, by the fact that there is no Institution in their country possessed of academic powers which is in harmony with their conscientious convictions and their sense of religious duty. The 4,141,000 Catholics of Ireland furnish, taking the average of the last few years, about 300 University students as against 1,800, or six times as many furnished by the 1,214,000 Protestants, a disproportion which would be still greater, if we were to confine the comparison to those receiving University education in its higher and stricter sense of training in Arts. I do not want to push this comparison too far. Let us only get at the facts of the case. I readily admit that from various causes it is not to be expected that the Roman Catholic population can supply University students in anything like an equal proportion with the Protestant. Too many of them are necessarily beyond the natural range of such education. All that is requisite for my argument is, that I should be able to show that the number of Roman Catholic students receiving University education is, both absolutely and relatively to the Protestants, so insignificant as to indicate the practical exclusion of their body. To anyone acquainted with the actual facts of Irish life, and having a knowledge of the condition and feelings of the people, it would be a mere waste of time to advance proofs in support of so obvious a conclusion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) has attempted, by a skilful manipulation of figures, to show that in the University-going classes of Ireland, the Catholics are to the Protestants in the proportion of about one to four. It has been pointed out, however, that in the calculation on which the right hon. Gentleman's conclusion is based, large University-going classes, in which Catholics immensely preponderate, have been omitted; and, also, that sufficient weight has not been given to the circumstance that in Ireland an unusually large proportion of candidates for University education are drawn from the ranks of the lower middle class. The actual fact, however, is that, including those who are merely receiving a professional training in law, medicine, or engineering, the Catholic students are to the Protestant, not even as one to four, but only as one to six, while among students in Arts, they are only as one to eight. The deficiency of Catholic students has been attributed to the number of young men devoted to preparation for the priesthood. But what ground have we for assuming that many of these young men would not gladly avail themselves of the advantages of regular University training, provided they were able to do so in an Institution approved of by their spiritual guides?—

DEATH OF MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: Sir, I rise to Order. A circumstance has occurred which has cast a gloom over the House. It is within the knowledge of hon. Members of the House that one of its number lies dead in the Library, and I do not think it is respectful or right, under these circumstances, to proceed further with the Business. I, therefore, beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING: I was only anticipated by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wexford, but in the presence of my honoured Leader the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) I should have thought it gross presumption on my part to rise without having consulted him; but, having done so, I feel that I am only expressing the unanimous feeling of all Irish Members present when I say that they consider this debate ought not to proceed further. However deeply interested every Irish Member must be in this Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon, I know, consulting my own feelings, that I can only express one sentiment on the subject. When I reflect that a Member of this House, who has been here for many years, who was highly respected by both sides, and who apparently was full of life and animation but two short hours ago, is now lying dead in one of the Chambers of the House, I think it would be a scandal before the country if we continued our Business longer, and I therefore have great pleasure in seconding the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."
—(Sir George Bowyer.)

MR. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Wexford to rise to a point of Order. The question now brought under the notice of the House does not in any way raise a point of Order. If the House thinks fit, under the painful circumstances of the present case, to adjourn, it is, of course, competent for the House to do so.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: Then, Sir, as I am not right in putting it as a Question of Order, I will now move that the House adjourn, and I am sure that the feelings of all Members will prompt them to agree to that Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am sure that there can be but one feeling, Sir, throughout this House. We have all received a severe shock to our feelings in hearing of the fearfully sudden death of one who has been for so many years a Member of this House, and who has won the respect, and, indeed, the affection of all hon. Gentlemen who have had the privilege of friendship with him. I have known my late hon. Friend for many years, and I can truly say that there was no Member more thoroughly deserving of the respect and sympathy of this House. I, of course, am naturally anxious to take any step which might show what I feel to be the sense of the House under such circumstances; and I should not have hesitated at the beginning of the evening to propose the adjournment of the House, but that I felt that we were met together, not for anything of the nature of entertainment, but for Business of a serious character, which I was loath to interrupt or to appear to think unimportant. But I cannot but feel—and in this I believe I am expressing the sense of all the Members of this House, to whatever Party they belong—that this painful matter having been mentioned, the House would deem it right that we should follow the course which has been proposed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wexford (Sir George Bowyer), and accede to the Motion for adjournment. Sir, we all recognize the very great importance of the question which has been raised by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don). I am happy to think that there will be, at all events, an opportunity for hon. Gentlemen who are interested in that Motion to bring it on again, or to discuss the same subject on Monday, when a cognate question will be brought forward in Committee of Supply. I think it will be in accordance with the feeling of the House that we should accede to the Motion for adjournment. I hope the formal Motion to set up Supply will be agreed to on Monday; and as the Vote proposed will be the one for the Queen's Colleges, it will be so thoroughly cognate to the subject of this evening's debate, that we shall resume the consideration of the question with perfect consistency, and I think with happier feelings, and with more power to discuss the question itself than we could do at the present moment, when we are naturally agitated by what has occurred.

THE O'CONOR DON: Sir, I do not rise to say one word on the subject last alluded to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, the resumption of the debate, and whether we should continue the discussion on Monday on the Queen's College Estimates; but I could not sit silent, the Motion which we are now discussing having been made by me, when such terrible news as that of the death of my hon. Friend has been brought before the House. I have had the pleasure of his acquaintance for many years, and I can fully sympathize with the feeling which is common to all Members of this House. I need hardly say that I felt deeply shocked at the intelligence communicated to me; and I myself would have proposed that the House should adjourn, only that I felt that that was a course which ought rather to be taken by the Leader of the House; and, therefore, I thought it would have been obtruding myself on the House had I ventured to do so. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has explained the reasons which influenced him in not taking that course. I fully appreciate that feeling; and I can say, on my own behalf, and on behalf of all those interested in this question, that we would not for one moment stand in the way of the House expressing its deep sympathy and feeling at the death of a Gentleman whom we all knew and thoroughly respected, and whose loss we all so deeply deplore. Therefore, I would not offer the slightest opposition to the Motion for the adjournment; but I must refrain from expressing any opinion as to the course which should be taken for the resumption of this debate.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I regret that I was absent for a moment from my place when this Motion was made. I have no doubt whatever that the course which has been suggested is that which is most consistent with the feelings of every one of us; and, if it is one which can be adopted without serious inconvenience to Public Business, or to the discussion of this important question, it is one which the House will be most desirous of adopting. It appears, from the observations which have fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it will be possible for another opportunity to be afforded to hon. Members who wish to discuss the question brought forward by the hon. Member for Roscommon; and, as it is the wish of those who will take part in the debate that this course should be adopted, I cannot conceive that there can be any objection to it. I am glad that there should have been so unanimous an expression of regret and deep feeling at the unfortunate loss which this House has to-day sustained.

Question put, and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at a quarter before Six o'clock till Monday next.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CONGRESS.—MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I have to inform the House that the German Government have issued an invitation to the Signatories of the Treaty of Paris to a Congress, and that Her Majesty's Government has accepted that invitation. I will read the terms of the invitation—and I will ask your Lordships to remember that an invitation in the same terms has been sent, and has by this time been accepted, by all the other Powers, Russia included. The invitation is as follows:—

“The Undersigned, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, King of Prussia, has the honour, by order of his Government, to convey to the knowledge of his Excellency the Marquis of Salisbury, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, the following communication:—

“In conformity with the initiative taken by the Austro-Hungarian Cabinet, the Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany has the honour to propose to the Powers signatories of the Treaties of 1856 and 1871 to meet in Congress at Berlin, to discuss there the stipulations of the Preliminary Treaty of San Stefano, concluded between Russia and Turkey. The Government of His Majesty, in giving this invitation to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, understands that in accepting it the Government of Her Britannic Majesty consents to admit the free discussion of the whole of the contents of the Treaty of San Stefano, and that it is ready to participate therein. In the event of the acceptance of all the Powers invited, the Government of His Majesty propose to fix the meeting of the Congress for the 13th of this month.

“The Undersigned, in bringing the above to the knowledge of his Excellency the Marquis of Salisbury, has the honour to beg his Excellency to be good enough to acquaint him as soon as possible with the reply of the British Government. The Undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to his Excellency the assurance of his highest consideration.

“MUNSTER.”

That invitation has been accepted in the following terms:—

“Foreign Office, June 3.

“The Undersigned, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of his Excellency Count Münster's note of this day, inviting Her Majesty's Government to take part in a Congress at Berlin for the discussion of the stipulations of the Preliminary Treaty concluded at San Stefano between Russia and Turkey.

“The Undersigned, taking act of his Excellency's verbal intimation that the invitation has been sent in the same terms to the other Powers signatories to the Treaty of Paris, and understanding that those Powers, in accepting this invitation, assent to the terms stated in his Excellency's note, has the honour to inform his Excellency that Her Majesty's Government will be ready to take part in the Congress at the date mentioned.

“SALISBURY.”

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words with regard to the announcement which has just been made to your Lordships' House. I shall only say for myself—and, I believe, on behalf of those behind me—that I most heartily congratulate the House, and, if they will allow me, Her Majesty's Government, on the prospect of this matter being discussed in a Congress of the European Powers. I wish to ask another Question—whether the reports are true with regard to Her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries at the Congress being the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Yes, my Lords, it is so.

EARL GRANVILLE: Then, I take the liberty of saying that I cannot equally congratulate Her Majesty's Government on this determination. I remember that in February, when the question of going into Congress was under discussion in this House, Lord Derby, the late Foreign Secretary, whom I regret not to see present, made a statement on the subject. We know that there are precedents for Foreign Secretaries attending as Plenipotentiaries at Congresses of an important character; but Lord Derby then stated expressly, on behalf of the Government, that the attendance of the Foreign Secretary as Plenipotentiary at this Congress would be most undesirable; he thought that, however it might be with foreign Governments, with a Parliamentary system of Government like our own, and having regard to the way in which the Government of this country is carried on, such a course would be most inconvenient. He stated that if it were adopted, the Foreign Secretary would be cut off from all communication with his Colleagues, and would have to act upon instructions which he himself would have no share in framing.—[3 Hansard, cccxxviii. 45.] I entirely acquiesced in the course which the German Ambassador that the latest accounts which have been received as to the health of the illustrious victim of this abominable attack are satisfactory. It is, of course, too soon to use any stronger language; but, from all I have heard in the matter, I trust that Europe may have the joy of soon welcoming back to perfect health one of its most respected Potentates.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—ALLEGED AGREEMENT BETWEEN ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.—QUESTION.

EARL GREY: I wish to ask the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the statement which appeared in The Globe last Friday as to the terms agreed upon between this country and Russia?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The statement to which the noble Earl refers, and other statements that I have seen, are wholly unauthentic, and are not deserving of the confidence of your Lordships' House.

EARL GREY: I could not suppose that what was stated in regard to the retrocession of Bessarabia was true. It appeared too monstrous to be believed that Her Majesty's Government could have made such a stipulation as was alleged.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES—THE MILITIA ARTILLERY.—QUESTION.

LORD WAVENEY asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the rule for embodiment of brigades of Militia Artillery is analogous to that adopted in regard of regiments of Militia Infantry, by retaining them in their respective districts on withdrawal of the Royal Artillery; and whether they might in the meantime be employed supplementally in arming the respective works and forts to which under the scheme of localization they were attached?

VISCOUNT BURY, in reply, said, that in the event of the Regular troops going on foreign service, they would, in many instances, be replaced at home by the Militia. The brigades of Militia Artillery would be treated on the same principle as brigades of Militia Infantry; but the noble Lord was under a misapprehension in supposing that the Militia Infantry would necessarily remain in the districts to which they belonged—they would be used to replace the garrisons of towns from which the Regular regiments were withdrawn, and the Militia Artillery would be sent to man the fortresses where necessary. The localization scheme would not apply to cases of invasion. As to the employment for the Militia Artillery suggested in the Question of his noble Friend, it was to be borne in mind that the Militia Artillery were only out for a short time, and that a large number of them were young soldiers who were engaged in learning other portions of their duty than those which had to be discharged on these works and forts. If the noble Lord wished to have his regiment of Militia employed in the manner he suggested, the course for him would be to apply to the General of the district.

COMMITTEE (ON RE-COMMITMENT).

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to Order).

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Necessity of obtaining qualifying certificate from Medical Board, and obligatory establishment of Board).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he had to propose an Amendment by which midwifery would be included in the examination necessary for a qualifying certificate.

Amendment moved, in line 23, after ("medicine and surgery,") to insert ("including therein midwifery.")

Amendment agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON moved an Amendment, by which the terms for the establishment of the Medical Board was altered from the 31st December 1879, and 31st July 1880, to 30th June 1879, and 31st December 1879.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Registration of persons in medical register).

On the Motion of the Marquess of Ripon, an Amendment made, after the words "after the commencement of the reminded, the chief Minister of Russia will also be present. We had, therefore, to consider that in the altered circumstances, the Government of Her Majesty should be represented in a different manner from that which was first proposed. But, my Lords, on the whole, I can only say that we feel the great responsibility of the step we are taking; that we look in these circumstances to the support of your Lordships' House and of the country; and that if we fail in our duty—if it can be shown hereafter that any failure that may occur has arisen from the mode in which the Representatives of the Government of the Queen have been selected—we shall abide the consequences which we shall certainly entirely deserve.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I concur with the noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield), that these appointments are to be considered with reference to the circumstances of the time, and not entirely by the light of precedent. I also agree that they are not to be regarded as any slight upon the Colleagues of the noble Lords who have been selected as our Plenipotentiaries. But it appears to me that the noble Earl has not adverted to another general question which was raised by the noble Earl behind me. I want to know how far it is consistent with our principle of Government that the whole Cabinet is responsible to Her Majesty and to the country for every important step taken by the Government, that, in relation to foreign affairs, the Cabinet should be separated from two of its most important Members during the progress of the Congress, and that important questions which might arise during the Congress should be settled by those Colleagues without consultation with the Cabinet as a whole? I am not prepared to express any decided opinion on this point; but I think it is a very grave question, indeed, and one requiring to be carefully considered, whether the course proposed is altogether consistent with the Constitutional principles and practice of this country. Are important questions which may arise at the Congress to be decided, as far as this country is concerned, by the two noble Lords, without consulting with their Colleagues—and, especially, without verbal consultation. No doubt, there may be consultation by letter or telegram, but we all know how inadequate this is as compared to personal communication and discussion. Are decisions taken by the two Ministers in such circumstances to be binding? If they are, certainly Parliament would not have the same security which it would have if it knew that the decision was that of the Cabinet. The noble Earl said that the Members of the Cabinet in this country will have their importance increased by their being left behind. Is it possible to imagine that the Cabinet at home would overrule the decision of two such powerful Members of the Government as the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary? This appears to me scarcely possible, and, therefore, the course proposed to be taken by the Government does imperil the security which the Government has hitherto had. I think that questions of the deepest importance to the country should not be decided except on the collective responsibility of the whole Cabinet.

EARL GRANVILLE: I must say that my recollection does not accord with that of the noble Earl at the head of the Government, and that in the reason he gave for his change in policy his recollection deceived him. In February, on the occasion to which I have alluded, Lord Derby explained that one or two other Powers intended to take a course different from that which would be adopted by Her Majesty's Government. He said that Germany would be represented by Prince Bismarck, and Austria by Count Andrassy; but that, so far as this Government was concerned, we should not depart from the ordinary course of sending an Ambassador.

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I now wish to put a Question, of which I have given private Notice, to the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It is with regard to the fearful attempt which has been made for the second time on the life of the Emperor of Germany. I wish to know, Whether Her Majesty's Government have recently received any recent information as to the state of the Emperor's health?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I have to say that we have had the great satisfaction of hearing from the German Ambassador that the latest accounts which have been received as to the health of the illustrious victim of this abominable attack are satisfactory. It is, of course, too soon to use any stronger language; but, from all I have heard in the matter, I trust that Europe may have the joy of soon welcoming back to perfect health one of its most respected Potentates.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—ALLEGED AGREEMENT BETWEEN ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.—QUESTION.

EARL GREY: I wish to ask the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the statement which appeared in The Globe last Friday as to the terms agreed upon between this country and Russia?

NAVY.—H.M.S. "EURYDICE."

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD DORCHESTER asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether any, and if so, what steps have been taken since a first attempt, that failed, to raise Her Majesty's ship "Eurydice," sunk off Dunnose on the 24th of March last;

Whether any consultations relating thereto, between the dockyard or other naval authorities, and whether any eminent engineers, civil or military, have been invited to give their opinions;

Also, whether any firms, such as "The Steamship Salvage Company," or other persons experienced in such matters, have been invited to afford assistance towards or to tender for raising the vessel;

And, whether there was any objection to produce any Papers relating thereto?

The noble Lord said, he believed it to be the fact that the Government had received offers to raise the Eurydice from private individuals of great eminence as engineers, and from several large firms, who had special appliances for raising sunken ships. One of these companies, he believed, was already under a contract for raising the Vanguard. The attempts made by the Admiralty and Dockyard authorities had been denounced as in no way likely to succeed, whereas the Salvage Company had raised a very large ship from the bottom of the sea within four miles of the very spot where the Eurydice was sunk, not on a sandy, but a hard bottom. Only four weeks before the accident to the Eurydice, the vessel they had raised was towed into Portsmouth harbour. He could quite understand the failure to raise the Vanguard, but he could not understand the failure of the authorities to raise the Eurydice. It was, he thought, scarcely creditable to the first Maritime Power in the world, that a ship should have been lying for 10 weeks in 10 fathoms of water, within a short distance of one of their greatest naval arsenals.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: Before answering the Question of the noble Lord, I will avail myself of the opportunity to answer a Question put to me on Friday night by the noble Lord on the Cross-Benches (Lord Oranmore and Browne) with respect to a Naval Review. There is to be no Naval Review, but the Reserve Fleet will assemble at Portsmouth this week. With regard to the Question put to me by the noble Lord now, I am not surprised at it, because I know that many persons interested are imperfectly acquainted with what is doing and has been done—are unaware of the difficulties to be overcome, and express surprise at the apparently slow progress which has been made in raising the Eurydice. I am very glad that the noble Lord has given me the opportunity of explaining at somewhat greater length than on previous occasions the difficulties the Naval authorities have to contend against. The Question of the noble Lord embraces four distinct subjects—namely, what steps are being taken? whether any engineers, civil or military, have been invited to give their opinions? whether any private firms have been invited to afford assistance? and whether there is any objection to produce Papers? First, with regard to Papers, there really are none except the short daily journal kept by the officer in charge of working parties. This will show better than any words of mine the difficulties which have had to be encountered. It is made up to the 29th of May, and will show that out of the 67 days since the ship sank the working parties have only been able to work during portions of 27 days, and sometimes for not more than two hours out of the 24. For 40 days they were unable to work at all on account of the weather. The divers have only been able to work 80 hours in all; and the lighters have had to slip their moorings and run into harbour for shelter no fewer than 11 times; and they had to slip again last Saturday. No objection exists in respect to laying that journal on the Table. The next Question put by the noble Lord is, whether there have been any consultations between the Dockyard or other naval authorities? I think I mentioned on a former occasion that the Admiralty decided from the first that the business of raising the Eurydice should be intrusted to the Dockyard authorities at Portsmouth, where there is a most efficient staff of officers, both scientific and practical, who meet in consultation almost daily. They are presided over by the Admiral Superintendent, Admiral Foley, who is assisted by the Chief Constructor, Mr. Robinson; Captain Polkinghorne, Master Attendant; Captain Batt, Master Attendant of Chatham Dockyard, who was employed for a considerable time in connection with operations at the wreck of the Vanguard; and Captain Datham, Captain Moss, and Captain Palmer, Staff Commanders. In fact, it would be difficult to get together a stronger or a better Board. They are all agreed in thinking that under the circumstances of the case, and with the appliances at their disposal, no plan could be adopted more likely to insure success than the one they were at present endeavouring to carry out. They are animated but by one desire, and that was to succeed, and no exertions were being spared in order to attain that result. The next Question is, whether we have invited the opinion of eminent engineers, civil or military? The Admiralty have not invited the opinion of any civil engineer. The matter was one with which the scientific and the practical skill the Department have at its disposal at Portsmouth Dockyard is quite able to deal; and I very much doubt whether there is any civil engineer who has had any experience whatever in raising weights, such as that the authorities have had to deal with, under similar circumstances. I need scarcely add that it has not been considered necessary to invite the opinion of any military men. As to the Question, whether any private firms have been invited to afford assistance, I may say that, for the same reason that I have already mentioned, we have not invited the assistance of the Steamship Salvage Company, or any person experienced in raising vessels; and I am not aware that either the Steamship Company, or, indeed, any other person, has any experience whatever in raising vessels under the circumstances of the present case. There are cases of ships having been saved, and, indeed, of having been raised in smooth water and out of a strong tide-way. But there is no instance on record of a ship having been raised under circumstances similar, or in any way approaching, that in which the Eurydice is placed. The only case at all resembling the present is that of H.M.S. Pincher, a schooner of 180 tons, sunk in 14 fathoms off the Owers in 1837, and it was four months before they succeeded in getting her into Portsmouth Harbour. Of course, we have been inundated with offers. As to what steps are being taken, I have to remark that we have to deal with a dead weight of between 400 and 500 tons, lying 12 fathoms below water, in a strong tide-way, with a current running between four and six knots an hour, and with slack water varying from 30 to 90 minutes only. Indeed, it would be difficult to find a spot on the whole coast of Great Britain where greater difficulties exist—difficulties not only below on account of tide, but difficulties above water on account of tide and weather combined—for a nasty sea gets up at that spot very quickly with the slightest provocation. The Eurydice sank on the 24th of March, and it was not until the 27th that we were able to make an attempt to move the wreck. We did so by means of two corvettes—the Rinaldo and Pearl—which had been temporarily converted into lighters, assisted by two smaller lighters. This attempt failed, owing to the breaking of one of the hawsers; and then, after consultation, it was determined by the Board to which I have referred, to adopt what may be called the overlift principle, which simply means that instead of placing the lighters round the sunken ship as before, they will be placed immediately over her. They will be attached to the wreck by eight steel hawsers toggled through her main deck ports, and six jewel hawsers will also be passed round the ship. In addition to this, it is intended to make use of her two bower cables, and also of the Russian air bag, which has a lifting capacity of 40 tons. That will give your Lordships some idea of the difficulties to be overcome. No fewer than 16 different attachments have to be made, and an equal strain brought to bear upon them all. Should it come on to blow, or any sea gets up, they must all be slacked up, and probably let go, and the lighters would have to seek shelter in port, as they have had to do 11 times already, and the whole work have to be begun again when the weather is settled. But that is not all. It was supposed that the bottom where the Eurydice sank was hard ground; and so it is. There is a crust of hard ground, but below that is fine soft sand. It would appear that the ship struck the ground with great force, for her starboard cathead is knocked away, and a portion of her keel is sticking out under her stern. The result is the hard crust is broken, and the ship has been gradually settling in the soft sand. During the late gales she was settling at the rate of 2 inches a-day; but, fortunately, she is not settling any more at present, but she is 11½ feet in the sand, and out of that hole she has to be lifted and placed upon a new bed. That once done, the difficulty would be practically overcome, and, if the weather will only hold up, I hope it may soon be successfully accomplished, although I am bound to say that I no longer look upon it as a matter of certainty. We have not asked assistance of any civil or any other engineers, because the Dockyard authorities are fully equal to the task; but this I will say, that not all the eminent engineers, civil or even military, aided by the Steamship Salvage or any other private firm, could have hastened the raising of that ship by one hour. In conclusion, I have a plan of the manner in which it is sought to raise the ship, which I shall be happy to show the noble Lord.

LORD ELPHINSTONE said, that would depend entirely on the weather.

Lord Elphinstone

CHESTER, Papers respecting the raising of H.M.S. "Eurydice" ordered to be

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CON- GRESS—THE ARMENIANS.—NOTICE.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, he would to-morrow ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can give the House the assurance that in the Congress about to be held, Her Majesty's Government will undertake that the case of the Armenians shall be considered as well as that of the other Christians living under Turkish rule?

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE "NINETEENTH CENTURY"—THE ARTICLE ON LIBERTY IN THE EAST AND WEST—(MR. GLADSTONE).—NOTICE.

MR. HANBURY gave Notice that he would take the earliest opportunity to call the attention of the House to the language of an article recently printed in a publication called The Nineteenth Century, which article purported to have been written by a Member of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, lately First Lord of the Treasury, and especially to the following paragraph:—

"In this partnership the effusion of blood will fall largely to the Indian share. But the policy will be ours. The command ours. The reward and promotion ours. India will be as much at the beck of our will as the elephants, whom, perhaps, with the aid of a little winter clothing, she may send us. We shall use her as we use a steam engine, and shall consult her just as much. She will have just as much control over the expenditure of her own blood as the locomotive over the consumption of fuel; at least, this alone will be her share, unless and until she explodes. In the disasters of our wars she will be involved. In their successes she will have no concern. We may conquer territories, but not for her. We may even impose war indemnities, but she will have no voice in determining their application; and if a portion of them should, indeed, find its way to her Treasury, it will be the bounty given to a suppliant by his landlord, not the freely and rightfully adjusted share of a common remuneration for common sacrifices and efforts. It is very much to say to India, as we have said, we will measure, raise, and direct, and you shall pay, the Army which is to defend you from the foreigner. It is now, in the light of a sublime discovery, to be said, we will raise, manage, and direct, and you shall pay, the Army which is to be kept on such a scale that, besides defending you, it shall be sufficient to add largely to our European Force, and make up for the disadvantage at which we stand in the struggle with any Continental Power. Is it possible that this can work?"

MR. MUNDELLA rose to Order. He wished to know, whether the hon. Gentleman was in Order in reading at length from a magazine article for the purpose of making an allegation against a right hon. Gentleman who was not present?

MR. SPEAKER said, he understood the hon. Member to be reading from an article on which he proposed to found a Motion. He could not, therefore, rule that he was out of Order.

MR. HANBURY continued reading—

"Will India be content? Can India be content? Ought India to be content? In distant, and to her children ungenial, climes, in lands of usage, tongue, religion, wholly alien, the flower of her youth are to bleed and die for us, and she will have no part but to suffer and obey. This is injustice, gross and monstrous injustice; and those who are parties to its perpetration must prepare for the results to which injustice leads."

He wished to add that he would move a Resolution to the effect that, in the opinion of this House, such language on the part of a Member of Her Majesty's Privy Council was much to be condemned as unwarranted, inopportune, and calculated to create sedition in Her Majesty's Indian Empire.

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW—SAFFRON WALDEN UNION.—QUESTION.

DR. LUSH asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he will state to the House the circumstances under which the Guardians of the Saffron Walden Union refused to pay the usual fee to the medical officer of No. 3 district for treating a fracture of the leg of a child of J. Wright, whose family had previously been in receipt of Poor Law medical relief; whether, in such cases of emergency, medical officers are bound to wait for a relieving officer's order or to forfeit their fee; and, if he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Correspondence between the Board and the Poor Law Medical Officers' Association upon the subject, as well as of any Report he may have received from the Poor Law Inspector of the district?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that he had been informed by the Guardians that no relief had been given to Wright for the last eight years, and that they were of opinion that his family were not entitled to such assistance. On occasions of emergency medical officers were not bound to wait for a relieving officer's order or to forfeit their fee, but when the case was not one of emergency they were required to ask the Guardians, with whom it rested to say whether payment should be made or not. He had no objection to lay upon the Table the Correspondence on the subject.

INDIA—THE VERNACULAR PRESS ACT
—THE PRESS COMMISSIONER.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he can state what are to be the functions of the Press Commissioner lately appointed by the Government of India with the rank of a political agent of the first class; and whether the Secretary of State in Council has approved of that appointment; also, whether Papers will be laid on the Table containing the dissents on the subject by Members of the Council of India, in accordance with the provisions of the law?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the duty of the officer appointed to superintend the working of the Vernacular Press Act is to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the legitimate wants and aspirations of the Press, to receive and reply to references and complaints from editors, to act as the referee of the Press in its communications with the Government on the one hand, and on the other as the responsible adviser of the Government in its dealings with the Press under the new law. It was also to be his duty to read and revise the proofs submitted by those editors who desire to withdraw themselves from the restrictive provisions of the law. I have laid upon the Table of the House the Papers relating to this subject, and from the last despatch it will be seen that the Secretary of State in Council has requested the Government of India to refrain from putting that portion of it into operation which relates to the examination and revision of the proofs by a Government officer. As regards the last Question of the hon. Member, the proceedings and speeches in Council have usually been treated as confidential, and my noble Friend is not disposed to regard them in any other light upon the present occasion.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he would take the first opportunity which presented itself to move for Copies of the Papers in question.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

Whether Reports have been received from the Judicature Acts (Legal Offices) and Judges' Chambers' Committees respectively; and, if so, whether he will lay Copies of them upon the Table of the House; and, whether it is intended to fill up the present vacant office of Master of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Reports had been received, and would be laid on the Table of the House that evening. It was intended to fill up the vacant office referred to by the hon. Gentleman.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1875

—VIOLET POWDER.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the alleged extensive adulteration of "Violet Powder" with arsenic, and to the consequent deaths of young persons; and what steps he has taken in the matter?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, this subject has been brought under the consideration of my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, and in consequence of a Report which he obtained from one of the Inspectors of the Board having been forwarded to me, I have placed the matter in the hands of the Solicitor to the Treasury.

ARMY—COLONEL WELLESLEY.

QUESTION.

MR. J. COWEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Colonel Wellesley received any salary as an Officer of the Army in addition to the salary which he received as Secretary of Embassy at Vienna; and, if so, what are the nature of the military duties which he performs at Vienna; and whether his promotion continues in the Army now that he has become a diplomatist?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, Colonel Wellesley does not receive and will not receive any military pay. His name is still in the list of Colonels in the Army, and I see no occasion to recommend that it should be removed therefrom.

INDIA—TROOPS OF NATIVE STATES. QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Indian Princes entitled by Treaty to maintain troops have exceeded the force allowed to them, or whether it is the intention of the Government to prevent them from maintaining the number of troops allowed under the conditions of the various Treaties entered into from time to time between Indian Native States and the British Empire; and, whether the intention of the Government to forbid the armament of troops in the service of the Indian Native States with improved weapons is based upon any condition in the original Treaties forbidding the Native States to improve the equipment of their soldiers from time to time?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, it is not in contemplation to interfere with the number of troops in Indian Native States as defined by Treaty guarantee. The issue of arms to troops in Native States is not in any way regulated by Treaty—it depends upon the discretion of the Paramount Power in India.

INDIA—THE MAHARAJAH OF KUCH BAHAR.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether His Highness the Maharajah of Kuch Bahar is a voluntary visitor to this Country; whether His Highness is not still a minor; and, whether the Home Government has received any Copy of the Petition addressed by the Ranees of Kuch Bahar, the guardians of the young Maharajah, protesting against the alleged forcible removal of His Highness to England under an armed escort, and in spite of the protests of his relatives and of the religious authorities of his caste?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, the Maharajah of Kuch Bahar is a minor. He is a voluntary visitor to this country, and was in no way forcibly removed to England under an armed escort. His visit to England was an object which his father had much at heart during his lifetime, and which the Maharajah himself has been determined to carry out. No copy of the Petition mentioned by the hon. Member has been received by the Home Government.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. CLARE READ asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering the backward state of Supply, and the number of Amendments to the County Government Bill, he still expects to pass that measure as well as the Cattle Diseases Bill this year; and, should any doubt exist, whether he will allow the Cattle Diseases Bill, which has already passed the Lords, to take precedence of any English measure now before the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, undoubtedly it will be a matter of interest to proceed with the Cattle Diseases Bill, and as it has already passed the House of Lords we may hope there will be plenty of time for its discussion in this House. With regard to the County Government Bill, the case is this. If the debate upon going into Committee had been concluded—as we had every reason to hope it would be—before Easter, it would have been possible, by placing certain Notices of Amendments on the Paper, to have shortened the debate and attained the same end; but, unfortunately, the preliminary discussion was not concluded. The result is that it would be impossible to go into Committee on that Bill without a renewal of the debate. In these circumstances, and looking to the fact that the Bill is one of considerable importance, and contains some provision of great novelty, and that it requires the attention not only of this but of the other House of Parliament, it does not appear probable that we shall be able to pass it this year. It ought to be remembered that the Bill is of no immediate advantage, unless two other Bills which my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board has introduced—the Valuations Bill and the Highways Bill—are also proceeded with. We have, therefore, thought it better to take these two Bills before the County Government Bill. My right hon. Friend proposes on Friday to commit the Highways Bill pro forma, in order to reprint it with Amendments which he hopes will facilitate its passage through the House.

MR. PARNELL: May I ask if the Irish Grand Jury Bill will follow suit?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give Notice of that Question.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) BILL.
QUESTION.

MR. RAMSAY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in the event of this Bill not passing through Committee to-morrow (Tuesday), it will be brought forward again before the Whitsuntide Recess?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that if the measure did not pass through the Committee to-morrow, he was afraid that it would be impossible to name another day for its consideration until after the Whitsuntide Holidays. Supply would have to be taken on Friday, and probably some Scotch Votes would then come on.

ARMY—RIFLED ORDNANCE.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether the system of rifled ordnance, upon which we now rely, is the same which was twice rejected in 1855 by the Select Committee at Woolwich; and, whether on its subsequent adoption by the Board of Ordnance, Mr. Padwick refused the offer of £100 as being no proportion to the value of his invention?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Sir, I am afraid the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim is under some misapprehension. The system of rifled ordnance on which we now rely was not twice rejected in 1855 by the Select Committee at Woolwich. The offer to Mr. Padwick of £100 was given to him in consideration of his having drawn early attention to the subject of projectiles with studs, and by no means as a reward for an invention of which he cannot be admitted to be the inventor.

PARLIAMENT—THE DERBY DAY—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.
QUESTION.

MR. CHAPLIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he intends to move the adjournment of the House from Tuesday next till Thursday, as Wednesday next is the Derby Day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I observe that prior to the year 1860, it was the habit of the House to adjourn over the Derby Day; but the Motion for adjournment was not undertaken by the Government of the time being. In the year 1860, Lord Palmerston, then the Leader of the House, moved the Adjournment for the Derby Day himself, and from that time till the year 1871 the Motion was regularly made by the Leader of the House and acquiesced in without observation. Since 1871, however, the Motion has been opposed and divisions taken upon it, so that the position of the question appears to have changed. In these circumstances I do not think it would be desirable that the Leader of the House or the Government should make the Motion for adjournment; but, of course, it will be open to my hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) or any hon. Member who thinks proper to do so.

MR. CHAPLIN gave Notice, that in consequence of the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would himself move to-morrow that the House should, at its rising, adjourn till Thursday. He wished to ask Mr. Speaker, Whether he was right in supposing that in accordance with all former precedents this Motion, though moved by a private Member, would take precedence of other Motions?

MR. SPEAKER: I have referred to precedents, and I find that it has been the general practice that a Motion for the adjournment of the House should take precedence of other Business. In accordance with that practice, the Motion of the hon. Member will take precedence of the Public Business to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

MR. ASSHETON gave Notice that he would oppose the Motion for adjournment.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CONGRESS.—MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I may, perhaps, take this opportunity of making a statement to the House which will, I think, be of general interest. Papers have already been laid upon the Table by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs which, as they are short and interesting, I may, perhaps, be permitted to read to the House. They are a communication from the German Ambassador to my noble Friend Lord Salisbury, and Lord Salisbury's reply. The communication from the German Ambassador is as follows :—

“THE Undersigned, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, King of Prussia, has the honour, by order of his Government, to convey to the knowledge of his Excellency the Marquis of Salisbury, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, the following communication :—

“In confirmation with the initiative taken by the Austro-Hungarian Cabinet, the Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany has the honour to propose to the Powers signatories of the Treaties of 1856 and 1871 to meet in Congress, at Berlin, to discuss there the stipulations of the Preliminary Treaty of San Stefano concluded between Russia and Turkey.

“The Government of His Majesty, in giving this invitation to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, understands that in accepting it, the Government of Her Britannic Majesty consents to admit the free discussion of the whole contents of the Treaty of San Stefano, and that it is ready to participate therein.

“In the event of the acceptance of all the Powers invited, the Government of His Majesty proposes to fix the meeting of the Congress for the 13th of this month.

“The Undersigned, in bringing the above to the knowledge of his Excellency the Marquis of Salisbury, has the honour to beg his Excellency to be good enough to acquaint him as soon as possible with the reply of the British Government.

“The Undersigned, &c.

“(Signed) MUNSTER.”

The reply of the Marquess of Salisbury to that communication is as follows :—

“THE Undersigned, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of his Excellency Count Münster's note of this day, inviting Her Majesty's Government to take part in a Congress at Berlin for a discussion of the stipulations of the Preliminary Treaty concluded at San Stefano between Russia and Turkey.

“The Undersigned, taking act of his Excellency's verbal intimation that the invitation has been sent in the same terms to the other Powers signatories of the Treaty of Paris, and understanding that those Powers in accepting this invitation assent to the terms stated in his Excellency's note, has the honour to inform his Excellency that Her Majesty's Government will be ready to take part in the Congress at the date mentioned.

“The Undersigned, &c.

“(Signed) SALISBURY.”

The Congress will take place, therefore, at Berlin, on the 13th instant, and Her Majesty's Government will be represented by my noble Friend Lord Beaconsfield, by Lord Salisbury, and by Lord Odo Russell, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin. Sir, I am sure the House will anticipate that in making this communication, and in referring to this act of the German Government, I should say a single word to express the horror with which not only the House but the whole country has heard of the recent criminal attack upon the Emperor of Germany, and to express at the same time our earnest hope that no serious consequences may result. In spite of His Majesty's advanced age, his well-known mental and bodily vigour give us hope that the consequences will be less serious than might have been anticipated. Perhaps it may be of interest to the House, if my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs were allowed to read the latest telegrams which we have received with reference to the Emperor.

MR. BOURKE: The first telegram we received this morning was from Lord Odo Russell. It was dated 10.30 A.M., and was as follows :—

Owing to the kindness of the German Ambassador, I am able also to read a telegram received about an hour ago, which he has been good enough to send down to me, and which I have his permission so to read to the House. It is as follows :—

“BERLIN, 2.5.

“His Majesty was struck by 30 pellets in the cheek, arms, head, and back. Eighteen pellets struck his helmet. The pain yesterday was very great. No one of the wounds is dangerous in itself. His Majesty is calm and quiet, and has shown great self-possession throughout. Sleep at night is good, thank God! On the whole, His Majesty's state is satisfactory.”

We have also received from Lord Odo Russell another telegram, which appears to be a little later than those that I have just read :—

“The Emperor continues to be without fever. The ice placed on His Majesty's arm and shoulder has relieved the burning pain of the wounds. Some grains of shot are still inside the wrist and cannot yet be extracted, but there is no inflammation.”

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am quite sure the whole House will re-echo the expressions which have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the horror and detestation which have been excited among us by the attempt upon the Emperor of Germany's life, and will heartily join in expressions of sympathy with His Imperial Majesty and with His people. I am equally sure we shall all rejoice to hear that the consequences are not more serious than, under the circumstances, might have been anticipated. But, Sir, perhaps the House will also allow me to take this opportunity, as I may not have another opportunity before the Holidays, of making one observation in reference to the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's statement—I mean that in reference to the Representatives of this country at the approaching Congress. As far as I know, the course proposed to be taken by the Government is altogether without precedent, though that fact probably has not produced a great impression on the minds of hon. Members opposite, who have lately, as it appears to me, developed a remarkable indifference to established precedents in these matters. I must say that the arrangements which have been just announced appear to call for serious consideration, and that they are to my mind a matter for regret. If, Sir, the object of the Congress is to be simply—

MR. SPEAKER: The noble Lord is now entering upon matter of debate, and I am bound to ask him whether he proposes to conclude with a Motion?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, under the circumstances I had hoped the House would have allowed me to make a few remarks without it being necessary for me to conclude with a Motion, as I did not intend to detain the House longer than two or three minutes. However, to put myself in Order, I will conclude by moving the adjournment of the House. I was about to say that if the object of the Congress is simply to ratify conclusions which have been already arrived at, then I cannot imagine why the two chief Officers of the State should have thought it necessary to absent themselves from their duties in this country merely in order to take part in deliberations of that character. If, on the other hand, the Congress is to meet in order to deliberate upon and to decide upon questions of the most momentous importance, then, I think, it is very much to be regretted that the Representatives of Her Majesty's Government at the Congress will be deprived of the assistance they might otherwise obtain from the counsels of the Cabinet at home. Sir, I have been accustomed to believe that we are governed, not by one or two men, however eminent, but by Her Majesty's Ministers, acting together after due consultation and deliberation. But, in these circumstances, it seems to me that it will be quite impossible for the Cabinet at home to exercise any influence whatever on the decision which may be arrived at or agreed to by the Representatives of this country at the Congress. It may, perhaps, be said that the Plenipotentiaries will join the Congress at Berlin in order to support a policy which has been decided upon and determined by Her Majesty's Ministers at home. But, Sir, it is possible, and, indeed, it is very probable, that on an occasion of this sort unforeseen occurrences of the greatest gravity and importance may arise, and it will be impossible, in such circumstances, that Plenipotentiaries can receive the support which, in other circumstances, they might receive from the Cabinet at home. It may, again, be said that the conclusions to which they may pledge the country will require the ratification of the Government at home. I am sure, however, that the House will see the immense difference which exists between a Cabinet exercising an influence on the deliberations of the Congress while they were in progress, and taking the responsibility upon itself of either rejecting or considerably altering the decisions already arrived at. I cannot imagine for a moment that it will be denied that the part which this country is to take in these deliberations—in the settlement of a policy which may affect the present and future policy of this country for a great number of years to come—I say I cannot imagine that it will be contended for a moment that these events will be in the hands of any but the two Plenipotentiaries who are sent to the Congress. On the other hand, it is impossible to conceive that the Cabinet, sitting at home and deprived of the assistance of two of its chief Members, can exercise any real or beneficial influence over the deliberations of the Plenipotentiaries at Berlin. Nor do I think this arrangement will be any more satisfactory to this House when it is considered that neither of the Plenipotentiaries who have been selected has a seat in this House. Therefore, those Members of the Cabinet who might be most able to form an opinion as to the feeling of the House of Commons on these important matters will not be able to make their opinion known. Sir, I would not have taken this course, but for the fact that the very short time which will elapse before the Congress meets rendered it possible that another opportunity would not be afforded to me of calling attention to the subject. I hope the House will excuse me for having made these remarks.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (The Marquess of Hartington.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I do not know that it would be convenient that I should enter into a discussion upon this subject. Still, I may say that the whole of the proceedings and the whole of the policy which is involved in the meeting of the Congress have been the subject of long and most anxious deliberation on the part of Her Majesty's Government. We have in the fullest manner discussed among ourselves all the questions which are likely to arise, and there is so complete an understanding of those questions that we do not anticipate those disadvantages to which the noble Lord has referred. Undoubtedly, the question of the representation of this country at the Congress was one of considerable delicacy and difficulty, and it has been the cause of anxious deliberations on the part of Her Majesty's Government; but, upon a full consideration of all the circumstances, we found the balance of reasoning to be in favour of the course which has been adopted. The Congress will be attended by the Prime Ministers and Foreign Secretaries of the principal Powers concerned. The Prime Minister of Germany, the Prime Minister of Austria, and, in all probability, if his health permits, the Prime Minister of Russia, the Foreign Minister of France, and the Foreign Minister of Italy, will be the Representatives of those Powers at the Congress. It has, on the whole, appeared to Her Majesty's Government, that by requesting the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary to act as the Representatives of England, we were taking the course which was best calculated to arrive at a speedy and satisfactory conclusion of a matter which is not now in its infancy, but which has been considerably advanced.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he desired to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer the adoption of a course which an individual Member of the House was scarcely competent to propose; but which, he thought, would come with good grace from the Leader of that House. He would suggest that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should consider whether there was any precedent that would justify an expression on the part of the House of its abhorrence and detestation of the second attempt which had been recently made to assassinate a Sovereign who had been doing so much for the peace of Europe, as his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Germany, by convening a Congress in his own capital. He (Mr. Newdegate) was quite sure that if the right hon. Gentleman found that his doing this would be in accordance with precedent, he would consult and represent the feeling of the House by affording an opportunity for expressing the feelings of abhorrence which were excited by this second attempt to take a life so valuable to the world.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CONGRESS—REPRESENTATION OF GREECE. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: With reference to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that invitations to the Congress had been addressed to the Powers who were signatories to the Treaties of 1856 and 1871, he will remember that a short time ago he stated that the Government had taken steps to secure the representation of Greece—I wish to know, Whether any official invitation has been sent to Greece?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It would be more convenient if Notice were given of that Question.

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND). QUESTION.

THE O'CONOR DON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, considering the melancholy and unprecedented circumstances under which the House adjourned on Friday last, he will allow the Motion on Irish Education, which was then under discussion, to take precedence this evening on the question of going into Committee of Supply, which, he believed, the right hon. Gentleman again proposed to set up?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it did not, of course, lie with the Government to say what course hon. Gentlemen, who had given Notices of Motion on going into Committee of Supply, might consider it right to pursue; but if those hon. Members did not think it necessary to claim precedence, and would allow the debate of Friday evening to be resumed, that might, probably, he thought, be the best course for the convenience of the House. He might mention that while it had been intended to bring forward the Votes for the Queen's Colleges this evening, it was now proposed, in consequence of representations which had been received from several Irish Members, to put off those Votes until after Whitsuntide.

TURKEY.—MURDER OF MR. OGLE.
QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. H. SAMUELSON,

MR. BOURKE said, he believed that most of the Papers relating to the murder of Mr. Ogle would be in possession of the House on Friday next. Delay had arisen from a great deal of evidence having been taken in Greek, which required to be translated.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) BILL.
OBSERVATION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he did not wish to stand in the way of the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don; but, in case the debate on the adjournment for the Derby Day tomorrow should throw over the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, would the Government give another day for that measure?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I only hope the debate to which the hon. Baronet alludes will not be very long.

The O'Connor Don

SUPPLY.

THE LATE EARL RUSSELL.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have now to move that the House will immediately resolve itself into Committee of Supply. That is a formal Motion, consequent on the events of last Friday; but I wish to take this opportunity of referring to another subject, which I had hoped to have addressed myself to for a more practical purpose—namely, the loss which the country has recently sustained in the death of the distinguished statesman who was for so many years the Leader and the ornament of this House. It was the wish of Her Majesty's Government to have been able to propose the honours of a public funeral for that very distinguished man; and, if it had been in accordance with the feelings of his family, and with the directions which Lord Russell himself had left, no doubt the House would have most gladly joined in doing honour to his memory. But the House is probably aware of what has been said in "another place"—that the family of Lord Russell have felt themselves constrained, by the terms of his own direct instructions in his will, not to accept that proposal; and I, therefore, only express what I am sure is the feeling both of those among us who have had the privilege of sitting in this House with Lord Russell, and also of those who, being later Members, have only known of his reputation here from others, when I say that the House deeply regrets the removal, even at so advanced an age, of one who has been so great an honour to his country, and whose services have been such a great advantage to his country, and that we ought to express our heartfelt sympathy with his family in the loss they have sustained.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am sure the House has received with great satisfaction the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the intentions entertained by Her Majesty's Government with respect to the funeral of Lord Russell. Those of us, as has been remarked by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had the honour of a seat in this House when Lord Russell was still among us, will remember well how his name had come to command the respect, not only of those with whom he was immediately associated, but of men of all Parties and all sides of the House. There are, indeed, very few among us now who can recall from personal recollection the great part taken by Lord Russell in some of the most extraordinary events of English history, and few who can remember the great services which he rendered to the cause of civil and religious liberty, or the necessity which then existed for those services. Those events and services of Lord Russell have to a great extent been brought back to our memory by the records which we have all had the opportunity of reading during the last few days; and I am sure the House and the country will feel that any honour it is in the power of the State to confer would be well bestowed on the memory of one who during so long a period of his life exerted so much ability and energy in the service of his country.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND).

RESOLUTION.

MR. BLENNERHASSETT resumed the debate on the Motion of The O'Connor Don, which was interrupted by the sudden adjournment of the House on Friday night, consequent on the death of Mr. Wykeham Martin. Universities are, as a rule, mainly recruited from the ranks of pupils receiving instruction in the higher branches at intermediate schools. And a comparison in this respect points distinctly to some cause operating to exclude Catholics. Notwithstanding the fact that all the endowed schools of Ireland are strictly Protestant, there were, when the last Census was taken, 5,177 Catholics, as compared with 5,687 Protestant boys, actually under instruction in the higher branches. That is to say, in the field of intermediate education, the two religions were very nearly on an equality. That most instructive but melancholy record of Irish educational backwardness—"The General Report of the Census Commissioners of 1871"—contains the clearest evidence on the whole subject.

"There is something," say the Commissioners, "essentially wrong in the system of higher public instruction. Taking in the whole field of view," they write, "we are unable to repel the inference that the cause of this miserable backwardness in higher culture lies outside the national character, outside the distribution of wealth, outside variety of station, and outside every ordinary influence that should determine a certain element of the population to the acquirement of liberal culture."

This Report points out that, notwithstanding the undoubted zeal of their voluntary endeavours in the foundation of intermediate schools and Colleges, the Roman Catholics of Ireland are much behind the rest of the population in respect of every branch of higher instruction.

"Our survey of the field," it is admitted, "should be not quantitative, but qualitative; we should separate from the total of Roman Catholics the large proportion of their number whose place has been fixed beyond the natural horizon of superior education—who are outside the aim and reach of higher education."

But, allowing for all this, the Commissioners, after the most thorough and searching examination of facts and figures, arrive at the following conclusion:—

"We think there is warrant in common knowledge and common sense for the expression of an opinion—first, that if regard be had to the admitted progress of Ireland during the last decade in prosperity and wealth, all the higher educational wants of more than 5,000,000 of people, without distinction of creed, have not been adequately ministered to upon the evidence of the results before us; and, secondly, as regards Roman Catholics alone who comprise more than 4,000,000 of those 5,000,000, the demand for higher instruction among those having capacity and call for its reception is feebly represented by the figures tabulated."

The Report from which I have been quoting refers, as hon. Members will perceive, to intermediate as well as to University education. It would be highly undesirable to mix up these two branches of the subject in this debate; but still it is necessary to observe that the efforts of the Roman Catholics, wholly unassisted by the State, to build up a system of intermediate education for themselves, have suffered, and continue to suffer, most severely from the want of any University to stand in the relation to their schools that a National University would naturally occupy towards such Institutions. A system of intermediate education, without a University in connection with it, is like a body without a head. Let hon. Members consider what would be the effect upon the great public schools of England if Oxford and Cambridge were not to exist. What a vital stimulus, what invigorating influences would be lost. The principal Masters of all the great public schools are University men. The boys taught at these schools compete with one another, school with school, and boy with boy, for the various honours and prizes of the Universities, and often continue that rivalry to the end of their University careers; and their achievements have been chronicled on the walls of their old school-rooms for the emulation of future generations of scholars. It would be hard to over-estimate how much the unrivalled public schools' system of England owes to her ancient and splendidly endowed Universities. Compare this with the state of things under which the intellectual life of the great body of the Irish people is being starved and dwarfed, and are we not driven to the conclusion which finds expression in the words of the Census Commissioners, that?—

"There is not a moment to be lost before those upon whom the care lies should apply their faculties to the infusion of blood and spirit into the dry bones of public instruction in Ireland."

There is no doubt that the solution of the University question is essential not only to the development of higher culture, but to the satisfactory condition of that intermediate instruction with which the Government has undertaken to deal. What, then, is the difficulty in this question, and how is it to be met? It has been shown that the Catholics, as a body, do not participate in the advantages of University education. The reason why they do not is perfectly well known. It is because they have no University which is in accordance with the obligations imposed upon them by their religious belief. In the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone)—

"The Irish Roman Catholic is in this condition—that he is not able to obtain a degree in Ireland without going either to the Queen's Colleges to which he objects, or placing himself under examinations and a system of discipline managed and conducted by a Protestant Board mainly composed of clergymen of the Disestablished Church of Ireland. Religion being a force which operates with peculiar strength upon the minds of the Irish people, the great majority of them prefer to surrender all University advantages, rather than enjoy those advantages in violation of their sense of religious duty."

English opinion and policy as regards the education of the Irish people has passed through various stages at different times. A Statute of Anne made it felony for a Catholic schoolmaster to teach in Ireland. An Act of William III. made it civil death for a Catholic child to be sent to school in any foreign country. Nevertheless, as we read in charming pages, familiar, no doubt, to many hon. Members—

"Contraband scholars often were the returning cargoes of the smuggling craft that nightly ran silks and brandies into Irish creeks and bays in the early part of the last century."

The State has also attempted to combine education with efforts to proselytize, and large sums of money have been voted by Parliament for the purpose. All these attempts failed—as they deserved to fail—for the Irish people, strong as was their love of learning, steadfastly rejected the education offered to them on such degrading terms. In the words of Sir James Graham—

"All attempts to educate the people of Ireland have failed wherever there was an interference with conscience in matters of religion."

As regards higher education, the intolerance of compelling Catholic youths to resort to a distinctively Protestant Institution, under the control of Protestant clergymen, came at last to be recognized. In 1845 a new experiment was tried, and the Queen's Colleges were established on the avowed principle of avoiding all interference, positive or negative, with the feelings of the students in matters of religion. The object of Sir Robert Peel in setting up those Colleges was, no doubt, to benefit the Catholics. He was a great statesman, and animated by generous motives; but one who knew the Irish people and understood their feelings far better—Mr. O'Connell—fore-saw what the result would be, and declared his opinion that unless religion was introduced into the system, it would never be accepted by the Irish people. That venerable statesman, whose loss the nation is now mourning—Lord Russell—in the course of the debate on the Queen's Colleges, made a speech, of which subsequent events have shown the wisdom—

"On a question of this kind," he said, "the influence of the Roman Catholic Clergy ought to be fairly, not humbly or meanly, but fairly and honestly, sought. You should not omit in any Bill which you propose for academical education in Ireland that great element of your success, and almost the basis upon which your system must in future rest—the concurrence of the Roman Catholic Clergy. Unless you can induce the Roman Catholic Prelates and their Clergy generally to think that they can fairly recommend to those who come to them for spiritual advice, that they should place their sons at the Colleges which you propose to found, unless, I say, you can do this, the very best that you can hope for your measure is that it will be null; but my fear is that it will be noxious."

Lord Russell's views were disregarded, O'Connell's warning had no effect, and what has been the result? The secular system proved utterly obnoxious to those whose wants it was specially intended to meet. It has maintained only a struggling and precarious existence, and, at the end of over 30 years of trial, we had last year from the whole of Ireland, in the three Queen's Colleges, a little over 200 Roman Catholic students of every description attending lectures, and of these only about 70 matriculated in Arts. The Queen's Colleges were meant to supply a great void in the higher education of Ireland, and it is a significant commentary on that intention that the number of University students in Arts in that country was greater 40 years ago, before these Colleges came into existence, than it is now. As regards the special object for which they were designed, the secular Colleges have been a conspicuous failure. And yet my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), with the support of the authorities of Trinity College, given in a moment of panic, has thought that he could solve the Irish University question by making an addition of one to their number. With the example of the Queen's Colleges before him, he has succeeded in inducing Parliament to extend to Trinity College the identical principle to which the failure of those Colleges to attract the youth of Ireland to their teaching is due. What has been the result of the measure introduced by him? As yet, nothing, except that four Roman Catholic students have been admitted to scholarships in Trinity College in the course of five years. The Act for the Abolition of Tests has left the Protestant character of Trinity College for the present practically unchanged; because, under the operation of that Act, the Government of the College must continue to be mainly in the hands of clergymen of the late Established Church, until some time in the next century. A Catholic, even if he were elected to a Fellowship at the very next vacancy, would not, at the ordinary rate of promotion, have a seat on the Board and a voice in the general management of the College for 35 or 40 years to come. But, if this were otherwise, if Trinity College had actually become a secular Institution, what ground should we then have for supposing that as such it would have any influence in attracting the Roman Catholic youth within its walls? There would be only four secular Colleges instead of three, and the fact would still remain as strong as ever that four-fifths of the population of Ireland had not a single Institution in their country, with the power of granting a degree, whose constitution and government were in harmony with their conscientious convictions. The objection of the Catholics to the secular system has been stated in explicit terms, over and over again. They have not left us in any doubt on the subject. The heads of the Roman Catholic Church have repeatedly spoken, and lay opinion has been expressed with singular unanimity in accordance with their views. Public meeting after public meeting, Petition after Petition, have borne testimony to this fact. It is sometimes said that the sentiments of the Catholic laity on the matter are misrepresented, and that, at all events, a considerable section of them do not adopt the views of their Bishops. I cannot pretend to know what the private opinions of Catholics may be as regards the respective weight which should be given to the lay and clerical element in education; that I have always regarded as a matter for their own consideration, and one in which no one else has any right to interfere; but that any appreciable amount of lay Catholic opinion favours a secular as opposed to a Catholic University system, there is not one jot or tittle of evidence to show. The amount of proof in support of the contrary conclusion is irresistible. The natural exponents of Catholic opinion—the Catholic Members of this House—are, I believe, unanimous on the point. The testimony of public meetings, of Petitions, and of the Catholic Press is as strong as such testimony can be. Above all, there is the conclusive evidence afforded by the determined and persistent resolution of the Irish Catholics, at the sacrifice of considerable material advantage, to refuse to accept the teaching and the degrees offered them in secular Institutions. The Irish Catholic layman, with a strong preference for the secular system, to which, I suppose, he is afraid to give expression, who is occasionally evolved by hon. Members opposite from the depths of their inner consciousness, is, I believe, as purely mythical a personage as the famous Mrs. Harris herself. For all practical purposes, the demand of the Irish Catholics, lay and clerical, on this question, is definite, consistent, and unanimous. They ask for University education in accordance with those principles of religious belief which they regard as necessary to their eternal welfare, and they claim that the authorities of their Church shall have that control in the domain of faith and morals which they consider essential to this. They complain that because of this opinion, which they hold as part of their religious faith and obligation, they are subjected to grave difficulties in the pursuit of higher culture, and to substantial disadvantages in the various professions and walks of life in which a University training and degree are valuable. On this ground of the imposition of civil disability for religious belief they are entitled, on the simplest principles of toleration, to the sympathy of every consistent Liberal. In Ireland the equality of all religions before the State has been affirmed by Parliament. The Roman Catholic subjects of the Queen are admitted to be just as loyal, just as much entitled to confidence and consideration as the Protestant. They sit on the Judicial Bench, and fill great Offices of State. They ask, as the reasonable and necessary consequence of their position, that the ascendancy of religious and political privilege having been overthrown, the still more galling ascendancy of mental culture and superior education shall no longer be maintained. They ask—and the demand is one which cannot finally be resisted—for perfect educational equality with their Protestant fellow-subjects. This equality can only be brought about in one of two ways. It must either come by the abolition of all educational endowments, or by the creation of a Roman Catholic University or College in a fair position as compared with existing Institutions. The first of these courses would be calamitous. It would sound the death-knell of liberal culture and intellectual progress in Ireland, and would throw that country back for generations. To solve the religious difficulty in this way would be indeed to make a desert and call it peace. The glimmering light of the Queen's Colleges would be extinguished in utter darkness. The destruction of Trinity College would be a national calamity. The difficulty is that its maintenance, while you deny to Catholics equal advantages with those which it bestows on Protestants, is a violation of the great principle of religious equality. What, then, is the alternative policy? Is there no way by which we can preserve existing Institutions, and leave them free to carry on their work, and, at the same time, do substantial justice to the Catholics, and break down the barrier which separates them from University education? The only way is to give them an Institution for themselves, in which they shall be free to carry out their own principles. Last Session, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) introduced a measure in which he attempted to do this by the creation of a Catholic College within the ancient University of Dublin. That proposal was supported by the Catholic Members, and was understood to be acceptable to Catholic opinion in Ireland. It was rejected by a large majority. And now we are asked by the Irish Catholics to consider their case, and the Government is invited to frame a measure to meet it. No details of such a measure are suggested in the Resolution before us. There are some to whom the idea of a separate University commends itself, and no doubt there is much to be said in its favour. I do not myself share the fears of those who think that the creation of another University in Ireland would tend to lower the standard of education. Higher education is nowhere more prosperous or more widely diffused than in those countries where there are several Universities. Look at Scotland, with its four Universities, and Germany with 20. There would not, I think, be any difficulty in maintaining the requisite stringency of examination. A central University for Ireland, where all students could meet and contend in honourable rivalry—a great national home of learning—is a grand idea; but I fear it would not be easy to realize it, except at great and excessive cost. The differences which exist with regard to many of the most important branches of knowledge are so fundamental and profound that it would be impossible, without the most serious limitations of academic teaching, to bring together representatives of the different creeds on the same Board. I am inclined to think that it would tend more, in the end, to the promotion of learning to let each body work out its own system after its own fashion. The real difficulty in this question, however, does not lie in choosing between these rival methods of academic organization. It centres in the claim made by the Catholics for what is called denominational endowment. This is the point on which the whole controversy really turns. The contention on their part is, that without the sufficient and substantial—I do not say extravagant—endowment of a Catholic Institution, it will be impossible to raise Catholic University education to the level of that which is enjoyed by those who are not debarred by religious scruples from making use of Trinity College and of the Queen's Colleges. Are, then, the objections to this course so strong that they cannot and ought not to be surmounted? These objections are founded to a certain extent on our recent policy as regards the English Universities. The tendency of that policy has unquestionably been to abolish the exclusive character of those Institutions, and to open them as freely as possible to all comers. We have attempted to apply the same policy to the University of Dublin. But, as was pointed out at the time, those who thought that the opening of Trinity College to all denominations would convert it into a national Institution, were applying to Ireland, by a false and misleading analogy, experience gained from a state of things when the problem to be solved was totally different. In England we opened the door to Protestants, who, though Dissenters from the Established Church, were eager and willing to enter. In Ireland we opened the door to Catholics, who did not want to enter, but who wished to go somewhere else. The experience of the Queen's Colleges has shown conclusively that no amount of opening, in the sense of the destruction of any distinctive religious character, will bring the Catholics into Trinity College. Then, it is said, and said with great apparent force, that the Protestant Church in Ireland has been disestablished and disendowed. The Maynooth Grant and the Presbyterian Regium Donum have disappeared. All this has been done with the cordial approval and aid of the Catholics. To ask us now to endow a denominational Institution, is to ask us to abandon our principles, to reverse our recent acts, to dig up from its grave the old dead and buried policy of State aid to religion. I fully admit that if what we are asked to do is to be regarded as an endowment of the Roman Catholic religion, these objections apply with overwhelming force; but I do not think this is the case. The line of separation is delicate and fine, but it is perfectly distinct. These objections apply exclusively to the endowment of religion; against the endowment of education there is not a word to be said. Nay, more—there is a general feeling that the effective expenditure of a reasonable amount of money in the promotion of higher education in Ireland would be a great public good. What we are asked to do is to endow higher education in the only way in which endowment will be acceptable, and can be expected to bear fruit. We are anxious to promote education; but, in attempting to do so, we must recognize the conditions and limits imposed upon us by the feelings and character of the people for whom we legislate, or all our efforts will be vain. The mind of a nation cannot be elevated by influences external to itself exercised against its will. Religion is the strongest of all the forces which operate upon the minds of the Irish people, and the advancement of liberal culture amongst them will never be effected

if we bring it into collision with religious faith. It has been said that if a Roman Catholic College were endowed with public money the State would be compelled to interfere in its internal arrangements, and—as it were—to hold the balance between the different sections of a religious body with whose mutual relations it had nothing to do. If this were necessary, it would certainly be a great evil; but I cannot see the necessity. No antagonism between the Catholic clergy and laity is an element in this question. No one thinks that were we to concede the point of endowment, there would be any difficulty in framing a Constitution for the new academic body which would be cordially accepted by all Catholics, lay and clerical. Having done this, we should leave that body as free as possible, State interference being kept at a minimum. Nothing can be more absurd than the notion which lies at the bottom of this objection, that the Irish Catholics are to be regarded as children who require to be protected by Parliament from the influence of their own clergy. If such coercion of spiritual terror had any existence amongst them—and I do not for a moment believe that it has—who can doubt that a healthy growth of lay independence would be best promoted by leaving the whole body free to adjust and to arrange their own relations without the disturbing influence of external interference. There is one respect, however, in which State supervision would undoubtedly be necessary. If public money be given to further education in any Institution connected with a particular religious persuasion, the State is bound to see that the money so given is properly used, and that the education paid for comes up to a fit standard. The representatives of the Catholic claims have repeatedly expressed their willingness to submit, in this respect, to the most stringent tests. Persons of great experience and authority in academic matters have assured me that there would be no difficulty in making such tests really effective; and, of course, the more thoroughly they were applied, the higher would be the value of the degree. The State would be able to make certain that the teaching was really efficient, and that a proper standard of acquirement in the various branches of secular learning was maintained. So much for the chief objections that have been raised against the endowment of a Catholic Institution for Higher Education in Ireland. The positive grounds on which such a plea may be urged are extremely strong. Without some provision of the kind, it is clearly not to be hoped that Ireland will regularly take her place in that great educational movement, which is the noblest characteristic of the age in which we live. At present, a large number of her youth are shut out, except at the sacrifice of convictions and feelings, which even those who differ from them are obliged to respect, from that high and equal level of liberal education to which they justly aspire. We wish to see Ireland liberal and enlightened, yet we withhold from her the means of that knowledge and culture by which alone liberal and enlightened sentiments are spread amongst a people. Those who have seen anything of her social life must know that there is nothing she stands in greater need of than an educated and enlightened middle class. Yet we keep the Catholic landowners, the lawyers, the doctors, the men of business, in this position—that they cannot get a degree at any University in the country which is sanctioned by their religion. We know that Ireland is a poor country, with many obstacles to her progress, and yet we make no effort to enable her to supplement the poverty of her material resources by the riches of her intellectual gifts. I am no advocate for showering down gold in the form of extravagant endowments on any Institutions; but, considering the circumstances of Ireland, and especially of the Roman Catholic body, I do not think it is possible for them to have a University adequate to their wants, and worthy to hold a position at the head of their educational system, without, not merely recognition of their degrees, but substantial pecuniary aid. The Irish Catholics do not abound in riches. Land is the chief source of wealth in Ireland, and the landed proprietary of the country is for the most part Protestant. Confiscations and the Penal Laws, which were so long directed towards preventing the Catholics rising to influence or wealth, have left them, even still, comparatively poor. The necessity of supplying the material requirements of their worship draws heavily on their scanty resources. The contributions of persons, whom in England we should not hesitate to class among the very poor, have made their churches rise in beauty, and even splendour, over the land. In the field of intermediate education they have shown, under circumstances of discouragement and difficulty, a noble zeal and liberality. I should be sorry to see the wholesome stimulus of voluntary effort released; but there is a limit to what is possible in this direction. There is one sphere, at least, in which the so-called maxims of Free Trade—the ordinary laws of supply and demand—are clearly inapplicable, and that is in the development of learning and culture among a poor and backward people. There is a debt due to Ireland, and especially to the Catholics of Ireland, in this matter. Hitherto, when they have come to us for bread, we have given them a stone. Shall we be content now to send them away empty? There are other than educational issues involved in this question. It is no mere struggle of sects or parties. A vital principle in the government of Ireland is called in question. The reasonable liberty of the people of that portion of the United Kingdom is at stake. If there be any question which is entitled to be regarded as an Irish question, a question in which Irish interests predominate, and which Irish opinions should decide, it is this question of the teaching of Irish youth. There is no mistaking the voice of Ireland in the matter; there can be no pretence of mistaking it. Is that voice entitled to be heard or is it not? Are we justified in allowing our educational theories or political difficulties in this country to stifle the legitimate aspiration of Irish parents—an aspiration shared by so many in England—that their sons should be educated in a place where their religion is taught and recognized? Shall we, in the name of freedom of conscience, compel the Catholics of Ireland—because they are Irish, and because they are Catholics—to adopt a principle which is repugnant to their highest sense of duty, or else to forego all share of those advantages which, in a national and normal state of things, they would as the great majority of the nation enjoy. If this be done, with what force and reason can 4,000,000 of the people of Ireland say, in the words of Swift—"Government, without the consent of the governed, is the very definition of slavery." The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. ERRINGTON: Mr. Speaker, I must, in the first place, join my hon. Friend the Member for Kerry in thanking Her Majesty's Government and the House for the kindness with which they have facilitated our proceeding with the discussion this evening. Yet, I must say that it is very discouraging, after all that has occurred for so many years, to find ourselves once more face to face with this interminable question of Irish University education. Of course, I know that there are and must always be great and important questions in advance at any given moment of public opinion, and that their advocates must be content to bring them forward, year after year, to urge and reiterate their arguments until they succeed in working public opinion up to the necessary mark. But I fear that we who know the weary and intricate history of this question, can hardly console ourselves with the thought that we have as yet made any very material progress. And yet I have no reason to complain of the manner in which our arguments are received. On the contrary, it appears to me that by far the most important of those arguments, I would say the whole of our premisses, are admitted on all hands. We are told everywhere—"It is quite true; the condition of superior education in Ireland is positively deplorable. Ireland has had a good deal to complain of in the past, and we frankly admit the necessity and expediency of doing something to remedy the present state of affairs, but"—(for, Sir, a hitch always occurs somewhere)—"the demand which you make for denominational education, as necessary to guarantee your liberty of conscience, is out of the question; even if we were prepared to consider it, no Ministry could pass such a measure; the people of England would never stand it." Sir, that is a very serious statement; for it means that, proud as the people of England very justly are of freedom of conscience and of religious equality in the abstract and in the concrete for England and Scotland, they are not prepared so far to waive certain prejudices as to extend those rights to Ireland and to Catholics. Now, I think I have a right to ask those who use and intend in future to use this statement—for it is no argument—to tell us plainly and openly whether they themselves share those prejudices, or whether they are merely taking refuge behind the prejudices of others, and using this as a convenient if not very creditable non possumus? For I contend that if they do not share those prejudices, they ought to meet us in a totally different spirit. It would be perfectly fair while admitting the a priori justice of a demand for religious equality, to plead strong popular prejudice as a hindrance to be overcome, as an unfortunate cause for delay; and I venture to say that if we had been met, or if we were even now met in that spirit, the solution of this question need be neither difficult nor long delayed. It is really very hard for us to understand how anyone can doubt or deny that this question does involve the religious convictions of the Irish Catholics. That it does so is, to my mind, contained in the admission which everyone makes as to the backward condition of education in Ireland. For it is not contended, as far as I know, that that condition is due to any want of educational facilities, and certainly not to any want of appreciation or desire for learning on the part of the Irish people. It is due simply to the fact that the only educational facilities which exist in Ireland—the only facilities you will give the people of Ireland—are such as they cannot and will not avail themselves of; they say they cannot do so on account of their convictions. It is not, Sir, that they love education less, but that they love conscience more. Now, I fully admit that you may think those convictions wrong, and even uncalled for and misplaced; but I do not see how you can go behind the statement made by the Irish Catholics that the matter does affect their consciences. This was most fully and fairly admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) in his great speech on introducing the University Bill of 1873. These are some of the eloquent words he used on the occasion. He said—

“We have sought to provide a complete remedy for what we thought, and for what we have long marked and held up to public attention, as a palpable grievance—a grievance of conscience.”

Mr. Errington

And, again, he asks—

“Do we intend, or do we not intend, to extend to them (our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects) the full benefit of civil equality on a footing exactly the same as that on which it is granted to members of other religious persuasions? If we do not, the conclusion is a most grave one.” —[3 Hansard, ccxiv. 380—426.]

Sir, I am sure the House will agree that such a conclusion would be a most serious one; and I feel so strongly that this point is at the bottom of the whole question, and that so long as it remains open it is premature to discuss the merits and details of various schemes that, with the permission of the House, I would say a word on it. Sir, by far the ablest, by far the most plausible statement, I have ever seen of the case against us, is in a paper written shortly after the rejection of the Bill of 1873, by a most able man, one who was known personally to many hon. Members of this House, and, by his writings, to many more—one, Sir, unfortunately, too soon removed from the sphere he illustrated and adorned by his talents—I allude to the late Professor Cairns of Trinity College; and I am sure my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland will bear me out in what I say in praise of his great abilities. In the paper I allude to, after clearly and fairly stating our alleged grievance, he draws the following conclusion:—

“Nor can there be any doubt as to the one and one only remedy which would be adequate to meet the latter ground of complaint. One and one only remedy can satisfy the exigency—can place those who object to united education in open Colleges on an equal footing with those who accept the assistance of the State on those conditions—namely, the chartering and endowment, on a scale commensurate with the endowments of the National Universities, of a Catholic University, established on principles satisfactory to the Priesthood. Nothing short of this can place Ultramontane Catholics on an equal footing as regards the higher education with other members of the community; and the single question now for statesmen is, are they or are they not prepared to make this concession?”

Sir, I have confidence enough in the fairness and justice of English statesmen, and of the English people, to believe that they will make this concession when they realize—what we all know to be the case, and can prove—first, that this is really the grievance of the Catholics of Ireland and not of a mere minority; and, secondly, that it is in itself a reason—able and a substantial grievance; for, on the denial of one or other of these two points almost every argument against us is based. First of all, we are told that our grievance, such as it is, is not the grievance of the Catholics of Ireland but only of a small minority, which Professor Cairns would call an Ultramontane or Clerical faction. Sir, that is an argument which, no doubt, deserves the fullest consideration. My hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) has, however, dealt with it in the most conclusive manner, and shown, I think, clearly that, judged by whatever test you like, if ever there was a question which went home to the hearts and feelings of the vast majority of the Irish Catholics, it is this one. But, it is further urged that, even if this were a general Catholic grievance, still it is one of so peculiar a nature, so unreasonable in itself, as not to call for, or even to warrant, the interference of the State for its redress. It is so important the full significance of this argument should be patent to the House, that I venture to quote it in Professor Cairns's words—for he always had the full courage of his opinions—and he puts it most ably; but, at the same time, in all its crudeness and plainness. He says—

"To state my own view of this matter—while I admit the fact of inequality, I am disposed to deny the existence of a grievance in the sense of a disability which the State ought to redress. The State is undoubtedly bound to frame its laws impartially as between the several classes of citizens; but, as I understand the case, it is no part of the duty of the State to provide that all citizens shall derive equal benefit from the laws. This must depend, in part, at least, on the character and conduct and even on the idiosyncracies of those who are affected by them; and if it happen that in certain cases these are such as to exclude some people from the benefit of laws framed in good faith and with an enlightened regard to the interests of the community, as a whole, the unfortunate result is not to be attributed to unfairness in the law, but rather to the peculiarities of temperament or taste of the persons concerned—peculiarities which, so far as they go, unfit those who are the subjects of them for sharing in the general advantages of National union."

I think this is rather startling doctrine, and that it savours somewhat too much of intolerance to be acceptable to the House of Commons, at all events, in the 19th century. Why, it simply begs the whole question. It assumes that these laws are so absolutely impartial and perfect, that anyone who differs from them is unworthy of consideration; that his opinions may at once be disposed of by calling them idiosyncracies and peculiarities of taste and temper, and that they actually place him outside the pale of the law. Yet, I am glad to have cited the argument, for I am sorry to say it is a very popular one, constantly advanced against us; and from it the House may judge of the spirit in which opinions, at all events honest and legitimate, are too often met in Ireland. But, even apart from its spirit, an argument less likely to advance the practical question of educating Ireland, I cannot conceive; for, if it is to be acted upon, whatever other results it may have, it is certain to leave Ireland permanently without education. For my part, however, I fully admit that we may fairly be called on to justify our position, and to show not merely what our difficulty is, but that it is a reasonable and substantial difficulty; and to satisfy the House that we are not invoking the name of conscience as a Deus ex machina to come down and magnify some mere trumpery grievance. What, then, is this conscientious difficulty? Nobody, Sir, has more respect and admiration than I have for the past of Trinity College; I think it is a feeling which is shared, and certainly ought to be shared, by every Irishman; no one has a more sincere hope and expectation that the future of that Institution will be worthy of its great past; no one has more respect and regard than I have for my two hon. and learned Friends who so ably and so eloquently represent the University in this House; but, Sir, in the presence of my two hon. and learned Friends, I must say deliberately that the system of education offered by Trinity College to the Catholics of Ireland is neither more nor less than an organized attempt to bribe them to do, or to allow, or make their children do, what they know to be wrong—to bribe them, that is, by the offer of educational facilities of prizes and scholarships, and even by dangling before them the prospect, very distant, I admit, of a possible Fellowship; and, Sir, we know how difficult it is, especially in these days when education is so necessary, to resist such inducements. Of course, I need hardly say that in using the word bribery I do so not in any personal or offensive sense. I am merely trying to express, as accurately as I can, what I believe to be the case. Now, I am always very unwilling to suggest a comparison which may, even at first sight, appear extreme; but I must say that the more I consider this system, the less I can see what difference there is in kind between it and the old system on which the penal laws were founded. Because we all know that at a very early period in their existence, these laws ceased to inflict death or physical torture for religious opinions. In their most developed and advanced period, they became an elaborate system for literally bribing Catholics or Dissenters, by the offer of civil rights and liberties, and by the threat of being deprived of those rights and liberties, to leave a religion they believed to be true, and to conform to one they believed to be false. Of course, I admit the difference in degree; but, surely, liberty of conscience is not a question of degree? It is one of principle if anything is; nor, I think, does this House desire or claim to oppress consciences any more in small than in great matters. Professor Cairns reminds us, however, that some Catholics do send their sons to Trinity College and the Queen's Colleges, and hence, it is argued, it can be no violation of conscience. But that is a strange argument. For might it not as well be contended that because, under pressure of the penal laws, some Catholics did, as we know, conform to Protestantism, therefore, that pressure entailed no violation of conscience—which is absurd. This brings me to the most important part of the question. How far is our grievance practically felt?—that is, are we justified in maintaining, as we do, that to submit our children to a secular system of education is to expose to serious danger, if not to entire subversion, religious opinions which we think it essential they should hold? I think a moment's consideration will show that this position is not so unreasonable as it may at first sight appear to some people. I need hardly remind the House that the tone and tendencies of modern thought are diverging daily more and more from that older teaching, in which dogma, and revelation, and some sort of supernatural religion, were—as we think they ought to be—cardinal points. To illustrate this needs only the mention of such names as those of Mr. Mill and Mr.

Bain, Professors Huxley and Tyndall, Auguste Comte, Mr. Herbert Spencer, and so many more leaders of modern thought, who, though differing among themselves, all agree in this general direction. This is also so happily illustrated in a sentence, as yet unpublished, which fell lately from one of the foremost thinkers of the day—one, I may add, whom we are proud to claim as English, by adoption at all events—I mean Professor Max Müller—that perhaps the House will allow me to quote it. Speaking, as I am now, in illustration of the tendency of modern thought, he said—

“Every day, every week, every month, every quarter, the most widely-read journals seem just now to vie with each other in telling us that the time for religion is past; that faith is a hallucination or infantile disease; that the gods have at length been found out and exploded . . . . that we must now be satisfied with facts and finite things, and strike such words as ‘infinite,’ ‘supernatural,’ ‘divine,’ from the dictionary of the future.”

I think that the House will agree that this expression is as true as it is picturesque. Further it must be remembered that, of all the old systems, to none is this tone of thought more antagonistic than to ours. Views in accordance with it will, of course, prevail in educational institutions under a secular system, and they will work not only through the medium of Professors and lecture halls, but through the influence of the students on each other, and through the very atmosphere and tone and spirit of the place, which they must necessarily permeate. Therefore it is that, while to attend such teaching is not in itself equivalent to giving up religion, it is so grave a danger that, according to our principles, nothing can justify it except extreme necessity. Now, do you desire, or are you in any way justified in, forcing that extreme necessity on us? I do not believe you are, and therefore I contend that it is not unreasonable in us to protest and rebel against the application to Ireland, under present circumstances, at least, of what we are told is to be the future and immutable policy of this country in regard to education—that under no circumstances will the State give aid or endowment to any class or religious denomination as such. But here we are met with another objection. We are told—“You are very inconsistent; you are always asking to have the same laws applied to Ireland as to England, and yet, when we do apply them, you are not content." Sir, it is quite true, we do ask to have the same laws for Ireland as for England; but we ask for the same laws in effect, and not merely in words. There is nothing more disingenuous than to apply a formula of words to circumstances in themselves totally different, and to argue that you are producing the same effect. I can illustrate this in a moment. We all know what a powerful body the Church Party are in this country; we see their numerous Representatives in this House, many of them sitting opposite to us; and I am glad to think that, in these matters, at all events, they represent the opinions of the vast majority of this country. We know the views of that Party are just as strong as ours can be, as to the necessity for some connection between religion and education. Well, in the old Universities, and in that vast network and ramification of intermediate and grammar schools all over the country, they have ample scope and room for the fair application and development of their legitimate convictions; and, therefore, it is quite natural that they should assent to a policy which does them no injustice. But I should like to know this. Supposing that, by some freak of fortune, they were to find themselves suddenly placed in the same position as we are—that is, at the mercy of a system not merely indifferent, but in its working positively hostile and destructive—would they, in that case, with their numbers, with their influence, with their wealth, for one moment submit to such a policy? I am sure they would not. And is it right to ask us to submit to it merely because we happen to be weaker and poorer, though equally numerous in proportion? All we ask is a fair field and no favour; but we do ask to get a fair start, to be put on the same footing as others; we shall then be able to take care of ourselves, and shall be perfectly willing to accept a policy which will no longer place us at a disadvantage. But, Sir, I would also make an appeal to hon. Friends of mine on this side of the House, who combine with great zeal in the cause of education strong views as to the advantages of an entirely secular system, which they would like to introduce not only into Ireland, but into England and Scotland. Now, I would submit to my hon. Friends, whether, as they are not strong enough to force this system on England and Scotland, it is fair or generous to take advantage of our poverty and weakness to force it on us, and thus to keep us in a position of educational and religious inferiority to English Churchmen? But I would also point out to them that it is illogical besides, for that poverty and weakness, of which advantage is taken, are the direct results of the past oppression and misgovernment of Ireland, which my hon. Friends themselves are the very first to regret and deplore; and I do them the full justice to say that they have done a great deal to remedy some at least of the results of that unfortunate past; so that it is an illogical thing to use against us the consequences of those very antecedents which you deplore. But there are, I admit, two or three difficulties too serious to be passed over, but which, I think, I can, in a very few words, considerably smooth down; and I allude to them now because they appear to be felt especially by the hon. Gentlemen to whom I am appealing. Some of my hon. Friends are afraid that if the State were to do justice to our demands, by establishing a denominational University, such an Institution might fall too completely under the control of the Catholic Clergy. Well, to that my answer is very plain. I do not speak here with authority from anyone; but I have some knowledge of the opinions both of the laity and clergy, and of some of the most influential persons among the latter; and I say, without hesitation and without fear of contradiction, that neither laity nor clergy ask for, nor desire, nor would accept, any such control as is here indicated. Why, Sir, our clergy are the first to recognize that the secular education of men of the world must to a great extent, especially in these days, be developed and controlled by men of the world, who are versed in, and have themselves received, such an education. What we do ask for, and less than which we cannot and will not accept, is that necessary amount of control by the authorities of our Church which shall guarantee to us that the education shall be thoroughly Catholic in tone and spirit. We do not claim, we should not agree, to exclude a single branch of learning from our curriculum. We all recognize, and the clergy as much as any of us, that knowledge ought to be universal, and to include every aspect of knowledge; in fact, that knowledge of truth is not complete without knowledge of error. Only we claim to teach what we call truth as truth, and error as error, instead of leaving it to the accident of a Professor's own opinions—who may this year be a Comtist, next year a follower of Mr. Mill or Mr. Herbert Spencer, and the following year, perhaps, a Materialist or an Atheist—to inculcate what he pleases. We have a canon on which we claim to rely, and we consider we have a right to insist that our children shall be taught according to that canon. I appeal to everyone, whether our opinions, thus stated, fairly lay us open to the charge, so often made against us, of trying to keep up and revive a sort of mediæval obscurantism? Why, if those who make that charge would only investigate our opinions for themselves, they would see how utterly unfounded it is, and I trust they would have the candour to recognize its injustice. It is further objected, however, that under such a system public money might be spent in the direct teaching of religion. To that I can give an unqualified contradiction. We would guarantee that not one sixpence of public money should be devoted to anything but secular teaching. The necessary religious teaching would come from private sources. Of course, in such an institution, secular teaching would have a general tinge of religion through it; but that is the characteristic of denominational education, and would not, I understand, be objected to. But it is also urged that to establish such an institution might not be for the real interests of education in Ireland, for that the standard of learning might not be kept up to the proper level. To that, I can only say that we should be not only willing, but desirous, that the State should have such fair control, and take such securities, as should guard, as far as possible, against such a danger. That such securities might be devised is evident. This is not the moment to discuss in what form they might be most effective. That would depend upon the circumstances under which a denominational University was established; the State might, however, exercise control over the examinations; it might appoint a certain number of examiners; it might lay down rules and conditions under which degrees should be given. At all events, I undertake that we should co-operate heartily with the State, in securing that it should get full value in secular education, for every sixpence of public money which might be granted. And now, Sir, I have only one word to add. It is with reference to statements made at various times by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich; whose name, after all, is so intimately associated with all that is most hopeful in modern legislation for Ireland, that it is difficult to speak on such a subject as this without some allusion to him. Sir, no one has more right than the right hon. Gentleman to express an opinion as to the results of that legislation, in which he has borne such a part; and, certainly, I can say that no one's opinion is looked for with more eagerness and interest in Ireland than his. He has expressed that opinion very fully on more than one occasion. I think it was this time last year he did so at Birmingham, and again more recently in a great speech he delivered at Oxford in the winter; and on both occasions he expressed regret that after all he and his Friends had done for Ireland, the condition of that country, and I think he said especially the condition of the Irish Representation in this House, was not quite so satisfactory as he could desire. I am sure, Sir, I am not doing the right hon. Gentleman more than justice, when I say I think that expression arose not from the mere selfish regret that the Liberal Party were no longer able to count, as they hitherto could, on the support of the great majority of the Irish Members; but that it came from the broader and more generous regret, that so considerable a proportion of the representation of these three united Kingdoms, should appear to be alienated, or I will say removed, from cordial co-operation with one or other of the great Parties in the State, in what is surely the noblest outcome of Parliamentary life, the emulation and rivalry of Party in developing and advancing the interests of a great common Empire. That, Sir, is a regret which we may all share. But I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, when he considers the position in which we are placed with regard to this question, to say nothing of any other question, he can wonder if we find ourselves driven into some such course as he indicates? Because, if he is astonished, I would ask him whether he can suggest any alternative which we have not tried, any ordinary Constitutional means which we have not exhausted? Why, my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon has shown, in his complete and able statement, how we had exhausted every course, usque ad nauseam—and with what results? Sir, I am sure the right hon. Gentleman is not one to under-estimate the immense value of the boon for which we are seeking—namely, religious equality. It is one of those boons which benefits, I think, as much those who give it as those who receive it; but it is also one that those who would win and enjoy must show themselves worthy of, by being ready to labour for it, even, if necessary, under trying and painful conditions. I cannot, of course, foretell the issue of this struggle. It may not be more in us than in other mortals at any given moment to command success; but of this I am sure, and I know my countrymen enough to say it, that they will, by their determination and their perseverance, show that, at all events, they deserve, and will continue to deserve it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the present condition of University Education in Ireland is most unsatisfactory, and demands the immediate attention of Parliament, with the view of extending more generally and equally the benefits of such education,"—(Mr. Blennerhassett),—instead thereof.

MR. KING-HARMAN, in supporting the Amendment, said, the fact that the question demanded the attention of the House had been proved by the repeated attempts which had been made to bring it before the House by means of Bills and otherwise. It had been asserted that a portion of the people of Ireland were not in favour of granting higher education to Catholics, but he never heard such a statement made in Ireland or by an Irishman. For the objection which had been urged to the system of University education desired by the Roman Catholics, that it would place education in the hands of the priests, no ground had been shown. No sane Irishman, possessing education himself or appreciating the advantages of education, would do what the opponents of Catholic education in Ireland asserted would be the effect of the proposed change, and allow the entire education of the rising generation of the country to be handed over entirely to the priesthood without any supervision on the part of the State. The people of Ireland, he believed, would decline to send their children to be educated at Colleges conducted on any such system, and such Colleges would not pay. The people and the priesthood, too, were perfectly able to understand that, and all they demanded was a better system than now existed, in order that the children might receive a comprehensive and not a dwarfed and bigoted education. He agreed generally that as regarded their education the Catholic youth of Ireland were not placed on a fair footing with their Protestant countrymen—that they had to start in the race of life unfairly handicapped and weighted, whereas it was the duty of the State to deal equally with all classes.

MR. JOHN GEORGE MACCARTHY:

As I do not often trespass on the attention of the House, I hope you will allow me to tell you calmly and frankly what is thought on this subject by Catholics of the middle class in Ireland. Of course, hon. Members from this side of the Channel cannot know this of their own knowledge. The great majority of the Members of the House—that majority with whom the decision of all questions respecting the most important and intricate domestic concerns of Ireland ultimately rests—have never even set foot in Ireland. Such Members can only form their opinions of Irish affairs from Blue Books, Parliamentary debates, and newspaper articles; or, to use the German phrase, they evolve their conclusions from the depths of their own consciousness—an obviously hazardous process. Hon. Members who do favour us with an occasional visit come to see the Giant's Causeway, the Phoenix Park, and the Lakes of Killarney, or to get a little hunting or fishing. We try to make them as pleasant as we can, and to bore them with our grievances as little as possible. They know scarcely anything of the problems which weigh on an Irish father's heart, and are discussed in family council at Irish firesides. But I believe you would like to know. You do not wish to do us a cruel injustice. You would be fair to us if you knew how. Above all, you do not seriously intend to curse our homes and our children's lives with the deadliest of all curses—the curse of ignorance. Now I have some right to speak for Irish Roman Catholics of the middle class. I belong to that class. I know all about it from my earliest years. You may rely on what I tell you. I am not a politician in any Party sense. I have no quarrel with anybody in this House or out of it. I want nothing from anybody in this House or out of it. On account of professional duties I am rarely able to attend here. When I come it is to try and do some good, and there is scarcely any good I have so much at heart as that which is involved in the question now before you. Listen, then, while I tell you how we Irish Roman Catholics of the middle class are circumstanced in this matter, and how we feel about it. Having made some money in commerce or in the professions, we are intensely, perhaps unduly, anxious that our sons should obtain the advantages of the higher intellectual training from which, owing chiefly to the defects of your past legislation, we ourselves were debarred. We are, at the same time, honestly attached to our glorious old Church, and we would not, even to secure for our sons the advantages of education, violate our religious convictions. The problem, then, with us is how to get for our sons the advantages of the higher culture without sacrificing our religious principles? This ought not to be an insoluble problem, seeing that it has been solved in nearly every Christian age and country. Looking around us, then, we see the State has, in fact, furnished munificent endowments for academic education in Ireland. There is Trinity College, with its £60,000 a-year, fed by endowed schools with an annual income of over £70,000 more. I do not say a word against Trinity College—the illustrious Alma Mater of Boyle and Berkely, of Goldsmith and Moore, of Grattan and Flood, of Galbraith, of Lecky, and of Isaac Butt—an University so brilliantly represented by both the hon. Members who sit for it in this House. The only thing I have to observe about Trinity College is that we Irish Roman Catholics are virtually excluded from it. In its traditions, in its government, in its habits, in its moral atmosphere, Trinity College is Protestant; in theory it has latterly become Secularist. To both Protestantism and Secularism, but especially to Secularism, we Irish Roman Catholics have conscientious objections. We have no quarrel with our Protestant or Secularist neighbours, but we object to our sons being reared on the Protestant or Secularist system, just as you would object to your sons being reared on the Catholic system. Hence, as a matter of fact, and by the necessities of the case, we are virtually excluded from Trinity College with all its splendid endowments, its able teaching, and its well-won ancient fame. Turn now to the Queen's Colleges. These offer us great advantages, and, in many respects, just of the kind we want. They have palatial buildings in three of our provincial cities. They give excellent education almost for nothing. Their Professors are able, learned, and zealous. They offer prizes and scholarships with both hands. They grant academic degrees with a charming facility. They have some £40,000 a-year from Parliament. But they are founded on a principle to which it is notorious we, Irish Roman Catholics, have conscientious objections. I am not here to argue the theological grounds for these objections. It is enough that we hold them, and we are entitled to hold them. We have as good a right to our religious principles as any other subjects of the Queen—nay, as the Queen's Majesty herself—and we have a right, too, that these convictions shall place us under no Civil disability whatever. Hence, by the necessities of the case, and as a matter of fact, we are excluded from the Queen's Colleges just as we are excluded from Trinity College. Where, then, in Ireland, are we to send our sons for University education? There is absolutely nowhere. You have, practically, closed against our sons the doors of all your State Institutions, by refusing to open them except on conditions which you know we cannot conscientiously accept. In this difficulty, we subscribed a large sum to get up a

University of our own. But you refuse this Institute the slightest status as a University. You will not give a shilling of endowment, or the power of conferring the humblest degree. Hence, it is no rhetorical exaggeration, but the strictest and most measured statement of the fact, to say that as matters now stand you virtually exclude our sons from the advantages of the higher education. It is a virtual exclusion to grant a thing only on a condition which you know cannot be accepted. It reminds one of the generosity of the famous Governor of Valladolid who told the Jews settled in that city that they should have plenty of meat, but on one condition—it must be all pork. You will give us plenty of education—plenty, but on one condition—it must be just of the peculiar and exceptional kind which you know we cannot conscientiously accept. Of course, a few of us are tempted by the advantages you offer to disregard our religious convictions, just as I suppose some of the Jews of Valladolid were tempted by the sweet odours of roast pork. There are 75 Roman Catholic lads in Trinity, and 225 in the Queen's Colleges—300 University students out of 4,000,000 of Irish Roman Catholics. But these are only the exceptions which prove the rule. Three hundred students out of 4,000,000 are an utterly miserable proportion. Scotland, with a lesser population, yields 4,000 University students. Bavaria, with a lesser population, yields 8,000 University students. Of the total population of Scotland, 1 in every 1,000 enjoys University education; in Germany, 1 in every 2,600; in England, 1 in every 5,800; but of the Roman Catholics of Ireland there is only 1 University student in every 15,000 of the population. These, then, are the facts of the case. Permit me now to point out some of the results of this state of facts. One result is that Irish Protestants have a virtual monopoly of the advantages of University education in Ireland. We Irish Roman Catholics do not grudge our Protestant fellow-countrymen any real advantages whatever. We would wish to multiply those advantages a hundred-fold. But we do grudge them monopoly. We do protest against ascendancy. In this matter you give them a present monopoly, and you provide for them a future ascendancy. £60,000 a-year for Trinity College, £70,000 a-year for Endowed

Schools, £40,000 a-year for the Queen's Colleges, £30,000 a-year for Model Schools—all these vast endowments are supplied for what is, practically, the almost exclusive use of one-fifth of the Irish community, and that precisely the fifth, which, by its wealth and its traditional culture, is least in want of endowment. This House boasts of a generous instinct for fair play. I ask, is this fair play? This House boasts of its staunch adherence to the principle of religious equality. Is this equality? Why adjust your endowments for academic education, so that, practically, the Protestant minority get all, and the Catholic majority nothing? But there is more in the matter than present disadvantage. There is future ascendancy. Having abolished Protestant ascendancy of one kind, you are steadily creating a Protestant ascendancy of another kind—a kind far more powerful, more splendid, and more enduring than the former, because it will be an ascendancy of knowledge over ignorance, of trained and cultivated intellects over intellects that you have virtually excluded from the higher training, and the nobler and more liberal culture. Anyone acquainted with Irish affairs knows that this influence is operating. Already you have handicapped our sons in the race of life; you stamp them with social and intellectual inferiority. Trinity College, the Queen's Colleges, and the endowed schools, are sending out Protestant lads every day who have been thoroughly trained at the expense of the State, and who have wisely and honourably availed themselves of that training. Cæteris paribus, these lads must carry off the prizes of life from those whom the State virtually excludes from its Universities and Colleges. I once called your attention to wasted land, I now call attention to wasted intellect. In all our towns and districts, there are thousands of lads growing up in ignorance and indolence who, if they had received fair educational advantages, would be in receipt of good salaries, and in the discharge of useful duties. Nor is this confined to Ireland only—the disadvantage follows our lads to the Colonies. In a celebrated letter, Sir Gavan Duffy has told us how his heart gets sick at seeing the troops of Irish Roman Catholic lads seeking their fortunes in the Colonies, full of pluck and of natural talent, but with almost every avenue to fortune barred against them by their inferiority in education. Again, permit me to point out that those whom you virtually exclude are precisely those to whom, on account of the admitted errors of your past legislation, this House owes the amplest reparation. Remember, you actually forbade knowledge to our fathers. You made it a felony for any Irish Catholic to teach. You made it misdemeanour for an Irish Roman Catholic to learn. You maintained these disabilities for generations. Their results still remain. We Irish Roman Catholics have not the traditional culture, the long-descended lore of those for whose education the State has always munificently provided. Even those of us who have become learned, like those of us who have become rich, want the refinement which only the ages mature. Hence, as Lord Emly recently pointed out, we have a clear case for compensation—

Again, permit me to point out, this evil, so far from being limited to University Education, only commences with it. The University is the keystone of the academic arch. Remove it, and the whole educational edifice tumbles into confusion. Listen for a moment, while I read for you a brief extract from the Report of Lord Taunton’s Commission, showing how the Scotch Universities influence the whole intellectual life of Scotland—

“In every corner of Scotland—in the Islands as well as in the Highlands, among the shepherds of the Grampians and the fishermen of Argyleshire, as well as among the weavers of Paisley and the colliers of Ayr and Dumfries—the influence of one or other of the four Universities is keenly felt, not merely through the connection of the parochial schoolmasters—many of whom take University degrees—and the Governors of their churches with the Universities; but because the cheapness and the elementary character of University education renders it accessible to a very large proportion of the population, and the desire to attend the Universities is so strong and so active as to be a real cultivating force amongst the whole population. The poorest rural school strives to prepare its pupils for intermediate schools, or for the Universities. Schools in general are better attended on account of the stimulus given by the Universities to the desire for knowledge: the prospect of concluding his education with a University course, and of winning a competitive course is present to the mind of every clever boy of every class, even the poorest throughout the whole Kingdom.”

It is thus a University in harmony with the wishes and sympathies of the people’s works. Take the converse of all this, and you will see what you have done for education amongst the Roman Catholics of Ireland. One of the chief organs of English opinion, The Pall Mall Gazette, has recently declared that—“It is hardly possible to exaggerate the destitution of the Roman Catholics of Ireland in respect to education.” Primary education, intermediate education, collegiate education, are all in confusion. The Lord Lieutenant recently called attention to the astounding fact that there is a third of our population which does not even know how to read. Your own Census Commissioners report to you that—

“Something essentially wrong underlies the whole system of public instruction in Ireland.” That the “higher intellectual life of the country is starved and dwarfed,” and that “not a moment is to be lost before those upon whom the care lies should apply their faculties to the infusion of blood and spirit into the dry bones of public instruction in Ireland.”

But the system has larger than even educational results. The monstrous and cruel injustice of refusing to our sons the advantage of the higher education, except on a condition which you know we cannot conscientiously accept, is producing amongst the middle class in Ireland a rankling sense of injustice, which may have the most disastrous ulterior consequences. There seems to them no resource from one or other of two conclusions. Either this House is utterly incompetent to understand Irish affairs, or else it is deliberately sacrificing to the dictates of an ignoble bigotry the educational interests of 4,000,000 of the subjects of the Queen. It is utterly absurd to deny the existence of this grievance. Nearly all your greatest Parliamentary authorities have long ago admitted it. Ten long years ago the late Lord Mayo, as Chief Secretary for Ireland, on a debate on Mr. Maguire’s Motion, is reported by Hansard to have said—

“There exists a large class in Ireland to whom the system adopted at neither University—that is of Dublin or the Queen’s—is acceptable, and who therefore decline to avail themselves of the advantages they offer. There is a large number of persons who object to send their sons to a University where the only religion taught is one that they do not profess, and there are also many who will not send their sons to a College where religious teaching does not form a portion of the system of education. Are these objections unreasonable? I ask this House to consider whether there are not many among us who would have the same objection to send their sons to Universities where the Roman Catholic religion alone was taught, or where all religious instruction was studiously omitted."—[3 Hansard, cxc. 1382.]

And in a Memorandum drawn up in March, 1868, and printed by order of the House of Commons, he said—

"A just claim exists for the creation of a University of a denominational character, which would offer the like advantages to those whose conscientious scruples prevent availing themselves of the instructions offered in the Trinity College and the Queen's Colleges."

The right hon. Gentleman the late Prime Minister is reported by Hansard to have said, 10 years ago—

"I think we feel now, that the Roman Catholics of Ireland . . . have, with respect to education, a real and admitted grievance—namely, that if they seek for their children that kind of education which is called denominational, they are subject to detriment in regard to certain civil rights on account of their conscientious belief. I need not say that in my view no new method of dealing with the higher education in Ireland can be satisfactory, which shall not provide an effectual remedy for that real grievance. . . . Above all, if we be just men, we shall go forward in the name of truth and right, bearing this in mind, that when the case is proved, and the hour is come, justice delayed is justice denied."—[Ibid. 1750-1771.]

The present Prime Minister was not less explicit. In the same debate, 10 years ago, he said—

"I am of opinion that there is but one mode by which you can supply the grievous want that has been so long complained of by the Roman Catholics of Ireland—namely, that they cannot enjoy the advantages of a higher education under the influence of their own priesthood, and that is by the establishment of a Roman Catholic University. And I want to know on what ground of justice such a proposition can be refused."—[Ibid. cxc. 1777.]

I now earnestly ask all who wish well to Ireland to give this question a frank and generous consideration. It concerns nothing less than the utilization and development of the intelligence of the whole Kingdom, now running to waste. You love liberty, do not deny to your fellow-citizens the liberty which is of the essence of all liberty—liberty of education. Of old the sumptuary laws decreed that a man should wear only one particular cut and colour of coat. This was mildness itself compared with decreeing that a man should be educated only in one particular shape and hue of mind. If a choice must be made, regulate the coats if you will, but let our minds be free. You hate persecution for conscience sake. This is persecution for conscience sake. On principle, it is just as clearly persecution to deny a right as to inflict a wrong. You denied education to our fathers; surely, you will not persist in denying it to our sons! Whatever may be the faults of the Irish people, their bitterest enemy has never denied them a passionate love of knowledge. Time was when your ancestors came to Ireland to learn, when our ancestors went to England to teach. In the dark penal days, when your law made learning a misdemeanour, and teaching a felony, we kept the sacred lamp of knowledge burning in the poor mud hut and by the bleak hill-side. In latter days, we strained every nerve to get our children the culture we love; but you deliberately render our efforts fruitless, by refusing the legal sanction and public endowment which you only can give. After all, is it so unreasonable to ask you to concede to the Irish Roman Catholics what even Prince Bismarck still concedes to the German Roman Catholics, and what you yourselves freely grant to the Catholics of Australia and the Catholics of Canada; nay, to the Pagan Hindoos. I know the Hindoos are just now great favourites, and I wish to speak of them with all respect and to treat them with all justice. But I venture to suggest that if a time of real danger to the Empire came, it would be better to have at your side the well-trying valour of the Irish race than all your dusky legionaries from Indus or Ganges. Is it so unhealthy for a great community to have its children reared religiously? Is it the function of Parliament to prevent men being reared religiously. In France, a great orator and politician recently declared—

"The notion of God is the root of all social error; we must give God notice to quit; above all, we must expel Him from the schools; we must take care that the new generation shall not know God."

Surely, this is not the doctrine to be practically adopted and enforced by the British House of Commons. Sad, indeed, would be the day when such a creed rules this House. Even the wise old Pagans knew better than this. In sweet and stately eloquence, Plato taught the Greeks, and Cicero the Romans, that nations grow great, and calm, and free, not in proportion to their armies, or their navies, or their treasures, but in proportion as religion grows in the hearts, and virtue in the lives, of the people. Every State, every society, all order, every man's rights, the peace of every home, the safety of every woman depends on two things, and on two things only—physical force and moral principle. Unhappy is the State that depends on physical force alone. To such State will come, as to such States even in our own days have come, ruin, and blood, and robbery, and shame. But happy is that land—whether it be rich or poor—where religion reigns in the hearts and homes of the people, maintaining order not by feeble and transitory force from without, but by the strong and abiding principle within, curbing the vagaries of intellect, restraining the power of passion, making man more manly, making woman more womanly, making all more wise and gentle; teaching moderation, and justice, and obedience to law as only religion can teach them, and illumining the dusty, weary ways of common life with the hopes and the radiance of another world.

MR. PLUNKET said, he should not trouble the House at any length, as he had already had several opportunities of speaking on the subject, but he felt bound to make a few remarks, since the question closely affected the University which he had the honour to represent. While he was well satisfied with the moderation with which the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) had brought the question before the House, and admitting that moderation had distinguished the utterances of some of the hon. Members who had supported it, he could not allow that the arguments of some of those hon. Members were strictly accurate. The Resolution of the hon. Member for Roscommon was one which stated that University education in Ireland was unsatisfactory, and called upon the House immediately to deal with the subject. He was aware that the deficiency of Irish University education had often been described in that House in glowing terms by eminent men; but when they came to facts and figures, and set aside the religious grievance—although he did not say there was not room for improvement—he thought they would see that the position of University education in Ireland was not extremely unsatisfactory. The facts were stated in the course of a former debate on the same subject by the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair), and he did not remember that the statement then made had been contradicted since. The figures stood thus—In England there was 1 University student in 3,700 of the population, while in Ireland there was 1 for every 2,800 of the population. Ireland was, therefore, better off in that respect than England, while, he admitted, Scotland was better off still, having 1 University student in 860 of the population. But when his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh came to test the question by the number of Art degrees conferred after examination, he showed that not only was Ireland better off than England in that respect, but that she was better off even than Scotland—the number produced annually being for England, in one year, 750, or 1 in 30,000 of the population; in Scotland, 130, or 1 in 26,000; in Ireland, 338, or 1 in 16,000 of the population. Well, that being so, he came to the question whether the Roman Catholics of Ireland were in an unfair position as regarded the number of their University students. He did not mean to deny that there were a certain number of Roman Catholic young men not attending a University who would go to a recognized Roman Catholic University if there were one. What he said was this, that hon. Gentlemen who supported the Motion ought to be able to make out a strong case. How did the case stand? Was it contended that the University endowment for the Roman Catholics should be proportionate to that enjoyed by the other denominations? Well, if they took the basis of the population, the argument would carry them too far. If, on the other hand, they took the number of the classes at all likely to contribute to the number of University students, then, unfortunately, the argument could not carry them far enough. This he did not assert in any spirit of ascendancy. It was a well known fact that in the upper classes in

Ireland, in the Professions, and even in the upper middle class, there were not a sufficient number of Roman Catholics to sustain the argument put forward by hon. Gentlemen opposite. But then it was said—What about the Divinity schools? As the case had been presented, there were a vast number of Roman Catholic students studying for the Church, but not in a University. That fact cut against the argument used as to proportion. He should be glad that all possible inducements should be held out to Roman Catholic young men studying for the Church to attend a University. But what was said when the Irish Church was disestablished and disendowed? Did the proposition now made amount to this—that the Irish Church having been disendowed, Maynooth should be re-endowed? If that were so, it ought to be declared. He had to complain that hon. Gentlemen opposite never stated what they actually desired. They said—“Oh, only make a proposal, and you will find us most conciliatory.” What they ought to do was to state plainly what they required. Did they require that Roman Catholic Divinity students should be separately educated—separately, as regarded the lay students of their own Church? Was that system to be maintained? But the real reason, in his opinion, why there were not more Roman Catholic University students, was that there were not greater facilities in existence for good intermediate education. In that view, he quite concurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). They had the promise of Her Majesty's Government that they meant to deal with that question; but if the Estimates were discussed over and over again, as they had been, it would be impossible for the Government to carry out their undertaking. This he believed, that strict denominational endowments were impossible, and those who expected them would be disappointed. He must further say that some of the statements made by the hon. Members opposite would mislead, if they stood alone, although he was sure there was no intention to mislead. There were at present in the University in Dublin a considerable number of Catholics availing themselves of all its advantages. So there were many Catholics in the Queen's Colleges. He would not be certain about the exact figures. There were at present in the Queen's Colleges 886 students, and of these 230 were Catholics. In Dublin University there were 1,200 students, and of these about 100 were Catholics. Of course, that was a very great disproportion, and he was not prepared to say that there was nothing to complain of; but he thought he had said enough to show that, as a practical question of figures, the case had been overstated. The hon. Member for Roscommon had referred briefly to the history of the question, and it was well known that almost every Government for the last 30 years had endeavoured to deal with it. When the Queen's Colleges were founded, it was supposed that the difficulty had been settled, and it was at that time believed that the demands put forward in this House on behalf of the Leaders of the Roman Catholic Church had been fairly met. He would not dwell on the disastrous episode in the career of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich; but, in all the attempts which had been made there was one thing wanting, and that was a definite undertaking as to the amount of control which was to be given to the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church. That was the real difficulty which arose, and he was afraid if the temper of the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic Church was the same now as it was during Lord Mayo's time, the prospects of a settlement had not improved. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick brought in a Bill remarkable for its ingenuity, but what did it all come to? It amounted to vesting absolute control in the most important matters in the Catholic Hierarchy. The appointment and dismissal of Professors, books to be admitted and excluded—all that power was, in the last resort, vested in the Archbishops and Bishops of the Catholic Church. At this time of day, and in the face of Oxford and Cambridge, and the Universities of the Continent, the astounding proposal was made that no book was to be added to the Dublin University except with the consent of the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland. Everybody knew no Government would sanction such a retrogressive step as that. It was not fair of hon. Members now to come forward and say—“Unless you proceed to deal with this question you are doing a great injustice to Ireland,” when hon. Members knew very well that successive Governments had done their best to grapple with the question. He did not wish to say a word which might prejudice any fair proposal that might be brought forward in the sense suggested by the right hon. Member for the University of London. On that proposal, he would not at present offer any opinion favourable or unfavourable to it. But it was said that if they would not level up, they must level down; he had no fear that such a gloomy forecast of prophecy would be realized. There were, as he had said, at the Queen's University 886 students, of whom 230 were Roman Catholics; and at Trinity College, Dublin, 1,200 students, of whom about 100 were Roman Catholics; and at these Universities the students were receiving an education in all respects equal to that given at the Universities of England and Scotland. They were, probably, receiving a more practical education for the work-a-day wants of the Irish people than Oxford or Cambridge would afford them. The two Irish Universities were now absolutely open and free; they were not, by tests or otherwise, more inaccessible to one religious denomination than another; as a matter of fact, many Catholics did attend them; was it not then most unreasonable to say that they should be interfered with because there were other Roman Catholics who would not avail themselves of the advantages they offered? The £43,000 of endowments enjoyed by Trinity College was employed so as to confer the fullest advantage on the 1,200 students, they were provided with museums and libraries, commons and chambers, and all the ordinary incidents of University life, and fair encouragement in the way of prizes. But there were no sinecures; all the Professors and tutors were teaching Professors and all the fellows tutor fellows; full value was given for every penny received. A vast amount of light was being given out from day to day by the assistance and under the protection of State endowment; and that all this life, energy, and usefulness should terminate because some Irishmen would not benefit by them, was a proposal which no man would venture who realized what such advantages were worth, and which certainly no Irishman would make who knew the history of the University. It anticipated the other Universities in admitting all to its degrees, and reformed its Governing Body. There had been a steady increase in the number of Roman Catholic students since the disestablishment of the Irish Church. In the preceding eight years the number was 175, and in the subsequent eight years the number had been 254. Whatever else might be done by the House, he felt certain it would regard wild proposals of wholesale destruction as having no foundation in reason, and as opposed to common sense and to the interests of the country. The Governing Body of Dublin University were ready to accept all suggestions that could be made for furthering the policy on which they had entered. He had no wish to oppose the full and fair consideration of all the arguments which had been adduced by hon. Members opposite; but he must maintain that no case had been made out for the disendowment of all existing University Institutions, and he should support the Government if they felt inclined to meet the Resolution by moving the Previous Question.

MR. SYNAN said, he must deny that the Roman Catholic Prelates had, as was alleged, impeded the settlement of this question by their unreasonable opposition. It was true that there was a diplomatic conference between the Irish Catholic hierarchy and the late Lord Mayo, in which the latter had the victory. But it would be admitted that in that kind of encounter the victory did not always incline to the right cause. It appeared that the Irish Bishops had, in the opinion of Lord Mayo, asked too much; and he at once, without giving them the opportunity of moderating their proposals, broke off the correspondence, in order to conciliate a powerful Opposition and a discontented party of supporters. He thought Irish Members had reason to complain that the House had refused to read the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick a second time, although the objections raised to it in debate were such as were only suited for discussion in Committee. However, the interest excited by former debates on the subject was greater than that now indicated by empty benches, which were no augury for the success of the Resolution, particularly after the speech they had just heard. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Plunket) who had just spoken contended that the supporters of the Resolution had made out no case, and, taking the statement of the right hon. Member for Edinburgh University, said that the proportion of University students and graduates in Scotland was less than in Ireland. But the fact was that Scotland, with a population of 3,860,000, had 5,000 students, while Ireland, with a population of nearly 6,000,000, had only 1,900. Thus it appeared that Scotland had nearly three times as many students as Ireland. The number of lay Catholic students in Ireland passing through intermediate schools was 1,413, but how many were in the Universities getting degrees? According to his hon. and learned Friend, 100 in Trinity College, but the Returns showed there were only 75; while in the Queen's Colleges there were 280, so that there was a proportion of nearly 1,500 students to 305 who were seeking degrees. His hon. and learned Friend had said that there was no real grievance. But the Declaration of 1870, which was signed by two lieutenants of counties, 30 deputy lieutenants, 300 magistrates, 10 Queen's Counsel, 500 or 600 mayors, town councillors, and Poor Law Guardians—classes which supplied students—declared that there was. This was not all. The right hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan) presented a Petition the other day upon this subject, having the names attached of six Peers, 352 deputy lieutenants and magistrates, 40 Members of Parliament, and 33,978 members of corporations, Poor Law Guardians, and landed proprietors. Yet, in the face of these two documents, they were told that the people of Ireland had no grievance on this matter. What were the numbers of the Roman Catholic population? 4,500,000. How many students in the University represented that population? Only 305. The Declaration of the Roman Catholic laity proved that this was not an ecclesiastical or an imaginary grievance. What was the reason Catholic parents did not send their children in greater numbers to these Institutions? It was because they objected to send them to any Colleges for University education, or to any University for degrees, where they had not a guarantee and a protection for their faith and morals. Surely, the present was not a time to speak with contempt and indifference of such a feeling on the part of the Catholic laity of Ireland? When the English education question was before the House, hon. Gentlemen opposite invoked the assistance of Irish Members, and they gave their assistance in favour of denominational education. They must, therefore, admit that this was a practical grievance. The Queen's Colleges were founded in 1845; surely, they had been long enough on trial? Yet what had they done? They had entirely failed, as had been predicted from the first they would fail, and the secularization of the University of Dublin had also failed to attract Catholic students to Trinity College. He would not allow any man to tell him that he was there to represent any clerical body—he represented the Irish Catholic laity. With reference to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) as to the encouragement of middle-class education, how would that better the position of Roman Catholics as to University education? The Bill of 1873 would have been applicable to the case had it not been altered by the supporters of the right hon. Member for Greenwich; but it was proposed to be altered, and it then provoked the hostility of the Irish Members. It had been proposed to be turned into a secular Bill, and was lost on the second reading. The Bill of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) promised to open Fellowships and Scholarships to the Catholics of Ireland; but what had been the results? In five years there had been an increase of seven Catholic students. Could that be considered a satisfactory state of things? But he had been long enough in addressing empty benches. He trusted the Government would be true to the principles they had always avowed of being—the friends of denominational education—and would, by adopting the present Resolution, lay the basis of a system of University education in Ireland, and render it worthy of the nation.

MAJOR NOLAN observed, that the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had accused the Irish Members of exaggerating the case of the Catholics of Ireland in regard to that question; but the figures given by that hon. and learned Member himself proved that the case of the Catholics was almost incapable of being exaggerated. They could have no object in overstating their case, and the want was so extreme that no good would be effected by placing it in a worse light. The figures which the hon. and learned Member had brought forward showed that out of 1,200 students in Trinity College, only 100 were Catholics, and that, taking the relative proportions of the population belonging to the two denominations, there were in Ireland only one twenty-sixth part as many Catholics as there were Protestants receiving University education. If they took England, there would be 20 times as many receiving University education in proportion to the population as there would be in the case of Catholics in Ireland. In Scotland there would be 60 times as many. The want of University education amongst the Catholic population of Ireland could not be exaggerated, being, in the lowest case, 20 to 1, and ranging up to 60 to 1. The real question was, how that enormous disparity was to be remedied. If they allowed that unsatisfactory state of things to remain, it would tend more and more to divide the community in Ireland into two classes—an upper and rich class of Protestants, and a lower and poor class of Catholics. That was a result which, for many reasons, was extremely undesirable for the sake both of England and of Ireland. New reasons had come into force within the last 20 years which increased the evils of this marked division. There was, for instance, the introduction of competitive examinations, which, if the present system of education was continued, would result in placing the Protestants in Government situations, to the exclusion of the Catholics. The result would be that the poorer Catholics would take very little interest in the affairs of the country. Again, it must be remembered that there were many Irishmen who went to America. Some of these returned to Ireland, having acquired, not a University education, but a knowledge of life and of facts of great importance, leading them and others to the conclusion that the Americans were the cleverest of men. In excluding from the Catholics—that was, the great mass of the population of Ireland—the advantages of education, a Government pursued a policy which would, taken in connection with the close association of Ireland and America, do much to prepare a sort of hotbed for revolutionary ideas, whence they would be communicated to England. There was no wish on the part of the supporters of the Motion to endow a new Maynooth. No doubt some of the Maynooth students might avail themselves of a degree at an Irish University; but what the people of Ireland asked in the way of State aid in this matter was really only for their own money, as they sent over a large amount of money annually for Imperial purposes. The object was to obtain a high-class Catholic University education, and it would be to the advantage of any truly Imperial Government who wished to gain strength from Ireland, and not to have it as a thorn in their side, to allow the Catholic clergy and the Catholic laity to have some common footing with the Protestant clergy and society in regard to high-class education. As matters now stood, there was no outward or visible sign to associate the Catholics with the learned members of the community. The Catholics were educated as a class apart, and there were no means of showing that they had been educated to the same point as the Protestant clergy. If the system were such as to afford Catholics a higher class of education, and place them on a more equal footing with their Protestant fellow-countrymen, it would tend to make them look with somewhat more favour on the Imperial system of Government. It had been argued that intermediate education ought to precede University education in Ireland. The Irish people would be only too thankful if they could get either; but, although they were assured at the beginning of the Session that a Bill would be introduced with reference to intermediate education in Ireland, the Session was already far advanced, there was no sign of such a measure, and he was afraid that intermediate education would fall through. A University would be a natural centre from which Professors could be sent to intermediate schools, and without a University the teachers of those schools would have no common bond of union. He did not believe that there could be a system of intermediate education, unless it was accompanied by University education; because, without a University to go to, there would not be that prize, that incentive to study

among the more clever youth who would aspire to a University education. The hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin said the Roman Catholic Members from Ireland did not tell the House what they wanted. In the Bill introduced by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, they told the House exactly what they wanted. One fault of that Bill was that it went into too much detail. But they did not bind themselves to that Bill. They said they would be satisfied with the passing of that Bill, or of something like it. The hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin said the Roman Catholics of Ireland ought to be satisfied with the Queen's Colleges. How could they be satisfied with Colleges against which they had always protested? It was not the policy of hon. Members opposite to level down, because the levelling-down process had a tendency to spread, and what commenced with a few Irish Colleges might extend with great rapidity to more important Institutions nearer home. It was true that some 50 or 60 years ago many Catholic families, bribed by the offers of advantages in the Services and in the Medical Profession, sent their sons to Dublin University; but that was not so much the case now. Apart from the religious side of the question, nothing much was to be said against Dublin University, because the education it gave was of a high class; but that Institution had never been so associated with the great portion of the Catholic body, that they should shrink from disendowing it if necessary. Among other schemes which had been proposed to meet the educational difficulty was that of establishing a system of bonuses, by which the Catholic youths of Ireland were to be allowed to compete for money prizes. Such a system would not be altogether bad, especially if the Queen's Colleges and the Dublin University were disendowed so as to prevent their students from having a monopoly of the prizes. It would, however, be difficult to prevent students trained at the English and Scotch Universities from coming over and competing for the prizes. To establish a system of Examining Boards would be but an indifferent solution of the question. It had been said that the people of England would never consent to the establishment of a Catholic University; but his opinion was that the more the franchise was extended, the greater chance was there of justice being done to Ireland. The people of England sympathized with their Irish fellow-subjects, and would not refuse to comply with their reasonable demands. It was of the greatest importance to England that she should go forth as the champion of religious liberty; and, therefore, it was most shortsighted to give the Irish nation cause for complaining that religious liberty was denied to it.

MR. MORRIS said, that it was with some diffidence that he addressed the House, because in the city which he had the honour of representing a Queen's College was established. Certainly it was not his intention to say one word in disparagement of that Institution in any way. He thought that it was a subject which, if understood, could be argued on broad and plain issues. To say that University education in Ireland was unsatisfactory, was to anyone who knew Ireland but to utter a truism. Many things had been propounded for the benefit of Ireland, and many subjects relating to her internal affairs had been brought forward. There was one, however, with regard to which he could speak in the name of the Catholics of Ireland as demanding, certainly, the greatest attention which could be possibly given to any subject—and that was the question of University intermediate education. He had the honour of a seat in that House 10 years ago, when Lord Mayo took the settlement of the question in hand. He, for one, had ever since regretted that the question was not then settled upon the bases of the terms then offered. At that time, however, another system and another principle was introduced into the House and carried out—and that was the system of levelling down. He was one of those who had always protested against that system, and he trusted that it would never be adopted except under circumstances of extreme pressure. He considered, however, that if this question of education was not settled in some way which would be satisfactory to the Catholics of Ireland, the levelling down system should be adopted. He did not use the expression in any way as a threat. He trusted that the Government would try and ascertain whether it was not possible to settle the question on somewhat similar terms to those proposed by Lord Mayo. There was a rumour that some kind of intermediate education was to be adopted on the levelling-up system, and that the surplus from the revenues of the Church was to come forward in the shape of competitive prizes. He was not, however, going to enter into that question; but he thought that the Government might go a little further and adapt it to a system of University education. As matters now stood, many of the Catholic middle-class were deprived of the advantages of the Queen's Colleges in Ireland, because they did not like to send their sons to them under the system which now existed. Those people felt that a system of education without religion was false and injurious. A greater benefit could not be conferred on Ireland than the establishment, upon a proper basis, of a liberal and true system of education.

MR. A. MOORE thought the Government were in an absurd position in regard to this question. They had provided denominational education in one part of the Empire where many people did not want it, and refused it in another where it was desired by a large and influential section of the inhabitants. He complained that the Catholics of Ireland met with no respect for their religious convictions, while those of Protestants, and atheists, and infidels, were fully responded to, and their requirements provided for. The Catholics of Ireland were told that they might have University education, but that it must be at the expense of their religious convictions. One would think that the time had gone by when a man's religious convictions should stand in the way of his advancement in life; but the conduct of the Government in reference to this question showed that they had not yet made so much progress. There was another point to be considered, and that was the conduct of the Government at the commencement of the Session. They were told that a Bill upon intermediate education would be brought in, and no doubt they would have received it thankfully. But what had been the course pursued by the Government? Of course the House would be told that the policy of the Obstructives had prevented the Government bringing in the Bill. However, that was not so. The Bill was not forthcoming. They asked for the Bill, but it was said that before it could be produced the House must make substantial progress with the Irish Grand Jury Bill, and also make substantial progress with the English County Government Board Bill, which no one seemed much to desire. Those Bills were both weak and in a bantling state, and could not be passed in their present shape. This course would not add to the confidence which the Irish people felt in Her Majesty's present Government. He could not forget that, while a mere measure of justice was denied to the people of Ireland, a sum of no less than £238,000 was added this year to the Vote for education in this country. It was a very hard trial to come to that House, year after year, asking for a small acknowledgment of their educational claims, and yet meet with no response. A satisfactory solution of the question would, he hoped, be soon discovered; but that which was suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London would never be accepted. They might shut their ears now to the demand made; but eventually they would have to hearken to the oft-repeated voice of a nation, crying to Heaven for that which was only her just rights.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY observed, that the objection urged by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin appeared to be this—that if the Motion were adopted, Roman Catholic Divinity students would be prepared for their Church at the expense of the State. That would not be the case. Divinity students might attend a Roman Catholic University, but only to receive lay education, as did the Divinity students belonging to other Churches. Although this debate would not bring about an immediate solution of the question, yet he believed it would advance that solution to a stage far beyond its present position, and in time the people would demand their just rights. Many points formerly argued were now taken for granted, and it was now admitted that it was a question which ought and could be dealt with. Higher education was now as much a necessity for the upper and middle classes of Ireland as food. Whatever differences existed between them on the subject, they all, he was sure, were desirous that enlightenment should be spread among the people of Ireland, the better to enable them to discharge the duties which would devolve upon them in life. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) told them that he questioned the advisability for educational purposes of endowing Universities, and that the endowment of teachers put education to sleep. Looking back at University education, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was not altogether without some grounds for his assertion; for they had only to look at Oxford and Cambridge, with all their endowments, and the inefficiency of the Queen's Colleges with their endowment at the present moment, and also to look back at the time when Trinity College went by the name of the "silent sister," to see whether endowments should be given to Universities. For his own part, he thought the endowment of teachers should be discontinued, and ought to regulate, to a very great extent, the formation of any such institution. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that at the end of a University course students should be provided with endowments and prizes which would, probably, fall into the hands of men trained and capable of teaching, which would constitute a Teaching Body endowed indirectly, but, at the same time, dependent for the maintenance of their endowment on students in the University, on their own activity and capacity, and that advantage would be gained by the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, and the State relieved from the necessity of interfering with Colleges and the heads of Colleges. He would say, however, that if the proposal of the right hon. Member for the University of London meant merely the creation of an Examining University such as the University of London, it would not be likely to fulfil and meet the wants of the people of Ireland on the question before them. If he meant that instead of Colleges like Kemple College, or even the Queen's Colleges, they should have a number of schools full of schoolboys affiliated from the Universities, then he had no hesitation in saying that his proposal would deservedly fail. Something more than mere teaching and examination was necessary to constitute a new University.

If he would show some way by which University life in College could be created, and created with a prospect of full development, then, indeed, he would have done something to solve the great question. Of course, endowments would be required. That was necessary to place Catholics on an equality with Protestant Irishmen. It was felt in Ireland that the University question involved principles to which the people were solemnly bound. Many people said that University education was a central system which was to give light around to intermediate education; but he hoped freedom of opinion was allowed, and he must say he thought intermediate education should precede University education. But what was the position in which the Government were placed? At the beginning of this year, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies, but then Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), speaking at the end of the first Irish debate, admitted that legislation for Ireland was necessary on the subject of University education. He said that intermediate education was locally and educationally a preliminary to University education, and that he would deal with it in the first instance. This was a most important concession, and if the Government intended to give an earnest to this expressed intention of dealing with University education, the way to do so was to deal practically and without further delay with the question of intermediate education. In conclusion, he sincerely hoped the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon would not be altogether without effect.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, they were discussing the matter under a great disadvantage, seeing that they were so far in ignorance of the views of Her Majesty's Government in regard to it. As regarded the attitude of the Liberal Opposition, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Mr. Lowe) had made a somewhat novel suggestion; but, while last year he had brought it forward as a remedy, this year he had been candid enough to admit that it would not supply the want felt by the Roman Catholics of University education, though it would stimulate intermediate education. His declaration of opinion might be taken as that of the Opposition, and it amounted to nothing all. He had mentioned the failure of his Leader five years before, and had then told the Catholics that their cause was hopeless, but that in a commercial way he would do something to pay for certain results in secondary schools. Then the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin had made a thoroughly selfish speech, and had thought that any gain to the Catholics must necessarily be to the disadvantage of the Protestants. For his part, he could not admit that that result was inevitable. It might be argued that their objection to the present system of University education in Ireland was based upon hostility to the Queen's Colleges; but, so far as he was concerned, his objection was that they were set up to afford certain facilities to the Catholics of Ireland; and, after 30 years' experiment, the people of Ireland declined to avail themselves of the facilities, and it was in that sense they repudiated the Queen's Colleges as in no sense affording the facilities required by the Catholics in Ireland. The opponents of the Resolution said it was impossible to concede what it claimed on behalf of the Roman Catholics of Ireland. The same thing used to be said with reference to the injustice which was inflicted on the Roman Catholics of Ireland by the Irish Church Establishment; but at last the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich came forward and cut down that "upas tree." But on this question Parliament had, with characteristic obstinacy, failed to recognize the devotion of the Irish Catholic to his religion, which had been tested by the blood and tears of centuries of persecution. The Roman Catholics were the only people whose claims in the matter of University education were not accorded consideration; and, in contending against the national spirit of the people, Parliament had entered upon a contest which could only end in its own defeat and humiliation. The people of Ireland would neither be secularized by the Queen's Colleges nor proselytized by Trinity College. This was not a clerical grievance, but a grievance touching the heart and soul of the Catholic classes of Ireland. It had been said that although the Queen's Colleges were now denounced, they would in time prove to be a success, just as the national schools, which at first were denounced, had become a success. But the national schools had succeeded simply because they were practically denominational schools. Just in proportion as they became denominational, they became successful. He was quite ready to acknowledge the importance of intermediate education in Ireland, and how signal were the defects of the present system; but there appeared to be a conspiracy between the front Benches on both sides of the House to magnify intermediate education for the purpose of shelving University education. The Catholics of Ireland knew the result of the cramming system advocated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London. Under that system, the work done in a particular Department was paid for at so much per yard. Although Ireland was deficient in intermediate education, yet there were many excellent schools in the country capable of turning out young men well fitted to enter upon a course of University education; but the practical effect of the policy of the English Government was to encourage the minority and discourage the majority in their search after University education. The proposal before the House that night neither involved the abolition of the Queen's Colleges—if against the wish of the Irish people the House were determined to maintain them—nor did it involve the slightest impairment of Trinity College. It merely put forward a just claim on behalf of a portion, and that portion the overwhelming majority, of the nation, which had for centuries consistently made great sacrifices rather than participate in any privileges, political or educational, that could, in the slightest degree, affect their religious opinions. In conclusion, he warned hon. Members that no scheme of intermediate education would settle the question of University education, and that it would not repress or allay in an appreciable degree the feelings of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, who had so long vainly sought at the hands of Parliament redress for the injustice under which they were labouring.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY considered the discussion so far unsatisfactory, that with the exception of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), the speaking had been all on one side, so that really the supporters of the proposal for the establishment of a Roman Catholic University in Ireland had not anything to reply to. He would ask if the absence of speeches had arisen from the fact that there was a general acquiescence in the demand of the hon. Member for Roscommon? They well knew that was not the case, and he had not the smallest hope that the Government would make any concession to the wishes of the Irish people on this important subject. It was most unjust to deny men the right to educate their children, either on secular or on religious principles, as they thought fit. He, speaking as a Protestant, wished to see the same state of things in Ireland as existed in this country. In England ample provisions had been made for religious teaching, according to the belief of the majority of the people. The Universities and all the great public schools were Protestant to the backbone, because the great mass of the people were Protestant; but in Ireland, where the great majority of the people were Roman Catholic, they were mocked with a pretence of religious equality. The rich endowments, which originated in the piety and benevolence of their Roman Catholic ancestors, had been taken from them, and conferred on the Protestant minority. In fact, Government did in Ireland what it would not dare to do in any other part of Her Majesty's Dominions. In India they would not dare attempt to make the children of Mohammedans attend Christian schools. Over and over again had this grievance been demonstrated by the Irish Members, and sometimes their demand was met with fair words; but at other times, as on the present occasion, by silence, showing that the Government and the Legislature did not intend to do that which was just. But the demand was none the less just, and the Irish Catholics would, no doubt, as they were bound to do, insist upon it by every constitutional means in their power. It was folly to talk of having admitted Roman Catholics to the government of the University of Dublin. It would take 50 years before Roman Catholic graduates could have a voice in the government of that Institution. If the House refused to listen to the reasonable demand of the majority of the Irish people, what could they expect but that the Irish Representatives would refuse to allow them to have their own way in voting the Estimates for education in Ireland? The only course open to Irish Members was to prevent the House of Commons from passing those Estimates, upon the existence of which they based their power to carry out a system of education which was repugnant to the Irish people. If Parliament were to found a Roman Catholic College, it would have to depend for its success upon the quality of its teaching; and if it did not give as sound an education as was to be obtained in any Protestant College, the Irish people would not resort to it. The only argument he had ever heard urged against the scheme of a Catholic University was that it might be too ready to grant degrees, and so lower the character of the degrees granted by the other Universities; but that objection had been fairly met in the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), in which he proposed the establishment of a common University for Ireland, in which the students educated at the several denominational Colleges of the country might compete for their degrees. What right had the English Parliament to say that the majority of the Irish people should not educate their children according to their own religious faith? The Catholics of Ireland claimed the right to educate their children according to their own religious views, out of the produce of their own taxes, with exactly the same freedom as Protestants in England and Ireland enjoyed. They admitted that they were in a minority in Ireland, and yet when the Catholics asked for justice the answer was,—“We will give you something, but we will take care we do not concede the principle.” He had always felt that if the positions had been reversed, and if the Protestants were subjected to the same disabilities to which the Catholics were subjected, they would very long ago have heard a very different tale. Did they suppose that the Protestant people would submit to the degradation, the scandal, and shame which had been heaped upon the Catholics? And the only reason why the Catholics, in his opinion, had never obtained that to which they were entitled, was because they had not made their demands in tones sufficiently robust. Until they made themselves inconvenient to political Parties on both sides, there was no chance of their obtaining a solution of this question. In the meanwhile, the Roman Catholics could only rejoice that they, of all people, had maintained unimpaired their religious faith for long ages and amid cruel persecution.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, it was no part of his duty to defend hon. Gentlemen on the other side against the aspersions cast on them by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down; but, if he were disposed to do so, he might take some exception to the charge brought against them as to their not having made their remonstrances sufficiently robust. Repeated attempts had been made to settle this question on both sides of the House—attempts by Governments and attempts by private Members. He did not wish to go through the details of those schemes; but there was one scheme to which special reference was made by the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don), and almost every other Member who had addressed the House—that was, the scheme of the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). He did not know that its fate had been a very encouraging one for those who wished to follow in his footsteps. Reference had also been made to the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). He was certainly entitled to speak with some authority in the name of the people of Ireland, and any proposal emanating from him would always command the respectful attention of the House. But what did all those schemes prove? Why had none of those schemes, whether brought forward by the responsible Government or introduced to the notice of Parliament by private Members, met with success? The reason was this—the demands put forward by the Representatives of Irish opinion had been almost uniformly extravagant. What were those demands? Even so recently as a few weeks ago, a meeting was assembled in Dublin to consider this very question. The demand then put forward was—either concurrent endowment or total disendowment. The hon. Member for Roscommon, with great candour, repeated those terms—he spoke of levelling up or levelling down. One or other alternative, he said, must be adopted; but he knew very well that neither would ever be accepted by the House of Commons. He, therefore, was justified in assuming that the reason why this great question had been so long unsettled was that the demands made were wholly extravagant. He did not mean to say that the status quo was perfection. The status quo, however, had not been fairly described. Any impartial observer would have been led to form the opinion that hon. Gentlemen opposite were seeking to induce Parliament to reverse a system of exclusive endowment, wholly limited to one exclusive sect. But that was not the case. The existing University and the Colleges of Ireland, with one exception, were entirely open to persons professing all creeds. Since this question was dealt with by the Government, of which the right hon. Member for the University of London was a distinguished Member, the old Institution of Trinity College, Dublin, had been thrown open to all creeds, and there was the most perfect religious equality. He might have stated that, for nearly 100 years, degrees at Trinity College had been within the reach of all Her Majesty's subjects of whatever creed; and since 1873, the endowments had been equally open to Catholics and Protestants. Any one listening to some of the speeches in this debate might have supposed that the benefits of the Queen's Colleges were open only to Protestants, but they were available to all Her Majesty's subjects without distinction of creed. Protestants, as such, had no advantage conferred on them in Trinity or in the Queen's College which were not equally within the reach of Roman Catholics. There was one Institution which was an exception, and that was the Royal College of Maynooth—which formerly received an annual grant of £26,000, which had been, with the consent of those interested in that Institution, who were represented in the House, been commuted to the sum mentioned in the Irish Church Act. With that one exception, the University Institutions in Ireland were open to Her Majesty's subjects without distinction of creed. Under these circumstances, the case had not been fairly put before the House. Hon. Members, doubtless, had conscientious objections to the education afforded by these Institutions; but they were not justified in speaking of the application of their revenues as a confiscation to the injury of those for whom they were intended. Why had the advantages so offered to all creeds not been more freely made use of by the Roman Catholics? In the Queen's Colleges they had been made use of to a very considerable extent, some 25 per cent of those who did make use of them being of the Roman Catholic religion, while in Trinity College, Dublin, the percentage had been stated to be 10 per cent. At any rate, it was very considerable. But the reason why these Institutions had not attained a greater success had been the spirit of hostility which had been manifested towards them, no doubt, from conscientious motives, and which must be respected. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) had said that the months of February, March, April, and May, had gone by, and there had been no Intermediate Education Bill. He had been in hopes that the hon. and gallant Member was going to furnish the House with some record of Public Business during the months to which he had referred. Without going into detail, he might call the hon. and gallant Gentleman's attention to the fact that the time at the disposal of the Government during the present Session had been very fully occupied. He was not now going to find fault with the course which any hon. Gentleman had taken, but he might observe that the ordinary Supplies of the year had engrossed no inconsiderable amount of the attention of the House. He had always been strongly opposed to the practice of taking large Votes on account early in the Session, giving up every Government night, to nearly the end of July, to measures which might be more or less termed comprehensive, and bringing forward the Estimates in August; but it must be admitted that this practice had not been followed during the present Session. The Government, in a constitutional manner, had presented their Estimates at the earliest possible moment, and had endeavoured to take them in their ordinary course, without anticipating them with Votes on account, except when absolutely compelled so to do. In addition to the causes of delay to which he had referred, there had been exceptional demands upon the time of Parliament arising out of affairs outside the limits of this country, and that brought him to this point—that he defied any hon. Gentleman to point to a single moment when a measure of so much importance as that of Intermediate Education could have been submitted to the judgment of the House. However, the Government intended to fulfil their engagement. It would be trifling with the House to say in the present state of Public Business, that there was any chance of introducing a measure, at an early date, in this House; and, therefore, soon after Whitsuntide the Government would introduce a measure into the other House of Parliament. They hoped the Bill would reach this House at no distant date, and that it would not be one of the remanets of the Session. During the debate the two questions of University and intermediate education had been treated as inextricably interwoven, and it had been said, that the latter had been forced to the front by the Government to the exclusion of the former. Certainly intermediate education was preliminary to higher education, and, therefore, he did not shrink from the responsibility of that course. With respect to the Motion before the House, he thought the hon. Member for Roscommon would be disposed to agree with him, that no good object could be served by asking the House to express any opinion upon it. He abstained from expressing any opinion as to what it might become the duty of the Government to do at any future period with regard to this question; but he would not be justified in holding out any hopes to the House that during the present Session, at any rate, they would be disposed to go beyond the programme that had already been laid down.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Sir, I am disappointed in finding, from the Chief Secretary's speech, that he has not taken the trouble to qualify himself to speak on this subject. In order to answer an adversary effectively, it is necessary first to grasp his principles, and in order to persuade him, you must be able to realize his position and feel his feelings. At the outset of his speech, the Chief Secretary showed that he had not made this necessary preliminary effort. He complained of the dilemma of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don)—namely—"You must either level up or level down." What the hon. Member meant was that the Government should be just to all denominations, and treat all equally. If some are to be endowed, all must be endowed; or, if some shall not be endowed, then neither may any denomination receive a State endowment. That was the hon. Member's position. Was it not right? Does it not almost amount to a political truism? Yet the Chief Secretary for Ireland put it aside, as if it were not worthy of argument. Unless, indeed, he took this for a refutation—that the Dublin University and the Queen's Colleges are secular Institutions, which are "open to all Her Majesty's subjects of whatever denomination." This, then, is his ground—every educational Institution which is open to all Her Majesty's subjects is a proper recipient of State endowments. There are numerous Catholic Schools and Catholic Colleges in England, Ireland, and Scotland, which are open to all Her Majesty's subjects, of whatever denomination; every child or youth is free to enter them, who will receive the teaching which is there given, and conform to the rules and discipline of the Institution. Are these Schools and Colleges, then, fit objects, in the Irish Secretary's eye, for endowments from the State? "Oh, no," he will say, "we Protestants cannot send our children to them, because a form of religion is there taught to which we object." That is just what the Irish Catholics say of the Dublin University and the Queen's Colleges. Perhaps you exclude a purely secular teaching from your category of denominations? Let the House for a moment look at this new position. Take the Creed of Pope Pius IV., which is our creed. It consists of what is called the Nicene Creed, with the addition of a few Articles. In all the Creed of Pope Pius IV. there is only one Article which is not accepted by the High Church of England; knock off two or three more Articles, and you have the belief of the Low Church of England; cut off some more, and you have the belief of the Presbyterians, the Nonconformists, and others, until you leave only the first Article of the Creed, which is the belief of the Theists; exclude that, and you have the education of the Secularists. On what reasonable ground, then, can any man assert that Secularist Schools and Colleges may be endowed by the State, while no School or College which teaches any Article of Belief may be a recipient of State aid? Some object to this religion being taught with the public taxes to which they contribute; and some are averse to that religion being taught. But a great many more abhor the support out of public money of educational Institutions which exclude religion entirely from the instruction which they give. I will put this in another light. Let me know whether it is easier to learn or to forget? Which is everyone more apt to do—to acquire knowledge or to lose it? Of course, it is easier to forget, and everyone is apt to lose the knowledge he has acquired. Is it not, then, more reasonable to let children or young men learn the larger Creed in the first instance and forget the later Articles afterwards, if that be required, than to forbid them learning in youth any of the Articles of Belief, with the hope that they may acquire some of them later in life? The former is clearly more consonant to reason; and, if we study morals and events in those countries which, of late years, have excluded religion from their systems of education, we shall also be convinced that it is more consonant with a healthy practice and sound principles of statesmanship.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he had heard the greater part of the speech of the Chief Secretary with the deepest disappointment. It seemed to him that the right hon. Gentleman did not at all appreciate the magnitude of the question and of the interests which it involved. Nor had he offered the slightest indication that the Government, either in this or in any other Session, would deal with this very important subject. The right hon. Gentleman had also given a sort of denial to the assertion that a grievance existed on the part of the Roman Catholics of Ireland in that matter, and he had alleged that all previous attempts to settle that question had failed. But why had they failed? Because of an extravagant dread of ecclesiastical influence—a feeling which must be got rid of before they could fairly consider the problem they had to solve. The Chief Secretary had ridiculed the proposal to level down; but the Roman Catholics did not want to level down. They demanded equality without injuring existing Institutions in Ireland; but, if they were refused that measure of justice, they would insist on examining narrowly how the public money to which they contributed was at present spent on those Institutions. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Royal College of Maynooth alone received exceptional favour from the State. For himself, he confessed that he was amazed at that statement. Maynooth, instead of receiving exceptional favour, was disendowed at the time when the Irish Church was disestablished, although it ought then to have been preserved and dealt with in connection with Dublin University and Trinity College. The only crumb of comfort thrown to them in the speech they had just heard consisted in the promise to introduce a measure on intermediate education in Ireland; but even that measure was not to be introduced in this House, and it might reach them too late to be dealt with satisfactorily this Session. When, under these circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman asked him to abstain from pressing his Motion to a division, his answer must be that the right hon. Gentleman's own speech rendered it perfectly impossible for him to comply with that request.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, it was not his intention to detain the House for long; and he should not have risen to speak but for some observations, which rendered it necessary for some Member sitting for an Irish constituency, and not immediately connected with the Government, to say a few words on this subject. Last Session he had an opportunity of speaking for a short time on this matter, and he had previously spoken upon it in that House on one or two occasions. Having regard to the course of the debate in the House that night, and to the fact that very few Members had risen on that side of the House, it was his desire that one point, at least, should be placed very plainly before the House. The first question which arose in the debate was, whether there was a grievance—whether, in fact, the present state of University education in Ireland was so bad as it was represented to be? And the second was—how that grievance was to be remedied, having regard to the views of the House and the country with reference to denominational education? The observations which he had to make would be confined to the one part of the case connected with the first question to which he had referred.

It had been said that there had been an absolute or relative failure in the system of University education in Ireland. He begged the House to consider the conditions under which the Queen's Colleges were brought into being. They were brought into being for the express purpose of showing religious impartiality, and they were accepted by the House and by Parliament as a means of placing all denominations in Ireland on an equality. But, no sooner did those Colleges come into existence, than they were the objects of unremitting attack on the part of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, and they still remained the objects of such attack. He would refer to an extract, which had been previously placed before the House, in proof of what he said. In 1869, a resolution was passed at a meeting of Roman Catholic Bishops, held at Maynooth, in which they took objection to the system of University education in Ireland as being injurious to the faith and morals of Roman Catholic youth, inasmuch as it was not under the supreme control and care of the Church. The Bishops, therefore, called upon the clergy and the laity to use every constitutional means to subvert the mixed system of education. The position then taken up had been retained since; for, in 1871, a meeting of the same persons took place in Marlborough Street, to consider the question of University education, and the protest against the mixed system of education was then renewed. Under these circumstances, he asked the House whether the Queen's Colleges had had fair play, and whether the Irish people generally could be said to have had any part in the periodical denunciation of which these Colleges had been the objects? It was the design of those who passed those resolutions to affect the whole Roman Catholic population of Ireland with a hatred of these Colleges, for other resolutions were passed which directed that each of the former resolutions should be read, on the first convenient Sunday, at one of the public masses, in all churches and chapels throughout the Kingdom. Was it likely that under such a state of things the Queen's Colleges could obtain fair play amongst the Roman Catholic people of Ireland? But, notwithstanding the measures thus taken against them, they had been successful, and the figures relating to the number of students attending them showed that they had made considerable way amongst the Roman Catholics of Ireland. There was one other matter to which he would allude. It was impossible to dis sever this question from the subsidiary questions of intermediate and primary education. It was impossible for those who were supporters of the Amendment to deny that the principles they wished applied to University education applied with equal force to intermediate and primary education. With these few words, he should conclude by expressing his determination to give his hearty vote against the Amendment.

MR. SULLIVAN could assure the Chief Secretary for Ireland that his speech that evening would be received with something very like dismay by many persons in Ireland, who had, hitherto, been disposed to believe that Her Majesty's Government, being true to the principles of the Conservative Party in England, would do something for the service of University education in Ireland. There was no doubt in the world that one of the questions that had most largely divided the Irish people from the Liberal Party in this country had been that of education. For his own part, with most of his sympathies in full accord with the Liberal Party in this country, since he had come into that House he had, on this great question of education, painfully felt himself tending further and further from them, and coming into unity of action with hon. Gentlemen opposite, whom he had frequently heard asserting on the floor of the House the same principles of morality and religion in connection with University and public education that were dear to the hearts of the Irish people. But to those in Ireland who had marked the tone of Conservative feeling on this subject, and had marked the noble attitude of the Conservative Party on religious education in England, it was painful to see that no sooner was it attempted to apply their principles across the Channel, to a people who had been long kept in statutory ignorance, than the application of the principles to Ireland was refused. It was but a few years ago that Lord Mayo had made a proposition on this subject, which flatly contradicted the proposition of the present Chief Secretary for Ireland; for if there was need of dealing with this subject then, and of dealing with it in the radical way in which Lord Mayo proposed, how could the Chief Secretary get up and tell the House that there was no urgency now in this matter? Lord Mayo, in 1868, thought the matter one deserving instant attention; and its magnitude had grown with years, and increased every day. For his own part, he had no desire to misrepresent the issue; but he was aware that hon. Gentlemen in that House had hitherto been prejudiced against this demand of their's for University education. He could understand such a prejudice, and made considerable allowance for the opposition caused by it. The people of England and hon. Gentlemen in that House were assured that there was no desire for a Roman Catholic University on the part of the Roman Catholic laity in Ireland, and that the demand was only made by the Priests and Prelates for purposes of their own. That phase of the question was passed, and although those who now put forward the demand in the House did not for one moment repudiate the just and legitimate influence of the Clergy and Bishops, yet they emphatically denied that the demand did not emanate from the people of Ireland. He, for one, was returned by his constituency against the influence of the justly revered and respected Roman Catholic Prelate having jurisdiction in Louth County; and in putting forward the demand that night, he did it because of no episcopal or clerical dictation or control, but heartily and thoroughly at the instance and in the interests of the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland. He would take the House so far into his confidence as to tell them the history of the Bill promoted by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick City (Mr. Butt). It emanated from a joint committee of students of Trinity College, of the Catholic University, and of the Queen's Colleges in Ireland, by whom the original of the scheme was drawn up without the knowledge of a single Roman Catholic Bishop, and almost against the wishes of some of them who came to hear of it. The Bill was framed as a bond fide endeavour by the students of the Colleges he had mentioned, to see if they could not devise some kind of measure to deal with the just requirements of the people of Ireland in the matter of University education. Out of the meeting of that joint committee came a series of resolutions, which were submitted to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Limerick City; and that was the origin of the Bill laid before the House a Session or two ago. It was not concocted by Bishops or Priests, but it was the proposal of the Roman Catholic laity of Ireland, who were determined that they would no longer submit to be deprived of University education. The Chief Secretary had reminded the House that a Ministry had been beaten upon this question. It was because their proposition did not rise to the level of the occasion. Nothing short of a statesmanlike solution of the question would be of any avail. The right hon. Gentleman had further said that their demands were uniformly extravagant and impracticable. How much, or how little, would he have them ask? Would he have them accept less than an equality with England, or did he think they would ask more? But of one thing he might be sure; that with anything less than equality they would never be satisfied. They were also told that Trinity College was open to Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Dissenters, and that there were no longer any restrictions. If that were true, what necessity was there for the Queen's Colleges? If hon. Members who put that excuse before the House believed in it, the necessity for the Queen's Colleges in Ireland was gone. Could it be said that the Roman Catholic University in Ireland, struggling as it was, had not produced men who had grown up with the same liberty of thought as was found in any other University? But when it was said Trinity College was open to Roman Catholics as well as Protestants, he must make one observation. Not for one moment did he wish to disparage the position of Trinity College, glorious in its traditions, and still honoured by every educated Irishman, or to detract from the good that it had done for Ireland. He was sure no Roman Catholic in Ireland would seek to injure it; but he regretted that Trinity College had lent itself to a false attitude against the Roman Catholics, and was not true to the principles upon which it was founded, when it preferred a partial secularization, lest justice and equality should be granted to a Catholic Institution. He had prophesied that the Bill of the hon.

Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) would not succeed, nor had it. The portals of Trinity College were indeed open to all; but it was a mockery to offer them that for the University they desired. No King or Queen that ever sat upon the English Throne would have dared to propose to the people of England such a proposition as was made to them, or would have attempted to inflict upon England a University which was as foreign to its sympathies as was the University system which was now forced upon the people of Ireland. And if the people of England were deprived for 50 years of a University system in accord with their conscientious feelings, how would the progress of the country be stopped? He put it to the House whether it was not their right and duty to accord to the Irish people a University system in accord with their consciences and feelings. He appealed to their generosity to give them what they asked for in this matter. By hateful and disgraceful Statutes, the Irish people had been kept in educational bondage and deprived of the blessings which this country had enjoyed, and they had some claim on the generosity of the English people.

quently extended over several days; because, in the nature of the case, the stipendiary could give only the fragments of his time which remained after the ordinary work of the police court was finished. This caused very great expense, more especially to the captains whose cases were under consideration. So far as he was aware the magistrates had not been guilty of any neglect of duty in the holding of these inquiries. It was, no doubt, right that these disasters should be inquired into by a competent Court and by competent officials; and he was not complaining of any matter, except that the jurisdiction having been taken from the local magistrates a very unnecessary expense had been cast upon the captains having to attend these investigations.

MR. GOURLEY referred to the large expenses caused on the inquiries held by the stipendiary magistrates at South Shields, compared with that expended when they were conducted by local magistrates. Masters and officers belonging to Sunderland, Seaham, and Hartlepool were compelled to go to South Shields, and wait the convenience of the stipendiary magistrates. This involved a serious loss of time, as well as of expense, without any corresponding benefit; hence he considered that the time had come for a revision of the present system of inquiry. He held that until a Wreck Commissioner was appointed for the North, the inquiries there ought to be held before the local magistrates.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that he quite understood the grievance which had been referred to. It would receive due attention and consideration at the hands of the Government.

MR. BIGGAR wished for some explanation as to the salary of a solicitor at £1,000 a-year, and £600 for counsels' fees, besides the salaries for three clerks. He could not understand how there could be any employment for a counsel at all.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained that the officials alluded to were winding up a certain number of cases which had been left outstanding. When the work on which they were employed had ceased then their offices would be abolished, and, as recommended by the Commission, the gentlemen would be absorbed into other offices and omitted from the list.

MR. BIGGAR wished to point out to the hon. Baronet that he had not explained why counsels' fees were necessary, nor why so unreasonable a sum as £1,000 a-year was paid to a solicitor.

"That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he had no objection to the Government taking the second reading of the Bill, on the understanding that it would give an opportunity of considering the principles raised by it before the House went into Committee on the Bill.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he had pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill.

NAVY—H.M.S. "EURYDICE."

QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR: I wish to ask the noble Lord who represents the Admiralty in your Lordships' House, Whether he does not think it would have been possible, by the aid of an iron-clad, to have raised the "Eurydice" the day after the accident, to such an extent that she might have been towed into shallow water?

LORD ELPHINSTONE: I have heard it said that had the means to which the noble Lord refers been adopted the Eurydice would have been raised ere now; but perhaps the best way I can answer the Question is by illustration of the very small power of even one of our very largest iron-clads to move a weight at rest. Take, for example, the Hercules, a ship of 7,200 tons, with a nominal horse-power of 1,200, but capable of working up to between 7,000 or 8,000. She would be unable to move a body at rest of more than from 40 to 50 tons. This enormous mass, exerting a force of 7,000 or 8,000 horse-power, would be, as it were, anchored by a weight of between 40 and 50 tons; and so in the case of the Eurydice. When she sank she represented a weight in iron and stores of from 150 to 180 tons, and that was, therefore, the weight that had to be moved. Suppose, for the sake of argument, they had been able to get the ends of her two lower cables up the day after she sank—the breaking strain of each cable is equal to 64 tons—they would, therefore, have been together unequal to a strain of more than 120 tons—the weight to be moved being from 150 to 180 tons. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that, even supposing they had been able to get at the cables, which has not been the case, they would have been quite insufficient to move the ship in the way suggested.

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into Committee.

EARL DE LA WARR said, that some of the provisions of the measure would bear very hardly upon the owners of cottage property and others, which would entail unreasonable expense. He thought that careful inquiry into the details of its provisions was desirable, and he begged, therefore, to move that it be referred to a Select Committee.

Amendment moved, to leave out all the words after ("That") and insert ("the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.") —(The Earl De La Warr.)

EARL COWPER thought that before their Lordships intrusted the rural sanitary authorities with increased powers they ought to inquire into the way the work already intrusted to them was discharged by those bodies. It appeared to him that in some instances they had performed their functions in a very unsatisfactory manner. In many cases the members quarrelled among themselves and did nothing else; in other instances they were completely in the hands of their medical officer; and in others everything was carried against the single representatives of a parish by the persons who represented the other parishes.

LORD NORTON observed, that whatever might be thought of rural sanitary authorities they were established, and he deprecated arresting the progress of the Bill, which had been brought forward a second time by private Members of the other House fully competent to deal with the subject, while the Government had not found time or opportunity to deal with the subject more perfectly. Nevertheless, he regretted the re-commencement of the work of sanitary legislation so soon after its consolidation. The Sanitary Commission, over which he had had the honour to preside from 1869 to 1871, and to which many eminent men had devoted much attention, and whose Report had been the basis of all subsequent sanitary legislation, had laid down the proposition that the chief cause of the imperfect working of the law was the complication of the law itself and the multiplication of Acts in detail. He therefore, immediately upon the Report, attempted a consolidating Bill, and meanwhile had a digest made of all the numerous Acts upon the subject. The late Government recognized the importance of consolidating the law, and next year passed the Act of 1872, preparing the way for consolidation, and the present Government passed the consolidating Act of 1875, of which this Bill dealt partially with one part only—namely, water supply to cottages. The Act of 1875 did not pretend to be complete in many parts, and especially in this of water supply. The Sanitary Commission said that water supply was the most difficult part of their inquiry, because it dealt not only with the interests of local authorities and consumers, but with intricate proprietary rights; and particular places could not well be compulsorily supplied without consideration of the whole watershed, which introduced further questions of area and rating; but this Bill dealt only with rural districts, and with them imperfectly, as the Report of the Select Committee to which the Bill was referred in the House of Commons amply showed. Its clauses ran parallel with sections unrepealed of the Act of 1875, and the charging of water rates or rents might come under either or both. Still, the Bill should pass as a step in the right direction, and as compelling the Government to deal completely with its subject next Session, and to make one separate Act on water supply, repealing the sections on the subject in the Act of 1875. The law might so be restored to clearness and intelligibility to the public.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY hoped their Lordships would not consent to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. No doubt the object of the Bill was important; but much of this importance attributed to it was due to a forgetfulness of what the law already provided—it was, in fact, but a small advance on the existing law. The Consolidation Act of 1875 enabled the rural authorities to construct works for the purpose of supplying water and to tax the whole parish for those works. It was quite clear that in some cases that might be an oppressive mode of proceeding, and what the Bill sought to effect was a comparatively small change. The Bill before their Lordships gave the rural authorities power to charge the owners of particular cottages with a water supply for those cottages. No such charge as that supposed by the noble Earl who moved the Amendment would be thrown on an owner. Clause 2 enacted that the supply must be provided at a reasonable cost, not exceeding a capital sum the interest on which at the rate of 5 per cent per annum would amount to 2*d.* per week. It was true that, in the clause as it stood, there were added the words—but he intended to propose an Amendment which would limit the power of increase by the Local Government Board to a sum which would make the entire cost not exceed an interest of 3*d.* per week. There were some persons who had crotchets against improvements; but as there was nothing more important than a pure supply of water, he hoped their Lordships would not delay this measure by sending it to a Select Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY presumed that his noble Friend meant to convey that those who opposed this Bill were the people who had crotchets against improvements. He did not wish to oppose the progress of the Bill; but he ventured to repeat what he said on the second reading, that caution was necessary in order that the rent of cottages might not be raised, as this would be a very serious calamity to the labouring classes, and he feared that the improvements proposed by the measure would prevent the most important of all improvements, the housing of the poor. Owing to strikes and the rise of prices, the cost of cottage building had considerably increased—indeed, it did not now pay to build cottage property. It might be argued that it was desirable to have cottages with the best possible water supply. They might argue in that way, and be victorious in the argument; but if they added to the cost and difficulty of building cottages, and if, as a consequence, those who now built them abstained from doing so, they would have won a damaging and dangerous victory in a sanitary point of view, for the overcrowding of cottages would be a result. They ought to take care that this Bill did not increase the difficulty already experienced by the labouring classes in obtaining cottages, because that would be a very serious calamity.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then the original Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Duty of rural authority to provide or require provision of sufficient water supply, and procedure for enforcing such requirement).

EARL FORTESCUE said, he would now move an Amendment, of which he had given Notice, the object of which was to draw a distinction in this Bill between water for cooking and drinking and water used for other domestic purposes. There was a much greater consumption of water for the latter than for the former purpose, and, therefore, the supply needed to be larger, and the hardship of having to fetch it from a distance was much more serious; so, on grounds of economy, it was desirable to make a distinction between "pot water" and "slop water."

Amendment moved, in line 12, to leave out from ("distance") to ("use") in line 13, and insert ("water sufficient for the.")—(Earl Fortescue.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON hoped that the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill would not accede to the Amendment, which would provide for two sources of supply, the one less pure than the other. It was of equal importance to have pure water for domestic purposes as for drinking. The Medical Officer of the Board of Health reported that in 1873 there were 240 cases of fever which could be traced to water containing sewage matter having been used for washing vessels in which food was afterwards cooked.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he could not accept the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, that it would be a harsh thing to make the owner of a worthless cottage incur the expense of a water supply, even though he might wish to throw the cottage down.

Amendment negatived.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET moved an Amendment, to leave out the words—

"Or at such other cost as the Local Government Board may, on the application of the local authority, determine under all the circumstances of the case to be reasonable."

This would limit the power of the local authorities to raise a capital greater than would at the rate of 5 per cent amount to 2*d.* a-week.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he would accept the noble Duke's Amendment so far as it put a limit on the power of the local authorities to raise capital; but would move that the limit should be 3*d.*, instead of 2*d.*

Amendment made; then—

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY moved to omit the word ("twopence,") and insert ("threepence") in lieu thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3. (Appeal against apportionment of expenses) agreed to.

Clause 4 (Appeal by owner against requirement to provide a water supply).

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, the right of appeal was given by the clause under these five different conditions—(1) If the supply of water is not required under the circumstances of the case; (2) if the time limited by the notice for providing the supply is insufficient; (3) if it is impracticable to provide the supply at a reasonable cost; (4) if the local authority ought themselves to provide a supply of water for the district; and (5) if the whole or part of the expense of providing the supply, or of rendering the supply wholesome, ought to be a charge on the district. The appeal with regard to the first three conditions lay to the Justices in Petty Sessions; and with regard to the two last conditions, it lay to the Local Government Board. He contended that the appeal ought to be in all cases to the Local Government Board. The working of that Bill would virtually lie with the Inspectors, acting under the local authority—persons who, in many instances, were not fit to be intrusted with such functions, being without either education or experience. If an appeal were made under either of the three first conditions above-named, the Justices in Petty Sessions would hear the evidence of the Inspector and that adduced on behalf of the owner, which might be very conflicting; but they would have no technical knowledge or any means of arriving at a sound or impartial judgment on the merits of the case. Speaking as a landlord, he would himself much prefer that the question should be decided by the practical knowledge of an engineer or surveyor sent down by the Local Government Board. In a small village not far from his own neighbourhood the local authority, by the advice of their Inspector, established a system of drainage which, instead of improving the sanitary condition of the village, made it a great deal worse than it was before. An application was made by persons interested in the matter to the Local Government Board, who sent down their engineer, and that officer reported that the whole of the works which had been executed by the sanitary authority, and for which the proprietors of houses had been charged, were utterly valueless. To guard against the recurrence of such cases he would, therefore, suggest that the clause be so altered as to let the appeal lie to the Local Government Board, and not to the Justices in Petty Sessions.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought that if the noble Marquess referred to the Public Health Act he would find that the argument went in the contrary direction to that which he had indicated. It so happened that in that Act—under which that appeal was to be instituted—it was provided that the works should not be commenced without the sanction of the Local Government Board, and that that Board might appoint an Inspector to make an inquiry on the spot. He confessed he had rather a liking for local authorities, and had not that distrust of Justices in Petty Session which the noble Marquess seemed to entertain.

He hoped their Lordships would not alter the clause.

EARL FORTESCUE felt neither the noble Marquess's vehement distrust of local authorities, nor his unbounded confidence in Government Inspectors.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday the 21st instant; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 106.)

CONSERVANCY BOARDS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON said, he had, at the beginning of the Session, put a Question to Her Majesty's Government in reference to the Report, on the subject of the prevention of floods, of a Select Committee of that House which sat to consider that question last year, to which the noble Duke opposite had given a reply that was not altogether satisfactory. The noble Duke was then able to hold out very little hope that Her Majesty's Government intended to act upon that Report; but he did say that some provision for the improvement of Conservancy Boards which would enable them to deal more effectually with the matter might possibly be introduced into a Bill which Her Majesty's Government intended to bring in in the other House of Parliament. A measure, to which he believed the noble Duke had referred—the County Government Bill—had been introduced into the other House in the course of the present Session, but its provisions appeared to him to be by no means satisfactory, and he learnt to-day from the ordinary sources of information that it was not likely that even that measure would be proceeded further with this Session. In these circumstances, he wished to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they intended to take any steps to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee on Conservancy Boards to prevent the recurrence of the disastrous floods of 1877? He hoped the Government would hold out some hope that they would endeavour to deal with this question in the course of next year, and also to deal with it as a separate matter, instead of mixing it up with the subject of County Government, which involved much wider considerations, within which political questions were connected.

THE EARL OF SANDWICH hoped the Government would not wait until next year to deal with the question, which, taken by itself, was really one of great simplicity.

EARL FORTESCUE also hoped the Government would deal with the subject, which was much too large to be satisfactorily dealt with in isolated Private Bills.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON admitted that the noble Marquess was well within his right in bringing this question before the House, and the more so in that he had taken a considerable part in the inquiries that had been made on the subject, and had experience of floods in the part of the country with which he was personally acquainted. He must confess to the feeling of surprise with which he heard his noble Friend and Kinsman (the Earl of Sandwich) express an opinion that the subject was one of no great difficulty. He should have thought that the noble Earl knew sufficient of the subject to be aware of the difficulties and intricacies which beset it. There were conflicting interests of all kinds—upper owners and lower owners, mill-owners, various authorities through whose jurisdiction the rivers flowed, and other persons interested in various ways. The question, therefore, was by no means easy to deal with; and if any attempt was made at all, the subject must be dealt with in a comprehensive manner, so that the question might be set at rest, to the satisfaction of those whose interests were affected. The Government, with a strong hope of being able to settle the question, included it in the County Boards Bill—a measure which they certainly hoped to have been able to pass in the course of the present Session, but concerning which their hopes had, unfortunately, been disappointed. He could only say that the Government were honest and decided in their desire to deal with the subject if, on full consideration of all its bearings, they found it possible to do so.

EARL COWPER said, he was quite sure that the Lord President of the Council, with the knowledge that had been already acquired, could, and he believed would, bring in a Bill which would be satisfactory to all parties concerned.

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT.

The House met at Two of the clock.

THE "NINETEENTH CENTURY"—THE ARTICLE ON "LIBERTY IN THE EAST AND WEST"—(MR. GLADSTONE)—MR. HANBURY'S MOTION.

MR. O'DONNELL: I beg to give Notice, as an Amendment to Mr. Hanbury's Motion, to move—

"That, having heard the extract from the 'Nineteenth Century' on the subject of extraordinary military burthens upon India, and in view of the often-condemned but unreformed abuses of Government and Administration in India; the imposition of unjust and inquisitorial taxation upon the industrious poor; the violation of the perpetual land settlement in Bengal by arbitrary cesses; the coercion of Native opinion and the discouragement of Native literature by gagging Acts of the most despotic description; the unrepresented condition of the Indian people both in their own land and in the Imperial Parliament; the habitual waste of the revenues levied upon those unrepresented masses; the recurring famines, largely occasioned by the neglect of the public works of the former rulers of India, and aggravated by the reckless and ignorant application of the means of relief and by the practical immunity from accountability enjoyed by the higher officials; the liability of the processes of Law to the interference of the Executive power; as well as considering an immense list of individual grievances and wrongs, this House is of opinion, that no service could be performed towards the Crown more valuable or more opportune than to point out the impolicy and danger of imposing on the people of India extraordinary military burthens in support of the Foreign policy of an Empire from whose free Constitution they are excluded and in whose essential benefits they are denied a share."

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE—LETTER CARRIERS. QUESTION.

MR. H. BRASSEY asked the Postmaster General, If a man named Channer, who has been employed for many years as an occasional messenger in the sub-postal district of West Malling, Kent, was last year refused permanent employment as a rural messenger, though strongly recommended for the appointment; if a small boy named Langridge, aged sixteen, received such a similar appointment as a rural messenger, and has since been suspended, having been convicted of drunkenness; if a convict on ticket of leave not long ago received the appointment of rural messenger near Edenbridge, and has since been dismissed or again convicted; if there is not difficulty in finding full grown men to undertake the duty of a rural messenger at the present rates of remuneration; and, if he will refuse his sanction to the practice of entrusting Her Majesty's mail bags in lonely country districts to boys of small stature and tender years, who are physically incapable of protecting themselves and the valuable property entrusted to them?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The man named Channer was not eligible, being above the age at which rural letter-carriers are admitted. Langridge, being 16, was eligible, and having obtained a Civil Service certificate was appointed. He afterwards got drunk, and was dismissed. A man, who it turned out was a convict on ticket-of-leave, was unfortunately employed by the sub-postmaster of Cowden to deliver the letters, with the knowledge and concurrence of the postmaster of Edenbridge, and of a resident magistrate whom he consulted. This man has again been convicted of stealing and sentenced to penalservitude. As a rule, there is no difficulty in finding suitable persons to undertake the duties required at the present rate of remuneration. The system now in force has not been found generally to work badly, and it does not seem desirable to alter it.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—DEATH OF SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID, MEMBER FOR READING.—QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can communicate to the House the result of the inquiry which he informed the House he had directed to be made with reference to the death of Sir Francis Goldsmid from an accident in getting out of a Railway carriage at the Waterloo Station when it was alleged that the door had been opened from without before the train had stopped; and, whether he will now cause inquiry to be made as to what regulations have been made to prevent the repetition of a similar accident?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I laid upon the Table of the House last night the Report of Colonel Yolland upon the lamentable occurrence to which my hon. Friend refers. Colonel Yolland attributes the accident to the door of the compartment, which was fastened, having been opened by some of the officials at the station before the train had stopped; and, also, to the absence of suitable arrangements respecting the footboard of the carriage. I shall carefully consider the Report; a copy has been forwarded to the London and South-Western Railway Company, and I have requested them to inform me what steps they have taken, or propose to take, to prevent the repetition of similar deplorable accidents.

INDIA—THE INDIAN ARMY.

QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is intended to raise fresh troops in India to take the place of those that have been despatched to Malta?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No intimation has been received here that it is intended for the present to raise fresh troops in India to take the place of those that have been despatched to Malta. Should the service, however, be prolonged, the Government of India, who are responsible for its peace and security, may think it necessary to complete their normal military establishment.

COLLECTION OF RATES (DUBLIN)— LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If it is his intention to bring in, in this Session, any Bill for amending the Law which relates to the collection of Rates in Dublin?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON): Sir, a Commission has been recently sitting in Dublin inquiring into the whole subject referred to in the Question of the hon. Member; and until I have had an opportunity of fully considering the Report of that Commission, and carefully reading the Evidence taken before it, it would be premature to come to any decision on the subject.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CON-GRESS—THE ENGLISH REPRESENT-ATIVES—THE ARMENIANS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. HAYTER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in the Congress about to be held at Berlin, England will be the only Great Power represented both by her Prime Minister and her Foreign Secretary; and, whether there is any precedent for the adoption of this course in former Congresses by England? He also wished to know, whether the right hon. Gentleman is in a position to state to the House the reasons which have induced the Government to recommend to Her Majesty the appointment of two plenipotentiaries to attend the Congress?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: With regard to the first Question of the hon. Gentleman, we do not know for certain who are to be the Representatives of all the other Powers at the Congress. With regard to the second Question, whether there is any precedent for the adoption of the course of sending two Representatives by England—the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—there is no such precedent. With regard to the third Question—of which the hon. Gentleman has not given Notice—I really do not see that I can say anything more than I said last night.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can give the House the assurance that in the Congress about to be held, Her Majesty's Government will undertake that the case of the Armenians shall be considered as well as that of the other Christians living under Turkish rule?

MR. BOURKE: If my hon. Friend will look at the Treaty of San Stefano, particularly Article 16, he will see that the case of the Armenians must necessarily come before the Congress, and no doubt it will receive the careful consideration of the Powers.

NAVY—THE RAMS OF IRON-CLADS.
QUESTION.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has had under his consideration any plan for the construction of the ram of an ironclad ship, so that it should be removable, when not actually required for purposes of war, or for its being covered in time of peace in such a manner as to render it less damaging in the event of a collision with another vessel?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that the rams of the Invincible, the Agamemnon, the Shannon, and other vessels of modern construction were so fitted that they could be removed and replaced. Any temporary covering, he might add, which might be placed on a ram must be destroyed in the event of a collision.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CON-GRESS—REPRESENTATION OF GREECE.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Greece has received an invitation to the Congress, Greece not being a party to the Treaties of 1856 or 1871; and, if not, what steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take to give effect to their expressed wish that Greece should be represented?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: As the invitations to the Congress have been addressed to the Powers who were signatories to the Treaties of 1856 and 1871, and as Greece was not one of those Powers, an invitation could not be addressed to her. The invitation to Greece to attend must come from the Congress itself, and the subject will be brought before the Congress as soon as it meets.

THE GERMAN EMPEROR.—QUESTIONS.

SIR CHARLES FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received any information to-day respecting the condition of the German Emperor?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, we have received a telegram this morning from Lord Odo Russell, in which he says that His Majesty has passed a good night, and that his state was satisfactory this morning. I have also seen a telegram from the German Embassy, to the effect that His Majesty's state was considered satisfactory by the doctors, and that there was much less pain this morning than yesterday.

MR. NEWDEGATE: With reference to the suggestion which I ventured to make yesterday to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he has found any precedent which would justify his proposing some Motion or form of Address whereby the House might express its detestation and abhorrence at this second attempt which has been made upon the life of the Emperor of Germany?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have been unable to find in any of the recent precedents of this House any case in which a Vote of the character referred to has been proposed to or passed by this House, with the exception of the case of the assassination of President Lincoln. That was a case in which the deed had been completed, and in which an Address expressing sympathy with those who had been bereaved, and horror at the crime which had been committed, was adopted by both branches of the Legislature. There is no precedent for an Address in the case of an attempt upon the life of any Sovereign; and I cannot help thinking that there might be inconvenience in introducing a precedent which we might possibly be asked to follow in other cases in which it might be less convenient to adopt such a course than it would be at the present moment in this particular case, on which the feeling of the House would be so unanimous. But, Sir, in the few words which I ventured to say last night, which were echoed so much better by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, and which were so emphatically cheered and sympathized with by the whole of the House, I think I expressed the general feeling of the country. I would only further say that my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Marquess of Salisbury) has already, in the name of England, expressed to the German Government the sense, which he is so well able to express, of the feeling entertained throughout the country in regard to the crime. In these circumstances, I do not think it necessary that any further expression of feeling on the part of the House should be given.

THE "NINETEENTH CENTURY"—THE ARTICLE ON "LIBERTY IN THE EAST AND WEST"—(MR. GLADSTONE)—MR. HANBURY'S MOTION.

QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS asked the hon. Member for North Staffordshire, Whether it is his intention to proceed, before the holidays, with the Motion of which he has given Notice, on going into Committee of Supply, with reference to portions of an article by the right hon. Member for Greenwich which has appeared in "The Nineteenth Century?"

MR. HANBURY, in reply, said, that from the nature of the Motion itself he felt himself bound to bring it forward at the earliest possible period. He was therefore anxious that it should come on next Thursday; but, considering that the right hon. Gentleman to whom it referred was in Scotland, and looking at the difficulties which at all times stood in the way of private Members, he did not think he should succeed if he were to endeavour to bring it on on that day. He therefore intended to bring it forward on the earliest possible opportunity after Whitsuntide, which would probably be the first Thursday after the House re-assembled. When he gave Notice of his Motion he had every reason to believe that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich would be in his place, particularly as an intimation had been given of an important statement from the Government in both Houses on that day. If he had had any idea that the right hon. Gentleman would not be present, he should certainly have postponed his Motion.

MERCHANT SEAMEN BILL—REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. J. STEWART asked the Under Secretary of State for India, When the Report of the Select Committee and the Evidence on the Merchant Seamen Bill will be placed in the hands of Members?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, the Minutes of Proceedings would be ready in a few days, the Evidence not for some little time. The Bill was on the Paper for Thursday; but, of course, it could not be taken until hon. Members had had time to consider the Evidence.

PARLIAMENT—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE DERBY DAY.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Sir, I beg to ask the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, Whether, seeing that this day has been specially arranged for the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, he could not postpone his Motion with reference to the Derby Day to the Evening Sitting?

MR. CHAPLIN: If I thought it were the general wish of the House that no portion of the morning Sitting should be sacrificed in the discussion of this Motion, I would at once act upon the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman; but I do not think such is the case. Besides, I feel sure that it will occupy very little time indeed. I think the House will be of opinion that an ample apology for my bringing forward this matter will be found in the fact that my Motion is in support of a time-honoured custom, which has been practised with the general approval of hon. Members for a period which extends over an entire generation of Members. Since 1847, if not for a longer time, this House has invariably adjourned over the Derby Day, except when the Derby Day fell within the Whitsuntide Recess, as was the case last year. In the previous year, and the year before that, the Prime Minister, then Mr. Disraeli, himself moved the adjournment over the Derby Day as a matter of course. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, when he was Prime Minister, more than once made a similar Motion. Beginning in 1852—and not in 1860, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us last night—Lord Palmerston made the same Motion, and continued to do so during the whole time he presided over the Government of the country. Under these circumstances, I rather regret—and that for more reasons than one—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not thought it incumbent upon him to follow the precedents which have been set him by the former Leaders of this House. Of this, however, I am quite certain—had he thought fit to do so it would have been an absolute “certainty” for him—what is called in racing parlance a real “good thing”—on its being carried; and I confess I am sorry that what I am afraid will appear as a slight on this time-honoured race should have come in this House from its Leader, and who also happens to be the Leader of the Conservative Party. However, the right hon. Gentleman knows his own business best, and hence it is that it has fallen to a private Member to make this Motion to-day. Lord Palmerston once said there were Motions made in the House which the longest speeches could not make intelligible to hon. Members, while there were others which might be comprehended without any speech at all; and this Motion is, I am inclined to think, one of those which immediately recommend themselves to the good sense of the House of Commons. I really do not know what Business is to occupy the attention of the House upon Wednesday; but I think it cannot be of sufficient importance to induce us to break through a time-honoured custom; and I also think that when hon. Gentlemen are opposed to a practice for which we have had precedents during the last 30 years, we are entitled to ask them how it happens that that which was considered right and fit in 1876 should become improper and unfit in 1878? The onus is, I think, thrown upon them to show why we should now depart from a custom which has for so long a time met with the assent and approval of the House. So far as I am concerned, I do not see that this Motion can be opposed on the ground of a great pressure of Business, nor, indeed, do I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer to raise any such objection. It is, therefore, clear that it is not on the ground of any pressure of Business that my Motion is to be opposed. That being so, I may state that there are one or two reasons which strike me why we should adjourn over to-morrow. In the first place, we shall be acting upon a precedent of many years' observance; and, in the next place, the day has come to be regarded as a holiday not only by Members but also by the admirable staff of officials connected with this House, all of whom perform their duties in a most admirable manner. Indeed, I think it must be admitted that there is no body of public men more indebted to its staff of officers than the Members of the House of Commons are to their officers for the courtesy and attention with which they perform their duties. I must say, therefore, that I consider it would be somewhat harsh on our part were we to abrogate the holiday to which they have been looking forward for some time past, and for which they have no doubt made all their arrangements already. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Assheton), who has notified his intention to oppose the Motion, stated on a former occasion that the character of the race at Epsom had changed almost entirely; that formerly the majority of the horses were owned by noblemen and Members of Parliament, but that such was not now the case. [Mr. ASSHETON: Hear, hear!] My hon. Friend cries "Hear, hear!" but I think he has made a great mistake, for on looking over the list of what is called "probable starters," as published in one of the sporting papers, I find that a great many of the horses belong to distinguished persons. I believe there is one belonging to my noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition; but the first favourite—and, as far as I am informed, the horse likely to win—belongs to another Member of this House; and, surely, under these circumstances, we should fail in our duty to our brother Member if we do not all go down to Epsom to witness his triumph. It will be a proud thing for all of us if the Derby of 1878 should come back to the House of Commons; and in support of the hon. Member and his horse I express an earnest hope, for the hon. Member's own sake, as well as for our own, that "Sir Joseph" may be the winner. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the House, at its rising this day, do adjourn until Thursday.

MR. RICHARD POWER, in seconding the Motion, said: The Marquess of Granby, when moving in 1849 the adjournment of the House over the Derby Day, stated that it was a custom which had been observed from time immemorial. If, then, in 1849, the adjournment in question was regarded as a custom dating from time immemorial, I should like to know what it is now? Here I must say that all of us regret the absence of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who, if he had to bring forward the Amendment to this Motion, would have introduced it with something like originality and humour. In these days, when we have to listen to so much repetition and seriousness, it is absolutely refreshing to hear something we have not heard before, and, although we may not agree with it, to have an opportunity to laugh instead of yawn. I have, in listening to debates in this House, often wondered in how many forms it is possible to present the same idea; for, generally speaking, after the first hour of debate we hear nothing new, but have to listen to the same ideas brought forward and clothed in different words. The simple question, however, with which we have now to deal, is whether we shall have a holiday to-morrow or not? We have had, I think, a most laborious Session. We met at an earlier period than usual, but why I have not yet been able to find out—and our perambulations night and day through the adjoining Lobbies have been both numerous and fatiguing, and, judging by the faces I see before me, I think we want, as Mrs. Brown says, "a little outing in the country." No one can ever accuse the supporters of this Amendment with being too genial or jovial. Because a few are dishonest gamblers, and a few drink more than they can walk away with, they would punish the many who desire to enjoy an innocent and a pleasant day. I do not deny that there may be some who make the Derby a business matter—men who bet largely and eat and drink little; but there are far more who look upon the Derby as a pleasure, who bet little, but who eat and drink a great deal. The Derby is, in fact, a great national fête, and, as a great national fête, it is most fitting that the grand Assembly of the nation should take part in it. Hon. Members ought to remember that "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." Look around the House, and you will see that the faces of the overworked Members are pale with the intensity of political thought and with the cares of State. The Members of the Government seem overworked, and to have duly earned their salaries. Overworked, too, appear the occupants of the front Opposition Bench, whose only salary is hope. They also require a holiday, and especially so as we all know that "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick," and nothing is so good for a sick heart as a little amusement. Heaven only knows the sorrows and disappointments of the Opposition. It is not merely by study, or by the consumption of the midnight oil, that we can hope to qualify ourselves as legislators. We must study men, and men's follies and vices, as well as their virtues, if we are to legislate for them in a proper manner, and, therefore, it is our duty to observe them under all forms and under all circumstances. Therefore I say, that wherever the people are, there, too, should their Representatives be, and to-morrow they will certainly be on the Epsom racecourse. Therefore we should say, not "Away with the Derby," but "Away to the Derby." The whole world looks up to England for the preservation and perfection of horse-racing; and, therefore, it is not unnatural that we should observe among our most eminent statesmen decided proclivities to support it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland is a living example of this, for I am happy to find that last year the right hon. Gentleman won at York the celebrated Gimcrack Stakes. I would ask the opposers of this Motion if they are aware of the inconveniences which they create for their fellow Members? If they succeed in defeating this Motion, what is to become of the well-appointed drags with those mysterious hampers on the top labelled "Fortnum and Mason?" Have they no sympathy for the occupants of a well-packed bus, or those of a non-pretentious hansom? As I have before said, this House is a great National Assembly; horse-racing is a great national pastime; and the Derby is the race, above all races, to which the people of this country look forward with the greatest pride and the greatest gratification. Under these circumstances, this great National Assembly should give a national support to the Derby. This I should expect to hear from the Radicals, who pride themselves upon their proclivities; but, on the contrary, while the Conservatives proclaim—"Let everything alone," the Radicals, on the other hand, proclaim—"Do not let anything alone." My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), however, suggests that those who wish to go to the Derby might do so, and leave the Business of the House to him and the supporters of his Bill with respect to Sunday Closing in Ireland. I am afraid that would be a dangerous proceeding, and an unconstitutional one, as I am afraid the hon. and learned Gentleman would not find a quorum left to make a House to enable him to proceed with his measure; but if hon. Gentlemen will undertake not to divide, I think they might be made a present of the House, and they can have a grand day of unlimited talk. To-morrow the minds of hon. Members will be unequal to the task of legislation. Their thoughts will run in a far different channel—and the first favourite, the second favourite, the third favourite, the outsider, the dark horse, and the one that "could have won, only something happened to him," will be in their minds; and if they are called upon to legislate, I really think they may do a great injury to the Empire. Some of my hon. Friends have such an antipathy to the Derby, that I really think they must have lost a fortune at Epsom in their younger days. They are not genial spirits, who can enjoy the many various amusements which characterize the classic grounds of Epsom. My hon. Friends love to call themselves the Party of sense. They love to look upon horse-racing as a silly amusement. Would they like to know what a wise man once did—a wiser man than even the hon. Member who has given Notice of opposition to this Motion—I mean King Solomon? King Solomon kept 40,000 horses; he had 12,000 horsemen or jockeys; and, better than all, he had races every day in the week after dinner. But, seriously speaking, the House has already made penal nearly all the sports and pastimes of our ancestors—cock-fighting, dog-fighting, bull-baiting, man-fighting, and nearly all kinds of fighting except that of Armies, when one-half the world is prepared to slaughter the other half in the name of civilization. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire has told us that this Motion has been sanctioned since 1847 by Lord Palmerston, Lord Beaconsfield, the right hon. Member for Greenwich, and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and good, indeed, must be the cause to unite so many elements of warfare. But hon. Members around me are super-excellent; they are anxious for a little more talk—a little more debate. We have already had too much talk. We can have talk any day of the year; we can have the Derby only once. In conclusion, I would remind the House that horse-racing was sanctioned—in fact, to some degree established—by James I.; and so far back as the reign of Charles II. races were held in Hyde Park, and I think they created more amusement and caused less annoyance than the “peace” meetings and the “war” meetings which have been lately held there. In the midst of great social changes, let us be left at least something manly. This is an effeminate age; we are becoming too ladylike. There are men of the present day—strait-laced, tight-buttoned, eye-glassed, gingerbread sort of creatures—who would frighten our ancestors, if they could only see them. The origin of horse-racing is ancient, and by no means inglorious; it has grown up among us and become a great institution; we have carried it to a state of perfection hitherto unknown; and I hope the day is far distant when the House will refuse to sanction a pastime so manly and so noble.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House will, at the rising of the House this day, adjourn till Thursday next.”—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. ASSHETON opposed the Motion. The hon. Member who had moved the adjournment, and the hon. Member who had spoken in support of the Motion, had put the cart before the horse. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had done so, when he advanced the preposterous proposition that the onus probandi rested, not on the Mover of the Resolution, but of the Amendment. He had always understood that the onus probandi rested on the person who made a Motion, not on the man who opposed it. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. R. Power) also put his cart before his horse, because he regretted the absence of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) on the ground that the opposition to the Motion would not be introduced with originality or humour. How could the hon. Member possibly tell how he (Mr. Assheton) was going to introduce his opposition? He would leave the hon. Member's humour to the hon. Member himself, because the matter was far too serious to be made a mere matter of jest; and he would, also, leave his originality to the hon. Member, because he had told the House that “All work and no play made Jack a dull boy.” He thought he had heard that before. Members who believed it beneath the dignity of the House to adjourn for so trifling a cause might congratulate themselves that this Motion was no longer brought before them by the Prime Minister as an Imperial concern and essential to the welfare of the country; but that it was left to a private Member because it was a private Member's day. If hon. Members wanted a holiday, there were many more appropriate days on which they could adjourn. He had never heard a weaker case than that which was made for the Motion; and he thought they should at least have some better reason before giving up a working day. He could not admit that a thing which had been going on for 100 years was a time-honoured custom. The race itself was not of that age, and the custom of adjournment not half so long. It might be true, as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) had said, that many of the horses were now owned by Members of that and the other House of Parliament; but the general run of racing was not what it was 40 years ago, nor was the Business of the House, for there was more to be done now; and a question of a day more or less was a matter of far more serious import now than it was at that time. When the other House of Parliament, some time ago, found that important Business was coming on upon the Derby Day, it agreed to postpone the Derby, in fact to postpone its pleasure to its Business, and so ought the House of Commons to do now. No one grudged a holiday less than he did; but they were going to take their holidays very soon. Those who kept the officials of that House, not from 12 to 6 o'clock on a Wednesday afternoon, but up all night, to discuss at what time Irishmen should drink whisky, were the persons who might fairly incur the charge of infringing on the holidays of those gentlemen. And as for the Members themselves, did anyone imagine that one the less would go to the Derby whether they adjourned or not? The Derby Day was one of the most disgusting days in the year, unless you went to the Derby, for you could do no business on it; and if you went to any place of amusement, it was so crowded as to be disagreeable. He would sooner see a holiday given on the day of the Oxford and Cambridge cricket match or the Queen's ball than on that of the Derby. He should protest, if no one else did, when the Question was put, and divide the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no intention of detaining the House for more than a moment before going to a division, if they were to go to one. He only wished to explain that in abstaining from making the Motion which, as usual for a good many years past, had been made by the Leader of the House for the adjournment over the Derby Day, he was not actuated by any desire or intention to oppose the adjournment. On the contrary, he had every intention of voting for it. But it seemed to him that the old practice of the Motion being made by some one unconnected with the Government—a practice which was superseded for a certain number of years from 1860, or, at all events, at a time when the House was unanimous on the subject—was, upon the whole, a better practice to revert to than that which had been adopted of late years. His hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) was not quite correct in referring to the case when Lord Palmerston moved the adjournment for the Derby Day in 1852. It was perfectly true that Lord Palmerston moved the adjournment in 1852, but he was not then in Office—Lord Derby's Government were in Office at the time—and Lord Palmerston moved it as a private Member. But in 1860, when there was a general feeling on the subject, he believed it was the best course that the Leader of the House should make the Motion. Anyone, however, who referred to what had occurred of late years must have seen that there was more opposition; and as the day was not one usually devoted to Government Business, he thought it was better that the Motion should be made by some independent Member, and then all could vote for it on grounds of perfect equality. For himself, he would vote for the adjournment as a custom which, whatever might be said against it in the abstract, had prevailed very long, and which there was no good reason for setting aside. As far as the unfortunate Members of the Government were concerned, as it was a day always selected for a Cabinet Council, an adjournment was of no advantage to them.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he should very much enjoy a Derby Day or a holiday; but he should be sorry that a vote of the House should compel the Business of the country to wait upon the horse-racing Members of the Assembly. Tomorrow was the day for his Bill, and he was quite aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, before the end of the Session, would make this excuse for the fact that a number of measures had to be abandoned—that there was no time to pass them. A good deal of time had been taken up by this discussion, and thus the consideration of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill would be interfered with. He was ready, however, to withdraw his Bill in favour of the Bill of his Scotch Friends and in order to facilitate Public Business. If the House adjourned for the sake of seeing horse-racing to-morrow, he wanted to know whether his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) would not have some answer to the accusations that would be hurled against him? Within the last 24 hours he had heard a Minister of the Crown say that he could not go on with a most important measure because he had not time. Those who wanted to go to the Derby might go there; but let those who wished to transact the Business of the country be allowed to do so. He knew he was speaking against the proclivities of many in the House; but he also knew he was speaking what was right in the face of the country and of Europe. He would not say that they were going to fiddle while Rome was burning; but he would say they were going to trifle while Europe was on the verge of the most critical events. Would the Government make this Motion if it were a Government day? He protested against the adjournment as a waste of time. He could not endorse what the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Richard Power) had said, that the Representatives of the people ought to go where the people went—that they ought to go to horse-races, man-fights, and dog-fights.

MR. RICHARD POWER explained that he had never said any such thing.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that no one could be more startled than the hon. Member at the extension of his own logic.

MR. BLAKE: Mr. Speaker, I congratulate Her Majesty's Government on having resolved to discontinue the practice of themselves moving the adjournment of the House over the Derby Day. This is a hopeful sign. If the Motion is a good Motion, the Government should still move it. If it is not a good Motion, the House should reject it. The Government evidently regard it as a doubtful matter. Some of us regard it as positively mischievous. It is a sad waste of time. It sacrifices a private Member's day, one of the Wednesdays, of which only about eight remain. This is in itself no small objection. The chief objection to it is that it gives the sanction of this Assembly, whose high character we are all so jealous to maintain, to an amusement which, though it may be innocent in itself, is the cause of enormous evil in almost every town throughout the country. It is impossible to estimate the distress and misery caused by the speculation and gambling which attend all horse races, especially those on the Derby Day. A series of celebrated pictures in the Royal Academy, entitled "The Road to Ruin," are now attracting much notice. I fear, Sir, it is a fact beyond all dispute, that the road which has led thousands of our countrymen to ruin has run to a very great extent, if not mainly, along the race courses of the country. This, with us, is a matter of conscience. I hope the House will abandon a custom which is grievous to many of its Members, and to a very large number of the people of this country. Those hon. Members who wish to attend the race can readily obtain the leave of the House to absent themselves. Or they can do, what they not unfrequently do, absent themselves and go without leave. But do not let them stop the legislative Business of the House. To this we very strongly object.

It does not tend to the honour, and dignity, and credit of the House, that this should be done. In 1872, the minority against adjournment over the Derby Day amounted to 58. In 1874, it was 69. In 1875, it was 81. In 1876, it increased to 118. I trust, Sir, that the House will to-day still further increase this minority, or, better still, convert it into a majority.

MR. BIGGAR considered it his duty to vote for the adjournment. If it had been simply a question of horse-racing he would not have voted for it; but gambling had decreased to a very great extent, and the Derby was now a mere picnic.

Question put.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 4.]

(The Lord Advocate, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)
COMMITTEE. [Progress 21st March.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 12 (Appointment of county road trustees).

MR. ANDERSON, in moving as an Amendment, in page 8, after line 38, to insert the following section:—"Every tenant of land of the yearly value of one hundred pounds or upwards," said, his object in moving this Amendment was to bring tenants to take a more complete and thorough part in the management of roads. As the Bill at present stood, the management was left far too much in the hands of the Commissioners of Supply, who consisted entirely of the proprietary class. He wished to make tenants of £100 and upwards road trustees; whereas the Bill ignored tenants altogether, unless, perhaps, Corporations who paid £800 and upwards, which was going too far, and was a proposition to which he hoped the Committee would never consent. He wanted to see the Road Boards popularized, and it was high time that something in that direction were done. There was no reason, that he could see, why their counties should not be exactly like the municipalities in their great towns, and until they were so they would not be perfect. In the meantime, when a Bill was being introduced for creating one system of management for the whole of the roads, he thought it was a pity not to recognize the popular element a little more, and with that object he proposed the Amendment.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he effect of this Amendment in the county next to that in which he resided would be simply disastrous, for it would give an overwhelming majority to a particular class of persons who would, practically, swamp the Board. There would be, he calculated, 1,585 persons on the Road Board instead of 290. These persons would be made up as follows:—The Commissioners of Supply for that county, at present, were 187; the factors, 10; persons appointed by each Corporation or incorporated Company, 4; two persons out of each parish elected by the ratepayers from their own number, 86; one person for every police burgh in the county, 3; total 290. Under the hon. Member for Glasgow's Amendment the Commissioners of Supply would remain at 187, the number of tenants on the valuation roll, paying a rent of £100 or upwards yearly, would be 1,128. Six persons out of each of the 43 parishes elected by the ratepayers from their own number 258, and 4 persons elected by the Commission of the Police of each police burgh, 12; total, 1,585. He need not point out the absurdity of such an arrangement, and he hoped the Government would not accept the Amendment.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he did not at all approve of the principle that persons should be on the Road Board not as representing any body, but simply because they occupied property of a certain amount. The Amendment, too, instead of making the Boards more popular and representative, would operate in the adverse direction.

MR. ORR-EWING hoped the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) would not press his Amendment, and if he did that the Government would not assent to it. He thought the Amendment was dictated rather by opposition to the Commissioners of Supply than by a desire to give the tenants representation. It was a fact, also, that there were many local Acts, the terms of which were practically settled by the tenants, which were so far from being representative, that they were very much less liberal than the proposals of the Government.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendments were made:—In page 8, line 39, leave out "and," and insert "any writing;" in page 8, line 39, after "seal," insert "under the hand of the secretary or other officer;" and in line 40, leave out "every," and insert "any."

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER moved, as an Amendment, the omission of the word "incorporated" in line 40. By the clause as it stood Companies not incorporated could not vote, although they were possessed of property of the annual value of £800 and upwards. The result was, that the Clyde Coal Company and Dixon's Company (Limited) would vote, while the Coltness Iron Company and William Baird and Company could not.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had had very little time to consider the Amendment, as it had not been put down on the Paper. He doubted whether it would have the effect desired by the hon. Baronet, even if carried. An unincorporated Company could not hold land except through trustees.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the trustees could not vote for Commissioners of Supply.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER said, he would not press the matter now, but would bring up the Amendment on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ANDERSON said, he did not understand why £800 was chosen as the limit in the Bill, and why it was not £700 or £600, or any other sum. In his opinion, £800 was too much; but as the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) intended to move to reduce it to £200, he should not move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. M'LAREN said, the professed object of the Bill was to place corporations who held land in the position of landed proprietors, yet while an ordinary proprietor would have a vote for comparatively small rental, a corporation would not unless it came within the £800 class. Now, a corporation was regarded by the law as exactly similar to a private individual, and why should they not be treated as other individuals? He considered that every corporation whose landed estates were worth £200 a-year should have the right to vote in these matters; and therefore he moved to substitute the word "two" for the word "eight," in page 8, line 42.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY also thought that the valuation of £800, required by this clause of the Bill, in order to enable a corporation or a corporate Company to appoint trustees, was too high. He was in favour of reducing the amount as proposed, while, at the same time, restricting the title of the Company to ownership qualification.

MR. RAMSAY said, as the Bill now stood any Company assessed at £800 for taxes of any kind during the year could appoint a representative. He thought it would be desirable to define the right of Companies more clearly.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for Edinburgh ought not to be accepted. The question raised here was really as to what parties might be represented by proxy. In the case of incorporated Companies, their position was the same as that of Commissioners of Supply, who could be represented by the factors of their landed estates if the rentals were £800 a-year. If the Amendment passed, the Companies would be entitled to vote for any part of their rental, whether received from houses or other sources.

MR. M'LAREN replied, that a rental of £200 a-year from landed estates should be sufficient. Every corporation had an official—their treasurer, who represented the trust—who was altogether different from an ordinary factor. If the Lord Advocate thought that £200 a-year was too small, he was willing to take a larger sum; but he thought £800 a-year perfectly preposterous. There might as well be a clause to the effect that no corporation with a landed estate should have any representative, as pass the clause as it at present stood.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY, in page 8, line 42, proposed, in order to make it clear that Companies must be owners of land and not tenants only, to insert after the word "assessed" the words "as owners."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not in the least object to the addition of the words proposed by the hon. Member for Forfarshire.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER said, with reference to the 3rd subsection in the clause relating to the appointment of county road trustees, there should be only one person instead of two elected by the ratepayers in each parish situated wholly or partly in the county. He therefore moved, as an Amendment, in page 9, line 1, subsection 3, to leave out the words "two persons," and insert the words "one person, not being a Commissioner of Supply, or otherwise a trustee." His reason for moving the Amendment was, that he regarded the persons constituted as trustees under the Bill as so numerous that the Boards would be unwieldy, and he thought it would be almost impossible to get the Bill fairly worked under them. He therefore proposed to substitute one trustee for the two provided for by the Bill.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had refrained from moving his Amendment to increase the number of trustees to be elected by each parish, because he was informed that in some counties where the number of parishes was very large, any increase of the representation would make the number of elected members cumbersome and unworkable. But he hoped the Government would not consent to reduce the number of trustees appointed by the Bill. He would have preferred that three members should be elected by the ratepayers of each parish in the place of two; but he should certainly oppose the appointment of any smaller number.

MR. MARK STEWART pointed out that in several counties within his knowledge the election of two members by each parish would completely swamp the other representatives. In some counties which had private Acts, it was found that they could not even give one elected member to each parish, because it would make the representation unfairly great in comparison with the other constituents of the Board. He thought the best way to avoid this difficulty in the present case would be to reduce the number of trustees to one.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, the object of having these elected members was to secure that a certain number of persons representing the ratepayers should take part in the business of managing the roads. He, therefore, thought it very important not to reduce their number to an extent which would prevent their getting proper members. In Lanarkshire the number of elected members would be only four or five, as the number of parishes in that county was comparatively small. He wished to ask the Government a question, which he begged to apologize for not having put into a more workable shape—namely, why the number of elected members should not be made to depend upon the size of the parishes? He thought that it might be easily laid down as a rule that a parish with less than 1,000 or 500 inhabitants should have only one representative; but that as the population increased to 5,000, 10,000, or 50,000, the proportion should be larger.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it might be that the number of the road trustees would be inconveniently large; that was part of the framework of the Bill. It must be remembered that elected members and non-elected members represented different interests, and he hoped that the House would not consent to reduce the proportion of elected members. It would be remembered that tenants were not directly represented. The only representation of the ratepayers was secured by this clause. He was quite sure that if Scotland were taken as a whole, it would be found that the number of Commissioners of Supply much exceeded the total number of elected members that would be elected at the rate of two to each parish.

THE LORD ADVOCATE quite admitted that in many counties—indeed, he might say in most counties—the body of trustees would be very unwieldly, and not the best possible for the despatch of business required in the management of the roads throughout the county; but, at the same time, it was exceedingly necessary to have a fair representation by elected members, and he did not think that could be secured by adopting the Amendment proposed for reducing the number of representatives to one for the ratepayers of each parish. Of course, the ratepayers were not tied down to parochial representatives, and he hoped they would be able to furnish a sufficient number of trustees as members of district committees for the management of local roads.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he did not cated any suggestion of a conflict of interests between the elected trustees and the Commissioners of Supply. In the county of Aberdeen there were two tenant trustees elected by each parish, and that number had been found to be very satisfactory. In the case of Lanarkshire, which was a county of parishes, they desired to have two trustees, and the Commissioners of Supply were by their experience qualified, after the experience they had, to have the great advantage of having two trustees elected by each parish and representatives. These trustees were held responsible by their neighbors to have the roads kept in good condition, and for seeing that the money spent upon them was economical and well spent. It was believed that the election of two trustees would be economical and judicious management. The elected trustees had no voice in regard to the payment of rates, in regard to the assessment, the both of which affected the Commissioners of Supply alone. There was, therefore, no conflict of interests between the two classes of trustees. It would be practically impossible, without a very complicated machinery, perfectly to balance the interests in the road trust, because the number of Commissioners of Supply was so large in the different counties of Scotland that what was found to suit in one would not suit in another. He thought, judging from the experience gained from previous Bills which had passed, that the proposal to elect two trustees would be perfectly well.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not suggest that there was any conflict of interests between elected trustees and Commissioners of Supply. It appeared to him that their interests were identical; that, however, in his opinion, was no reason for withholding a fair representation from either.

Mr. Mark Stewart

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY had not alluded to any remark of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate concerning a conflict of interests between the elected trustees and the Commissioners of Supply, but to the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George Campbell).

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. M'LAREN said, the Committee having adopted the principle that each parish should have two representatives, he begged to propose that the same measure of justice be extended to police burghs and he would therefore move that in the 4th sub-section of the clause in reference to trustees, instead of one person only being appointed as trustee by the Commissioners of Police of any police burgh within, or partly within, a county, there should be two persons. The parishes in Scotland would be found, as a rule, to be considerably smaller than the burghs; and, besides that, the rental of the parishes was very much smaller on the average than the rental of the burghs. He thought, therefore, it would be exceedingly anomalous to say that every parish, however small, should have two representatives, while every burgh, however large, should have only one. This appeared to him an oversight, and the provision should have been the other way—namely, that while parishes might have one representative, the burghs, being larger and more important, should have two. He begged to move that the word "one" be omitted, and the word "two" be inserted.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME asked, with reference to the proposal of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), whether, in cases where the provost or chief magistrate was ex officio trustee, another person would also be deputed to represent the burgh? If this were not so, he should be inclined to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh; because it seemed to him that burghs should have more than one representative.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had an Amendment coming immediately after the present one, on the same question, but going further than that of the hon. Member for Edinburgh; and it was, therefore, almost needless to say that he entirely approved of giving a larger representation to burghs. He wished to impress on the hon. Member for Edinburgh to take a division on the point, which was a very important one.

MR. RAMSAY said, that while there might be exceptional parishes, such as those mentioned by the hon. Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), where the population was larger than in many burghs, yet the burghs in Lanarkshire which he (Mr. Ramsay) had the honour to represent,

make the representation unfairly great in comparison with the other constituents of the Board. He thought the best way to avoid this difficulty in the present case would be to reduce the number of trustees to one.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, the object of having these elected members was to secure that a certain number of persons representing the ratepayers should take part in the business of managing the roads. He, therefore, thought it very important not to reduce their number to an extent which would prevent their getting proper members. In Lanarkshire the number of elected members would be only four or five, as the number of parishes in that county was comparatively small. He wished to ask the Government a question, which he begged to apologize for not having put into a more workable shape—namely, why the number of elected members should not be made to depend upon the size of the parishes? He thought that it might be easily laid down as a rule that a parish with less than 1,000 or 500 inhabitants should have only one representative; but that as the population increased to 5,000, 10,000, or 50,000, the proportion should be larger.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it might be that the number of the road trustees would be inconveniently large; that was part of the framework of the Bill. It must be remembered that elected members and non-elected members represented different interests, and he hoped that the House would not consent to reduce the proportion of elected members. It would be remembered that tenants were not directly represented. The only representation of the ratepayers was secured by this clause. He was quite sure that if Scotland were taken as a whole, it would be found that the number of Commissioners of Supply much exceeded the total number of elected members that would be elected at the rate of two to each parish.

THE LORD ADVOCATE quite admitted that in many counties—indeed, he might say in most counties—the body of trustees would be very unwieldly, and not the best possible for the despatch of business required in the management of the roads throughout the county; but, at the same time, it was exceedingly necessary to have a fair representation by elected members, and he did not think that could be secured by adopting the Amendment proposed for reducing the number of representatives to one for the ratepayers of each parish. Of course, the ratepayers were not tied down to parochial representatives, and he hoped they would be able to furnish a sufficient number of trustees as members of district committees for the management of local roads.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he deprecated any suggestion of a conflict of interests between the elected trustees and the Commissioners of Supply. In the county of Aberdeen there were two tenant trustees elected by each parish, and that number had been found to work very satisfactorily. In the case of Forfarshire, which was a county of small parishes, they desired to have two elected trustees, and the Commissioners of Supply were by their experience quite satisfied, after the experience they had, of the great advantage of having two tenant trustees elected by each parish as tenant representatives. These trustees were held responsible by their neighbours to have the roads kept in good condition, and for seeing that the money spent upon them was economically and well spent. It was believed that the election of two trustees would insure economical and judicious management. The elected trustees had no voice whatever in regard to the payment of debt, or in regard to the assessment, therefore, both of which affected the Commissioners of Supply alone. There was, therefore, no conflict of interests between the two classes of trustees. It would be practically impossible, without a very nice machinery, perfectly to balance the powers in the road trust, because the number of Commissioners of Supply was so various in the different counties of Scotland, that what was found to suit in one would not suit in another. He thought, judging from the experience gained from private Bills which had passed, that the proposal to elect two trustees would work perfectly well.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not suggest that there was any conflict of interests between elected trustees and Commissioners of Supply. It appeared to him that their interests were identical; that, however, in his opinion, was no reason for withholding a fair representation from either.

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY had not alluded to any remark of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate concerning a conflict of interests between the elected trustees and the Commissioners of Supply, but to the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George Campbell).

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Consequential Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. RAMSAY said, in the absence, for domestic reasons, of the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour), he begged to move the Amendment of which he (Sir George Balfour) had given Notice—namely, to insert, after the provision for the election of two representatives by each parish in the county, the words—

“And in counties where the tenants are at present trustees for the commutation roads, on the qualification of paying certain rentals, these tenants shall be trustees for all roads.”

He would simply state his belief that this proviso would apply chiefly, if not exclusively, to the county represented by the hon. and gallant Member, where it was desired that the trustees should continue to act as they had acted hitherto.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was hardly possible for the Government to assent to the Amendment. The proposal was really, that in all cases where a county had a local Act by which the tolls were abolished, the machinery of the old Act should be retained for certain purposes, instead of the new. It was quite competent for these counties to retain their present local Acts, and their local machinery by which they were worked; but, on the other hand, if they discarded those local Acts, and superseded them by the adoption of the present Bill, he did not see why the Committee should import confusion into the Bill by allowing the old machinery to operate.

Mr. M'LAREN said, the Committee having adopted the principle that each parish should have two representatives, he begged to propose that the same measure of justice be extended to police burghs and he would therefore move that in the 4th sub-section of the clause in reference to trustees, instead of one person only being appointed as trustee by the Commissioners of Police of any police burgh within, or partly within, a county, there should be two persons. The parishes in Scotland would be found, as a rule, to be considerably smaller than the burghs; and, besides that, the rental of the parishes was very much smaller on the average than the rental of the burghs. He thought, therefore, it would be exceedingly anomalous to say that every parish, however small, should have two representatives, while every burgh, however large, should have only one. This appeared to him an oversight, and the provision should have been the other way—namely, that while parishes might have one representative, the burghs, being larger and more important, should have two. He begged to move that the word “one” be omitted, and the word “two” be inserted.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME asked, with reference to the proposal of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), whether, in cases where the provost or chief magistrate was ex officio trustee, another person would also be deputed to represent the burgh? If this were not so, he should be inclined to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh; because it seemed to him that burghs should have more than one representative.

Mr. ANDERSON said, he had an Amendment coming immediately after the present one, on the same question, but going further than that of the hon. Member for Edinburgh; and it was, therefore, almost needless to say that he entirely approved of giving a larger representation to burghs. He wished to impress on the hon. Member for Edinburgh to take a division on the point, which was a very important one.

Mr. RAMSAY said, that while there might be exceptional parishes, such as those mentioned by the hon. Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), where the population was larger than in many burghs, yet the burghs in Lanarkshire which he (Mr. Ramsay) had the honour to represent, were certainly more populous, not only than some parishes, but than almost any rural parish in Scotland. It would be only giving the burghs a fair measure of representation if the Lord Advocate would accede to the Motion.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY was decidedly of opinion that the parish representatives having been fixed at two, the burgh representatives should be increased to the same number.

MR. ORR-EWING said, that the larger burghs, which would have a separate Road Trust, did not need the representation sought for them. He could not see that any burgh had a right to be represented by a road trustee, unless it contributed to the keeping up of the roads.

MR. W. HOLMS said, his only objection to the clause was that there were too few representatives of ratepayers, and too few representatives of burghs. He should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren).

MR. DALRYMPLE thought that the representatives of the burghs should not be on the County Road Trust at all. The burghs managed their own affairs, and it seemed to him that the County Commissioners should be left to manage the landward district roads, and that the burghs should have no voice in their management. At all events, he should distinctly oppose the appointment of a second trustee.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it seemed to him that the question would come to be one of statistics, and that the hon. Member (Mr. Dalrymple) had entirely misapprehended it. The clause related not to burghs in general but to police burghs, which were defined as populous places having a population not exceeding 5,000. These should in some degree be represented. The roads in these burghs were managed by the County Trust, and the question really was, did their population on an average exceed the population of parishes?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there had been a good deal of misapprehension as to the import of the clause. Reference had been made by the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) to the population of some of the burghs which he represented; but he (the Lord Advocate) asserted that none of these burghs were at all likely to be in the position of throwing themselves into the arms of the County Trust, instead of managing their own roads. Some of them might do so, but they certainly would not be populous burghs. The only case contemplated was that of a burgh which could not manage its own roads, except at great expense, and which availed itself of the provisions of the Bill in order to make common cause with the county. He believed that this class of burghs would not only be limited in number, but in population. The suggestion of the Bill was very fair. It dealt with Royal and Parliamentary burghs and with police burghs. It provided that where a Royal and Parliamentary burgh took the step alluded to, it should have as representatives the Provost, the chief magistrate, and one member of the town council. [In the case of a police burgh, the Provost or chief magistrate and one of the Commissioners of Police should be the representatives, so that in each case there would be two representatives. In those localities intended to be benefited by the provisions of the Bill, there was not much probability of the population being larger than in the parishes.

MR. M'LAREN thought the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had lost sight of the fact that there was a clause in the Bill which enabled all burghs of a population not exceeding 10,000, to make an arrangement with counties to keep up the roads and streets in that burgh upon such terms as the counties might think fit to agree to. He wished to know whether the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate thought that a burgh of 10,000 inhabitants was to be placed in the same position as regarded representation as some petty parish in Scotland with 500 inhabitants, or even less? The burghs ought to have two elected representatives, in addition to their chief magistrate. He thought the clause an unjust one, and felt it his duty to divide the House upon the question.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY believed there were two classes of burghs which came under the operation of the clause. The sub-section, on which the Amendment was founded, dealt with the case of the police burgh, which had no choice but to be of necessity a part of the county. This police burgh had under 5,000 inhabitants, and would get one elected member. The proposal now was to elect two. The rest of the clause referred to Royal and Parliamentary burghs or police burghs of over 5,000 of population, and for these there existed a different set of circumstances altogether. In their case, the Bill contemplated their coming to an agreement with the counties to have their roads kept up and their representation on the County Board was a separate affair altogether; but the case of the small police burgh was not met by the explanation given by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate.

Question put, "That the word 'one' stand part of the Clause."

MR. TREVELYAN moved to amend the clause, by inserting, after the word "trustees," in page 9, line 12, the following words:—

"All persons being proprietors in feft, in life-rent, or in fee not burdened with a life-rent, in lands and heritages within the county of the yearly rent or value of at least one hundred pounds sterling, in terms of the Act of the seventeenth and eighteenth Victoria, chapter ninety-one."

In certain counties in Scotland, as the right hon. and learned Lord and many hon. Members knew, the roads were managed by a joint Board, partly composed of Commissioners of Supply from outside the burghs, and partly of gentlemen inside the burghs, having the same qualification as Commissioners of Supply. Sometimes this qualification was £100. In Dumfriesshire and other counties, however, it was £150. So far as he could gather from its clauses, the Bill would disfranchise those gentlemen whose qualification was derived from property situated within the burghs. In Selkirkshire some of the most valuable members of the Road Board were gentlemen deriving their qualification from property within the burgh of Selkirk. His Amendment, which copied the words of the Selkirk Act, would prevent this disfranchisement.

MR. ORR-EWING opposed the Amendment in its existing form, as likely to give the same qualification as that of a Commissioner of Supply to persons whose property was situated in burghs which might not contribute to the support of the county roads.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME wished for some further explanation of the effect of the section.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY understood the proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) to be, that where a Royal, Parliamentary, or police burgh of over 5,000 inhabitants agreed with the county that the county should manage its roads, every owner of property of £100 value within the burgh should in that case have a seat at the Board of Trustees. Such an arrangement between county and burgh would be voluntary, and it would be desirable that it should be easily terminable. He therefore urged that, as the provisions of the Bill already provided for a sufficient representation of a burgh, in these circumstances, it would be undesirable to accept an Amendment which would have the effect of making the trustees a cumbrous body, and of prejudicing voluntary arrangements between burghs and counties.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY understood that the Amendment was suggested to meet the case of Selkirkshire. It seemed, however, to him that the provision would admit too many to the County Road Board.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL understood the proposition to be, that in the case of arrangements between burgh and county, the landward part of the county and the burghs should be put on an equal footing, and that the burghs should be represented by proprietors, plus the elected members, in the same way as the counties were.

MR. ORR-EWING objected to the Amendment, on the ground that it would indirectly change the law of Scotland as to the qualification of Commissioners of Supply, which was fixed at £200.

MR. TREVELYAN assured the Committee that he was not desirous of raising any abstract question for discussion. He only wished that the course which had generally been followed hitherto in these counties where burghs were included in the Road Trust, should be followed under the new Act. That course had been found very advantageous in Selkirkshire and Dumfriesshire. Other counties than Selkirkshire would be prejudicially affected by the Bill if their position were not protected by this Amendment; and a large number of exceedingly useful road trustees would be disfranchised. He did not think the burghs should be placed in a position less advantageous than that which they at present occupied, and if he received sufficient encouragement to do so, he would take a division.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, the Amendment would apply not only to the burghs in these counties, but to the burghs in all counties, and where there was a large number of proprietors holding this qualification they would swamp the trust. He hoped the Amendment would not be accepted.

THE LORD ADVOCATE did not think the Government could accept the Amendment. The counties referred to by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) were exceptional counties in the South of Scotland, generally of a pastoral character, although they were dotted here and there with centres of industry; and he doubted whether the arrangement which was said to have suited them would suit the industrial counties. In the larger and more populous counties to the North, the species of representation described by the hon. Member was not known, and the more recent local Acts abolishing tolls had approximated to the lines of the present Bill. He had no desire to disfranchise these trustees, and, indeed, they must, to be disfranchised, disfranchise themselves. They were at present county trustees, within the meaning of their local Acts; but if they came within the scope of this Act, they came under legislation of quite a different kind, that contemplated separate management by burghs. He had understood that the burghs in these counties were rather desirous of having that separation, or the means of effecting it for themselves. If the Committee adopted the Amendment, it would simply come to this—that, in addition to Commissioners of Supply and elected trustees, every person who was owner of property of the value of £100 within a burgh would be added to the County Road Trust. In many counties that would render the County Trust cumbrous and utterly unworkable, and would extend the county trusteeship far beyond the limits to which the Government could agree.

MR. RAMSAY, though believing it desirable that the burghs should have a voice in the management of the county roads with a view to their being able to make representations as to the management of roads adjacent to the burghs, advised the withdrawal of the Amendment, if for no other reason than that, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing), it virtually altered the legal qualification for being a Commissioner of Supply.

COLONEL MURE thought that as the proposed Amendment would unduly extend the dimensions of the Board of Trustees, it should not be persevered with. While suitable to the pastoral counties mentioned, it would be unmanageable in the industrial counties.

MR. TREVELYAN, remarking that Selkirkshire would probably take an advantage of another Amendment to the Bill which the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had frankly placed on the Paper, and that the discussion would not justify him in delaying the Business of the Committee by taking a division, asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. ORR-EWING moved to amend the clause, in page 9, line 12, by inserting, after the word "any," the words "such burgh being a."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that this, and two other Amendments by the hon. Member being improvements in the wording of the Bill, he did not object to them.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. ORR-EWING, the following Amendments were made:—In page 9, line 15, leave out "other," and insert "such;" and in the same line, after "burgh," insert "being a police burgh."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Mode of election by ratepayers).

MR. MARK STEWART moved to insert, in page 9, line 23, after the word "election," the words "in such convenient place in each parish as he may appoint." The convener of the county might live a long way off, and it was expedient that meetings should be called at convenient places within the parish.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14 (Trustees designated and incorporated) agreed to.

Clause 15 (Appointment of County Road Boards).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY rose to move, in page 10, line 11, to leave out from "shall," to "each," in line 12, and insert "may if they see fit at." There was no place for such a Board as here proposed; and although he did not propose to ask the Committee to omit this Board from the machinery of the Bill altogether, he moved his Amendment so as to make the appointment of such a Board entirely optional.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought there could be no doubt that the proposal which had just been made raised an important question, and he regarded it as essential that the constitution and existence of a Road Board should be made imperative. He quite admitted that in some, if not most, of the counties of Scotland, the general management of the trustees was satisfactory. He quite admitted that when any question of importance arose, the trustees would become alive to its importance, and would discuss and deliberate fairly as to what should be done; and he would be no party to limiting that right of determination on the part of the general body of road trustees in a county. But those who were acquainted with the proceedings of such bodies must be aware of the fact that if they were left to themselves, the management devolved upon a few active persons who conducted the whole business of the trust without any personal responsibility, and who practically constituted the supreme authority within the county. His proposal was, that a Road Board should be instituted as a standing committee, which should have administrative powers, but which should still be subject to such regulations and instructions as the trustees might direct and provide. The Board would be able to carry out the directions which the general body of trustees might choose to give, and whenever it might happen to act in a manner which was not in conformity with the desire of the majority, it would be liable to have its actings set aside, and to have a plain rule laid down for future guidance. He did not propose that the Board should be left to take the entire management in districts and parishes; but he believed that, to the extent to which the Bill went, the proposal now under consideration was necessary to the satisfactory working of the measure.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he regarded his proposal as so reasonable, that he thought the Government would have agreed to it. He could speak from considerable experience of one county in Scotland—he referred to Forfarshire—and he asserted with the greatest confidence that there was no room whatever for such a Board to occupy between the district and the general body of trustees. It would, in short, prove altogether a trumpery Board, and would be more likely to cause difficulties than anything else. Indeed, so far as he knew, there was not only no necessity for it in Forfarshire, but no necessity for it at all in any of those counties which had adopted private Acts, and he had not seen it urged in any Petitions which had been presented to the House that such a Board should be appointed. For what imperative duties would the Board be called into existence? Simply these—that the district committee must report to the Board, and the Board to the trustees, instead of the committee reporting to the trustees directly, and that the Board should constitute a court of appeal. These were the only two imperative duties which were set out; but clearly the Board could not have any greater knowledge of the wants of the district than those districts themselves, and the general body of trustees might appoint a committee from among themselves to hear appeals. If, however, the Government were determined that there should be such a Board, he hoped that they would agree to this—that the trustees themselves should be allowed to appoint it, provided they found there was any necessity for doing so. If there were thought to be any such necessity, no doubt it would be appointed; but, for his own part, he regarded the proposal of the Bill as objectionable, and as being a cumbrous piece of machinery for which there was no necessity whatever.

COLONEL MURE thought that if effect were given to the proposal of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay), the machinery would be much more cumbrous than it was at present.

MR. RAMSAY said, it had been stated that there were counties in Scotland in which the proposed Board would be an advantage. That might be so; but he thought there were other counties with very large bodies of trustees in which no necessity whatever for any such Board existed, and to that extent his own experience concurred with that of the hon. Member for Forfarshire. He also agreed with the hon. Gentleman that if there were to be this appointment at all, perhaps the permissive method of procedure might be the best. The matter might be left to the trustees without any risk of inconvenience.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had given Notice of an Amendment, in page 10, lines 14 and 15, to leave out the words, "and not less than one-third and not more than one-half of the Board," in order to insert the words—

"Of whom one-third shall be Commissioners of Supply, one-third shall be tenants, and one-third."

He had placed the Amendment on the Paper for the purpose of putting the Board on a better footing, by making one-third of it consist of Commissioners of Supply, one-third of tenants, and one-third of elected members. As, however, his former Amendment had been negatived, it would, of course, be impossible for him to carry this one; and, therefore, he would, with the permission of the Committee, withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL ALEXANDER, moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 14, to leave out "third," and insert "fourth." Under the clause, he remarked, the number of elected trustees appeared to be very large; for it provided that the County Board should consist of not more than 30 trustees, and not less than one-third, and not more than one-half, of the Board should be elected trustees. It was this proportion to which he objected. The elected trustees had not really so much interest in the matter as the other trustees, and they ought not, therefore, to possess such large representation at the Board. Under the clause as it stood, they might certainly form one-half of that body. It was in order to reduce the number of elected members from one-third to one-fourth that he proposed this Amendment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was evident from the Amendments that had been placed upon the Paper, that there might be room for a good deal of difference of opinion on the matter; but he thought that the provisions of the Bill, as drawn up, constituted a fair compromise.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, it would be very unfair if the elected trustees were to be reduced in number, as the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) proposed. He thought that as the tenants were going to pay as much money as the Commissioners of Supply, they ought not to have any less share in the representation than one-half. The proposal made by the Bill was extremely unfair, and still more unfair and unreasonable was the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite. If the hon. and gallant Member did not press his Amendment, he would move to leave out "one-third," in order to insert "one-half." As the elected trustees were, in any case, the representatives of those who paid at least one-half of the taxation, it certainly was a manifest injustice that they should have a smaller representation at this Board than the Commissioners of Supply. If the argument of his hon. and gallant Friend were correct, the Commissioners of Supply ought to pay a larger share of the taxation than they did at present. Instead of paying one-half of the rate, they ought to pay two-thirds, and in that case he would be willing that they should have a representation of two-thirds on the Board. The proposal embodied in the Bill was, in his judgment, contrary to the principles of sound legislation, and could only be carried by a majority of members of that Committee who were determined that the Commissioners of Supply should have an ascendancy on the Board.

LORD ELCHO said, it was evident there were conflicting views upon this subject; but he thought that what the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate proposed was a fair medium course; and he, therefore, hoped that his right hon. and learned Friend would adhere to his proposal. It had been said that the elected trustees would not be adequately represented; but, if they were not, it would be their own fault. The Road Board was to be appointed at a general meeting of the body of trustees, and it was at that meeting that those gentlemen should look after their interests and the interests of those whom they might be called upon to represent. If they had a majority present at the general meeting, there could be little doubt that they would receive there a full representation—namely, one-half, on the County Road Board. He hoped the Government would stand by the clause, which appeared to him to be just and fair.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought there could be no doubt that in this case the "one-third" represented the principle that the elected trustees should be in a minority at the Board. ["No, no!"] The expression was "not less than one-third and not more than one-half." The general effect of that would be that the elected members would be in a minority. ["No, no!"] Well, on an average they would. They could not be more than one-half, and they might be less than one-half. The elected members would clearly represent the greater part of the taxation under the Bill. One-half of the taxation was paid by the tenants; but the elected members would represent not only the tenants, but small proprietors under £100 a-year and the burghs, and that being so, it was indisputable that it was unjust they should be put in a minority.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, that while he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Alexander) would not press his Amendment, he desired to point out that hon. Gentlemen who spoke of the elected trustees representing the body that paid more than one-half of the total charge, seemed entirely to forget that the tenants practically received back part of what they paid in the shape of diminished rents. This came, therefore, to a large extent out of the landlords' pockets.

COLONEL MURE said, he desired to supplement what had been stated by the hon. Baronet who had just spoken. Under Clause 65, proprietors would also have to pay for all new works—for new roads and new bridges. In addition to that, the whole burden of the debt would fall upon them; and, in all these circumstances, it was not at all fair to say that the elected trustees would pay a larger sum than the other trustees, and were consequently entitled to a larger representation. He hoped the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would perceive that—"In medias res tutissimus ibis."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, lines 14 and 15, to leave out "and not less than one-third, and not more than one-half of the Board," and to insert "of whom one-half shall be elected trustees." With reference to the remarks of the last of the hon. Members who had spoken—his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Mure)—it ought to be remembered that the Bill provided that elected trustees should have no voice in the questions of debt or of new roads and bridges. The questions coming before the Board would be questions in connection with which the tenants would have to pay, and the landlords—the Commissioners—would also have to pay, and even if it were distinctly provided that there should be one-half for each, there was still no provision whatever that the burghs should be represented. But he maintained that those who would pay one-half of the taxation would be placed in a minority. On the simple grounds of equity, the House was bound to recognize the principle that those who contributed one-half of the taxation were entitled to one half of the representation. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 14, to leave out the words "third and not more than."—(Mr. James Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY hoped that the proposal of the Bill would be allowed to remain as it was. It would appear, from the manner in which some hon. Gentlemen had spoken, that there was actually an antagonism between the tenants and the Commissioners of Supply; but such an idea was a perfect delusion. The tenants would be represented at the Board, their interests would be duly considered and cared for, and matters would be conducted with as much economy as possible. In these circumstances, he really thought that they need not waste more time in discussion as to the word which should be put into the Bill.

Mr. M'LAREN said, the hon. Baronet who had just spoken (Sir Graham Montgomery) had protested against the idea that there was any difference of interest between the Commissioners of Supply and the tenants. He (Mr. M'Laren) would admit there was no antagonism between them; but, because of that very fact, why should the tenants be stigmatized as they would be, if they had not an equal vote and an equal representation? There could be no reason for it. He appealed to the Government to give way to the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire.

Mr. O. S. PARKER wished to point out to the Committee, that as the Amendment was now put, it would have an effect which, perhaps, was not contemplated — namely, that it would not equally divide the representation; but would provide that, while one-half of the Board must be elected trustees, more than one-half might be elected trustees. Therefore, the Amendment, if carried, might have the effect of giving more than one-half of the representation on the County Boards to the elected trustees. If it were true, as had been suggested, that there would be no antagonism between the two classes of governors, and that, if left alone, a fair proportion of each class would be appointed, he saw no particular reason why either the clause should not be allowed to stand in the form in which it appeared in the Bill, or why the words regulating the proportion of elected trustees should not be entirely omitted. If there were to be no antagonism, no harm could be done by either of these courses being adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that as the Amendment was originally drawn, it contained more words than were necessary, in that it laid down that not less than half and not more than half of the body should be elected trustees. He thought by shorten than half.'

Sir G

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY said, he did not intend to turn the scale in the way suggested by the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. O. S. Parker); and if the words which he had moved were found to have a different signification from that which he attached to them, they could be amended on the Report. The object of his Amendment was to give an equal representation on the Board to the parties interested. He proposed that the Board should consist of half elected trustees and half Commissioners of Supply. If the Government were prepared to leave out the clause altogether, without specifying the numbers in any way, he should be quite content to accept this part of the Bill in that form, and trust to the sense of justice which he had no doubt pervaded the general body of trustees to do what was right in the matter.

Mr. M'LAGAN said, it seemed to be conceded that the interests of the landlords and tenants in this matter were not antagonistic. Well, they certainly were not antagonistic, but they were not identical. The one was permanent, and the other was temporary and fleeting, and only extended to the duration of his lease. If a road were allowed to go down for four or five or six years, it required at the end of the time a good deal of money to put it again in proper condition, and the cost must fall upon the landlord, the tenant who had not paid a fair proportion during his tenancy, but had used the roads, having probably moved away into another district. Therefore, he was inclined to take a middle course, and support the clause as it stood in the Bill.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 121; Noes 69: Majority 52.—(Div. List, No. 165.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 16 (County to be divided into districts, and district committees appointed).

Mr. ORR-EWING moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 24, to leave out the word "shall," and insert "may, if they think fit." The object of the Amendment was to leave it optional with the trustees to divide the

if

MR. RAMSAY hoped that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would not agree to the Amendment; because, if it were thought right that there should be a County Board appointed in every case, it was equally requisite that there should be a division into districts in every case. He thought that if the hon. Member who moved the Amendment would just consider the circumstances of the county which he represented in that House, he would feel that, unless it were divided into districts, some injustice would be done to the inhabitants of very large areas. It was expedient, therefore, that this obligation should continue to exist.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY pointed out that in Scotland there were some counties so small that it would be very inexpedient to divide them into districts at all. Their number might not be large; but, at the same time, he thought the power referred to in the clause should be permissive.

MR. RAMSAY reminded the hon. Baronet that it was not imperative to make the division in any counties where there were not more than six parishes.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that being so, the result of passing the clause in its present shape would be, that in the case of any small county which happened to contain seven parishes, it would be imperative to divide those parishes into more than one road district. That would be undesirable, and he, therefore, hoped the Amendment would be adopted.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY supported the proposal to divide each county into districts. If the Amendment were not adopted, the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate might consider the desirability, in certain cases, of extending the limit which he had introduced into the clause relating to the number of parishes. It was quite proper that as regarded all larger counties, at all events, they should be divided into districts.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought it would be well to consider the suggestion just made by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay). At the same time, he thought it was exceedingly desirable that in some counties in Scotland, at all events, this should be made imperative; and he would remind the Committee that there was provided an appeal to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with a view to see that the boundaries were rightly laid down. The present exception would exclude several of the smaller counties in Scotland; but it was impossible for him at that moment, without looking into the statistics of the case, and ascertaining the number of parishes in each county above that limit, to say what should be the proper figure in the clause.

MR. ORR-EWING insisted that great harm would be done to many counties by dividing them into districts. He thought it should be left to the whole body of the inhabitants in each county to decide whether the county should or should not be divided into districts.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS suggested that after what had been said, a fair case had been made out for a re-consideration of this particular question. He would remind the hon. Member (Mr. Orr-Ewing), that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had undertaken to look into the matter; but he could not say whether the number "six" should be altered before the Report.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE agreed with the suggestion, remarking that, if passed in its present form, the clause would work great injustice in many parts of the country.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he would withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate recommended the clause—with reference to the point now raised—between the present stage and the Report.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would do that, but added, it was possible that the statistics, when examined, might not enable the Government to propose any alteration in the limit contained in the clause. In that case, it would be open to the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire again to propose and to take the sense of the Committee upon his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in page 10, line 29, after "fit," to insert "but being, as far as may be, persons deriving their qualifications as trustees from lands within such district."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, in page 10, line 29, to leave out the words from "committee," to "provided," in line 35. The Amendment raised a similar issue to that on which the Committee had recently divided; but, in the present case, it derived additional importance from the fact that the whole management of the roads would depend on the district committee. Therefore, it was of essential importance that upon these district committees the tenant-farmers should be fully represented. No doubt, in the appointment of these district committees, all the principal landowners in the district would wish to be placed upon it; but that would probably be the whole amount of interference which they would take upon themselves in the matter. If the tenants were not fairly and fully represented on these district committees, the practical result would be that the management of the roads would fall into the hands of officials, and that would be a very unfortunate position of affairs both for the landlords and the tenants. He was now speaking from practical experience of those counties which had come to Parliament for private Acts of their own, and it was a very remarkable thing that this Bill, which was brought in by the Government, was far more Tory in its character than the private Bills which had been promoted by the Commissioners of Supply themselves. That was one remarkable feature of this measure. He knew of no Bill, except that of the county which was represented by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho), in which this invidious distinction was made between the two classes of trustees. If the tenant-farmers were not to have a direct voice in the management of the roads in the district in which they lived, all that would remain for them to do would be to vote in the election of those who should have such voice in the management of the roads. He therefore hoped that the Government would not insist upon this clause as it stood, because he did not speak now in the interest of the representative trustees alone, or of the Commissioners of Supply, but in the interest of both bodies; and it was of the utmost importance for the good working of this Bill and the economical management of the roads, that the tenant-trustees of the parish should feel that they had an active and direct interest in looking after the roads in their respective districts.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 29, to leave out from the word "committee," to the word "provided," in line 35, inclusive. — (Mr. James Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'of whom one' stand part of the Clause."

LORD ELCHO said, he would point out to the Committee that there were a hundred and odd clauses in the Bill. They were now on the 16th, and that day had been given to them for the purpose of making progress with a measure which, he supposed, they were all anxious to pass. Well, the arguments which the hon. Gentleman had adduced in favour of his present Amendment had already been urged by him in reference to a former Amendment, which the Committee, notwithstanding, had rejected, and affirmed the principle of the clause. Under these circumstances, he would suggest that if they wished to make progress, they would simply adopt or negative the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. ANDERSON, in whose name the next three Amendments stood upon the Paper, said, they were intended to make the district committees precisely the same as to their construction as he desired the Board to be—namely, that they should be composed of one-third proprietors, one-third tenants, and one-third elected members. The Committee, however, had already entirely ignored the tenant-farmer, and precluded him from having any existence on the Board, except by accident. In two divisions it had declared its approval of the proposal that the Board and district committees should be so constructed that in no instance would the landed proprietors be left in a minority. It was, therefore, absolutely useless for him to move his Amendments, and he would not take up the time of the Committee by doing so.

LORD ELCHO said, he must protest against the allegation of the hon. Gentleman that the tenant-farmers had been ignored in the Bill.

Mr. ANDERSON replied that they were ignored as a class, inasmuch as the only means which were open to a tenant-farmer to obtain a place on the Board were that he should be among the elected members. As a tenant-farmer he had no status, and it might easily happen under the Bill that the elected members might all be proprietors under £100 a-year, and not a single tenant on the Board.

Amendments, by leave, withdrawn.

Remaining Amendment (Mr. Orr-Ewing), by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17 (Appeal to Secretary of State as to formation of districts).

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, in page 11, line 6, the omission of the words "Secretary of State," and the substitution for them of the words "Sheriff of the county." The Sheriff would, he contended, because of his greater local knowledge, be much better qualified to decide appeals relating to questions of boundary than a Member of the Government, however eminent, residing in London, and unacquainted with the various localities in regard to which an appeal was made.

Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE expressed a hope that the Government would accept the Amendment. It appeared to him to be quite out of the question that the Secretary of State in London could satisfactorily discharge the duties which the clause would impose upon him. The people of Scotland managed their own affairs very well, and he, for one, strongly objected to the tendency which prevailed at the present day to the system of centralization. It was quite evident, he thought, that the Secretary of State could not be so well acquainted as the Sheriffs of counties with local circumstances, on which the proper arrangement of boundaries very much depended; and he hoped the Government would think better of it, and not compel the Committee to divide.

Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE hoped the Government would adhere to the clause as it stood. Under its operation, the words "Secretary of State" would in reality mean the Lord Advocate; and there would, in his opinion, be a great disadvantage in having questions which might arise with respect to the division of counties decided by a person who might be, to a considerable extent, mixed up with local affairs.

Mr. MARK STEWART asked if it was necessary to have the clause at all, and stated that he had an Amendment to omit it altogether. He maintained that no necessity existed for giving a power of appeal at all. The greatest harmony, as a general rule, prevailed at the meetings of the Commissioners of Supply. There were, of course, from time to time, points on which differences of opinion existed; but the minority were always disposed to give way to the views of the majority. But, apart from that, what, he should like to know, could a Secretary of State understand about the intricacies involved in questions of boundary in each county in Scotland? What, again, did the Sheriff of a county know about local matters? He, of course, travelled about the county; but it by no means followed from that that he should possess the requisite information to enable him to be an efficient court of appeal under the Bill. The result of the adoption of the clause, too, would be, he firmly believed, to lead to no end of intrigues and expense in order to have questions settled in London, instead of having them disposed of, as at present, by one vote of the Commissioners of Supply, and, if necessary, re-settled at the expiration of a period of three years. The clause, in fact, would give rise to all sorts of plotting and nagging, which, in his opinion, it would be extremely desirable to avoid.

Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE rose to Order. He wished to ask whether the hon. Gentleman was in Order in discussing an Amendment for the rejection of the clause, which stood in his name lower down on the Notice Paper, when the immediate question before the Committee was the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander)?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Wigton (Mr. Mark Stewart) would not be in Order in making observations which were directed to the rejection of the clause as a whole, inasmuch as the Question before the Committee was a proposal to amend it.

Mr. MARK STEWART would, of course, at once bow to the decision of the Chairman, and would simply say, in were certainly more populous, not only than some parishes, but than almost any rural parish in Scotland. It would be only giving the burghs a fair measure of representation if the Lord Advocate would accede to the Motion.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY was decidedly of opinion that the parish representatives having been fixed at two, the burgh representatives should be increased to the same number.

MR. ORR-EWING said, that the larger burghs, which would have a separate Road Trust, did not need the representation sought for them. He could not see that any burgh had a right to be represented by a road trustee, unless it contributed to the keeping up of the roads.

MR. W. HOLMS said, his only objection to the clause was that there were too few representatives of ratepayers, and too few representatives of burghs. He should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren).

MR. DALRYMPLE thought that the representatives of the burghs should not be on the County Road Trust at all. The burghs managed their own affairs, and it seemed to him that the County Commissioners should be left to manage the landward district roads, and that the burghs should have no voice in their management. At all events, he should distinctly oppose the appointment of a second trustee.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it seemed to him that the question would come to be one of statistics, and that the hon. Member (Mr. Dalrymple) had entirely misapprehended it. The clause related not to burghs in general but to police burghs, which were defined as populous places having a population not exceeding 5,000. These should in some degree be represented. The roads in these burghs were managed by the County Trust, and the question really was, did their population on an average exceed the population of parishes?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there had been a good deal of misapprehension as to the import of the clause. Reference had been made by the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) to the population of some of the burghs which he represented; but he (the Lord Advocate) asserted that none of these burghs were at all likely to be in the position of throwing themselves into the arms of the County Trust, instead of managing their own roads. Some of them might do so, but they certainly would not be populous burghs. The only case contemplated was that of a burgh which could not manage its own roads, except at great expense, and which availed itself of the provisions of the Bill in order to make common cause with the county. He believed that this class of burghs would not only be limited in number, but in population. The suggestion of the Bill was very fair. It dealt with Royal and Parliamentary burghs and with police burghs. It provided that where a Royal and Parliamentary burgh took the step alluded to, it should have as representatives the Provost, the chief magistrate, and one member of the town council. (In the case of a police burgh, the Provost or chief magistrate and one of the Commissioners of Police should be the representatives, so that in each case there would be two representatives. In those localities intended to be benefited by the provisions of the Bill, there was not much probability of the population being larger than in the parishes.

MR. M'LAREN thought the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had lost sight of the fact that there was a clause in the Bill which enabled all burghs of a population not exceeding 10,000, to make an arrangement with counties to keep up the roads and streets in that burgh upon such terms as the counties might think fit to agree to. He wished to know whether the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate thought that a burgh of 10,000 inhabitants was to be placed in the same position as regarded representation as some petty parish in Scotland with 500 inhabitants, or even less? The burghs ought to have two elected representatives, in addition to their chief magistrate. He thought the clause an unjust one, and felt it his duty to divide the House upon the question.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY believed there were two classes of burghs which came under the operation of the clause. The sub-section, on which the Amendment was founded, dealt with the case of the police burgh, which had no choice but to be of necessity a part of the county. This police burgh had under 5,000 inhabitants, and would get one elected member. The proposal now was to elect two. The rest of the clause referred to Royal and Parliamentary burghs or police burghs of over 5,000 of population, and for these there existed a different set of circumstances altogether. In their case, the Bill contemplated their coming to an agreement with the counties to have their roads kept up and their representation on the County Board was a separate affair altogether; but the case of the small police burgh was not met by the explanation given by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate.

Question put, "That the word 'one' stand part of the Clause."

MR. TREVELYAN moved to amend the clause, by inserting, after the word "trustees," in page 9, line 12, the following words:—

"All persons being proprietors in feft, in life-rent, or in fee not burdened with a life-rent, in lands and heritages within the county of the yearly rent or value of at least one hundred pounds sterling, in terms of the Act of the seventeenth and eighteenth Victoria, chapter ninety-one."

In certain counties in Scotland, as the right hon. and learned Lord and many hon. Members knew, the roads were managed by a joint Board, partly composed of Commissioners of Supply from outside the burghs, and partly of gentlemen inside the burghs, having the same qualification as Commissioners of Supply. Sometimes this qualification was £100. In Dumfriesshire and other counties, however, it was £150. So far as he could gather from its clauses, the Bill would disfranchise those gentlemen whose qualification was derived from property situated within the burghs. In Selkirkshire some of the most valuable members of the Road Board were gentlemen deriving their qualification from property within the burgh of Selkirk. His Amendment, which copied the words of the Selkirk Act, would prevent this disfranchisement.

MR. ORR-EWING opposed the Amendment in its existing form, as likely to give the same qualification as that of a Commissioner of Supply to persons whose property was situated in burghs which might not contribute to the support of the county roads.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME wished for some further explanation of the effect of the section.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY understood the proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) to be, that where a Royal, Parliamentary, or police burgh of over 5,000 inhabitants agreed with the county that the county should manage its roads, every owner of property of £100 value within the burgh should in that case have a seat at the Board of Trustees. Such an arrangement between county and burgh would be voluntary, and it would be desirable that it should be easily terminable. He therefore urged that, as the provisions of the Bill already provided for a sufficient representation of a burgh, in these circumstances, it would be undesirable to accept an Amendment which would have the effect of making the trustees a cumbrous body, and of prejudicing voluntary arrangements between burghs and counties.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY understood that the Amendment was suggested to meet the case of Selkirkshire. It seemed, however, to him that the provision would admit too many to the County Road Board.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL understood the proposition to be, that in the case of arrangements between burgh and county, the landward part of the county and the burghs should be put on an equal footing, and that the burghs should be represented by proprietors, plus the elected members, in the same way as the counties were.

MR. ORR-EWING objected to the Amendment, on the ground that it would indirectly change the law of Scotland as to the qualification of Commissioners of Supply, which was fixed at £200.

MR. TREVELYAN assured the Committee that he was not desirous of raising any abstract question for discussion. He only wished that the course which had generally been followed hitherto in these counties where burghs were included in the Road Trust, should be followed under the new Act. That course had been found very advantageous in Selkirkshire and Dumfriesshire. Other counties than Selkirkshire would be prejudicially affected by the Bill if their position were not protected by this Amendment; and a large number of exceedingly useful road trustees would be disfranchised. He did not think the burghs should be placed in a position less advantageous than that which they at present occupied, and if he received sufficient encouragement to do so, he would take a division.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, the Amendment would apply not only to the burghs in these counties, but to the burghs in all counties, and where there was a large number of proprietors holding this qualification they would swamp the trust. He hoped the Amendment would not be accepted.

THE LORD ADVOCATE did not think the Government could accept the Amendment. The counties referred to by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) were exceptional counties in the South of Scotland, generally of a pastoral character, although they were dotted here and there with centres of industry; and he doubted whether the arrangement which was said to have suited them would suit the industrial counties. In the larger and more populous counties to the North, the species of representation described by the hon. Member was not known, and the more recent local Acts abolishing tolls had approximated to the lines of the present Bill. He had no desire to disfranchise these trustees, and, indeed, they must, to be disfranchised, disfranchise themselves. They were at present county trustees, within the meaning of their local Acts; but if they came within the scope of this Act, they came under legislation of quite a different kind, that contemplated separate management by burghs. He had understood that the burghs in these counties were rather desirous of having that separation, or the means of effecting it for themselves. If the Committee adopted the Amendment, it would simply come to this—that, in addition to Commissioners of Supply and elected trustees, every person who was owner of property of the value of £100 within a burgh would be added to the County Road Trust. In many counties that would render the County Trust cumbrous and utterly unworkable, and would extend the county trusteeship far beyond the limits to which the Government could agree.

MR. RAMSAY, though believing it desirable that the burghs should have a voice in the management of the county roads with a view to their being able to make representations as to the management of roads adjacent to the burghs, advised the withdrawal of the Amendment, if for no other reason than that, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing), it virtually altered the legal qualification for being a Commissioner of Supply.

COLONEL MURE thought that as the proposed Amendment would unduly extend the dimensions of the Board of Trustees, it should not be persevered with. While suitable to the pastoral counties mentioned, it would be unmanageable in the industrial counties.

MR. TREVELYAN, remarking that Selkirkshire would probably take an advantage of another Amendment to the Bill which the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had frankly placed on the Paper, and that the discussion would not justify him in delaying the Business of the Committee by taking a division, asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. ORR-EWING moved to amend the clause, in page 9, line 12, by inserting, after the word "any," the words "such burgh being a."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that this, and two other Amendments by the hon. Member being improvements in the wording of the Bill, he did not object to them.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. ORR-EWING, the following Amendments were made:—In page 9, line 15, leave out "other," and insert "such;" and in the same line, after "burgh," insert "being a police burgh."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Mode of election by rate-payers).

MR. MARK STEWART moved to insert, in page 9, line 23, after the word "election," the words "in such convenient place in each parish as he may appoint." The convener of the county might live a long way off, and it was expedient that meetings should be called at convenient places within the parish.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14 (Trustees designated and incorporated) agreed to.

Clause 15 (Appointment of County Road Boards).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY rose to move, in page 10, line 11, to leave out from "shall," to "each," in line 12, and insert "may if they see fit at." There was no place for such a Board as here proposed; and although he did not propose to ask the Committee to omit this Board from the machinery of the Bill altogether, he moved his Amendment so as to make the appointment of such a Board entirely optional.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought there could be no doubt that the proposal which had just been made raised an important question, and he regarded it as essential that the constitution and existence of a Road Board should be made imperative. He quite admitted that in some, if not most, of the counties of Scotland, the general management of the trustees was satisfactory. He quite admitted that when any question of importance arose, the trustees would become alive to its importance, and would discuss and deliberate fairly as to what should be done; and he would be no party to limiting that right of determination on the part of the general body of road trustees in a county. But those who were acquainted with the proceedings of such bodies must be aware of the fact that if they were left to themselves, the management devolved upon a few active persons who conducted the whole business of the trust without any personal responsibility, and who practically constituted the supreme authority within the county. His proposal was, that a Road Board should be instituted as a standing committee, which should have administrative powers, but which should still be subject to such regulations and instructions as the trustees might direct and provide. The Board would be able to carry out the directions which the general body of trustees might choose to give, and whenever it might happen to act in a manner which was not in conformity with the desire of the majority, it would be liable to have its actings set aside, and to have a plain rule laid down for future guidance. He did not propose that the Board should be left to take the entire management in districts and parishes; but he believed that, to the extent to which the Bill went, the proposal now under consideration was necessary to the satisfactory working of the measure.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he regarded his proposal as so reasonable, that he thought the Government would have agreed to it. He could speak from considerable experience of one county in Scotland—he referred to Forfarshire—and he asserted with the greatest confidence that there was no room whatever for such a Board to occupy between the district and the general body of trustees. It would, in short, prove altogether a trumpery Board, and would be more likely to cause difficulties than anything else. Indeed, so far as he knew, there was not only no necessity for it in Forfarshire, but no necessity for it at all in any of those counties which had adopted private Acts, and he had not seen it urged in any Petitions which had been presented to the House that such a Board should be appointed. For what imperative duties would the Board be called into existence? Simply these—that the district committee must report to the Board, and the Board to the trustees, instead of the committee reporting to the trustees directly, and that the Board should constitute a court of appeal. These were the only two imperative duties which were set out; but clearly the Board could not have any greater knowledge of the wants of the district than those districts themselves, and the general body of trustees might appoint a committee from among themselves to hear appeals. If, however, the Government were determined that there should be such a Board, he hoped that they would agree to this—that the trustees themselves should be allowed to appoint it, provided they found there was any necessity for doing so. If there were thought to be any such necessity, no doubt it would be appointed; but, for his own part, he regarded the proposal of the Bill as objectionable, and as being a cumbrous piece of machinery for which there was no necessity whatever.

COLONEL MURE thought that if effect were given to the proposal of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay), the machinery would be much more cumbrous than it was at present.

MR. RAMSAY said, it had been stated that there were counties in Scotland in which the proposed Board would be an advantage. That might be so; but he thought there were other counties with very large bodies of trustees in which no necessity whatever for any such Board existed, and to that extent his own experience concurred with that of the hon. Member for Forfarshire. He also agreed with the hon. Gentleman that if there were to be this appointment at all, perhaps the permissive method of procedure might be the best. The matter might be left to the trustees without any risk of inconvenience.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had given Notice of an Amendment, in page 10, lines 14 and 15, to leave out the words, "and not less than one-third and not more than one-half of the Board," in order to insert the words—

"Of whom one-third shall be Commissioners of Supply, one-third shall be tenants, and one-third."

He had placed the Amendment on the Paper for the purpose of putting the Board on a better footing, by making one-third of it consist of Commissioners of Supply, one-third of tenants, and one-third of elected members. As, however, his former Amendment had been negatived, it would, of course, be impossible for him to carry this one; and, therefore, he would, with the permission of the Committee, withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL ALEXANDER, moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 14, to leave out "third," and insert "fourth." Under the clause, he remarked, the number of elected trustees appeared to be very large; for it provided that the County Board should consist of not more than 30 trustees, and not less than one-third, and not more than one-half, of the Board should be elected trustees. It was this proportion to which he objected. The elected trustees had not really so much interest in the matter as the other trustees, and they ought not,

therefore, to possess such large representation at the Board. Under the clause as it stood, they might certainly form one-half of that body. It was in order to reduce the number of elected members from one-third to one-fourth that he proposed this Amendment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was evident from the Amendments that had been placed upon the Paper, that there might be room for a good deal of difference of opinion on the matter; but he thought that the provisions of the Bill, as drawn up, constituted a fair compromise.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, it would be very unfair if the elected trustees were to be reduced in number, as the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) proposed. He thought that as the tenants were going to pay as much money as the Commissioners of Supply, they ought not to have any less share in the representation than one-half. The proposal made by the Bill was extremely unfair, and still more unfair and unreasonable was the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite. If the hon. and gallant Member did not press his Amendment, he would move to leave out "one-third," in order to insert "one-half." As the elected trustees were, in any case, the representatives of those who paid at least one-half of the taxation, it certainly was a manifest injustice that they should have a smaller representation at this Board than the Commissioners of Supply. If the argument of his hon. and gallant Friend were correct, the Commissioners of Supply ought to pay a larger share of the taxation than they did at present. Instead of paying one-half of the rate, they ought to pay two-thirds, and in that case he would be willing that they should have a representation of two-thirds on the Board. The proposal embodied in the Bill was, in his judgment, contrary to the principles of sound legislation, and could only be carried by a majority of members of that Committee who were determined that the Commissioners of Supply should have an ascendancy on the Board.

LORD ELCHO said, it was evident there were conflicting views upon this subject; but he thought that what the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate proposed was a middle course; and he, therefore, hoped that his right hon. and learned Friend would adhere to his proposal. It had been said that the elected trustees would not be adequately represented; but, if they were not, it would be their own fault. The Road Board was to be appointed at a general meeting of the body of trustees, and it was at that meeting that those gentlemen should look after their interests and the interests of those whom they might be called upon to represent. If they had a majority present at the general meeting, there could be little doubt that they would receive there a full representation—namely, one-half, on the County Road Board. He hoped the Government would stand by the clause, which appeared to him to be just and fair.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought there could be no doubt that in this case the “one-third” represented the principle that the elected trustees should be in a minority at the Board. [“No, no!”] The expression was “not less than one-third and not more than one-half.” The general effect of that would be that the elected members would be in a minority. [“No, no!”] Well, on an average they would. They could not be more than one-half, and they might be less than one-half. The elected members would clearly represent the greater part of the taxation under the Bill. One-half of the taxation was paid by the tenants; but the elected members would represent not only the tenants, but small proprietors under £100 a-year and the burghs, and that being so, it was indisputable that it was unjust they should be put in a minority.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, that while he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Alexander) would not press his Amendment, he desired to point out that hon. Gentlemen who spoke of the elected trustees representing the body that paid more than one-half of the total charge, seemed entirely to forget that the tenants practically received back part of what they paid in the shape of diminished rents. This came, therefore, to a large extent out of the landlords’ pockets.

COLONEL MURE said, he desired to supplement what had been stated by the hon. Baronet who had just spoken. Under Clause 65, proprietors would also have to pay for all new works—for new roads and new bridges. In addition to that, the whole burden of the debt would fall upon them; and, in all these circumstances, it was not at all fair to say that the elected trustees would pay a larger sum than the other trustees, and were consequently entitled to a larger representation. He hoped the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would perceive that—“In medias res tutissimus ibis.”

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, lines 14 and 15, to leave out “and not less than one-third, and not more than one-half of the Board,” and to insert “of whom one-half shall be elected trustees.” With reference to the remarks of the last of the hon. Members who had spoken—his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Mure)—it ought to be remembered that the Bill provided that elected trustees should have no voice in the questions of debt or of new roads and bridges. The questions coming before the Board would be questions in connection with which the tenants would have to pay, and the landlords—the Commissioners—would also have to pay, and even if it were distinctly provided that there should be one-half for each, there was still no provision whatever that the burghs should be represented. But he maintained that those who would pay one-half of the taxation would be placed in a minority. On the simple grounds of equity, the House was bound to recognize the principle that those who contributed one-half of the taxation were entitled to one half of the representation. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 14, to leave out the words “third and not more than.”—(Mr. James Barclay.)

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY hoped that the proposal of the Bill would be allowed to remain as it was. It would appear, from the manner in which some hon. Gentlemen had spoken, that there was actually an antagonism between the tenants and the Commissioners of Supply; but such an idea was a perfect delusion. The tenants would be represented at the Board, their interests would be duly considered and cared for, and matters would be conducted with as much economy as possible. In these circumstances, he really thought that they need not waste more time in discussion as to the word which should be put into the Bill.

MR. M'LAREN said, the hon. Baronet who had just spoken (Sir Graham Montgomery) had protested against the idea that there was any difference of interest between the Commissioners of Supply and the tenants. He (Mr. M'Laren) would admit there was no antagonism between them; but, because of that very fact, why should the tenants be stigmatized as they would be, if they had not an equal vote and an equal representation? There could be no reason for it. He appealed to the Government to give way to the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire.

MR. C. S. PARKER wished to point out to the Committee, that as the Amendment was now put, it would have an effect which, perhaps, was not contemplated — namely, that it would not equally divide the representation; but would provide that, while one-half of the Board must be elected trustees, more than one-half might be elected trustees. Therefore, the Amendment, if carried, might have the effect of giving more than one-half of the representation on the County Boards to the elected trustees. If it were true, as had been suggested, that there would be no antagonism between the two classes of governors, and that, if left alone, a fair proportion of each class would be appointed, he saw no particular reason why either the clause should not be allowed to stand in the form in which it appeared in the Bill, or why the words regulating the proportion of elected trustees should not be entirely omitted. If there were to be no antagonism, no harm could be done by either of these courses being adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that as the Amendment was originally drawn, it contained more words than were necessary, in that it laid down that not less than half and not more than half of the body should be elected trustees. He thought the object would be attained by shortening it to the words "not more than half."

Sir Graham Montgomery

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he did not intend to turn the scale in the way suggested by the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. C. S. Parker); and if the words which he had moved were found to have a different signification from that which he attached to them, they could be amended on the Report. The object of his Amendment was to give an equal representation on the Board to the parties interested. He proposed that the Board should consist of half elected trustees and half Commissioners of Supply. If the Government were prepared to leave out the clause altogether, without specifying the numbers in any way, he should be quite content to accept this part of the Bill in that form, and trust to the sense of justice which he had no doubt pervaded the general body of trustees to do what was right in the matter.

MR. M'LAGAN said, it seemed to be conceded that the interests of the landlords and tenants in this matter were not antagonistic. Well, they certainly were not antagonistic, but they were not identical. The one was permanent, and the other was temporary and fleeting, and only extended to the duration of his lease. If a road were allowed to go down for four or five or six years, it required at the end of the time a good deal of money to put it again in proper condition, and the cost must fall upon the landlord, the tenant who had not paid a fair proportion during his tenancy, but had used the roads, having probably moved away into another district. Therefore, he was inclined to take a middle course, and support the clause as it stood in the Bill.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 121; Noes 69: Majority 52.—(Div. List, No. 165.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 16 (County to be divided into districts, and district committees appointed).

MR. ORR-EWING moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 24, to leave out the word "shall," and insert "may, if they think fit." The object of the Amendment was to leave it optional with the trustees to divide the county into districts for the purpose of managing the highways under their control.

MR. RAMSAY hoped that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would not agree to the Amendment; because, if it were thought right that there should be a County Board appointed in every case, it was equally requisite that there should be a division into districts in every case. He thought that if the hon. Member who moved the Amendment would just consider the circumstances of the county which he represented in that House, he would feel that, unless it were divided into districts, some injustice would be done to the inhabitants of very large areas. It was expedient, therefore, that this obligation should continue to exist.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY pointed out that in Scotland there were some counties so small that it would be very inexpedient to divide them into districts at all. Their number might not be large; but, at the same time, he thought the power referred to in the clause should be permissive.

MR. RAMSAY reminded the hon. Baronet that it was not imperative to make the division in any counties where there were not more than six parishes.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that being so, the result of passing the clause in its present shape would be, that in the case of any small county which happened to contain seven parishes, it would be imperative to divide those parishes into more than one road district. That would be undesirable, and he, therefore, hoped the Amendment would be adopted.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY supported the proposal to divide each county into districts. If the Amendment were not adopted, the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate might consider the desirability, in certain cases, of extending the limit which he had introduced into the clause relating to the number of parishes. It was quite proper that as regarded all larger counties, at all events, they should be divided into districts.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought it would be well to consider the suggestion just made by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay). At the same time, he thought it was exceedingly desirable that in some counties in Scotland, at all events, this should be made imperative; and he would remind the Committee that there was provided an appeal to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with a view to see that the boundaries were rightly laid down. The present exception would exclude several of the smaller counties in Scotland; but it was impossible for him at that moment, without looking into the statistics of the case, and ascertaining the number of parishes in each county above that limit, to say what should be the proper figure in the clause.

MR. ORR-EWING insisted that great harm would be done to many counties by dividing them into districts. He thought it should be left to the whole body of the inhabitants in each county to decide whether the county should or should not be divided into districts.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS suggested that after what had been said, a fair case had been made out for a re-consideration of this particular question. He would remind the hon. Member (Mr. Orr-Ewing), that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had undertaken to look into the matter; but he could not say whether the number "six" should be altered before the Report.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE agreed with the suggestion, remarking that, if passed in its present form, the clause would work great injustice in many parts of the country.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he would withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate recommended the clause—with reference to the point now raised—between the present stage and the Report.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would do that, but added, it was possible that the statistics, when examined, might not enable the Government to propose any alteration in the limit contained in the clause. In that case, it would be open to the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire again to propose and to take the sense of the Committee upon his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in page 10, line 29, after "fit," to insert "but being, as far as may be, persons deriving their qualifications as trustees from lands within such district."

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, in page 10, line 29, to leave out the words from "committee," to "provided," in line 35. The Amendment raised a similar issue to that on which the Committee had recently divided; but, in the present case, it derived additional importance from the fact that the whole management of the roads would depend on the district committee. Therefore, it was of essential importance that upon these district committees the tenant-farmers should be fully represented. No doubt, in the appointment of these district committees, all the principal landowners in the district would wish to be placed upon it; but that would probably be the whole amount of interference which they would take upon themselves in the matter. If the tenants were not fairly and fully represented on these district committees, the practical result would be that the management of the roads would fall into the hands of officials, and that would be a very unfortunate position of affairs both for the landlords and the tenants. He was now speaking from practical experience of those counties which had come to Parliament for private Acts of their own, and it was a very remarkable thing that this Bill, which was brought in by the Government, was far more Tory in its character than the private Bills which had been promoted by the Commissioners of Supply themselves. That was one remarkable feature of this measure. He knew of no Bill, except that of the county which was represented by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho), in which this invidious distinction was made between the two classes of trustees. If the tenant-farmers were not to have a direct voice in the management of the roads in the district in which they lived, all that would remain for them to do would be to vote in the election of those who should have such voice in the management of the roads. He therefore hoped that the Government would not insist upon this clause as it stood, because he did not speak now in the interest of the representative trustees alone, or of the Commissioners of Supply, but in the interest of both bodies; and it was of the utmost importance for the good working of this Bill and the economical management of the roads, that the tenant-trustees of the parish should feel that they had an active and direct interest in looking after the roads in their respective districts.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 29, to leave out from the word "committee," to the word "provided," in line 35, inclusive. — (Mr. James Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'of whom one' stand part of the Clause."

LORD ELCHO said, he would point out to the Committee that there were a hundred and odd clauses in the Bill. They were now on the 16th, and that day had been given to them for the purpose of making progress with a measure which, he supposed, they were all anxious to pass. Well, the arguments which the hon. Gentleman had adduced in favour of his present Amendment had already been urged by him in reference to a former Amendment, which the Committee, notwithstanding, had rejected, and affirmed the principle of the clause. Under these circumstances, he would suggest that if they wished to make progress, they would simply adopt or negative the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. ANDERSON, in whose name the next three Amendments stood upon the Paper, said, they were intended to make the district committees precisely the same as to their construction as he desired the Board to be—namely, that they should be composed of one-third proprietors, one-third tenants, and one-third elected members. The Committee, however, had already entirely ignored the tenant-farmer, and precluded him from having any existence on the Board, except by accident. In two divisions it had declared its approval of the proposal that the Board and district committees should be so constructed that in no instance would the landed proprietors be left in a minority. It was, therefore, absolutely useless for him to move his Amendments, and he would not take up the time of the Committee by doing so.

LORD ELCHO said, he must protest against the allegation of the hon. Gentleman that the tenant-farmers had been ignored in the Bill.

MR. ANDERSON replied that they were ignored as a class, inasmuch as the only means which were open to a tenant-farmer to obtain a place on the Board were that he should be among the elected members. As a tenant-farmer he had no status, and it might easily happen under the Bill that the elected members might all be proprietors under £100 a-year, and not a single tenant on the Board.

Amendments, by leave, withdrawn.

Remaining Amendment (Mr. Orr-Ewing), by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17 (Appeal to Secretary of State as to formation of districts).

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, in page 11, line 6, the omission of the words "Secretary of State," and the substitution for them of the words "Sheriff of the county." The Sheriff would, he contended, because of his greater local knowledge, be much better qualified to decide appeals relating to questions of boundary than a Member of the Government, however eminent, residing in London, and unacquainted with the various localities in regard to which an appeal was made.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE expressed a hope that the Government would accept the Amendment. It appeared to him to be quite out of the question that the Secretary of State in London could satisfactorily discharge the duties which the clause would impose upon him. The people of Scotland managed their own affairs very well, and he, for one, strongly objected to the tendency which prevailed at the present day to the system of centralization. It was quite evident, he thought, that the Secretary of State could not be so well acquainted as the Sheriffs of counties with local circumstances, on which the proper arrangement of boundaries very much depended; and he hoped the Government would think better of it, and not compel the Committee to divide.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE hoped the Government would adhere to the clause as it stood. Under its operation, the words "Secretary of State" would in reality mean the Lord Advocate; and there would, in his opinion, be a great disadvantage in having questions which

MR. MARK STEWART asked if it was necessary to have the clause at all, and stated that he had an Amendment to omit it altogether. He maintained that no necessity existed for giving a power of appeal at all. The greatest harmony, as a general rule, prevailed at the meetings of the Commissioners of Supply. There were, of course, from time to time, points on which differences of opinion existed; but the minority were always disposed to give way to the views of the majority. But, apart from that, what, he should like to know, could a Secretary of State understand about the intricacies involved in questions of boundary in each county in Scotland? What, again, did the Sheriff of a county know about local matters? He, of course, travelled about the county; but it by no means followed from that that he should possess the requisite information to enable him to be an efficient court of appeal under the Bill. The result of the adoption of the clause, too, would be, he firmly believed, to lead to no end of intrigues and expense in order to have questions settled in London, instead of having them disposed of, as at present, by one vote of the Commissioners of Supply, and, if necessary, re-settled at the expiration of a period of three years. The clause, in fact, would give rise to all sorts of plotting and nagging, which, in his opinion, it would be extremely desirable to avoid.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE rose to Order. He wished to ask whether the hon. Gentleman was in Order in discussing an Amendment for the rejection of the clause, which stood in his name lower down on the Notice Paper, when the immediate question before the Committee was the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander)?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Wigton (Mr. Mark Stewart) would not be in Order in making observations which were directed to the rejection of the clause as a whole, inasmuch as the Question before the Committee was a proposal to amend it.

MR. MARK STEWART would, of course, at once bow to the decision of the Chairman, and would simply say, in conclusion, that he greatly doubted whether the Sheriffs of counties in Scotland were competent to pronounce an impartial opinion on matters which, so far as he could see, could only be satisfactorily decided upon by the members of the Commission of Supply.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY rose to Order. He thought it was doing a great injustice to the Sheriffs of Scotland to suppose that they could not arrive at an impartial opinion on such questions as would, under the operation of the clause, be submitted to them as a court of appeal.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that if the hon. Member for Wigton (Mr. Mark Stewart) intended to cast any general reflection upon the administration of justice in Scotland, his remarks would not be in Order. He did not, however, understand that to be his intention.

MR. MARK STEWART believed there was only one hon. Member in the House who would have objected to the words which he had used. What he meant to say was, that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to get men of judicial mind to decide with advantage on the vexed questions which might have to be submitted to them under the Bill. That, he might add, was not only his own private opinion, but the opinion of many persons who had had large and long experience in county matters in Scotland, who had brought the subject under his notice, and whose views he had promised to lay before the House.

COLONEL MURE, in regard to the argument as between the Secretary of State and the Sheriff, might point out that this was not going to be an annual or general duty, because they had a new Act before them. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire had pointed out that there were great inequalities in the different districts. At the same time, he should be prepared to support the idea that the Sheriff of the county would be better fitted for this duty than the Secretary of State; but he would like to know whether this Secretary of State was to be the English Secretary of State or the new Scottish Secretary of State? As to what had been said, that the Sheriff was not a good court of appeal on local matters, because he might, though not intentionally, be under local influences, he might say that the Sheriff was a local magnate, and he did not think that would be the case. He might, however, remind the Committee that the Sheriff was a Law Officer, appointed by the Court in Edinburgh, whose position in the country was merely temporary, and who, although he might not possess any special knowledge of local matters, was supposed to be acquainted with questions relating to lands and heritages. He would, therefore, so far as he could see, be about the best person to decide in cases of appeal. He should support the Amendment.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY noticed that it was a charge against the former Lord Advocates that they always put the Sheriffs in the Bill they introduced. Now, here was a case where the Lord Advocate exercised his discretion in another direction, and hon. Members stepped in and objected. For his own part, he believed the Secretary of State would be a very suitable authority to whom to give the proposed power of deciding in cases of appeal.

MR. RAMSAY thought it probable that any reference to the Secretary of State might be found to be unnecessary; but, in the event of the clause remaining part of the Bill, he would prefer that it should pass in its present shape, because, without for a moment impugning the way in which the Sheriffs discharged their duties, and although he had full confidence in them, he must say he did not wish to see them take part in the settlements of any local differences of opinion with respect to the sub-division of counties.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that if there had been the least affinity between the duties imposed by the clause and those which appertained to the judicial office, he, for one, should not have hesitated to give the matter to the Sheriff. No such affinity, however, existed. The duties which would have to be performed under the operation of the clause were far from being judicial, and would involve the Sheriffs in unpleasant disputes in the endeavour to arbitrate between the two halves of a county, with the certain result of giving dissatisfaction to one of them. He might also observe that, under certain public Acts, the duty had been imposed on the Sheriffs of defining burgh boundaries; and that, in all such cases, it had been provided that their decision should not be final, but that a right of appeal should be given to the Secretary of State. He hoped, he might add, that questions of the kind dealt with in the clause would, generally speaking, be settled by agreement, and that references to the Secretary of State would be exceedingly rare. The clause, he maintained, had in no way a centralizing tendency. It was not proposed to vest the administration of the law in the Secretary of State, but to enable him to decide between certain parties, and to make his decision final for a considerable time.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the clause would give enormous powers to the Secretary of State to the extent of which he altogether objected. These powers, too, it should be borne in mind, were to last for 10 years. It appeared to him to be giving powers to the Secretary of State in London, and taking power from Scotland; and, under the circumstances, he hoped the Amendment would be pressed to a division.

MR. M'LAREN wished to draw the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire's (Lord Elcho's) attention to the fact that a great deal of time had been occupied by useless Amendments on the noble Lord's side of the House.

On Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill?"

MR. MARK STEWART moved its omission. It involved, he said, a question on which he entertained a very strong opinion. He could not see the object of bringing up questions relating to the sub-division of counties in Scotland to be reviewed periodically in London by the Secretary of State. The people of that country had hitherto been able to manage their own affairs without troubling others, and what good reason was there, he should like to know, why they should, in the present instance, be compelled to change a system which hitherto had been found to work well, and to submit to a decision by the Secretary of State which was to have effect for no less than 10 years? Alterations were made in Scotland in such matters as those with which the Bill dealt every October or April as the case might be; and it would, he thought, be much more satisfactory to Scotch Members and also to Scotchmen, that they should not be subjected to the provisions of a clause such as that under discussion.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE seconded the Amendment, and expressed a belief that if the clause were omitted from the Bill the Commissioners of Supply would settle disputed matters among themselves without the aid of the Secretary of State.

Moved, "That the Clause be struck out."—(Mr. Mark Stewart.)

MR. VANS AGNEW pointed out another objection to the clause. It would, in his opinion, give rise to persistent opposition on the part of small minorities. It would, in his opinion, be much better that the clause should be omitted from the Bill, and that each county should be allowed to manage its own affairs through the voice of the majority.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE hoped the Government would abide by the clause. The case was one in which, in his opinion, a majority might in a mixed county or town population and suburban districts do a great deal of injury, unless the minority were invested with a right of appeal such as the clause proposed to give.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 162; Noes 9: Majority, 153.—(Div. List, No. 167.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 18 (Islands to be districts).

MR. RAMSAY moved the omission, in page 11, lines 38 to 40, of the words—

"And in payment of a reasonable share of the necessary general expenditure incurred in such county in the execution of this Act."

The whole of the money levied in an insular district ought, he contended, to be expended within the limits of that district, and he could not understand why islands should be saddled with any portion of the expenditure which might be incurred in carrying out the law on the mainland, inasmuch as they would derive no benefit from its operation.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought the islands had been very fairly dealt with in the Bill. It was very difficult to say that a part of the county should be exempted bearing its share of the outlay. He thought that, to the extent of a reasonable sum, it was impossible to see any principle for not laying a proportion of these expenses upon the islands.

MR. RAMSAY said, the only reason for which he proposed the Amendment was that the clause imposed upon the islands a payment, while no benefit could be received from the mainland parts of the county. He thought it unreasonable that they should be made to pay a part of the general expenditure.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 19 (Occasional vacancies to be supplied).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he would not move the Amendments to the clause which stood in his name on the Paper. He wished, at the same time, to suggest to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate the desirability of empowering the trustees to supply any vacancies which might arise among their own number as well as in the Board.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would take the matter into consideration.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 20 (Failure to elect not to invalidate acts of trustees), agreed to.

Meetings of Trustees, Board, and Committee.

Clause 21 (Time and place of general meeting of the trustees); Clause 22 (Meetings of Board and district committees); and Clause 23 (Quorum at meetings of trustees' board, and committee); severally agreed to.

General Regulations for conducting the business of Meetings.

Clause 24 (Regulations as to meetings and proceedings of trustees' board, and district committees).

DR. CAMERON moved the omission, in page 15, line 11, of the words—

"But this provision shall not prevent a person whose name is entered on the list of Commissioners of Supply as factor for more than one proprietor, from voting on behalf of such proprietor in his absence at a meeting of the trustees."

The provisions, he contended, made, as it stood, a very invidious distinction in favour of a single class of commissioners.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that a Commissioner of Supply who had £800 a-year according to the valuation roll, might be represented under the operation of the present law by his factor in his absence. If, then, two proprietors could vote if they sent two factors to a meeting, was it not reasonable that for the sake of convenience they should be enabled to vote by means of one?

MR. RAMSAY was of opinion that the effect of the Amendment, if passed, would be to disfranchise a considerable number of proprietors who were represented at road trust meetings by their factors.

MR. M'LAREN supported the Amendment. The clause in its present shape appeared to him to be most unjust. It would result in a revival of the old system which used to prevail in the House of Lords, when a Peer carried a majority of proxy votes in his pocket.

And, it being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock,

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday 18th June, at Two of the clock.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL rose to call attention to the Endowed Schools of Ireland, particularly with reference to the Report of the Royal Commission on Endowed Schools, Ireland, appointed in 1854, and to a Return recently laid upon the Table of the House; and to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition, revenues, and ma-agement of the Endowed Schools of Ireland, with instructions to report how far those endowments are at present promoting or are applicable to the promotion of Intermediate Education in that Country without distinction of class or religion."

In doing so, he wished to apologize to Irish Members for taking up what might be considered to be their peculiar property. His attention had been directed to the question, in the first place, because he thought the question of Irish education was not so much an Irish question as of one the most important Imperial questions of the day; secondly, because, though these endowments were in such a state of inefficiency as to demand the immediate attention of the Legislature, no Irish Member had devoted any attention to the subject; and, thirdly, because if the establishments with which they were connected were put into a thoroughly efficient state, they would have a most beneficial effect upon the higher education of the middle classes in Ireland. It was more than 40 years since these schools were last brought under the notice of Parliament; and he trusted, therefore, that he might claim the kind indulgence of the House while he touched very briefly upon some of the more striking facts connected with the subject. The endowments for educational purposes in Ireland were found, by the Report of the Royal Commission of 1854, to amount to £68,670 per annum, and were derived partly from landed estate and partly from funded property. The extent of the landed estate was 75,000 acres, and the funded property produced an income of £16,000 a-year. Competent authorities had stated that, under proper management, there could be little doubt that before a generation or two had passed the endowments would amount to nearly double that sum. The Commissioners of Education for Endowed Schools administered the funds of and generally controlled six Royal Grammar Schools and seven schools of private foundation which had been placed under their management in 1818. The endowments arose from 25,000 acres of land; but the net income was only 7,000 a-year, and that, he thought, was a point that required explanation. The celebrated foundation of Erasmus Smith had landed property of 12,000 acres, and produced an income of £9,000 a-year; but they had, at the time the Commission reported, a surplus of £3,000, and as they had given no account since that time, their income now might amount to anything from £12,000 to £20,000 a-year. They were supposed to support five grammar schools and 140 elementary schools. Another celebrated endowment was that called "The Incorporated Society," which was founded to support both higher and elementary education; it had an income of £11,000 per annum, arising from 17,000 acres of land, and £100,000 in the Funds. They supported eight boarding schools, and a number of day schools as well; but as, on the whole, this endowment was found by the Royal Commissioners to be fairly efficient, he did not propose to direct special attention to it on the present occasion. With respect to the Royal Free Schools, the State was directly responsible for their management, having placed them under certain Commissioners appointed by the State. As he had said, there were six of these Royal Free Schools — namely, Enniskillen, Armagh, Dungannon, Raphoe, Cavan, and Banagher. They were founded by James I. and Charles I., and their income was £7,395 per annum, in addition to exhibitions at Trinity College amounting to £1,200 per annum. They would accommodate 410 boarders, and 1,055 day scholars; but, as a matter of fact, they were only educating 150 boarders and 490 day scholars. The education was intended by the Royal Founders to be gratuitous; but, in actual fact, out of 671 pupils, only 85 received a gratuitous education. The schools were intended for the benefit of all Irish children, without distinction of creed. In the Report of 1858, the Royal Commissioners said—

"We are of opinion that the Royal Schools are by their constitution essentially non-exclusive. They are not intended for pupils of only one religious persuasion, and the master has no power to compel all the pupils to receive religious instruction in his own tenets."

Yet, of the 671 scholars, only 49 were Catholics, and 45 Presbyterians; and of the 49 Catholics, 37 were educated in the Banagher School, so that only 11 pupils were left to be divided among the other five schools. The following quotation from the Report of the Royal Commission might, perhaps, explain how it was that the 25,000 acres under the management of the Endowed Schools Commissioners only produced a net income of £7,000 a-year. In it, they reported as follows:—

“It appears, from the provisions of the Act of Parliament under which the Commissioners of Education were constituted, that it was part of their duty to take an annual account of the assets and liabilities of the Royal School estates. This, however, was not done; but, on the contrary, the accounts of the law agents were allowed to accumulate during a series of years, no provision being made for the payment of them. The accounts thus omitted contained some excessive items, yet they were allowed to remain untaxed during 13 years. In addition to this, the accounts of the Board were never audited from the date of its foundation down to the present time, and this neglect on the part of the Commissioners took place, although it was discovered, after one of their secretaries had died in insolvent circumstances in 1827, that he had appropriated the funds of one or two charities so long before as the year 1816, which they had reported in that year to have been invested in Government Stock, and had carried on a fraudulent system of concealment for 11 years previous to his death without detection. It also appeared in evidence that since 1827 considerable sums for the payment of law costs had been debited to several charities which ought properly to have been charged on the Consolidated Fund, and that payments had been made out of the funds of other endowments without any legal authority to warrant such an appropriation.”

Notwithstanding this, the accounts of the Board had never been audited from the time the Royal Commission reported up to the present day, and no action had been taken on that Report. He could only account for that by the supposition, that when the Report was issued, the Commissioners of Education must have felt that their last hour had come; for the Report recommended the formation of a new Board, and the present one had not thought it worth while to justify the continuance of its existence. Its annual Reports to Parliament were characterized by a candour which was almost cynical. It reported that one school, in a Catholic district, and with a large endowment, educated only five pupils—all Protestants—and another seven; and this was not a temporary condition of things, for the Royal Commission in 1858 reported the two as educating eight pupils between them. A school which, according to the annual Report, was “well attended”—namely, that of Clonmel—had accommodation for 115, and the attendance was only 38. Another—the Royal Free School at Dungannon—had accommodation for 170, and the attendance was 49. Another—that of Cavan—did not “present any variation,” its condition having always been most unsatisfactory; and, with accommodation for 140, it had an attendance of 36, all Protestants, in a Catholic locality. A mastership of one school, that of Banagher, having fallen vacant in 1873, the then Lord Lieutenant (Earl Spencer) appointed a Catholic headmaster. Now, of the 42 scholars, 37 were Catholic, and this was the only school which showed any signs of improvement, in spite of every drawback and an income of only £164 per annum. Unfortunately, the Irish Church Act abolished the diocesan schools, which might have been made, under good management, useful centres of higher education. It was supposed they were sectarian institutions, and they were treated accordingly; but they were nothing of the kind; the Church had nothing to do with them, except to contribute to their support, and they were only called diocesan schools because, at the time they were formed, a diocese was a more convenient division to deal with than a county. These Commissioners of Education, with regard to their meetings and the difficulty they experienced in holding them, asked that the attendance of an ex officio member should not be required, and three ordinary members should form a quorum. Now, this paragraph in their Report threw great light upon the constitution of the Board of Commissioners. Among the Members were the Lord Chancellor, the Primate, some Bishops, some Judges, the Member for the University of Dublin for the time being—there being at the time of the constitution of the Board only one Member for the University. He did not know, however, which Member for the University now performed that duty. All these eminent persons had a thousand other things to attend to, and it was, therefore, impossible for them to give their attention to the complicated affairs that must arise in the management of 25,000 acres of land, £16,000 a-year in money, and some 15 or 16 schools, which ought to be educating nearly 3,000 scholars. The Royal Commissioners said of the permanent Commissioners—gular, and for some years past increasingly so. It was stated to us by Dr. Kyle, the secretary, that for the last few years it has been very difficult to procure the presence of the Commissioners, and that he has frequently been obliged to make personal solicitations to induce the members to come. The necessary quorum is only three, yet out of a number of 17 persons the average attendance has been but three and four, and has often been reduced to a minimum. The presence of one ex officio member is made essential by statute for the transaction of business. Nevertheless, Dr. Kyle stated there had been a difficulty in procuring the attendance of one such Commissioner."

There was, however, one day of the year on which heroic efforts were made to get these dignitaries together, and that was the day when the annual report had to be signed. On that important occasion the Lord Chancellor forsook his Court, the Primate his pulpit, the Judges their benches, and the Member for the University of Dublin for the time being turned up from goodness knows where; but all they did, however, was to ratify the impotent proceedings and lend the weight of their names to the maundering lucubrations of their octogenarian secretary. He thought that the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would agree that that Commission was a corporation a trifle more unreformed than any of the bodies which he had had to deal with. All that he had said as to the Commissioners of Education would apply to the Governors of Erasmus Smith's foundation, and more. He should like to quote a passage of the Report of the Royal Commission—a perfect gem in its way, as showing how Irish endowments were managed—

"We found that there were four officers of the Board intrusted with the duty of keeping the accounts. The forms of accounts to be kept have been supplied by Mr. Fetherston, the solicitor to the Governors, and to him we were referred by the chairman for every information with respect to the ledger. But Mr. Fetherston stated that he never looked into the accounts unless some question was raised with regard to special items. He never examined the ledger or took any particular notice of it. He thought that Mr. Thorp, the assistant registrar, had charge of the accounts. This Mr. Thorp denied. The Rev. Mr. Hamilton, the registrar, stated that he never had anything to do with the accounts, and that he was not responsible for them; that Mr. Thorp did keep the accounts. Mr. Barlow, chairman and treasurer, thought it necessary to set Mr. Hamilton right upon that point, and stated that Mr. Hamilton was held responsible for the accounts by the Governors. He was aware, however, that Mr. Thorp actually kept the accounts. Mr. Thorp, to whom the keeping of the accounts was thus intrusted for a number of years, said that he did not understand at all what was meant by double entry in bookkeeping, and admitted he did not know what assets meant. The only check upon accounts thus kept was the audit by Mr. Barlow, chairman and treasurer, who, when questioned as to some errors, said—"I know nothing of it, as I never looked into the ledger in my life. I am not an accountant; I am not a bookkeeper; and if I did look at it, I dare say I should not be much wiser than I am at present. I am glad to have the opportunity of saying I never looked into a page of it."

Yet these were accounts relating to the management of 12,000 acres of land and an income of £10,000 a-year. The state of the Swordborough School was most unsatisfactory, and that of the Robertson endowment was not only unsatisfactory in itself, but had prevented the establishment of satisfactory parochial schools. He might also quote the case of the Dublin Blue Coat foundation, amounting to £1,650 a-year, and which was a signal instance of the loss of property through neglect. If the title of that property had been kept up, it might now have been most valuable. Various other endowments might be mentioned in support of his argument; and last, but not least, there was that most monstrous of all anomalies, the Irish Society. After that statement of facts, he felt himself warranted in asking the House to agree to the Motion, for it was of the utmost importance that no opportunity should be lost of stimulating the existing educational institutions of Ireland. The Census Commissioners, in 1871, gave some important statistics as to the educational condition of Ireland generally, and it must be allowed to be altogether unsatisfactory. They said—

"Under the head of 'superior instruction,' a term which comprises all instruction not strictly elementary, the movement between 1861 and 1871 is upon the whole the reverse of gratifying, representing as it does for Ireland so miserable a percentage as .05 to the total population. In 1861 the number of persons returned as under superior instruction, including everyone who by any forcing of the sense of the words could be said to be receiving, or in the way of receiving, something more than rudimentary instruction was 24,311. In 1871 these numbers had fallen to 24,170. Commentary would almost weaken the evidence of figures such as these; during a decade filled with the most excited struggles and impassioned debates upon the subject of higher instruction, and in a country where the appliances in aid of that instruction, whether from ancient foundations, from the liberality of Parliament, or from private munificence, are certainly not scanty, a decrease is to be registered in the number of those who, upon the most charitable interpretation, can be treated as in the receipt of higher instruction. This flush of means and beggarliness of results exists, moreover, in a nation whose impulse would move it in the direction of excess rather than of defect along the line of liberal studies if those impulses were allowed full play. By some means or other the higher intellectual life of the country is plainly being starved and dwarfed; nor is there a moment to be lost before those upon whom the cure lies should apply their faculties to the infusion of blood and spirit into the dry bones of public instruction in Ireland."

This was testimony which revealed a state of things which was discreditable to Ireland, which was discreditable to the Imperial Parliament, and which, if no remedy was applied to it, would most certainly be discreditable to the Ministers of the Crown. He knew he should be told that Ireland was prosperous, and he would not deny that she had made a certain material progress. In proof that she had done so, they might enumerate the horses, cattle, pigs, sheep, and also, if they liked, the donkeys in that country; for he had seen it stated in a statistical paper that Ireland was a very prosperous country because of the number of its donkeys. But if they compared her rate of progress in those respects, however, with the corresponding rates of progress in England and Scotland, they would find that the boasted prosperity of Ireland was subjected to the most disappointing diminutions. How, indeed, could material wealth, and the rich natural resources with which Ireland was endowed, be turned to the best account when the means of distributing scientific culture among the masses of the people were so utterly deficient. He saw that the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Waterford County (Lord Charles Beresford) had placed on the Paper an Amendment to the Motion, in favour of denominational education. On that point he (Lord Randolph Churchill) agreed with the noble and gallant Lord, who was, no doubt, himself a brilliant specimen of denominational education; and if he would bring forward his proposal at a future time, he would gladly support it. As an addition, however, to the present Motion, it was neither appropriate, nor germane to the question. He hoped, therefore, that the Amendment would not be pressed, because it would only complicate the issue before the House, and embarrass hon. Members in arriving at a proper conclusion. He trusted, also, that the Government would not refuse to accede to his Motion. If, unfortunately, they did so, he could not see how they could escape the charge of being apathetic and indifferent to that subject, or how they could prevent its being said—to quote a now historical expression—"Will Ireland be content; can Ireland be content; ought Ireland to be content?" The House had every reason, however, to believe that the Government were far from apathetic on the education question, and he was only asking them to begin in Ireland a work with regard to her endowed schools which had been completed in England, and which was nearly completed in Scotland, and for which there was 10 times greater justification in Ireland than there ever had been in England or Scotland. The noble Lord concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in seconding the Resolution, said, he was quite sure that those who had heard the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) would feel that they owed thanks to him for having called attention to such an important subject, and for having introduced it in so able and interesting a speech. For his own part, as an English Member, he (Mr. Chamberlain) would make no apology for seconding the Resolution, for he felt sure that Irish Members would welcome any proof that English Members were interested in Irish grievances. It would be admitted on all sides that the state of education in Ireland was thoroughly unsatisfactory in all its branches, and he was unable to share in the opinion of his noble Friend that no charge of apathy respecting it could be made against the Government. He certainly thought it was hardly creditable to a strong Government that it had done nothing in five Sessions to meet the legitimate aspirations of the Irish people in the matter. The Resolution proposed by the noble Lord might have gone further, seeing that it dealt only with the fringe of the subject; but it was none the less important on that account. He imagined that the Government would see that they could not deal with intermediated education, unless they arranged to take the greatest possible advantage of existing foundations. These foundations were of considerable importance in Ireland, their total income amounting to nearly £70,000 per annum. In comparison to English endowments they sank into insignificance, for the Endowed Schools Commission reported in 1867 that the gross income of the English foundations was nearly £600,000 per annum; and they reported upon nearly 3,000 endowments. But the comparative smallness of Irish endowments was an additional reason why the most should be made of such facilities as existed. They found that in the Royal Free Schools of Ireland there was accommodation for 1,500 students, while less than 700 were offering themselves, and while the grammar schools could accommodate 1,200, they only contained 800 scholars. It was, therefore, evident that there was great room for such an inquiry as had been suggested, and the Resolution of the noble Lord did not in the slightest degree prejudice the nature of the reforms which might be recommended. Precisely the same allegations which the noble Lord made against Irish endowed schools were made some years ago against English endowed schools, and an exposure of the abuses of the latter led to their reform. The abuses connected with the endowed schools in Ireland had been pointed out many years ago in various Reports; they were proved up to the hilt in the Report of the Irish Commission of 1854, and it was very difficult to see how such a Report had been permitted for 20 years to remain waste paper. It was stated, with regard to many of the smaller endowments in England, that the teachers had become mere parasites and pensioners upon the fund, and that the accounts were found to be most inefficiently kept, and there was not one of these charges which could not be brought with equal truth and force against the Irish endowments. They knew that in England abuses were long-lived; but in Ireland they seemed to have the life of a cat. From the Report relating to the Erasmus Smith foundation, the whole thing seemed to be regarded as a gigantic practical joke, and was quite worthy of the philosophers of Laputa. From a Report of the Commission of Lord Powis, in 1870, it appeared that the same official was still in charge of the accounts; but it was not stated whether he yet knew what double-entry meant, or that he could distinguish between assets and liabilities. The original intention of that foundation was to provide middle-class education in the localities in which the Erasmus Smith schools were established; but in 1858 only 10 per cent of the total endowment was applied to middle-class education, and the whole of the rest was devoted to elementary instruction, and therefore to the relief of the rates—to the saving of the pockets of those who might fairly be regarded as responsible for primary education. It was perfectly evident that the system of education in Ireland concealed abuses which at least were as great, and probably greater, than any disclosed by Schools Inquiry Commissions in England; and he could not but conceive why what was sauce for the goose should not be sauce for the gander, or why the legislation which had proved beneficial in England should not be applied to Ireland. Since the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commission, there was no proof that these institutions had voluntarily reformed themselves—in fact, there was every reason to suppose they had not; for experience taught him that self-electing and non-representative Bodies were rarely capable of self-improvement. He ventured to call the attention of the House to the part of the Census Commissioners' Report, which dealt with the fact that, while almost the whole of these endowed schools were strictly confined to the members of the Protestant Church, yet there had been an actual retrogression in the matter of Protestant education. On the other hand, the Roman Catholics had progressed in education. In fact, these endowments had acted as a hindrance to education instead of a benefit. From 1861 to 1871, the Report showed that there had been a diminution to the extent of 14½ per cent in the number of Protestant Episcopalians receiving intermediate education. The effect of these endowments had been, and still was, to discourage voluntary effort and individual enterprise. With such an indictment as had been brought against these endowments, it seemed to him impossible to understand on what ground the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock could be resisted. If it could be alleged that the grosser abuses to which they had pointed, and which existed at the time of the Report of the Commission in 1858 had now ceased, still there would be this reason for a Committee of Inquiry—that it was desirable to revise these foundations in order to ascertain whether they could not be made more generally available for the whole population, in order to remove the exclusive character they now possessed. Those who managed these endowments should not be permitted to fritter away the income at their disposal by making petty doles to small and comparatively useless institutions, instead of employing them in promoting really important educational institutions. The Amendment about to be proposed by the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford) was entirely alien to the object of the Motion, and, to an extent, it was deficient in meaning, and therefore he saw no reason why the House should accept it. For what purpose should an inquiry be held into the practicability of establishing denominational schools in Ireland? These very establishments, with regard to which an inquiry was asked for, were denominational institutions. They were Protestant Episcopalian denominational schools. Perhaps the noble and gallant Lord wished to inquire into the practicability of establishing Roman Catholic denominational schools in Ireland? But there was no need for inquiring into that subject, inasmuch as it was perfectly practicable to establish such schools, if the necessary private endowments were forthcoming. If, however, the noble and gallant Lord wished to know whether it was practicable to establish Roman Catholic denominational schools by means of State aid, the answer was—"Certainly, the moment that Parliament chose to sanction such a proceeding." The noble Lord who had brought forward this Motion had acted very considerably towards Her Majesty's Government in limiting its terms to a demand for inquiry, seeing that he might have asked for immediate legislation. But, probably, he had compared the promises made in the Queen's Speech with their fulfilment down to the present time, and if he had done so, he would have found that of eight measures so promised only one had as yet passed into law—namely, the Factories and Workshops Bill. The others were hung up, like Mahomet's coffin, between heaven and earth, and the prospect of their being realized was very doubtful. It was wiser of the noble Lord to ask for inquiry, and, his Motion being confined to that, in his (Mr. Chamberlain's) opinion, the Government could not refuse it, unless they desired to have it believed that they were anxious to conceal abuses the existence of which they could neither deny nor defend.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition, revenues, and management of the Endowed Schools of Ireland, with instructions to report how far those endowments are at present promoting or are applicable to the promotion of Intermediate Education in that Country without distinction of class or religion."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD, in rising to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, to add to the Motion—"and also into the practicability of establishing schools upon the denominational system," said, the noble Lord's (Lord Randolph Churchill's) Motion touched Irish education only in a certain part; but it was desirable that the whole subject should be inquired into, and with that view he should divide the House upon his Amendment. He believed that what was wanted was not only a new system of endowments, but a new system altogether—a denominational system, which he believed would be found more efficient than that which at present existed, and which did not please anybody, either Protestant or Roman Catholic. The question ought to be taken in hand as soon as possible; and he hoped that more was to be expected in this matter from the Conservatives than had yet been offered by the Liberals—they being pledged against the denominational system—that the Government would, at least, give that system a fair trial. For a system of education to be useful, the teacher and the pupil must be of the same religion; and no system like the present, under which the pupil must look upon his teacher as either a heretic or an idolater, could work efficiently. The strongest argument in favour of denominational schools was that they were admittedly the best managed educational institutions. The real difficulty with regard to the denominational system was, that the State did not like to make grants for educational purposes unless it had control over the manner in which that education was given; and, on the other hand, neither Protestants nor Catholics were prepared to give up to the Government their control of the education to be given to their children. That, of course, was a very great difficulty; but he believed that if a Committee were appointed to inquire into the subject, they would find the way to a compromise. He could not help thinking that this religious principle was too much talked about in connection with education debates. ["No, no!"] Why, the whole question of religion was a matter of the accident of birth, the children generally inheriting their religion from their parents. His father and mother happened to be Protestants, and therefore he was a Protestant. So it happened all the world over. Why not live and let live? For his own part, he believed that a Mohammedan or a Bhuddist, or any other man, if honest and conscientious in acting up to his convictions, had as good a chance of getting to Heaven as a Protestant or a Roman Catholic. At all events, the denominational system, he believed, would be found to work well; and, with a view to the adoption of a new system in that direction, he begged to move his Amendment.

MR. KING-HARMAN seconded the Amendment, affirming that the only hope for checking the spread of revolutionary principles in Ireland was a sound religious education, which the present system failed to supply. He could not agree with the noble Lord who had moved it, that too much was said in these education debates on the question of religion, for he could not imagine how that could happen. Education without religion was, to his mind, worse than no education at all, and he thought it would be a good thing for the country, and he should like to see established in Ireland a system, by means of which the children of Protestants and Catholics could be educated together; but he feared that was not possible, as they would not work harmoniously together. There could, however, be no reason why the whole question should not be referred to one and the same Committee, with good hope that satisfactory results would follow.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "and also into the practicability of establishing schools upon the denominational system."—(Lord Charles Beresford.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

DR. WARD said, he was glad to hear the Conservative Representatives of Protestant constituencies contending for the denominational education which the Liberal Members representing Roman Catholic voters had so long contended for. While he thanked the noble and gallant Lord who had moved the Amendment (Lord Charles Beresford) for it, at the same time he would ask him not to press it. He did so for the reason that he could not help thinking that it was inopportune to mix the question of denominational education with the question whether large sums left for the endowment of education had not been misappropriated and ought not to be applied in accordance with the will of the people. If Her Majesty's Government refused investigation into the entire subject, they would be shirking their responsibility, and he should know how to regard their promises with respect to that of intermediate education.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY thought that inquiry into the subject of the disposal of the enormous funds devoted to denominational education in Ireland was urgently needed; but the Amendment which had been moved went too far, and dragged in questions which it was advisable at present to avoid. The object of those who supported the original Motion was simply to raise the standard of the present denominational schools in Ireland, by giving them an opportunity of attaining a greater degree of efficiency; but that object would be endangered by raising wider questions on which there were great differences of opinion. The adoption of the Motion would interpose no obstacle to the promotion and passing of any measure which Her Majesty's Government might have in contemplation on the subject of intermediate education.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER cordially agreed with the views expressed by the noble and gallant Lord who had moved the Amendment (Lord Charles Beresford). He (Sir George Bowyer) regarded the idea of carrying out a system of mixed education in Ireland as an idle dream. Mixed education was a good idea in itself; but, practically, it could not be carried out, and no education could, in his opinion, be beneficial which was not founded upon religion. Mixed education was inconsistent with a religious system, and, so far as pure secular education was concerned, they had now seen some of its results. Secular, or godless education, was radically bad, and all over Europe they saw the spread of Socialism as the consequence of its establishment. Under it, the young grew up without being amenable to any authority. It had especially been found most disastrous in Germany. The Governments of Europe thought that in increasing secular education they were increasing their power; but they had discovered that they had raised a monster which they could not guide. He hoped, however, that the noble and gallant Lord would withdraw his Amendment, as, if agreed to, the labours of the Committee would be interminable, and therefore fruitless. This was a question of policy, and the House should decide it.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA also hoped that the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford) would withdraw his Amendment. It was, no doubt, very good in itself, and might be usefully considered at a subsequent period; but, at present, it could only tend to hamper the Committee, and he did not think it should be mixed up with the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill).

MR. ERRINGTON thought injustice was done to the Amendment by calling it irrelevant, and that it really supplemented the Motion in an important particular. The Motion contained an instruction to the Committee to proceed on certain lines; and this rendered the further instruction contained not only relevant, but opportune and necessary. He, therefore, hoped it would be pressed, unless the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock agreed to leave out the words in his Motion "without distinction of class or religion."

cult matter for the Irish Members to consider at the present moment. The Amendment would suit his views if it could be carried, and in that view he would heartily support it; but he was afraid that the Government would vote both against the Amendment and Resolution, and that would leave the Irish Members in some difficulty. He did not wish that this question should be made the pretext for shelving that of intermediate education. He hoped that the noble and gallant Lord opposite (Lord Charles Beresford) would withdraw his Amendment, unless the Government supported it.

MR. NEWDEGATE believed there was need for an inquiry into these endowed schools; but he hoped Ministers would be careful in dealing with the subject, and that the Protestants of Ireland would not be deprived of the endowments which they now possessed, and to which they were entitled. He supposed the wish of the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford) was to preserve the denominational character of the endowments, but he should recommend him not to press his Amendment. If the mixed system were "rotten," it was the result of the determination of the Catholic Hierarchy to exclude from the schools the Scripture extracts in the use of which the Catholic and the Protestant Primates had concurred.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had not been fortunate enough to hear the speech of the noble Lord who brought forward this Motion (Lord Randolph Churchill); but he understood that he had made out a very powerful case for an inquiry. It was acknowledged that the great educational want of Ireland was that of secondary and intermediate education, and he trusted that the discussion would be confined to the manner in which that want was to be met. There were certain endowments for the purpose, and the question was how they could be best utilized. There could be no doubt that great abuses existed in reference to the endowed schools of Ireland, and the only objection that ought to be urged against the Motion should be either that a case had not been made out—which no one suggested—or that a Commission would be better than a Committee. He should have supposed that a Commission might have been better than a Committee, if it had not been that there was a Commission 20 years ago, whose Report had furnished many of the facts, but on which Report no action had been taken. The matter, therefore, seemed one for a Committee. If the Government thought its inquiry would militate against the progress of their promised Bill, perhaps the general opinion would be that the Motion ought not to be pressed; but he could not conceive that inquiry could be otherwise than useful in facilitating legislative action. There was a strong case for making a similar inquiry by a Committee for Ireland to that which had been made by Commission for England and Scotland. With regard to the Amendment of the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford), it appeared to him that the pressing of that Amendment would be a mistake, and that it would be almost fatal to any educational object in that matter. For himself, he had a strong opinion in regard to separating religion from education; but he thought the true question ought to be considered appropriately and at the right time. They had a case for inquiry as to how far certain endowments had been misused, and the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Waterford wished the Committee also to inquire how they were to put up denominational schools. But if they put that second subject of inquiry on the back of the first subject, the first would be utterly lost sight of. Let them first ascertain the facts as to how these endowments had been abused, and afterwards the important question of religious education could be considered. In dealing with the question they should not forget that they were legislating for Irishmen, and not for Englishmen or Scotchmen.

MR. J. LOWTHER thought the House would not complain of the manner in which that evening had been spent, as they had had some very instructive, and—he was bound to say, speaking for himself—very amusing speeches. They had had, first, the able and amusing speech of his noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), who had devoted great attention to that subject. Most hon. Gentlemen must have thought the noble Lord's statements were of a somewhat startling character, and might also have felt some curiosity to see the proofs by which they could be established. Next came the Amendment of the noble and gallant Lord the Member for Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford), which was supported by that ability and wit for which he was so well known in the House. His noble and gallant Friend the Member for Waterford had scarcely been used fairly in that discussion. Hon. Members had urged that the Amendment was inconvenient, and he could fully believe that to many of them it would be most inconvenient. But the Motion was also inconvenient. Now, speaking for himself and the Government, he need hardly say they could not accept the Amendment, whatever course they might adopt as to the Motion. At the same time, representing, as he did, an important Irish constituency in which strong feelings were entertained on the subject of that Amendment, his noble and gallant Friend was not only justified in raising, but bound to raise, that question; and he (Mr. Lowther) could not agree with those who said that if the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock were adopted, the Amendment would be out of place. Now, there were parts of the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock which the House generally would admit were deserving of their serious attention. His noble Friend had alleged against the Endowed Schools maladministration of the temporalities in their hands, and had suggested that a Committee of that House should inquire into their management. He did not deny that his noble Friend had made out a prima facie case for an inquiry of some kind, although he had prudently reserved his proofs for a tribunal competent to deal with such details. But a Committee of that House would be one of the most inappropriate bodies to conduct such an investigation. ["No, no!"] His noble Friend had mainly based his case on maladministration in regard to the management of farms, the collection of rents, the audit of accounts, and various other details, many of them involving local elements; and a Committee of that House was hardly the tribunal to which matters of that kind should be referred. His noble Friend had referred to the great question of the policy which was to regulate Parliament on the subject of intermediate education. With regard to it, it was his (Mr. Lowther's) duty last night to make an announcement of the policy which Her Majesty's Government intended to submit to Parliament. He stated that it was the intention of the Government at an early period to introduce in the other House of Parliament a measure dealing with that important subject. He could not imagine that the noble Lord had any means of knowing what that measure would be. He (Mr. Lowther) was not going to avail himself of the present opportunity by attempting prematurely to divulge its details. But he thought the House would be disposed to agree with his contention, that there were two distinct branches involved in the Motion of his noble Friend. There was the question of the administration of the temporalities in the hands of the Commission, and there was the question of the policy which should guide Parliament in dealing with the question of education. With regard to the question of policy, he thought the Government had already expressed their intention of dealing with it. If the House were to appoint a Committee, it would be the duty of the Government, out of respect to that Committee, not to introduce any measure in anticipation of its Report. He thought the Government could hardly be expected, in the face of a Committee appointed by one of the Houses of Parliament, to introduce a measure and take the subject out of its hands. He would admit that his noble Friend the Member for Woodstock had made a statement with regard to the management of the temporalities of these academies, which he thought deserving of inquiry; but he thought a Committee of that House could not undertake properly those limited and merely local functions. He thought inquiries would be more appropriately conducted by a small Commission appointed for the specific purpose of inquiring into the management of the temporalities. If that suggestion would fall in with the views of his noble Friend and those who supported him, he should be quite willing to undertake that a Commission of the character which he had mentioned should shortly be appointed to inquire into and report upon the management and conduct of the temporalities and revenues of those bodies. He hoped that, in these circumstances, his noble Friend would be satisfied with the important discussion which he had raised upon this question, and would not press his Motion. Of course, some alterations would be required to adapt his Motion to the limited inquiries to which he (Mr. J. Lowther) had referred. He hoped, also, that his noble and gallant Friend the Member for Waterford, who had contributed so ably to this discussion, would see that, in the circumstances, he would certainly be consulting the interests he had at heart, and also the convenience of the House, by not pressing his Amendment.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he must express the deep obligations of himself, and he thought he might say of all the Members connected with Ireland, to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), for the great interest he had taken in this subject, and for the manner in which he had introduced the Motion. He hoped, however, that the noble Lord would accept the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He entirely concurred in the remarks he had made, and was glad to learn that the inquiry which he had suggested would not interfere with the intended measure of the Government.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL consented to withdraw his Motion, on the distinct understanding that there would be no limit to the inquiry of the Commission, and that it would have full powers to inquire into the existing condition of the schools, their management, and their revenues.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, it must be understood that he did not propose that there should be a Royal Commission. What he was prepared to agree to was a small Commission to inquire into the subject of the management of the property. He would be happy to communicate with his noble Friend as to the terms under which such a Commission might be appointed.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

DOVER AND CALAIS MAIL CONTRACT. RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Contract entered into between the South Eastern Railway Company and the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company and the Postmaster General for the conveyance of the Mails between Dover and Calais be approved."—(Sir Henry Selwin-IBbetson.)

SIR WILLIAM FRASER moved, as an Amendment—

"That this House declines to approve the said Contract until an undertaking be given by the South Eastern Company and the London, Chatham, and Dover Company to provide more adequate service in their steam vessels."

He complained that the boats which were used by these two Companies for the cross-Channel traffic were not what they should be; that they were often overcrowded; and that the accommodation for the vast number of inhabitants of this country who went and returned from abroad every year was most inadequate. Seeing that in the course of the autumn very large numbers of the public would be proceeding to France, he felt that it was necessary some steps should be taken to remedy the present wants, so that something like decent accommodation should be provided for the public. He therefore declined to assent to the proposed contract, which showed an increase of £8,000 over the former terms, until some satisfactory assurances were given for the future. The House had no other means of objecting to the present inferior service than the present Motion, and therefore he begged to move his Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House declines to approve the said Contract until an undertaking be given by the South Eastern Company and the London, Chatham, and Dover Company to provide more adequate service in their steam vessels,"—(Sir William Fraser,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MAJOR DICKSON said, the moment chosen by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Kidderminster (Sir William Fraser) for making his proposal was most inopportune, as the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company were at that moment engaged upon some costly experiments, which, if successful, would prove a great boon to those travelling between Dover and Calais. It had been found impossible, in the present state of Calais harbour, to use ships with single keels of larger size than those at present employed in the service. The Company had therefore purchased the Calais-Douvres, a twin ship of considerable size, in order to carry on a difficult service in a satisfactory manner. He denied that the accommodation afforded was so bad as it was represented to be; and with respect to the increase in the amount of the contract, he explained that it was necessary by reason of the fact that they had to carry a much heavier quantity of mails, and that their expenses had largely increased through the increased cost of materials and wages. It was the desire of those who conducted the Continental service between Dover and Calais to do so in the most efficient manner; but to do so at the rates the Companies were at present receiving involved a great loss, and he was sure that the House would not require such a sacrifice from any Company. The French Government were making a large increase in the size and capabilities of Calais harbour, and when those works were completed, as they would be in about four years, the Company would be able to have larger and more powerful boats than could be employed under existing circumstances.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he could not admit that the answer of the hon. and gallant Member for Dover (Major Dickson) on behalf of the Company was satisfactory, for the reason that the only answer they had made to offers on the part of the Government of assistance in the work they had to perform was a demand for an increased subsidy. This had resulted, he supposed, from the fact that the railway communication was practically in the hands of one Company, which rendered it difficult for the Government to do anything except submit. At the same time, however, he wished to point out that the service in question was a very peculiar one, and that there had to be considered the disadvantages of the harbours at both sides of the Channel. He thought that what had been done in the matter was the best that could be done in the circumstances. On the whole, therefore, he hoped that the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Kidderminster (Sir William Fraser) would be satisfied with simply having called attention to the subject, and would not press his Motion to a division. There was no doubt that great public good would result from the improvement of the harbours in connection with the service, and that when those harbours were improved larger boats could be employed, and the service could be conducted more satisfactorily. Meanwhile, he hoped that the proposal of the Government to continue the existing contract would meet with general approval, and that it would be seen that the course taken by the Government was the only one that could well be adopted in the circumstances.

Main Question put.

Resolved, That the Contract entered into between the South Eastern Railway Company and the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company and the Postmaster General for the conveyance of the Mails between Dover and Calais be approved.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibb

MR. ANDERSON thought it rather hard that the hon. Member should make that Motion. Four months ago the Bill gained its second reading, and, during that long interval, not a single Amendment had been proposed to any of its clauses. Moreover, all the Amendments asked for by the Government had been incorporated in the Bill.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT (1876)
AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

(NO. 99.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that the object of the Bill, which had come up from the Commons, was to amend the 23rd Section of "The Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876," so far as related to Friendly and Benefit Societies. The Bill, which consisted of a single clause, proposed to enact that the provisions of that clause should not apply to monies which a pauper, or pauper lunatic, might be entitled to as a member of a Friendly or Benefit Society.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the Bill proposed to effect a considerable change in the existing law, of which he had great doubts as to the expediency. Hitherto, when a man came upon the poor rates, the Union authorities were entitled to take possession of any property he might have. The Bill proposed to exempt from that power any monies which the pauper might be entitled to receive as a member of any benefit or friendly society. It was provided, it was true, that the officers of the society should apply those monies to the maintenance of the wife and family of the pauper, if he had one; but if he had not, the Guardians were not entitled to receive the moneys, unless they had specially declared beforehand that the relief given to the pauper was by way of loan. He thought this proposal tended to destroy the spirit of independence and self-reliance, by teaching the working man that he was entitled to relief for himself, independent of the circumstances of his family.

EARL FORTESCUE expressed his concurrence with the noble Earl, in the principle that a pauper was not entitled to relief until any property he might possess was exhausted; and there was no reason why monies in the friendly societies should be exempted more than any other kind of property. He remembered that when he was Secretary to the Poor Law Board, Mr. C. Buller and he passed a clause facilitating the recovery of the cost of relief given to paupers out of property which had subsequently either become or been discovered to be under their control. This Bill went on exactly the opposite principle.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON acknowledged that the provisions of the Bill, as it now stood, were objectionable. The question, however, was one of considerable importance; and, though he was not prepared to say that the Bill should not be read a second time, he thought that the next stage should not be taken until some time had been allowed for consideration.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE said, he could not see on what principle a man should be maintained by the parish, while his wife and family were to receive the proceeds of any savings he might have effected.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CONGRESS — THE ARMENIAN CHRISTIANS.—QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, in putting to my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs the Question, of which I have given Notice, I quite admit that the subject is one of great difficulty and delicacy; but, at the same time, I think I can put it in such a manner as to avoid anything that might stir the susceptibilities of any who may be about to take part in the Congress. The Armenians, as represented by the ex-Patriarch of Constantinople and others, complain that, while in the Treaty of San Stefano all the other Christian subjects of Turkey are mentioned separately and in detail, and their position is fully recognized, they themselves are scarcely mentioned, or only mentioned in such a manner, merely by name, as to give them no kind of security that their case will be fully considered whenever the Congress shall assemble. They state that they constitute a nationality worthy of consideration, and that altogether in the world they amount to between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000, of whom about 3,000,000 are inhabitants of the Ottoman Empire, 1,000,000 are under Russian rule, and the rest scattered throughout Persia, Java, Europe, and America. It was true that in the 16th clause of the Treaty of San Stefano, the Armenians were mentioned; but that clause gave very little assurance beyond this, that the Porte would do its best to save them from the ravages of the Kurds and Circassians. Everyone knows that the Armenian Province of Turkey is one of the finest countries on the face of the earth, and the Armenian Christians are noted for their intelligence and commercial industry throughout the world. All that they at present require is contained in the Question on the Notice Paper—namely, Whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will undertake, that in the Congress about to be held, the case of the Armenian Christians shall be heard as well as the case of the other Christians under the Government of Turkey? I think that they have addressed a very humble and proper request. They have a right to be protected under the great European Treaty of 1856; and I am sure that the intelligence of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will induce him to consider the question, and that the generosity of his heart will stir him to do all that is consistent with his duty to promote the interest of this great nationality, so long labouring under such grievous oppression and cruelty.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the Armenian Christians, I believe, are mentioned in an Article of the Treaty of San Stefano, in which the Sultan promises to provide such reforms as will relieve the immediate localities, and protect them from their special sufferings—the ravages of the neighbouring hordes of Kurds. The other Christians under the government of Turkey are not, if my recollection serves me rightly, provided for specifically in the Treaty. What is provided for is that institutions shall be given to the Christian Provinces. That is not a distinction without a difference. Where the Christians are exclusively, or a very large majority, of the inhabitants of a particular Province, it is possible to give them special institutions, and to give the Province special institutions also; but where they are mixed with a large proportion of persons of another faith, it is not possible to give them special institutions, without having recourse to that which is undoubtedly an anomaly—namely, the provision of different institutions for the inhabitants of the same locality. That is, undoubtedly, a very considerable difficulty, and certainly it is one which will meet us on the threshold of the case of Armenia, whenever it may come to be considered; because, though undoubtedly the Armenians are a people of a separate faith, and—though the term cannot be applied with accuracy—they may also be regarded as constituting a separate nationality, yet they are so scattered about, and so mixed with the Turkish population, that either you must provide institutions applicable to Turks, Kurds, and Armenians, alike, or else you must have recourse to the anomalous device I have referred to—of having several different institutions in the same locality. I am pointing out this to show my noble Friend that the case of the Armenians is not quite on all fours with that of other Christians inhabiting other Provinces of Turkey. With respect to my noble Friend's Question, I can only say that it is not my province to indicate what a Congress consisting of the Powers of Europe will think it right to do; but it is, undoubtedly, the fact that the case of the Armenians must, by the Article of the Treaty of San Stefano, to which I have alluded, be brought under the consideration of the Congress. I feel sure that the other European Powers will examine the case of Armenia with great sympathy for all its people, and with a desire that their lot should be ameliorated, and I can assure my noble Friend, with absolute confidence, that these sentiments will animate Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I have heard with satisfaction the statement of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; because, though undoubtedly that statement was guarded, I gather from it that the case of the Armenian people will be brought effectively before the Congress, and that, so far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, whatever should in justice be done for them will be done. And, my Lords, if justice is to be done, there are no Christian subjects of Turkey who deserve more consideration than the Armenians. They are a religion and a nationality distinct in themselves. They are ancient in history; they are a peaceful, industrious, and highly commercial people; and they are second only to the Greeks in intellectual power among the Christian races of the East. They may be said, indeed, to be the equivalent of the Greeks in Asia Minor. Nor have any people suffered a greater amount of oppression than the Armenians. In that, indeed, it may be said they have but shared the common fate of the other Christian races of the East; but I believe that the misfortunes and sufferings of the Armenians have been greater than those of some of the Christian races in Europe, because the power of the Porte was less felt in those distant Provinces, and the public opinion of Europe has been less brought to bear upon their case. I myself, when travelling in those districts, many years ago, was often a witness of the grinding oppression to which the Armenians were subjected. No time, indeed, will ever efface from my recollection the evidence of the ruthless spoliation and savagery to which some of those Christian races, living far away from the sight and protection of the European Powers, were called upon to endure; but if that were the case then, what must be the state of things now, after a long season of anarchy, and when the reins of government over the Mahomedan population are wholly relaxed—when the barbarous Kurdish tribes come down from their mountains without check, carrying fire and sword and depredation over the whole Province? I believe that whatever horrors and cruelties have been perpetrated in European Turkey, they have been perpetrated to at least an equal extent in Asia Minor. That is the first point; but there are two other points to be remembered. First, if, after all this, it should be the destiny of the Armenian people to pass once more under Turkish rule, we must bear in mind that that rule would be relaxed and loosened as the result of present anarchy, and that the Mahomedan population may even be greatly reinforced by fresh accessions from the Turkish Provinces in Europe—a fresh element and cause of disorder and violence. The second is, that Russia at this moment contains, as I think my noble Friend opposite pointed out, not fewer than 1,000,000 Armenians within her districts, and that the condition of these people being greatly superior to that of their fellow-countrymen in Turkey, the contrast will be such that it will tend to keep up that uneasy feeling which it is the object of everyone at this moment, if possible, to allay. My Lords, we are now going into a Congress. I hope that the Congress, in dealing with the case of the Armenians as with that of other nationalities, will not content itself with merely patching up the present grievance; but, if a fair and full attempt is made at a final settlement of this question, the causes of scandal and future strife which exist now may be removed; and then only such means of prosperity may be secured to them, as will make them contentedly acquiesce in the form of government which may be given to them.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I heard with satisfaction the temperate terms in which my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Shaftesbury) brought forward the undoubtedly strong case of the Armenians. He has shown what a strong claim the Armenians have on the sympathy of the European Powers on account of their peaceful and commercial habits and their great intelligence; and I am bound to say that, though guarded, the assurance which the noble Marquess the Secretary of State has given of the sympathy of Her Majesty's Government with the Armenian people is extremely satisfactory. My noble Friend did not, and neither do I, expect the noble Marquess to go fully into the question now, when the Congress is just about to meet; I feel the difficulty there is in the way of discussing the matter at the present time. It is clear—and I do not blame them for it—that Her Majesty's Government do not wish to make any statement as to the course they propose to take at the Congress. My noble Friend, who is not now present (Earl Grey), asked, the other evening, whether certain rumours which had appeared in an evening paper as to the agreement between Russia and England were correct; and the noble Marquess, in reply, stated that those rumours were not trustworthy. We do not know, therefore, the exact nature of the agreement or of the policy Her Majesty's Government are about to adopt, and I do not think it would be convenient to put any pressure on the Government as to its terms; consequently, it appears to me it would not be convenient—there may be a difficulty—in discussing any particular point which will have to be considered by the Congress. I am glad, however, that this matter has been brought forward, and that the Question of my noble Friend has, to a certain extent at least, met with a satisfactory response from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CONGRESS — THE TREATY OF SAN STEFANO. — QUESTION. — OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR: My Lords, I think it would remove some possible misapprehension with regard to the terms upon which the approaching Congress is about to meet, if the noble Marquess at the head of the Foreign Office does not object to answer the Question which I have placed upon the Notice Paper—

“Whether Her Majesty’s Government consider the words in the invitation to the Congress, ‘That in accepting it the Government of Her Britannic Majesty consents to admit the free discussion of the whole of the contents of the Treaty of San Stefano, and that it is ready to participate therein,’ equivalent to the stipulation made by the Earl of Derby when Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—‘Her Majesty’s Government must distinctly understand before they can enter into Congress that every Article in the Treaty between Russia and Turkey will be placed before the Congress, not necessarily for acceptance, but in order that it may be considered what Articles require acceptance or concurrence by the several Powers and what do not.’”

By the words of the invitation to the Congress, it would appear that the basis upon which the Powers, including Russia, have arrived at some understanding is, “the free discussion of the whole of the contents of the Treaty of San Stefano.” Now, I can hardly regard that as conveying the same limitations or as equivalent to the stipulation so strongly insisted upon by Her Majesty’s Government in the communication of the Earl of Derby, then Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on the 21st of March to Count Schouvaloff, and referred to in the despatch of the noble Marquess on the 1st of April. Lord Derby said—

“Her Majesty’s Government must distinctly understand before they can enter into Congress that every Article in the Treaty between Russia and Turkey will be placed before the Congress, not necessarily for acceptance, but in order that it might be considered what articles require acceptance or concurrence by the several Powers and what do not.”

Now, there seems to be a considerable difference between going into Congress, in the one case, on the basis of simply discussing the Articles of a Treaty, and in the other, making it a condition, not only that every Article of the Treaty should be placed before the Congress—it is not said for discussion—but in order that it should be considered what Articles required acceptance or concurrence by the Powers and what did not. Discussion was, doubtless, implied in both cases, but the object in the stipulation of Lord Derby went further. The Treaty was to be discussed with a view to consider which Articles required the acceptance or concurrence of the several Powers, who, as I understand, were signatories of the Treaties of 1856 and 1871. In the one case, the validity of the Treaty is virtually admitted; in the other, the acceptance and concurrence of the Powers are assumed to be previously requisite. If the noble Marquess can state that the conditions before entering into a Congress, as laid down by Lord Derby, are to be adhered to, any doubts which have been raised upon the subject will be removed.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I am not sure that I follow my noble Friend correctly, and whether I am able to grasp the idea which he wishes to place before the House; and, therefore, perhaps, my answer may not be satisfactory. I would call my noble Friend’s attention to the fact that it is not the terms in which Her Britannic Majesty’s Government accepted the invitation to the Congress which constitutes the point for which we are contending, but the terms in which the Russian Government have accepted it. Let my noble Friend substitute for “the Government of Her Britannic Majesty,” “the Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia,” and then the passage will read—

“That in accepting it the Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia consents to admit the free discussion of the whole of the contents of the Treaty of San Stefano, and that it is ready to participate therein.”

It appears to me that this is an acceptance of a discussion of the totality of the Treaty; and if there is really any difference between the two formulas, as it is an acceptance of the discussion of the whole Treaty, while the stipulation referred to my noble Friend is one for placing the Treaty before the Congress in order that it may be considered what Articles require acceptance or concurrence, then, the whole being greater than the part, I take it that the admission in the acceptance is larger than that required in the stipulation; but I freely admit that it requires a microscopic eye to discover the difference.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY: I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without expressing my great satisfaction at the prospect which now exists of settling this question. It is not too late to secure the good-will of all the Christian populations of the East, and I am sure that the good wishes of your Lordships, and of the country, will accompany the Government in their endeavours to solve in Congress this great and difficult question, in which endeavours they have had to encounter difficulties exceeding those experienced by any previous Administration. There is everything to expect from a meeting like this, to which the whole of the Governments of Europe send the most eminent of their Ministers; and I trust that the results of the Congress will be to secure to Europe a lasting peace—at least, like the Congress of Vienna, a repose of 30 years. The present and past condition of the Christian Provinces of the Turkish Empire has been a scandal to Christianity; and, looking to the advancement of knowledge which we all possess of the subject, I hope that there will be something nobler shown to the world than a struggle for superiority or the extension of dominion in the East. I hope, too, that the settlement of this question will induce those nations, who are now armed to their uttermost and exhausting all their resources in preparation for war—to the scandal of Christianity and civilization—to abandon this ruinous policy, and turn their attention to internal improvement, which is so much wanted.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—BLACKWATER BRIDGE, YOUGHAL.—QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Board of Works in Ireland has as yet secured their Valuator's Report as to the value of the Blackwater Bridge near Youghal, and has taken the requisite preliminary steps for bringing the same into the possession or under the control of the Grand Juries of the counties of Cork and Waterford, with the view to the erection of a new permanent bridge in lieu of the present decayed structure; and, if not, whether he will take steps to expedite the removal of the serious danger which threatens the population who still make use of the bridge?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Owing to the presentments made at the last Assizes by the Grand Juries of the counties of Waterford and Cork being informal, and I may say illegal, both in form and substance—for which state of affairs, of course, the Government are in no way responsible—the Board of Works have been prevented from carrying out the work of removal and re-construction. Until the Grand Juries concerned make legal presentments, the Government are unable to take any steps; but we are endeavouring to expedite a settlement of the difficulties.

NAVAL COURTS MARTIAL. QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If it is the invariable practice of the Admiralty to submit for the perusal and report of the Judge Advocate of the Fleet the Minutes and Sentences of Naval Courts Martial whenever the sentences involve the punishment of penal servitude or imprisonment?

MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I may say that it has never been the practice to submit the Minutes and sentences of naval courts martial to the Judge Advocate, unless, in the opinion of the Lords of the Admiralty, there should be a doubt as to the legality of the proceedings or the sentences.

NAVY—H.M.S. "EURYDICE." QUESTION.

MR. BATES asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether further attempts are still to be made to raise the "Eurydice?"

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the hon. Member asks if the time has not arrived when the attempt to raise the Eurydice should cease? The attempts made hitherto certainly have not been so successful as we could wish, owing in a very great measure to the most unfortunate weather, which has interfered with the operations of those who have been engaged in the effort; and I would say myself that the time has almost arrived when those attempts should cease, if it were not for the strong feeling—which it is impossible not to respect—of a desire to recover the bodies, if possible, of the officers and men who are still in the vessel. The whole question has our very careful consideration, and I am not without the hope that the next effort which will be made may be crowned with success.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE BERLIN CONGRESS—CORRESPONDENCE. QUESTIONS.

MR. DILLWYN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence which has recently passed between Her Majesty's Government and the other European Powers relative to the assembling of the Congress at Berlin?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, perhaps he will allow me to put one of which I have given him private Notice, and that is, Whether it is the intention of the Government to lay any further Papers on the Table of the House, or make any statement which would give any information to the House and the country as to the policy the Government go into the Congress with?

MR. HAYTER also asked, Whether the right hon. Gentleman is now able to give to the House the names of the Plenipotentiaries selected to represent the Great Powers at the approaching Congress at Berlin; whether any Power other than England will be represented by its Prime Minister, its Foreign Secretary, and an Ambassador; and whether he can give the House any assurance that questions of the highest importance to this Country will not be finally decided in the Congress, except on the collective responsibility of the whole Cabinet?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I may, perhaps, be allowed to answer the Questions of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Mr. Hayter) first, at least in part. We have not received full information respecting the Plenipotentiaries deputed by the various Powers to attend the Congress. We know that France sends M. Waddington, Foreign Secretary, and Count St. Vallier, Ambassador at Berlin; Italy, Count Corti, Foreign Secretary; Prussia, Prince Gortchakoff, Chan-Schou-

Sir Joseph M. Kenna

valoff, Special Envoy; M. d'Oubril, Ambassador at Berlin; and Turkey, Sadyk Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Caratheodory Effendi. Austria and Germany will, of course, be represented by Count Andrassy and Prince Bismarck, who are Chancellors of their respective Empires. We have no information as to those who will be associated with them at present. The Times gave a long list of the Austrians yesterday or the day before. With regard to the Question which has been put to me as to the production of Papers, I have to say that it is not now possible to lay any further Papers on the Table; nor do I think there is occasion for any formal statement of the policy of Her Majesty's Government beyond that which is contained in the various Papers which have, from time to time, been presented to Parliament. I would refer especially to the Circular Despatch of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury), with regard to the Treaty of San Stefano, which Treaty will be the subject for discussion in the Congress. From that Despatch and from the statements which have, from time to time, been made in this House and elsewhere by Her Majesty's Government, its general views may, it seems to me, be sufficiently ascertained. The Plenipotentiaries who will represent England will be furnished with instructions drawn up by the Cabinet. In answer to the hon. and gallant Member for Bath, I may say that, undoubtedly, the questions to be decided in the Congress, so far as this country takes part in them, will be decided on the responsibility of the collective Cabinet. I do not know that I can say anything more, except that it would not be according to precedent, while it would certainly be inconvenient, to lay any further Papers on the Table at the present moment. When, however, the labours of the Congress have been brought to a termination, all the information which can properly be given will be laid before the House.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, seeing that the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill is put on the for Thursday June 20th, it is to be understood that that Bill will stand as the first Order on that day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he could not name the day when the Bill referred to would be taken as the first Order. Much would depend on the progress of Business. He would, however, give due Notice as to when the Bill would be brought on.

H.M.S. "BEAGLE" — EXECUTION OF A NATIVE OF TANNA — JUDICIAL POWERS OF NAVAL COMMANDERS.
QUESTION.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, When the further papers relative to the hanging of a native of Tanna, on board H.M.S. "Beagle," will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that the Secretary to the Admiralty had already laid the Papers on the Table, and that he hoped they would be in print shortly after the House met after Whitsuntide.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE PERAK EXPEDITION—THE EXPENSES.
QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What is the date of the most recent disbursement made on account of the expenses incurred in the employment of troops, partly dispatched from India, during the operations in Perak in 1875 and the early part of 1876; whether there are still any further payments to be made for those expenses; whether any portion of them have been temporarily defrayed out of the revenues of India; out of what sources such expenses are to be ultimately defrayed; and, whether it is intended to come to Parliament for a money grant to meet the whole or part of those expenses; and, if so, when?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Some disbursements are actually being made at the present time on account of this Expedition for personal allowances to officers and men, and there are still further payments to be made. The claims of the Indian Government against Imperial revenues on account of disbursements in connection with this Ex-petition amount to something less than £40,000, but this does not represent the whole cost. These claims have not yet been adjusted with the Colonial Office and the War Office. Some portions of the expenses have, I understand, been already charged against Army Votes; and it is at present impossible to say whether any Supplementary Estimate for the Army charges will be necessary.

POST OFFICE MAIL SERVICE — THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL COMPANY.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON: As the Postmaster General is not in his place, perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury will allow me to put to him a Question which has been somewhat mutilated in the printing. It is, Whether he is aware that the great delay in advertising for tenders for the Mail Service to the East, which is at present in the hands of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, and soon to expire, is diminishing the chances of competition, and tending to continue the service in the hands of that Company; if he is aware that the Peninsular and Oriental Company is the chief of some associated Companies who by stringent rules among themselves are endeavouring to establish a monopoly of the carrying trade to India, and therefore not deserving of any special favour; and, whether, in the interests of the public service he will at once advertise for tenders for the Mail Service at present performed by the Peninsular and Oriental Company?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: In answer to the hon. Member, I have to say that, of course, I am aware that the delays in these matters are of very serious import, and my endeavour has been as much as possible to minimize these delays. It is not within the knowledge of the Post Office that the Peninsular and Oriental Company is connected with any other Companies in the manner to which the hon. Member refers. The question of advertising for tenders has been, as I explained on a recent occasion, delayed in consequence of its being thought necessary to consult the Indian Government in regard to certain points in the new tenders. I telegraphed the other day for the purpose of expediting the answer from India; and I am assured, though I have not seen it, that the answer has arrived at the India Office, and will be at the Treasury to-morrow.

TURKEY—THE BRITISH FLEET IN THE SEA OF MARMORA.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is the intention of the Admiralty to remove the British Fleet under the command of Admiral Hornby from its present anchorage before the season is further advanced?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am obliged to my right hon. and gallant Friend for mentioning this subject. We are fully conscious of the fact that the Gulf of Ismid is at this season of the year very insalubrious for the Fleet; and the Admiral has received, or is about to receive, orders to seek a better anchorage. Acting on his discretion, he will, in all probability, remove the Fleet to Prince's Islands, in the Sea of Marmora, the anchorage which he selected on his own responsibility some time ago.

ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: There is still so much anxiety throughout the country with regard to the Emperor of Germany, that I should like to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they have received any information to-day which they can communicate to the House in reference to His Majesty's condition?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not see my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his place, and I do not know whether there is any very recent telegram as to the Emperor's condition; but the latest communication which I saw was satisfactory.

PARLIAMENT — ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I also wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman a Question with respect to the Business of the House. Hon. Members will be separating to-morrow for the Whitsuntide holidays, and it would be a great convenience if we knew, What Business is intended to be taken on Thursday next week, when we re-assemble, and, if possible, on the following Monday?

Mr. E. Stanhope

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Something, of course, must depend on the progress which we may make in Supply to-night; but we propose to take Supply again on Thursday next when we re-assemble. We shall not then, however, take the Irish Education Votes. These are proposed to be considered on Monday, June 17th. We also propose, if we have not completed the Classes which are down for Supply to-night, to go on with them at a Morning Sitting to-morrow. The remaining Classes will be taken on Thursday. We are anxious to get the Valuation Bill read a second time; and we hope then to make arrangements for going on with the various Bills which are now in Committee at Morning Sitzings on Tuesdays. We are likewise anxious to fix as early a day as possible for the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill; but I do not know at present whether it will be possible to take that measure as the first Order on the 20th instant. That will depend on the course of Business; but, if we cannot take the Bill on that date, due Notice will be given as to when it will be considered.

IRELAND — COLLECTION OF RATES (DUBLIN).—QUESTION.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any copy of the Report of the Commissioners on the Collection of Rates in Dublin has been furnished to any non-official person having no connection with the Commission, or will be furnished prior to the issue of the Report to Members of the House generally; whether, pending the publication of the Report, any promise of an appointment to the Collector Generalship, in the event of a vacancy in consequence of the Report, has been or will be made; whether, in any such appointment, the views of the representatives of the ratepayers will be consulted?

MR. J. LOWTHER: There is at the present time, as the hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware, considerable disorganization existing among the printing establishments in Dublin, in consequence of which it has been, unfortunately, impossible to obtain copies of the Minutes of Evidence given before the Commission on the Collection of Rates in Dublin, or a sufficient number of copies of the Report to enable them to be as yet laid upon the Table of the House. The hon. Gentleman asks me whether any copy of the Report has been furnished to any non-official person not connected with the Commission? I am not aware that any copy has been so furnished. But, ascertaining that one of the Members for the City of Dublin was himself a Commissioner, and consequently acquainted with the contents of the Report, I felt it only right to take the earliest opportunity of allowing his Colleague in the representation of that City to peruse the only copy which I had in my possession, and which I retain in my own hands. The hon. Member further inquires whether any promise of an appointment to the Collectorship has been or will be made pending the publication of the Report. I have certainly never heard of any promise of an appointment having been made, especially as no vacancy has yet occurred; and I need hardly say that no such promise will be made until a vacancy does occur. He also asks me whether, in any such appointment, the views of the representatives of the ratepayers interested will be consulted? I may remind the House that the appointment is vested in the Lord Lieutenant, who intends to exercise the duty of filling up the appointment on his own responsibility. He will, of course, be glad to receive representations from ratepayers in their individual or collective capacities, and to give due weight to such representations. The responsibility, however, of the appointment rests with the Lord Lieutenant, and he does not intend to ask them to share it with him.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

CLASS V.—COLONIAL, CONSULAR, AND OTHER FOREIGN SERVICES.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. RYLANDS: The hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Bennett-Stanford), who has a Notice on the Paper for the reduction of the amount of Colonel Wellesley's salary, is not in his place; and, although I am not prepared to move the reduction myself, I entirely sympathize with the hon. Gentleman in the opinion that the appointment was one which was open to a considerable amount of objection. But what struck me when the matter was before the House on a recent occasion, was that the hon. Gentleman seemed to consider the appointment of Colonel Wellesley was one of an extraordinary character, and contrary to the rules laid down for the guidance of the Diplomatic Service. No one can notice the conduct of the Foreign Office without coming to the conclusion that the appointment of Colonel Wellesley as Secretary to the Embassy was one of a great number of cases showing that the Foreign Office, in the conduct of the Diplomatic Service, was actuated either by personal favouritism or out of consideration for the influence of aristocratic connections. The effect of this is, that at the present moment the Diplomatic Service itself is in a state of great dissatisfaction; it is costing us more than at any previous period, and I think we have very little to show for the very large amount which is paid for that Department of the Foreign Office. We know very well that the late permanent Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord Hammond) had the management of the Diplomatic Service for many years, and the system which has been carried on at so much expense and dissatisfaction is a system which received from that gentleman a large amount of support. I may safely say that it was proved by the evidence given before the Committee on the Diplomatic Service, that during his régime every proposal for the reduction of the expenditure was resisted by the permanent Under Secretary, and every proposal for reform was denounced by him. What is the result? Though this system has led to a large increase in the expenditure, and has, in my judgment, also led considerably to the deterioration of the Diplomatic Service, the gentleman who was the head and front of that system was rewarded with a Peerage and a full pension. When those who resist every kind of reform are rewarded with the very highest honours Her Majesty can give, I am afraid that the great distinction conferred upon the noble Lord, who was formerly Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, is naturally an inducement to those who are in authority to follow exactly in the same lines; and I believe, at the present time, the Foreign Office rules are laid down on the old and bad precedents which have for so many years been regarded as the rule of that Department. It seems to me that the Foreign Office is an Augean stable, which it is almost impossible to cleanse; and so long as it exists in the present state, it will go on increasing the expenditure. We shall have increasing dissatisfaction amongst the members of the Service, and we shall have very unsatisfactory results from this expenditure. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer justifies Colonel Wellesley's appointment by quoting the Report of the Select Committee of 1871. I had something to do with that Committee. It was appointed at my instance, and I took a very active part on that Committee, and I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman had the reason put into his mouth by the Foreign Office why Colonel Wellesley should be retained. It is a very peculiar circumstance; but I think that if anyone looks back at the way in which the Foreign Office have dealt with Reports of Select Committees, he will find that such Reports are melted down by a kind of alchemy, under which all recommendations of a reduction in the expenditure of the Diplomatic Service in the public interest are thrown aside as dross, and where any recommendation is made which would justify the least increased expenditure, that is considered the true metal, and it is put into circulation. As an illustration of this, I may refer to the Select Committee on Official Salaries, appointed in 1850. Colonel Wilson Patten (now Lord Winmarleigh) was the Chairman, and he had associated with him a very distinguished number of Members of this House—Lord John Russell, Sir William Molesworth, Mr. Henley, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and other gentlemen of great authority. The Committee went into the question of the Diplomatic Service. They made a number of recommendations, which they believed would increase the efficiency of the Service, and at the same time secure economy in the expenditure. I have taken into consideration what the saving would have been providing these recommendations had been carried out, and find that the saving would have been from £30,000 to £40,000, or even, probably, £50,000 per annum, and the country would have saved, during the 28 years which have since elapsed, over £1,000,000. These recommendations were treated with contempt. A Committee, in 1861, made recommendations reducing the expenditure in some directions and increasing it in others. The latter recommendations only were accepted and carried out by the Foreign Office, but the others were not taken up at all. The right hon. Gentleman quoted the authority of the Committee of 1870-1, as a reason why Lord Salisbury is justified in appointing Colonel Wellesey as Secretary to the Embassy at Vienna. The Committee of 1871 recommended that the mere promotion by seniority should be done away with, and that there should be an opportunity for the Secretary of State, in certain cases, to give appointments without reference to seniority and by way of reward for merit. The Secretary of State was to have this authority and to exercise his selection, while paying proper regard to the claims of those in the Service. That is a material point. They recommended that the mere promotion by seniority, which was certainly acting in a most prejudicial manner in the Service, should be done away with as an absolute rule, and that there should be a right of selection by the Secretary of State for the promotion by merit of those in lower grades, so as to introduce energy and efficiency into the Service. Now, before 1871, the promotion in the under grades in the Diplomatic Service was entirely a matter of seniority, and, no doubt, gentlemen might without any special ability attain the very highest position, without paying any special attention to their duties, and without displaying anything but absolute mediocrity. These gentlemen, if they lived long enough, might rely on reaching the very highest positions in the Diplomatic Service. The Committee found that that system of appointing men of inferior quality to the highest posts simply because they lived long enough was a system which was eating up the Service. They found that men with ability left the Service, because they became disheartened in consequence of a number of men of no meritorious quality, but who had that valuable quality of longevity in superabundance, keeping them back. Hon. Gentlemen who were on the Committee knew very well that one of the points inquired into arose from the anxiety to remove the block in the Service for want of more rapid promotion. Now, is it to be supposed for a moment that the Committee who wished to remove the block would have sanctioned such an appointment as that recently made by the Government? The Committee recommended the appointment by the Secretary of State only to be used in exceptional cases where the greatest amount of industry and ability had been displayed. The Committee never contemplated the possibility of such an unexampled and incredible circumstance as bringing in an outsider to fill the place of those who were already in the Service. Such a thing never could have entered into the head of anyone. No doubt the Committee had a very strong opinion, with regard to the heads of Missions, that the Government should exercise great latitude in their appointment. I think there was a strong opinion that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs might appoint a gentleman, for instance, who had risen to great distinction as a statesman in connection with the Government of this country who might not have been in the Diplomatic Service at all. Upon that I have a clear opinion; and I think it has been a most unfortunate circumstance that in past years Governments have felt themselves almost restricted to gentlemen who have been trained up to the Diplomatic Service, and who have got their posts by virtue of seniority. It has been unfortunate that the Government of the day have not felt themselves at liberty to appoint an Ambassador at Vienna or Berlin from some distinguished Colleague of their own, who has sat in this House or in the other House, and who has secured not only the confidence of the Party to which he belongs, but also the general respect and confidence of the British public. But this is a very different case, and has reference only to appointments below the rank of Minister. We have a large body of men who have been trained to the duties of the position which Colonel Wellesley has taken. There are two or three Secretaries to each Legation. Some of these gentlemen, I have no doubt, have been striving to make themselves a name in the Service in order to procure promotion; and it was the desire of the Committee in 1871 so to reform the Service, that they should infuse into it a new life and a new hope. They wanted to get promotion for those who merited it. Men of dull mediocrity, given up to trivial amusement, and of light character, were to be discountenanced. The Committee wanted the Service to consist of men who, if efficient, should have a chance of promotion; and the State was not to accept a number of men who, whatever they did, were still to have a claim to promotion, whether their conduct was favourable or otherwise. Without casting any reflection on Colonel Wellesley—although he might be admirably suited to his appointment, for I have not the honour of Colonel Wellesley's acquaintance—I think that Lord Salisbury would not have appointed him unless he had certain qualifications; but what I contend for is this—you have got in your Service—I am afraid to say how many, but, I think, something like 20 or 30 first and second Secretaries; and, including third Secretaries, 40 or 50 gentlemen, who might naturally have looked forward to this prize. I say, unless it is a fact that all the first and second Secretaries of Legations, to whom the appointment at Vienna is a promotion—unless it is a fact that they are thoroughly unsuitable—we are striking a serious blow to the Public Service in bringing in a gentleman from the outside to place him in a coveted position over the head of those gentlemen who have been looking forward to the post. You are disparaging the Public Service. Are we to be told that these gentlemen are not fit for the Service? If that is so, we ought to strike out a number of the first and second Secretaries—and I think our establishments are too large—for it appears to me that the only construction you can put on this appointment is, that there is not one of them fit to take the Secretaryship of the Embassy at Vienna. I, certainly, have no intention to say anything that would be personally disrespectful to Colonel Wellesley; but I cannot help looking to the whole of the circumstances surrounding this appointment. In this House, several years ago, along with the right hon. Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), I called public attention to the nomination of Colonel Wellesley as Military Attaché at St. Petersburg. I felt at that time it was an appointment open to very serious question, and the reason why I felt so was this—that I believe in the reality of public offices. If they are a sham, then you are drawing money from the public under false pretences. What is a Military Attaché for? He is to represent this country at the head-quarters of a foreign Government, in order that he may keep the country well-advised as to every step taken by that Government; he is to give information of any movement of a military nature; and, in addition, he is to keep his Government apprised fully and thoroughly of the state of the Army of the country to which he is accredited. Is it desirable to send some young man without experience to the head-quarters of a foreign country, in order to give this information to this country? Our objection to the appointment of Colonel Wellesley as Military Attaché was, that he was too young and inexperienced for the post to which he had been appointed, and we urged that there were others who might have been appointed, and who were much more competent for the position. And now we have a repetition of a similar act of patronage in his favour. This gentleman has had great advantages placed in his reach by being appointed to a coveted office, and he has been placed over the heads of a large number of the members of the Diplomatic Service. I cannot help feeling that this appointment would not have been made unless the individual had had some great influence; and this, unfortunately, is not the only matter of the same kind of which we have to complain, in reference to the Foreign Office. You cannot expect for a moment that gentlemen will enter the service of the Foreign Office unless they take with them a certain amount of personal and family influence which would be likely to help them. If the proposal had been made to reduce this Vote, I certainly would have voted with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Benett-Stanford); in fact, if any proposal were made to reduce this Vote, I should be very happy to support it.

Mr. Rylands

I have some hesitation about moving a reduction myself, although I feel that this Vote might be reduced by very much more than the £1,000 which was suggested by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Shaftesbury. I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that just at this moment the House of Commons—or a large majority of the House of Commons—are prepared to support the Government in the extravagance of millions, and that I should have very little chance of saving £5,000 or £10,000. I, therefore, do not intend at the present time to move any reduction; but I protest against the amount of the Vote as extravagant; I protest against the Government ignoring the representations and recommendations of Select Committees in favour of greater economy and better administration; and I protest against the Diplomatic Service of this country being made use of for personal ends and for the purpose of aristocratical promotions.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF pointed out that in a case of this kind it was difficult for the Foreign Office to defend itself; because the head of the Department could not, from patriotic and prudential reasons, explain the motives which had actuated him in the course he had taken. He, therefore, thought it was the duty of the House to support the Foreign Secretary, when he took a course in virtue of his Office and on his responsibility as a Minister of the Crown. There was the less reason for asking explanations now, at a time when the Foreign Minister was engaged in negotiations more difficult and delicate than any that had engaged the attention of the Government of this country since the beginning of the century. With regard to Colonel Wellesley's appointment, he must say that when he first heard of it he felt a certain amount of annoyance, because the gentleman had been passed over the heads of several members of the Diplomatic Service; but he understood that the appointment was not made in accordance with the ordinary rules of the Diplomatic Service, but in accordance with Rule 18, which was as follows:—

"The Secretary of State reserves to himself the power to recommend to the Queen to name any person, even though not in the Diplomatic Service, for the higher and more responsible posts in it; and, generally, in regard to all promotions whatever in the Diplomatic Service, the Secretary of State will not be restricted by claims founded on seniority or members of the profession from making any such selection as on his own responsibility he may deem right."

The promotions of Military and Naval Attachés and Doctors who, though working side by side with diplomatists in the Diplomatic Service, could not be considered diplomatists alone, came within Rule 17, to which the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had referred. Rule 18, which he had quoted in extenso, would permit appointments which the hon. Member for Burnley said he should like to see made; while, at the same time, it ran counter to the objections raised by the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition to the selection of Lords Beaconsfield and Salisbury as the Representatives of England at the coming Congress. He should deprecate the hoisting of Military and Naval Attachés into high positions in the Service; but when a military man who was not in the Service had displayed great aptitude and ability in circumstances of great delicacy, he thought the Secretary of State was perfectly justified, under Rule 18, in availing himself of that gentleman's services. According to the hon. Member for Burnley's own showing, there could have been no objection to making Colonel Wellesley an Ambassador; and, in fact, he had been performing almost Ambassadorial functions in the course of his communications with the Emperor of Russia at the head-quarters of his Army. With regard to family and aristocratic influence, he thought it was not, and ought not to be helped. Even in America, where there was no aristocracy, there were official families; and it was found that members of those families were better received at European Courts, and performed their duties better, than other Americans who possessed equal culture and ability in other respects. For instance, other things being equal, who could be better fitted for such an appointment than a son of Lord Russell or Lord Clarendon, who from his childhood had heard diplomatic traditions, and had access to every great diplomatist who visited this country? Yet, no one would object to such an appointment on the score of aristocratic connections or family influence. As far as the case of Colonel Wellesley was concerned, he thought no good would arise from continuing the present discussion; and he would simply say that, except under special circumstances, he hoped the appointment would not be erected into a precedent.

MR. HAYTER agreed in thinking that this was not a proper time for renewing a discussion on Colonel Wellesley's appointment. He wished, however, to say that there was a question behind, which had not been touched upon. It had been stated by the Secretary of State for War, in answer to a question put to him in that House, that Colonel Wellesley received no military pay, and that he saw no reason to remove his name from the list of Colonels; but it must be remembered that Colonel Wellesley retained his regimental rank in the Coldstream Guards, and that his time was running on for a pension both in the Army and in the Diplomatic Service. He had been removed from the Duke of Cambridge's staff and placed on the list of full Colonels as an aide-de-camp to the Queen. He thought this unjust to men who were serving in the Coldstream Guards in the Crimea when Colonel Wellesley was a boy, but over whose heads he was now placed by being created a full Colonel in the Army and an aide-de-camp to Her Majesty. He was strongly of opinion that Colonel Wellesley, whether his appointment as Secretary of Embassy at Vienna was justifiable or not, ought now to be called upon to make his election either for the Military or for the Diplomatic Service, and ought not any longer to be allowed to qualify for retiring pensions in both Services, between the advantages of which he might ultimately make his selection.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he could not doubt that the Marquess of Salisbury had acted in the spirit of the recommendations of the Committee of 1871 in making this appointment; and in this particular crisis, under the special circumstances of the case, he thought it perfectly right that such an appointment should be made. He should, however, very much regret if a precedent were created for inflicting pain, or even the semblance of injustice, on such a body of gentlemen as belonged to the Diplomatic Profession. He did not think this would be the case. Several Ministers had been appointed who had never been in the Diplomatic Profession. Sir Henry Bulwer—afterwards Lord Dalling—for instance, was made Secretary of a most important Embassy, though he had never been in the Diplomatic Service; and then there was the case of Mr. Layard, who had only been nominally an Attaché to the Embassy at Constantinople, for the purpose of enabling him the better to conduct certain excavations. The appointment of Colonel Wellesley had been well supported by the House; but he hoped advantage would not be taken of it as a precedent to inflict pain or injustice on the members of the Diplomatic Service.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE expressed his regret that this matter was not pressed to a division. There was no greater farce than Special Confidential Reports as to Military Attachés, and it was upon the faith of one of these that Colonel Wellesley was appointed. When an officer joined the Army, if he were asked what languages he knew, and if he named a score, no steps would be taken to test his knowledge as to those languages.

MR. HOPWOOD said, the appointment was considered "a slap in the face" to the Diplomatic Service. He feared that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), in making the appointment, was moved partly by a high opinion of Colonel Wellesley's ability and partly by reasons which he could hardly disregard, but which he might not care to explain. The nation had already thrown open the Military Service of the country to deserving merit; and he hoped that by means of competitive examinations, or some other process, the same thing would be done with the Diplomatic Service also. The Service must not much longer remain simply a source of income for the privileged classes, but must be made what it professed to be—namely, a science, in which the highest ability would attain to the highest rank.

MR. COBBOLD said, he might tell the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), who seemed to think that an appointment in the Diplomatic Service was a matter of family connection, that the examination for admission to that Service was not one conducted by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but by the Civil Service Commissioners. He was not now going to enter into the general subject, except to say that he should be very happy to give the hon. and learned Member, who did not seem to be very well up in it, all the information respecting that Service, which 22 years' "dangling" at Court had enabled him to acquire. He (Mr. Cobbold) quite agreed with the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) that this appointment should not be made a precedent, and he did not believe that anything of the kind was intended. As his hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had very properly said, the rule which a former Foreign Secretary laid down had simply been made use of on this occasion by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter) seemed to have some fear that this officer would be serving for two pensions at the same time. He could relieve his mind to some extent by informing him that Colonel Wellesley would have to serve for 15 years before he could possibly become entitled to a pension of any sort or kind in the Diplomatic Service. He thought the question of this appointment had been thoroughly sifted the other day; and, therefore, he regretted to see on the Paper a Notice that it was to be again brought before them. He could not, however, allow to pass unnoticed some of the remarks which fell from his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) in introducing the subject to the Committee. His hon. Friend seemed to think that there was a general discontent prevalent in the Diplomatic Body. He must inform him that he entirely disagreed with him on that point. Of course, there was no body of men who did not talk amongst themselves, and who were not always wanting a little more than what they got; but he could assure the hon. Member that at the time when the Committee, of which he had said he was a Member, sat, he (Mr. Cobbold), and a great many of his Colleagues, were not altogether content with the then hon. Member for Warrington (Mr. Rylands). The hon. Member considered that the Service was a very expensive one. Well, it was, perhaps, a disadvantage that in England it was not known exactly what the nature of that Service was, except actually at head-quarters. The Committee must remember that members of the Diplomatic Service had to reside altogether abroad; that it was upon rare occasions that they could get back to their homes; and that they might be sent on Service to any part of the world. He did not think the present was the proper moment for entering further into this subject; and he trusted that the Committee would see the necessity of passing, without much further comment, the Vote.

MR. E. JENKINS said, that as he did not altogether agree with the criticisms which had been offered by hon. Gentlemen around him on this subject, he might, perhaps, be allowed to say a word or two in regard to it. He took it that the Diplomatic Service was a peculiar Service, and one in which the selection of the officers by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was a matter of the greatest importance. Therefore he, for one, should certainly not be prepared to support a proposal that men should be selected for the Diplomatic Service merely by competitive examination. But, on the other hand, the very fact that the responsibility of choice was thrown upon the Government made it all the more necessary, when it appeared that a thing had not been properly done, or that there was any reason to believe that men had been appointed who were not proper men, or that a case of injustice had taken place, that that proceeding should be criticized very severely, and that the Minister should be kept up to the point of responsibility to the country with regard to those appointments. Now, with regard to Colonel Wellesley, he could not help feeling that an injustice had been done to that officer by the criticisms which had been made upon his appointment in that House. It was right that it should be criticized; but, on the other hand, he did not think there was any hon. Member on either side of the House who, having read the papers, and being aware of the services which Colonel Wellesley had discharged to the country—especially in his personal relations with the Russian Government—would not admit that he was perfectly qualified for the post to which he had been appointed. Further, he supposed most of them would be generous enough to admit that if it were possible, without doing injustice to the Diplomatic Service, to give Colonel Wellesley a lift, the Government would be perfectly justified, in view of his services, in doing so; and, therefore, he hoped that, on both sides of the House, hon. Members would generously abstain from criticizing the appointment from a personal point of view. But there was one thing as to which the criticism of his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley was obviously in point, and it was this—how was it that in the whole of the Diplomatic Service there could be found no man so capable for the post of First Secretary of Embassy at Vienna as a man who had not been in the Diplomatic Service at all? There, certainly, his hon. Friend hit a blot, and a blot which he (Mr. E. Jenkins) dared say the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would feel to be a real one. They found that, in order to fill this post, it had been considered necessary to take a man who was not in the Service, and put him over the heads of a large number of men who had been in the Service for many years. They were, then, in this dilemma—either an injustice had taken place, or it had not. If an injustice had been done in putting Colonel Wellesley over the heads of abler men, then the Government were to blame for it; but if, on the other hand, no injustice had taken place, then the Diplomatic Service must be in a lamentable condition, and the criticism of his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley must be distinctly to the point. He wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he could give the Committee any explanation of the reasons why the Diplomatic Service was so defective and so deficient in talent as to render it necessary to import extraneous talent in order to bring it up to the mark?

MR. W. LOWTHER remarked that the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cobbold) had stated that it would not be in Colonel Wellesley's power to have a pension until he had served 15 years. He thought the hon. Gentleman was under a mistake in making that statement. If he would look at the regulations of the Service, he would find that if Colonel Wellesley were an Ambassador for a short period, he would be entitled to a pension of a certain amount; or if he were a Minister for another period, he would also be entitled to a pension. In order, however, to obtain a pension as Secretary of Legation, he must have served 15 years; and then he would not be quite sure of getting it, because it sometimes depended upon the caprice of those who were at the Foreign Office. The hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had put forward a theory relative to hereditary talent. He believed that the sons of great Generals might be very good officers, and that the sons of great diplomatists might be very well qualified to become diplomatists. Well, according to that theory, Colonel Wellesley was singularly lucky, for he had not only military but diplomatic talent, the head of the family being the Duke of Wellington, and his own father being Lord Cowley. The hon. Member had also alluded to the discussion which took place the other day; but he would remind him that that discussion was of a very meagre description, and a very short one, though on that occasion two Cabinet Ministers thought it worth while to stand up to defend the nomination. The hon. Member for Christchurch had further said that Military Attachés, serving by the side of other attachés, performed similar service. He did not think the hon. Member had ever served himself in Legation or Embassy where there was a Military Attaché, and he very much doubted whether the hon. Gentleman knew anything about it. When this question was last discussed, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Colonel Stanley) quoted Lord Cranbrook, and said—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member will not be in Order in referring in express terms to what passed during the debate in the House on this subject.

MR. W. LOWTHER would say, then, that they were told that Colonel Wellesley was very well qualified for the post of Military Attaché; but they had never yet been told why he was qualified for the post of Diplomatic Secretary of Embassy. Allusion had been made to the appointment of Mr. Layard, who, it was said, had not previously been in the Diplomatic Profession. To a certain extent he had been in the Diplomatic Profession, because he was attaché at Constantinople, though for what particular duties he did not know. Then, also, from being Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs he was named Minister at Madrid. But nobody ever called in question the right of the Crown to nominate to the higher post of Minister or Ambassador. He should be the last person in the whole of England to object to the Crown nominating whom it pleased to the higher post of Minister or Ambassador. They were told, on a former occasion, that the Marquess of Salisbury immediately fixed upon Colonel Wellesley as a proper person to fill this post. The noble Marquess must be possessed of a remarkable talent; because, he thought, the noble Marquess was only in Office a very short time when he discovered this great military and diplomatic talent in Colonel Wellesley. But he was not now alluding to that officer's talent. He might make the best soldier or the best diplomatist that ever lived; but he maintained that his appointment was a very great hardship upon the gentlemen in that Service over whose heads he had been placed. Not only had the Marquess of Salisbury shown great talent in discovering the qualifications of Colonel Wellesley, but he also had shown wonderful talent in discovering the inability of all the other gentlemen who were in the Profession. It was talent the most remarkable! He did not wish to detain the Committee any longer. The discussion had gone on quite long enough, he dared say; but, as a former member of the Diplomatic Service, he was inclined to think the members of that Profession would consider that the Government had, in this instance, broken faith with them.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, they had on the present occasion an advantage which they had not before—namely, the presence of the Representative of the Foreign Office in that House, and he trusted that before the discussion closed the hon. Gentleman would answer the following question. Supposing the Government were anxious to confer some mark of approbation upon Colonel Wellesley, why was it necessary to put him into the Diplomatic Service? Why might he not, having been supposed to have done well as Military Attaché at St. Petersburg, have been sent in a similar capacity to Vienna with some title of honour, with some personal allowance, or other mark of the favour of the Crown? Why was it necessary to put him into a place like that of first Secretary of Embassy—a place, the duties of which were utterly unlike those which he had been accustomed to exercise—when, in order to do so, it was necessary to pass over, injure the prospects, and hurt the feelings, of a number of the most useful persons in Her Majesty's Service? That was what he wanted to know from his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) and the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had misunderstood, to a great extent, the opposition to this appointment. He (Mr. Grant Duff), and many of those who sat about him, thought that Rule 18 was an excellent one, and that the Secretary of State should act most fully and freely under it; but they also were of opinion that so high a power as was conferred upon the Secretary of State by Rule 18 should only be exercised upon great occasions—upon occasions when the Secretary of State, or his Representative, could come down to that House and state the reasons why that high power had been exercised. It was, to a great extent, because he most ardently desired to see that power retained in the hands of the Secretary of State, that he protested now, as he did on a former occasion, against what appeared to him to be an abuse of that power. He could not help thinking that it had been exercised in this instance, partly, from reasons of a private nature, and not wholly from reasons connected with the Public Service.

MR. BOURKE said, he would not have thought it necessary or desirable that he should trouble the Committee by any remarks on the question, had it not been that he was unfortunately absent when it was brought before the House on a previous occasion. He should endeavour, as he went on, to answer the various remarks that had been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House. First, as to Colonel Wellesley's knowledge of the Russian language, the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Major O'Beirne) was entirely in error on that subject. The heads of the Foreign Office were well aware of Colonel Wellesley's proficiency in that language, and of the great energy shown by him in acquiring it. It had also been said that Colonel Wellesley was not proficient in the language of the country to which he was now accredited. That was a remark also wholly incorrect, and without any foundation. Colonel Wellesley was a German scholar, and perfectly competent, in that respect, to perform the duties which generally devolved upon the Secretaries of Embassy. The hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) had said that the examinations for admission into the Diplomatic Service were of a very slight character. That subject had been before the House on a previous occasion, and he was under a mistake in that respect. He (Mr. Bourke) did not mean to contend that the examinations were of a severe character; but they were, at all events, sufficiently so to test the proficiency of the gentlemen admitted to perform the duties which would devolve on them in the Service. The hon. and learned Member had indulged in some sarcastic remarks upon no qualifications being necessary for that Service, except family or aristocratic connection. He (Mr. Bourke) did not think that any Representative of the Foreign Office would ever put the qualifications necessary for diplomacy upon such a ground. He knew of no Service which required more intellectual qualifications than did the Diplomatic Service. He must say he was not surprised to hear the remarks which had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Westmoreland (Mr. W. Lowther), because he was well aware that his hon. Friend had himself passed through a long and distinguished diplomatic career, and it was very natural that he should be somewhat sceptical as to the expediency of admitting people into the Diplomatic Service, except by the usual method of examination. But he could not help thinking that his hon. Friend, after the habit of many other professional persons, had taken a very limited view of the subject before the House, and that he had rather postponed questions relating to the Public Service to others connected with the Profession of which he was so great an ornament. With respect to the question of pensions, his hon. Friend had, he thought, forgotten that one of the rules was to the effect that no person should be eligible for a pension until he had served 15 years. He did not know that that was a matter of much importance; but, still, the fact was as stated by the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cobbold). The remarks that had been made by the hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Mr.

Mr. Bourke

Hayter) referred to a military matter, and if he chose to raise that question, he would have an opportunity of doing so when the Army Estimates were brought on. He did not think it would be desirable that he should enter upon the question of pensions given to officers in the Army. So far as precedents were concerned, he could only say that there were numerous precedents for the course which had been taken by his noble Friend the Secretary of State in the present instance. It had been said by one or two hon. Members, and insinuated by a great many others, that the appointment of Colonel Wellesley to the post which he now occupied was a slap in the face to the Diplomatic Body. If he thought that was the case, he would not stand up in that House to defend the act of the Secretary of State, because there was no body of public men, he thought, deserved more the sympathy of the House of Commons than those who were employed in that Service. In the first place, they were very badly paid, and, in the next place, they had enormous responsibilities cast upon them. They had to perform duties of the most onerous nature, as well as to support the character of English gentlemen all over the world. There was no body of Diplomatic servants in the world with whom those of England would not favourably compare. But the House was aware that the Rule which had been read by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had received the assent of Parliament; and if that Rule were not to be a dead letter, the Secretary of State was perfectly justified in putting it in force whenever he deemed it desirable in the public interest; and, although he did not think it would be well to act on that Rule in very many instances, he was not at all prepared to excuse or apologise for the appointment of Colonel Wellesley, which had been made for no other reason than for the public good. It was well known that that officer had for the last eight or nine years been engaged in performing the duties of Military Attaché at the Court of St. Petersburg. The Secretary of State had ample means of satisfying himself as to Colonel Wellesley's capabilities and talent. He did not wish, however, to go further into that part of the subject. The present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had previously been the Secretary of State for India, and he then became acquainted with the career of Colonel Wellesley, and with the duties which that officer had performed, and of which the Committee were, no doubt, well aware, inasmuch as Colonel Wellesley's name appeared in the Blue Books. During the whole of that time, the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as a Cabinet Minister, had all these matters brought under his notice. All the duties which Colonel Wellesley had performed were essentially of a diplomatic character. Nobody could deny that. Well, the Marquess of Salisbury, seeing the way in which those duties had been performed, thought it would be desirable to take advantage of the rule which had been laid down by Earl Granville, and to strengthen the Diplomatic Service by introducing into it a gentleman who was not in it already, but who had manifested exceptional talents and an appreciation of the duties of the Diplomatic Service. In acting thus, the Marquess of Salisbury did not break down, but followed, a rule of the Service. It had been alleged that great interest was made to obtain the post of Secretary of Legation at Vienna for Colonel Wellesley. It had also been insinuated that night by the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), that Colonel Wellesley's appointment was entirely owing to his powerful connections. He was happy to relieve the hon. and learned Member's mind on this point, by informing him that the whole of the acquaintance which the Marquess of Salisbury had had up to this moment with Colonel Wellesley was absolutely and entirely an official acquaintance. The noble Marquess had never seen or spoken to Colonel Wellesley, except on official occasions and on official subjects, though he was bound to say that the noble Marquess had had many opportunities of discussing questions of importance. Nay, he would go further, and say that no human being ever asked the noble Marquess to appoint Colonel Wellesley, and that Colonel Wellesley himself made no application whatsoever. Here he must also beg to remind the Committee that not a single person who had attacked this appointment had been able to utter a word against Colonel Wellesley's fitness for the post; and that being the case, he thought the appointment could be justified on public grounds. So far from the Marquess of Salisbury being criticized for having made the appointment, he was of opinion that those hon. Gentlemen who professed to have so great a regard for the Public Service, and who said the interest of the Public Service ought to be placed before all other considerations, could be called upon to justify the course taken by the noble Marquess. Under these circumstances, believing, as he did, that the act of the noble Marquess was an act done in the performance of his public duty, and for the benefit of the public, he thought he could with confidence call upon the Committee to support the act on that ground, and on that ground only.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he did not intend to refer any further to the debate which had been raised concerning the appointment of Colonel Wellesley, but there were some points in this Vote on which he desired explanations. In the first place, he desired to know something as to the principle on which chaplains to Embassies were appointed, and what were the circumstances which necessitated their appointment. It appeared that there were chaplains in Denmark, in Italy, and in Spain. On the other hand, while they had a chaplain in Spain, it had not been found necessary, according to this List, to supply the spiritual wants of their Representative in Portugal. The distinction between Spain and Portugal must surely be a very fine one. Why, again, was it found necessary to supply a chaplain to the Court of Denmark, while at the Court of Sweden their Envoy Extraordinary and Secretary of Legation were left without any spiritual assistance whatever? In Austria they had a chaplain, but none in Bavaria. They had no chaplain either at Paris or Berlin, while, on the other hand, they had chaplains in Greece and Italy. He wanted to know what was the ground of these distinctions? It seemed to him that there was no principle involved in the matter at all, and he fancied that if there was a need for these chaplains, chaplains ought to be granted to all their Embassies in some fair proportion. On the other hand, if there existed no necessity for chaplains in such important centres as the capitals of Germany and France, and in numerous other countries, such as Sweden and Bavaria, he failed to see how there could be any necessity in continuing the chaplains in the places where they were stationed at present. He would also ask for some information as to why part of the expense of their Diplomatic representation in China was borne by the revenues of India? Under the head of "Legation in China," it was stated that the expense was partly repayable from Indian revenues. In his judgment, their Legation and Diplomatic representation in China were as much a matter of Imperial concern as their representation anywhere else in the world, and he objected to saddling the revenues of India with expenses which properly belonged to the general Diplomatic system of the Empire.

Mr. BENETT-STANFORD said, that on a former occasion he made a Motion similar to that which now stood on the Paper in his name. The reason why he wished to withdraw his Motion to-night was not because he had altered his own opinion with regard to the appointment of Colonel Wellealey, but because he did not think it would be right to press it after the very large majority which had been recorded in that House against his former Motion. He wished, therefore, to withdraw the Motion which stood in his name.

Mr. E. JENKINS desired to make a few remarks with reference to their Embassy at Constantinople. There was a physician appointed with a salary of £300 a-year, who was the British Member of the Board of Health. He should like to receive an explanation respecting the duties of that gentleman. Again, there was a note stating that one of the second Secretaries of Legation was in the receipt of £300 a-year as Superintendent of the Student Dragomans at Constantinople. As there was only one Student Dragoman at Constantinople, he wished to know whether it took £300 a-year to superintend him?

Mr. BOURKE explained that there were other Student Dragomans under the Consular Vote. As to the physician, his duties were to attend to the health of the members of the Embassy. The officer of the Board of Health was appointed by the Porte, and had to inquire into many sanitary subjects. Reports from him were sent to the Foreign Office every year, and they found it extremely useful that this Board of Health should exist.

Mr. RYLANDS asked, whether this was a very recent appointment?

Mr. BOURKE replied in the negative.

Mr. RYLANDS pointed out that while this gentleman received only £300 a-year as physician to the Embassy, he draw a salary of £400 a-year as Medical Member of the Board of Health. The latter salary appeared to be a new one altogether. Was it not a sort of appointment which ought to be paid rather by the Government of the Porte than by the British public?

Mr. BOURKE said, the Board had been appointed in conjunction with the other Courts of Europe, it having been thought desirable to have a scientific Board. Since he had been at the Foreign Office, a good deal of correspondence had been carried on with this Board of Health. Its duty was to report upon the state of sanitary affairs, not in Constantinople only, but all over Turkey. The Foreign Office had received from it very valuable Reports on the state of the plague at Bagdad, for example, and they had considered the spread of that disease in conjunction with the other Governments of Europe.

Mr. E. JENKINS observed, that there were no Student Dragomans mentioned in the Estimate under the Consular Vote for Turkey.

Mr. BOURKE, replying to the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), said, that if additional chaplains were proposed, the hon. Gentleman would most probably object to fresh appointments being made. The present anomaly could only be removed by appointing fresh chaplains, or by removing those who were already appointed. He could not say whether there was any great distinction between the places which had chaplains and those where there were none. It had not been deemed expedient, however, to remove

Mr. Baber's special service at Chung King under the Chefoo Convention. Seeing that the amount paid for Diplomatic representation in China was very considerable, it seemed somewhat surprising that an additional sum should be asked for in connection with this Treaty. He should like to know what was the condition of that Treaty at the present time. Perhaps Mr. Baber was to be a permanent employé, as the negotiations had been going on so long.

Mr. BOURKE said, Mr. Baber's salary was for a "special service," and that was an answer to his hon. Friend. That gentleman had particular functions to perform in regard to the Chefoo Convention, and he was one of the most prominent members of the Commission. He regretted his inability to announce that that Convention had been already ratified. No doubt difficulties had arisen, but the Government hoped they would be got over in a very short time. The Foreign Office was quite as anxious as his hon. Friend could be that the Chefoo Convention should be carried into effect. He hoped it would be the means of doing a great deal of good.

Mr. O'DONNELL said, the answer of the hon. Gentleman on the subject of the chaplains had been very unsatisfactory. The point of his objection was, that if a chaplain was not wanted in Sweden, for instance, one could not be wanted in Denmark; and that they could very well do without chaplains in Spain, if they were not necessary amid the temptations of Paris and the agitations of Berlin. He intended to move to reduce the Vote for salaries by the aggregate amount of the salaries of the chaplains. It was quite clear that if chaplains were not required in the important centres he had just mentioned, they could not be wanted where they were stationed at present; and if custom were to prevail, it ought to have preserved the Consular chaplaincies which were abolished some years ago. He only moved this reduction as a protest, and he hoped the Government would take into consideration the propriety of not replacing the present incumbents. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had not referred at all to the objection he raised Diplomatic representation in China was distinctly Imperial, and that it ought to be treated on exactly the same footing as the representation in Siam, in Portugal, or anywhere else. He objected to the revenue of India being subject to any charge which did not relate to Indian internal affairs or Indian policy. He observed that some of the third secretaries received £250 a-year each, while others received only £150. The explanation was that those who received the higher salary did so in consequence of their knowledge of public law. He would suggest that a knowledge of public law ought to be incumbent on every person in the position of third secretary in the Diplomatic Service. If third secretaries did not possess any knowledge of public law, he fancied they ought not to be appointed until they had qualified themselves for the post. In conclusion, he moved to reduce the item of £157,610 for salaries by £1,250, being the aggregate amount paid to the few chaplains who were still so exceptionally retained.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item for Salaries be reduced by the sum of £1,250."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD said, he wished to make one observation in reply to a remark of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) as to the reason for chaplains being required in certain cities and not in others. He would draw his attention to the fact that in some places there was more than one English church; but in others there was no English place of worship, except that kept up by the Government chaplain. Without, therefore, the services of the paid chaplains, travellers, as well as persons in residence, would be without a place for public worship.

Mr. PARNELL observed, that that might be a reason for the original appointment of these chaplains, but it was no reason for retaining them. What his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan wished to know was, whether the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs proposed making any alteration in these matters? It seemed that there were four places where it was in Russia; he it at the Embassies.

it was in Russia; he
it be an exceptional difficulty, and that the capacity of Her Majesty's officials was insufficient to enable them to master the Russian language. He should have thought that some of the officials of the Foreign Office might have learned Russian, Spanish, and other languages. Russian was a language which he thought all diplomats ought to know, though it was, no doubt, one that was difficult to acquire.

Question put, and negatived.

(2.) £166,053, to complete the sum for Consular Services.

MR. MUNTZ wished to draw attention to one point. He thought that Vice Consuls were not required in certain towns where there was already a Consul. They were now kept up in some small places; whereas, in others of nearly 100,000 inhabitants, a Consul only was found sufficient. In former times a Vice Consul was wanted because it took from five to eight months, on the death of a Consul, to communicate with this country and appoint a new one; and, in the meantime, the Vice Consul could act. But now, by means of the telegraph and steam vessels, a new Consul could be appointed and despatched almost immediately; and he saw no reason why Vice Consuls, as well as Consuls, should be retained in small places.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, that on that Vote he would take the opportunity of calling the attention of the Committee to a matter which had at his instance come under the notice of the House two years ago. It would, perhaps, be recollected that he had presented a Petition, very numerously signed, from the British residents at Boulogne-sur-Mer, which, on being submitted to the Speaker, could not be received, as mingled with the British signatures were those of many of the principal French inhabitants of the town, who cordially joined in the prayer of the Petition. The document was subsequently referred to a Select Committee for the consideration of precedents, of which Committee his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Spencer Walpole) was chairman, and he himself (Sir Eardley Wilmot) was a Member.

Mr. Sampson Lloyd

The Committee was unanimously of opinion that the Petition could not be entertained; and the subject-matter of it had therefore not undergone discussion until the time at which he spoke. The facts of the case were these. For many years Boulogne had been represented by a Consul; but when the late Mr. Hamilton resigned, and received the honour of knighthood after his long and useful Consular services, the Consulate was abolished, and the office was reduced to a Vice Consulate, with a smaller salary. Unfortunately, at the very time when the Government took this step, Boulogne had been, and was then, making rapid strides in trade and commercial importance, inasmuch that the exports and imports now exceeded those of Bordeaux, and Boulogne had become the third commercial seaport in France, after Havre de Grace and Marseilles. A very large and capacious dock had been lately constructed, called the Quai Napoleon, and this was now filled with trading vessels from every part of the world. Other countries—as, for example, Germany, Italy, Belgium, and Holland—were represented in Boulogne by Consuls, while England thought her dignity sufficiently maintained by a Vice Consul. That official had various duties to perform; in cases of wreck upon the coast he had frequently to travel many miles to the scene of the disaster, and to find money for the sailors, and he was constantly being referred to for the purpose of settling disputes in commercial matters, between his own countrymen and foreigners. In addition to this, the Consul at Boulogne had always been expected to dispense hospitalities occasionally to the municipality of the town; but with the small salary now doled out to the English Vice Consul, it was quite impossible he could do what was done by the Consuls of other nations. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) could not help using what might be considered a strong expression, but which was justified by the circumstances of the case—that the conduct of the Government had been very shabby in the way they had treated this important French town; and he appealed to his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bourke) to reconsider the matter, and remedy what he must say was felt by all the inhabitants of Boulogne to be a great injustice to the British official and a disparagement to their town and nation.

MR. RYLANDS said, it was a most extraordinary doctrine to lay down, that they were to pay salaries out of proportion to the duties performed by Consuls, merely out of consideration for the dignity of France. He hoped that respect for the dignity of France would not be shown in such a manner. With regard to the Consular Service, he thought it was a service in which we did not compare favourably with the service of other mercantile nations, and we had a great many appointments which might be reduced, and many might be abolished entirely; and it would be competent for some mercantile house to take the Vice Consulate where there was little business to be done in the interests of Great Britain. In the case of Boulogne, he believed that the Foreign Office acted upon the suggestion made by the Consular Committee. That Committee recommended the abolition of a great number of Consulates in France and other places, where the position was out of all proportion to the business carried on and the interest this country had in the trade. If the House would look to page 363, they would find that the Vice Consul at Boulogne received £250 a-year, and an allowance of £150 for a house, making £400 a-year, while the total amount of fees received by Government amounted to only £105. When the hon. and learned Member told the House of the great amount of business done at Boulogne, he should have looked at the small amount of fees, for that very fairly represented the amount of business done. It surely did not furnish a reason for Government going back from a change so recently made in the service. He thought they were perfectly well served by a Vice Consul, and if the office became vacant, the Government would have no difficulty in filling it up without any increase of salary.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE observed, that the Committee had certainly recommended the reduction of various Consulates to Vice Consulates. But it was important that in many places, and particularly in the East, able men, with competent salaries, should be appointed to discharge Consular duties. In Philippopolis, for instance, there was only a Vice Consul at £250 a-year, and yet, that was one of the places where it was most desirable that the interests of this country should be well represented. It should not be forgotten that the position of a Consul in the East was one of much more importance than elsewhere. In his opinion, it would be desirable that the first opportunity should be taken by the Government of going through the Consular Service, and seeing if they could not reasonably increase the salaries of the Consuls, so as to get good men and have the work properly performed. In particular, it was necessary that the Foreign Office should see that the Consuls and Vice Consuls in the East were properly paid, and properly represented English interests.

MR. DODSON said, that some years ago there used to be a considerable number of Consuls in different parts of Europe, and in some places in North America, who were kept at inland places. He was glad to see that an alteration had been made, and that the offices had been partially abolished, although they had not entirely disappeared. There were one or two remaining to which he wished to draw the attention of the Government. He was not speaking of inland towns in such countries as Turkey, where, under certain circumstances, it was necessary that British subjects should have the protection of a resident from their own country. He was speaking of civilized countries in Europe and America; and in those places he apprehended that the position of Consul was only required at seaport towns where vessels came. He observed that there were still Consuls at Brussels and at Paris; the Consul at Paris being paid £100 a-year. What necessity there was for a Consul at Paris, where there was an Embassy, he could not see; and he could not think that this gentleman had much to do, because he noted that he also held the appointments of librarian and registrar at the Embassy. At Brussels there was a Vice Consul, who received £100 a-year; but why he was required at Brussels was not apparent. If travellers wished for information, they could apply to the Embassy. What reason there could be for keeping Vice Consuls at some inland places, and not at others, he could not tell.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT, in reply to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), said, his hon. Friend had made a great flourish of trumpets about the taxpayer, and about the small receipts from Boulogne, and had referred him to the Estimates. Well, in looking at the Estimates, he found a similar charge, even on a much larger scale, might be made against French ports which were now represented by a Consul, and where the salary of the official who represented England was very much higher. He (Sir Eardley Wilmot) instanced Brest, Cherbourg, Havre, Bordeaux, and Marseilles (giving the figures), at all of which places the annual receipts were comparatively insignificant, in one even less than the receipts at Boulogne. The fact was, that the receipts were no criterion whatever of the work done, for they represented balances after all the necessary expenses and outlay and money advanced by the Consuls had been deducted. His hon. Friend, therefore, could build no just arguments on the figures he had quoted.

MR. WHITWELL hoped that the salaries of Consuls would not be increased where the work was now efficiently done. So far from places in the East having been neglected, the salaries of the Consuls and Vice Consuls there had already been increased. Although there was only one Vice Consul at Philippopolis there was another at Beyrout, not far off. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) was mistaken in supposing that the Foreign Office had neglected its duties and had not obtained efficient men at the salaries paid. Let them take the cases of the Student Dragomans, for which there was an item in the Vote of £1,900. It was well known that great advantage had been derived from the student interpreters in China; and as the item for the Student Dragomans was in the Vote, the Committee would be glad to hear whether the students now being instructed were English, Armenians, Greeks or others; and also what language, whether Arabic or Turkish, they were learning, and whether it was contemplated to place these dragomans, when thoroughly instructed, in some of the larger places in Asiatic Turkey?

MR. D. JENKINS said, that everybody felt that it was time that the Consular establishments in Turkey in Europe should be inquired into. It was monstrous to see the number of officials kept up there; and it was not wonderful that mischief should be done when so many people were employed. £700 a-year was paid to the physician of the Embassy, and in addition to that there was the hospital establishment. It was worth while to consider whether the superintendent of the hospital could not be utilized for the purpose of attending the Embassy, and thus save £400 or £500 a-year to the country. He also wished to call attention to the Consul at Réunion. He knew that he was originally appointed to look after the coolies; but as his services were no longer required for that purpose, he should like to know whether the Government would continue the office?

MR. BOURKE said, with regard to the observations that had been made as to the Student Dragomans, the late Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Derby) had announced his intention to institute such a class of interpreters. An examination had been held for the appointments, and certain gentlemen had been chosen, some of whom had already gone to Constantinople. The other dragomans, to whom reference had been made, were mentioned in a former Vote, and stood on quite a different footing to the new ones. With respect to the office of resident physician at Constantinople, he might inform the Committee that the post had already been abolished, and would not appear in the Estimates for the ensuing year. With regard to the general observations that had been offered on the Vote, he might say that the Government would make all the reductions they possibly could in the Consular Service. There was no reason for laying down general rules as to the appointment of Consuls or Vice Consuls at particular places; but the Government would deal with each case on its peculiar circumstances. With regard to the observation of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) as to the Consul and Vice Consul in South America, no doubt these Consuls cost money; at the same time he could not hold out any hope of reducing this cost, because while the commercial classes of this country derived great advantage from the Consular Services in South America, and so long as they did not object, it would be necessary to maintain these posts.

Sir Eardley Wilmot

MR. WHITWELL asked whether the Student Dragomans were Englishmen or natives?

MR. BOURKE imagined that they were Englishmen. He had not received any information to the contrary.

MR. O'DONNELL would ask the attention of the Committee to the item for Borneo. The Consul at Borneo received a salary of £300 a-year, and £250 for a house. He was also Governor of Labuan. On looking to the amount of fees received on behalf of the Government in 1876-7, he found that the Consul in that place received no fees whatever. Therefore, he received £300 a-year salary and £250 for a probably non-existent house, and he got a further salary as Governor of Labuan, where he probably had a house also. If he was not mistaken, the Consul at New Caledonia got £700 a-year, and if the Government could give some information about the duties of that gentleman, and those of the Consul at Borneo, he should feel obliged. With regard to the Consul at Réunion, who had £1,000 a-year salary and office expenses, he had received recently an account written by a French traveller, who gave a deplorable account of the condition of the native subjects in that place. He should feel obliged if he could be directed to the recent Report of the Consul at Réunion on the coolie emigration in that settlement. He would also particularly ask to know something about the Consul Generalship at Borneo. He believed there was an intention to extend operations in that direction, because considerable portions of Borneo had been granted by the legislative rulers to a British trading company. He did not know whether that trading company was likely to lapse into secession to the Crown.

MR. BOURKE said, that the Company referred to had no official connection with the Government, and the Government had no official information as to what the Company was. With regard to the Consul General, he had the same duties as were performed by Consuls in other parts of the world. He had to look after persons who came to trade in Borneo, of whom there was a considerable number. It was desirable that the Governor of Labuan should also be Consul of Borneo in order to save expense. With regard to New Caledonia, the Government did receive valuable Reports from that place on various subjects connected with the Island. The Consul of New Caledonia was appointed a few years ago when the cession of Fiji was made. He was glad the hon. Member had called attention to the subject, and he could assure him that if they had any opportunity of cancelling an appointment that should be done.

Vote agreed to.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that on that Vote he desired to raise a question of an important character having especial reference to the salaries of the Commissioners in South Africa. The Governor had £2,000 a-year as salary from the Colonial authorities, and had £1,500 derived from pension under the Crown. It seemed to him that the Government ought to have brought that question forward in a substantial form that would have enabled them to review the proceedings in South Africa for some time past; and he thought the Members of that House had a legitimate grievance against the Government for bringing on this Vote somewhat out of the way and without Notice. Had the Vote been brought on in regular order, instead of being taken as a Vote in Class III., after Votes in Classes I. and IV., the Committee would have been able to discuss the matter and might have been able to clear up some of the causes of the revolt, and information might have been given that would be interesting to the Committee on the affairs of South Africa, the crisis through which that country was passing, and whether our Governors had employed the best means for diminishing the area of the disturbance. Before they came to that, he would ask two general questions with regard to the grant in aid of the local revenue of the Falkland Islands? He would also ask what was the nature of the grant of £1,400 for clergy in Canada, and Nova Scotia, and North America? Canada and Nova Scotia were self-governed, and arrangements were made for the payment of their clergy. Why, then, should that House be asked to contribute to Missionary Societies, and to societies for the propagation of the Gospel? Certainly, it appeared to him that this was a matter that required explanation. With regard to the Falkland Islands, he found the grant in aid of local revenue amounted to £2,974. If he was not mistaken, the whole population of the Falkland Islands was only about 800 or 900, and he wanted to know why they required this grant in aid of local revenue?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that with regard to the Vote for the clergy in North America, these were life pensions to persons who had been in the service of the Government, he believed, as old Army chaplains for duties done years ago. The Vote was gradually, year by year, becoming less and less. In 1876 the Vote amounted to £1,976. The hon. Member would see that a considerably lower sum was asked in the present year. Parliament had made these grants for good reason; but, in due time, they would cease altogether. The Vote for the Falkland Islands was, no doubt, considerable; but, if they looked at the character of the Falkland Islands, it would be seen that it was important to this country to maintain them as naval harbours between Australia, America, and England. Therefore, as the population was small, and the revenue could not be large, it was necessary to supplement the local revenue by a further sum. It was thought probable that in future years the grant would be considerably diminished. Sheep-farming was extending in the Island; the duties on tobacco and spirits had been raised; and it was quite expected that the House would be asked for a smaller Vote next year.

MR. O'DONNELL hoped that on the item relating to South Africa the Government would not object to discussion. If he had had 1 Vote, he should probably have moved on a Resolution on the subject. If the Speaker do leave the Chair on the present occasion, he would come into the matter with any fulness that he should have under other circumstances. Still, he would state some of his reasons for moving this item. In the first appeared that the Chief Governor of South Africa and of Griqualand West, was exceedingly well remunerated with nearly £6,000 per annum from the Colonial Revenues, in addition to a personal allowance of £1,500 a-year as a distinguished pensioner of the Indian Government. That would be £7,500; and he did not see why there should be a grant of £2,000 given to him when the Colonists had already provided a magnificent grant for their Governor-in-Chief. Besides that, he had to object to the manner, as far as he had been able to observe, in which Her Majesty's High Commissioner for South Africa had discharged the functions for which it was proposed to remunerate him. He believed he was not exaggerating the case when he said that Sir Bartle Frere hardly adopted a policy suitable for South Africa. He was practically sent to South Africa to carry out the Federation scheme of Her Majesty's Government, and to press that by all legitimate means upon the Colony and the Colonial body of the Legislature, and he thought it would not be denied that when this small revolution broke out in Griqualand, the course Sir Bartle Frere distinctly took to promote the area of the disturbances which they had to deplore at the present moment was injudicious. When the revolt broke out in Griqualand, Sir Bartle Frere issued an Ordinance for general confiscation in the hope of entirely suppressing the revolt. One consequence in Griqualand was, that the refugees from the confiscated land flowed over the border into lands communicating with their own. Sir Bartle Frere seemed to have taken no means to restrict the military commanders in the measures they took to carry out this policy of confiscation. It would be admitted that one of the main weapons used by Sir Bartle Frere against the insurgent tribes consisted of the absolute

all the barbarities that savage tribes were wont to use towards their hereditary enemies, so that the non-combatant element of the Kaffir population suffered even more than the combatant Kaffirs. There might be a certain amount of justification for this course of conduct if it had been crowned with success. They found that Sir Bartle Frere pursued in the burning down of these Kaffir villages a course similar to that pursued in Ireland in the 16th century under Elizabeth, and later in the 17th century by Cromwell. Sir Bartle Frere made the country a waste. The necessary results of these operations was the death from starvation of a large portion of the Native women and children. The camps were often crowded by poor refugee women, whose stock had been driven off by the Forces carrying out the policy of Sir Bartle Frere. He would refer to the policy of Sir Bartle Frere in carrying off the stock and cattle immediately; but he must repeat that to such an extent were the camps of the Colonial Forces crowded by starving women and children that an order was issued expelling these poor starving people from the British camp. That spoke volumes for the result of the operations carried out by Sir Bartle Frere. With regard to stock lifting or cattle lifting, in every page almost of the Blue Book they found an account of a brush with the Kaffirs—so many Kaffirs killed, so many hundred of cattle carried off, so many sheep, a whole country cleared of cattle, and villages burned down in various places. In all this there was proof of the unchecked ardour of the troops, not so much the Regular troops, as of the unchecked ardour of our auxiliaries, which was such that the seizures of cattle were so great that the lands over the frontier were black with them. There was one case in particular which struck him. An attack was made on Kaffirs who were passing through the frontier to friendly territory. The frontier was black with against the Kaffirs. It might readily be assumed that all the black men were enemies, and in thus following them up, the tribes were punished that gave them refuge. In that way those tribes were driven in immense numbers to the other tribes to take part in the revolt against us. At the present moment it was not merely a revolt. Who could say to what extent it might reach? Such was the unquestionable and unquestioned authority exercised by the chiefs, that the defection of a chief necessarily involved the defection of his tribesmen. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, ought to have proceeded with the greatest care and consideration in making war upon men who went to war against us with a blind belief and loyalty which to them was a religion. The policy of Sir Bartle Frere had not been of that character; but he was sorry to say there had been too little discrimination of that kind exhibited. At a trial not long ago at King Williamstown, out of some 60 prisoners of war—rebels, if they pleased; but, after all, the tie of loyalty which could bind these men to our rule ought not to be scrutinized too exactly, and he, therefore, thought he was justified in speaking of what were called "the rebel prisoners" as to all intents and purposes prisoners of war—he found that out of some 50 or 60 of these prisoners brought up at King Williamstown, more than 40 of them were sentenced to periods of penal servitude ranging as high as eight years, and going down to two and three years, and that very few indeed were released. He was of opinion that it was unfair to apply to these persons the laws of sedition and treason, and that it was unpolitic to treat the Kaffir prisoners of war captured in the battle-field as persons liable to be tried, and tried with all the formalities of the Penal Code, and sentenced to penal servitude for merely obeying the commands of their chiefs—commands which were all the more welcome to them because their

our rule and their
 with the tribes already in on fomented by the sweep-of confiscation and con-lopted by Sir Bartle Frere.
 g Sir Bartle Frere he had r a moment to raise the ntion as to the personal that gentleman; but many men of high personal humanity became, through circumstances, types of the greatest tyrants the world had ever witnessed. There was another question to which he desired to call the attention of the Committee, and he approached it not only with reluctance, but with a certain amount of disbelief. He had not observed, in any despatch, that the Kaffir prisoners of war, or the Kaffir wounded, left on the field, were receiving any attention whatever. Again, if they were to impress the Native tribes—untutored barbarians—with respect not only for our power but our civilization, he thought they would do that better by treating them according to the dictates of our higher civilization, rather than by descending to their level, and meting out to them the savage rules of savage warfare. With regard to even untried prisoners of war, he was afraid that the policy of the Government in South Africa had not been such as to diminish the feeling of intense animosity which had already spread so widely among the Native populations against our rule. He assured the Committee that he was compressing his observations within the smallest possible compass, even at the risk of doing considerable injury to his cause by omitting essential facts; but he was afraid there was so much impatience at the discussion of questions of this character, that he felt bound to have a certain regard to that feeling. With regard to the question of punishment of prisoners of war under the sedition and treason-felony laws, he found from The Cape Argus of the 4th April that at King Williamstown five prisoners were sentenced to eight years' hard labour, 40 prisoners were sentenced to seven years' hard labour, one to six years, five to five years, one to three years; so that there were some 50 prisoners captured in the battle-field and tried as rebels by such a refinement of legal process as sentenced Nuncomar long ago to death on the gibbet when it was found inconvenient to apply the strict letter of the English law in order to get rid of an opponent to the Governor General of India. He thought the precedent of the execution of Nuncomar by the strict British law ought not to be repeated at this date, in the 19th century, and that Kaffir prisoners of war ought not to be tried as mere rebels, and ought not to be punished by penal servitude.

Mr. O'Donnell

With regard to the treatment of these prisoners of war, he found there was a perfectly unanimous expression of horror among the leading and rival journals in South Africa. The Cape Argus spoke of the untried prisoners of war in the following terms:—

“The story of the Black Hole in Calcutta is being repeated in King Williamstown in the Cape Colony. We had heard of these horrors before, but could not believe things were so bad as they are represented in a telegram published in Tuesday's Standard and Mail. It appears that 262 persons are confined in an iron building 102 feet long by 12 wide. The height is not given, and therefore we cannot get at the cubic space allowed to each prisoner, but the square measurement is only about 4½ feet for each person. It is impossible for these creatures to lie down, and, to add to their misery, they are half starved. Thus, with foul air, insufficient food, and limited space, they are subjected to tortures equal to those of the Inquisition. A number of the prisoners are mere boys, from 11 to 18 years old, and one is a little fellow only six. Yet this is a Christian country, and there are a number of clergymen in King Williamstown. Be it remembered also that the persons tortured in this brutal fashion are awaiting trial—but they are only niggers.”

Then the editor of The Cape Mercury, having his attention attracted to the matter by the horrible reports which had gone forth, actually visited the prisons, and he says—

“He found 262 adult Kaffirs cooped up and crammed together within the walls of three little iron sheds. Each of these sheds he found to be 34 feet long, 12 feet broad, and about 10 feet in height. In each of these low and narrow sheds about 90 men were huddled together. They were never allowed to go out for a single moment on any occasion whatever, or at any time, by night or day. For the 700 cubic feet of air which are necessary for the healthy condition of a human being, each of these wretched prisoners, in a climate of sweltering heat, had but 46 cubic feet—15 men had to live on one man's proper allowance of air. The gaolers asserted that each prisoner got a pound of porridge twice a-day; but the visitors ascertained that on the previous day, a Sunday, only one meal had been given, and while they were actually on the spot, about 2 P.M. on Monday—the prisoners not having broken their fast for 24 hours—two dishes or tubs of porridge, containing some 40 lbs.—that is, less than half a pound for each of the famished creatures—were laid on the floor of the shed, and the gaolers who brought them in immediately disappeared and locked the door. The agonized prisoners, knowing well they would get no more food until next day, begged the gaolers to apportion their scanty supply amongst them, but their piteous appeal was heard with silent scorn, and the consequence must have been either that the stronger prisoners robbed the weaker ones of their food, or that the porridge was measured out in full shares as far as it went, and that most of the starving crowd had not a mouthful given them to allay the gnawing pangs of ravenous hunger. As with food, so it was with water; a couple of buckets were handed in, and those who were able helped themselves, leaving those who were not to feel the horrors of parching thirst as well as of suffocation and of famine."

These were statements made by the most respectable authorities—men interested in suppressing the Kaffir outbreak; men of property and capital, men who had a stake in the country; but who, nevertheless, felt that that severity and heartlessness were not the best means of recommending the British rule to untutored barbarians. Evidence of that kind deserved, he thought, the very serious attention of the Government. The right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had before now rebuked him, with what the right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, considered a just severity, for bringing these questions before the House; but he (Mr. O'Donnell) thought that much more harm would be done to the Government, to the fame of the right hon. Baronet's administration of the Colonies, and to the future of our rule in South Africa, if there were to be a strict silence observed with regard to matters of this kind, than even if an Irish Member occupied a short space of time in Committee by bringing such cases under the notice of Her Majesty's Government. It was quite clear that if they summed up now the acknowledged points in Sir Bartle Frere's policy—of course, he must be made responsible for that which was done under his authority while in possession of his present trust—if they summed up those acknowledged points, they came to a total of severity applied to the tribes in South Africa which could not have been materially exceeded by the most severe measures of repression used recently in the East of Europe. They had confiscated the tribe lands and burnt down the Native villages wholesale. They had seen helpless women and children driven in flocks into the British camps for want of food; and although British humanity, in the first instance, relieved them, still the necessities of warfare compelled them to drive those women and children out into the devastated open. They had not only suspected, but convicted every tribe through which the refugee Galekas forced their way and confiscated their cattle. One after another they had driven the Native tribes into insurrection. They had brought up prisoners of war to be tried before English Courts who never knew anything of English process and knew nothing of the English language—men who had been accustomed to revere the ordinances of their Chiefs as something semi-divine. They had sentenced them to terms of penal servitude of six or eight years—terms as severe as could be meted out to ungrateful Irishmen, insensible to the charms of the form of administration adopted by Her Majesty's Government in Ireland. They had seen the Native prisoners before trial cooped up without food, air, or water, without the slightest regard for the most ordinary decencies of life; and he asked whether the occurrence of such things, or the reports of the happening of such things spreading abroad through tribe after tribe of the Native population, were not calculated not only singularly to diminish the credit of British Christianity, but singularly also to diminish the confidence of the Native tribes in the justice and humanity and the civilization of our rule? He could not but feel that Sir Bartle Frere was the official who was directly responsible for the doing of these things. He did not like to use the word "atrocities," or to say anything unnecessarily severe; but he laid the facts before the Committee as they were; and he ventured to think that the Committee might very easily employ its time much worse than by placing on record some expression of opinion against our policy in South Africa, which had not only been so severe, but whose severity had been so inefficacious. In conclusion, he moved to omit from the item under the head of South Africa, the sum of £2,000, payable to Her Majesty's High Commissioner in South Africa.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to point out to the hon. Member that a certain portion of the Vote had been already taken on account. It would be better, therefore, to propose to reduce the Vote by a certain sum.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would propose then to reduce the Vote by the sum of £1,200 or £1,300.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £2,000, for the Salary of Her Majesty's High Commissioner for South Africa, be reduced by the sum of £1,200."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: There is no item in the whole of this Vote in regard to which I less expected a reduction to be moved than this item of £2,000 for the salary of Sir Bartle Frere. The total amount of his salary may appear to be considerable, considering the payments made by the Cape Colony towards it; but I venture to say that no money is better spent; for during the past year, among all our Governors of Colonies not one has been placed in so difficult a position, and has performed the duties of his position with greater ability and greater humanity, than Sir Bartle Frere. The hon. Member for Dungarvan has alluded to a previous occasion when he brought this subject under the notice of the House. I am bound to say that I had not the least expectation that he would take the opportunity of a Vote of this kind to enter into a discussion of the whole policy of Sir Bartle Frere in reference to the Cape. I do not propose to follow him now into the discussion of that policy. But he took exception to the view I expressed—that it is not fair or right that such statements as he then made should be made, without proof of the accuracy of the charges preferred. The hon. Member has made charges again to-night without, as far as I know, any shadow of truth. He has spoken of the absolute destruction of every habitation in the Native country in which the war has been waged. No doubt, habitations have been destroyed in the course of these operations. Native habitations and other habitations must necessarily be destroyed in war; but that there has been anything like the indiscriminate destruction of which he spoke I absolutely deny. He spoke further of ill-treatment of Native women and children; but he did not bring any proof whatever of his assertions. No doubt, Native women may have suffered from hunger. But what have they done? They have come continually to the camps of the European or Colonial or Native Forces, and they have received provisions at their hands. I do not believe that any war was ever waged in which the women and children of an enemy were treated with greater humanity than they have been treated with on this occasion by all engaged in the war. In fact, the women of the rebellious Natives crowded into our camps to such an extent that, as the hon. Member said, it was found by General Sir Arthur Cunningham absolutely necessary to prohibit their admission. It was found that the women were sent in by the men of the tribes in order to act as spies on the movement of our troops; or, in some cases, to convey to the men in arms against our Forces the provisions given to them for their own relief. Under these circumstances it is hardly to be wondered at that, in his own defence, the General commanding our Forces deemed it necessary to put a stop to such proceedings. But I may add that when I noticed, now some weeks ago, a paragraph in a London newspaper referring to the issue of this order, I wrote to Sir Bartle Frere to request information on the subject, and to ask if he could state to me under what circumstances that order had been issued. I have received from him a despatch in reply, stating fully the circumstances which I have just briefly recapitulated to the Committee, which will shortly be laid on the Table of the House. The hon. Member has read at great length paragraphs from Cape newspapers with reference to the treatment of prisoners of war. I had no Notice that it was his intention to make these statements. Had I known it, I would have referred to Sir Bartle Frere's despatches to see if any mention was made of the statements in these paragraphs. But I cannot have any doubt whatever that as these statements were made in the Colony, Sir Bartle Frere made it his first business to inquire into them, and that he either found them inaccurate, or if accurate that he has taken measures to prevent their recurrence. The hon. Member objects to the trial of the prisoners of war with all the formalities of English law. Would he desire that they should be tried by a drum-head court martial? If there is one thing in regard to which Sir Bartle Frere has taken more pains than another during the course of the war, it is to insure that prisoners taken in arms should have a fair and legal trial. It certainly does not appear to me to be a very severe punishment for prisoners taken in arms against the Government of the country to be sentenced to various terms of imprisonment in proportion of that offence. I do not think there is any other point on which the hon. Member alluded to in his reply from me, except that complaint that large herds of cattle have been captured by our Forces in the war. Almost as soon as I assumed my present Office I took the opportunity, when writing to Sir Bartle Frere, to call his particular attention to this point which I had no doubt had not escaped him; and to impress upon him, what I am sure he will take every pains to secure—namely, that no operation should be undertaken merely for the capture of cattle, but that cattle should only be captured when, as often happens in the Native wars, it is necessary to do so in order to secure the only wealth of the Native tribes, and thus really in the cause of humanity to put as soon as possible an end to the war. I think I have now dealt with all the points to which the hon. Member has called attention. I will not, therefore, weary the Committee by further dilating on the subject; but I shall be prepared to discuss it at a future time whenever it may be raised.

Mr. PARNELL hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give some opportunity for discussing the subject. It would be recollected that when he (Mr. Parnell) asked a Question early in the Session, with reference to the war now going on in South Africa, and requested that the Government would afford an opportunity for the discussion of the subject, the right hon. Gentleman said he did not intend to afford any special opportunity, but that such opportunity would be afforded when the Vote came on for consideration. Now it appeared to him, whether another opportunity was to be afforded or not, that this was really the only time when a discussion could be raised in a practical way. The only legitimate occasion for a discussion on the question of policy of the Administration of the Government in relation to South Africa, and more especially in regard to the acts of the Governor who was charged with carrying out that policy, was upon the Vote for the expenses incurred in connection with South Africa. Upon what occasion, he asked, could they more properly do so? He had always heard it said that it was one of the most valuable privileges of the English Constitution, that an opportunity should be afforded when money not a proper time for raising the discussion. He differed entirely from the view of the right hon. Gentleman, and thought there could not be a more favourable opportunity. He did not think the horrible matters which had been referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan should be passed over in silence; but he was of opinion that the shameful deeds now being done in the name of English power and English authority in South Africa, should receive the direct condemnation of the House of Commons. He thought great credit was due to his hon. Friend for not having entered into the arrangement which the right hon. Gentleman desired him to make. And if no one but the Irish Members ventured to raise this question, some little good would be done by telling Her Majesty's Government how they regarded the course which was being pursued in South Africa. His hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan had described, in all its horrors, the way in which that war was being carried on; and all he (Mr. Parnell) could say was that the general policy of the Government in South Africa seemed to have been carried out by our agents in an atrocious and savage manner. What was the policy of the Government with regard to the Colonists? It gave them extensive military power, and so incited them to assume an overbearing attitude to the tribes with whom they were brought into contact. ["Order, order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member that the observations of the hon. Member for Dungarvan were pertinent to the matter under discussion, in so far as they called in question the conduct of the present Governor; but the hon. Member would not be in Order in entering into a general review of the policy of the Home Government.

Mr. PARNELL said, he had assumed that the Governor of South Africa was carrying out the policy of the Home Government, and he failed to see how he could criticize the acts of that Governor if he did not describe the policy he was carrying out. He would not further enter however upon the point, though he was within his manner in which carrying out the directions of the Home Government, assuming, as he did, that those directions had been given. He had no wish to do anything more than that. The cause of this war was a very simple one. The lands of these tribes of Kaffirs were confiscated and given to the Fingoes, a less warlike tribe, who were unable to keep what they had so obtained. If that had been all, so much mischief would not have been done. But the Kaffirs were driven back into territories in which they found it almost impossible to subsist, they attacked the Fingoes, the Colonists came to the aid of the Fingoes, and Her Majesty's Government sent out troops to the assistance of the Colonists, and so the matter went on until England had on hand this little war, which had now become a large one, and would have, no one could tell, what end. He submitted that this was a most pernicious policy, and that the Governors of the Cape Colony, and especially Sir Bartle Frere, would do far better if they encouraged a policy of conciliation in dealings between the Colonists and the Kaffirs, and tried to smooth over difficulties instead of pressing these Natives unjustly and confiscating their land. If such a policy were followed, they would very soon have a far different feeling shown at Cape Colony to that which now prevailed there. He did not wish to go into that point at any length, because it involved the general policy of the Home Government in dealing with the Colonists; but he did think it was a great mistake that people who were not able to defend themselves, like these Colonists, should be so much encouraged by the Home Government in their measures against their Kaffir neighbours. His hon. Friend (Mr. O'Donnell) did not grumble because some of the Natives were tried by ordinary Courts and not by drum-head court martial. At the same time, to judge by the precedents of the last Kaffir war, they would have got off much better if they had been so tried. In 1850 or 1852, instead of trying the Hottentots by the ordinary laws of the land for sedition, and sentencing, on conviction, to long periods of penal servitude, they were then tried by drum-head court martial, and sentenced to the nominal punishment of one year with hard labour. Consequently, judging by precedent, if the Kaffirs had been tried by drum-head court martial, they would have come off a great deal better than they had done when submitted to the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts. But the point which he especially rose to urge was, that it was an anomaly to try men by laws which they did not understand, and which really could have no application to the merits of the case. The Kaffirs were tried for sedition, which they all knew very well was an offence by one inhabitant of a country against the other inhabitants of it. Now, could the Kaffirs be called inhabitants of the Cape Colony in the sense in which the word was ordinarily used. It was an absurdity to try Kaffirs by laws and Courts meant for a very much higher state of civilization. It must be manifest that the conduct of the authorities, if not unjustifiable, was certainly absurd. As to the statement of the right hon. Baronet, that the Native women were sent into the English camp by thousands to act as spies—[Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I did not say so.] He (Mr. Parnell) understood the right hon. Baronet to say they were sent in by thousands. He afterwards said they acted as spies, and as no limitation was placed on the number, he concluded the right hon. Baronet to mean that they were all sent in as spies. But if, on the contrary, only a few acted as spies, was that any justification for turning these thousands of women and children into the wilderness to starve, who, by the right hon. Baronet's own statement, had come into the camp because they had been deprived by the British Forces of all means of subsistence. Their cattle were their only wealth, and when these were driven off by the British Forces, they were forced to go by thousands to the English camp. Yet, in face of the knowledge that in the wilderness they had no means of subsistence, they were driven out there to starve. His hon. Friend (Mr. O'Donnell) had very truly likened the proceedings of the English Forces in Cape Colony to the proceedings of the English Forces in Ireland in the time of Elizabeth. Then, it was also the policy of the Government to deprive the people of their means of subsistence, and they died of starvation by millions. There, in Cape Colony, the same principle was carried out. The country was deliberately devastated, the means of subsistence was deliberately removed, and when the women and children came starving into the camp, they were deliberately, and as a matter of policy, turned out again to die.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the right hon. Baronet had declared that his statements were not confirmed. In reply to his challenge he would show they were. He spoke of the remarkable tendency shown by the Forces to confound the property of the revolutionary and non-revolutionary Forces. On the 9th of November, 1877, Captain Elliot wrote that the hills and valleys were black with cattle, and that it would be idle to suppose that they all belonged to the peaceful Natives. The captured stock, he observed also, was divided on very unfair principles among the auxiliary forces. Again, as to the perils that non-combatants ran, he found Robert T. Rorke, of the Native Contingent, reporting on November 13, 1877, that on his way a number of Native women rushed out from among the bushes and fled. "Luckily I had my Fingoes sufficiently well in hand to prevent any firing." He opened the pages at random, but this gave an indication of the utterly destitute condition of these women huddling under bushes, liable to be startled and shot at by our Native auxiliaries. It was quite clear that such measures must be the reverse of consolatory to the Kaffirs. He would only quote one more instance of the sort of war that this had been. Charles B. Griffith, commanding the Colonial Forces, who had since received the Cross of St. Michael and St. George from the hands of Sir Bartle Frere, wrote, on November 29, 1877, that a tribe had been sufficiently punished; for they had been driven from their country, had lost 700 men, and had lost besides upwards of 13,000 head of cattle, besides horses, sheep, and goats, of which very large numbers fell into his hands. He noticed this because it was evident that a policy of extreme severity had been introduced into Africa, and had not succeeded in stamping out the insurrection; but, on the contrary, had extended its area. This same Commander Griffith in the same letter spoke of burning Native villages and huts as signals to the Forces moving in co-operation with him, and of their burning villages also in response. If he had time he could give the right hon. Baronet abundant evidence that he did not exaggerate one word when he said that the villages were burnt down, so that they might no longer give cover to the population, who consisted, in the majority of cases, of women and children, the men having taken refuge in the bush. He maintained that this was a terrible war, and that it would have been far better to have tried a little kindness. As to the punishment of prisoners of war, he made no objection to the men being tried by ordinary legal process; but he did object to the savage penalties for ordinary sedition being enforced against Kaffir prisoners knowing little of our authority, and owing little to our rule. Fifty or 100 years hence, that might be done; but at present these Kaffirs were independent tribes, and every maxim of policy, as well as of humanity, should suggest some other treatment than trying them as ordinary culprits, and sending them to penal servitude for six or eight years. The English policy was severe, and it had been a failure, and no reference to the humane disposition and the private character of Sir Bartle Frere would be any justification for letting the Vote pass without a protest. He had no doubt he was an admirably disposed man, but he was responsible for his subordinates; and as he (Mr. O'Donnell) could not get at his subordinates, he must direct his speech against his policy.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he did not desire to enter upon the very large and broad question of the policy of the Government in South Africa at the present time; but he did rise to say a word or two in defence of one of the most estimable and praiseworthy public servants this country possessed, who was not there to speak on behalf of himself, and against whom charges had been brought without any such intimation having been given as would have enabled the Government to vindicate his policy and the conduct he was pursuing. He had had the honour of the personal acquaintance of Sir Bartle Frere for very many years; he had watched his career in many distinguished positions with satisfaction, from the time when he was serving as an officer under the Indian Government until he received his present appointment as Governor of a Colony; and in the name of those who sat on his own side of the House, and in order that it might not be supposed that they sympathized with these charges, he protested against the manner in which these attacks, to which no proper answer could be given, had been made. If it were intended that his conduct should be impugned, he maintained that the more honourable course of proceeding would have been to have given Notice, and then he had no doubt Her Majesty's Government could have met these charges seriatim, and explained them one after another. If there were one man more than another among our public servants distinguished for peculiar and characteristic humanity, for especial talent in dealing with and conciliating these Native races, and for the peculiar consideration always evinced for those who came under his rule, it was Sir Bartle Frere. There was, indeed, no man against whom charges of this kind could be brought with less justification. Only a few years ago, it would be in the recollection of the Committee, that Sir Bartle Frere was employed in carrying through one of the greatest and most successful works of humanity ever attempted—that of putting an end to the slave trade of Zanzibar. He entered upon that work with all his heart, for the work suited his character, and he was successful. He had had some experience of Colonial wars—perhaps more than the two hon. Members who had just spoken. In New Zealand he had served under circumstances somewhat similar to those now existing at the Cape, and he knew then that there was not a single point as to the conduct of that war which could not have been explained and justified in the fullest detail on investigation. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would be able to give even a more elaborate defence than had now been given to a public servant, who had been assailed at a time when there were no opportunities for vindicating his character.

MR. O'DONNELL said, if the hon. and gallant Member had been present during the whole of the debate, he would have heard his explanation. He could not give Notice of his objection, because the Votes were taken in such an erratic way that they did not know 24 hours beforehand which particular Votes were coming on. As to the general character of the policy of the Government, he objected to that a long while ago. Lastly, he might remind the hon. and gallant Member that his defence of the personal character of Sir Bartle Frere was entirely beside the question. He was the chief; he was responsible for his subordinates—for such men as Griffith and Allen, and all the others engaged—and it was absurd trifling to bring up a question of his private character. It was absurd to try and cover these cruelties behind the excellent and humane character of Sir Bartle Frere. He admitted that he was all his most intimate friends declared him to be, and yet that did not free him from responsibility for the acts of his subordinates. Indeed, he carefully guarded himself against making a personal attack on Sir Bartle Frere, and would speak as highly of his private character as any hon. Gentleman or right hon. Gentleman. But here they had a great responsible official; a war against Natives conducted with a severity unsurpassed in any other country; in spite of that severity, the war was increasing; and, even though an insignificant Irish Member, he contended he was entitled to call attention to the facts of the case.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £2,129, to complete the sum for the Orange River Territory and St. Helena (Non-Effective Charges).

(5.) £1,220, to complete the sum for the Suez Canal (British Directors).

(6.) £5,742, to complete the sum for the Suppression of the Slave Trade.

MR. O'DONNELL asked, why a moiety of this should be charged on the Indian Revenue, when it was an extra-Indian expense?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, before 1871 it was all charged to India; but in that year the then Secretary of State for India (the Duke of Argyll) examined into the matter, and the result was that since that time one-half had been paid by the Imperial Government.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £10,547, to complete the sum for the Tonnage Bounties, &c., and Liberated African Department.

CLASS VI.—SUPERANNUATION AND RETIRED ALLOWANCES, AND GRATUITIES FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER PURPOSES.

(8.) £221,961, to complete the sum for Superannuations and Retired Allowances.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, it was not his intention to say anything with regard to the old classes of superannuation allowances; but, with regard to the new ones, there were two or three questions he should like to put. He found that, on page 447 of the Votes, there was an item in favour of the Rev. E. P. Arnold, and he wished to ask whether the person to whom that was payable was not dead; and, if so, whether he had not died before the beginning of the financial year, in which case the Vote ought not to be granted? Then, again, on page 478, there was a charge for Mr. W. Doria, Secretary to the Embassy at St. Petersburg, and the amount of the retiring allowance bore, in his (Sir Charles W. Dilke's) opinion, an undue proportion to the amount of salary. Mr. Doria, it seemed, had only had 12 years' service; he had been in receipt of a salary of £1,050; and his retiring allowance was £700 a-year. This, in the absence of explanation, also seemed an unduly large sum. The Committee ought to require some explanation of the very large amount of these pensions in proportion to the salaries. Then, on page 480, there was an item for Mr. L. Moore, who, after 15 years' service as second Secretary at Constantinople, retired at the age of 44 with a pension of £500 a-year, which was the full amount of his salary. This, likewise, was a matter that required explanation.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON regretted that he was not able to give an immediate answer to his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea on the two points he had just brought forward with regard to the new service, as the Under Secretary of State was not in the House. With regard to Mr. E. P. Arnold, he was informed that that gentleman was dead; and, of course, the amount would only be paid proportionately up to the date of his death, any surplus going back to the Exchequer.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE wished to know, whether Mr. Arnold had not died before the beginning of the financial year?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he believed the death did not occur before the preparation of the Estimates.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked, whether the information he had inquired for as to Mr. Doria and Mr. Moore would be furnished on the Report of Supply?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON promised to furnish the information on the Report.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had some remarks to make on the same Vote, and he trusted they would not lose weight in consequence of the advocate who made them. He wished to refer to the case of Mr. J. H. Richardson, Librarian at Queen's College, who, at the age of 46, had been compelled to retire, after 20 years' service, on an allowance of only £50 a-year, his salary as Librarian having been £150 a-year. Mr. Richardson's health had broken down, and he had become almost completely blind. However much the students and graduates of Queen's College might differ from him on other points, they would, he was sure, agree with him in this—that it was the unanimous feeling in the College, and among all who had anything to do with Mr. Richardson in his capacity of Librarian, that it was not right that that unfortunate gentleman, who was in a wretched state of health and afflicted with almost total blindness, should be sent away from his recent sphere of duty with the inadequate provision of £50 a-year. He believed it would not be in Order to suggest any increase in the Estimates; but he hoped it would be possible for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when he had looked into the case, and found that a scholarly gentleman and assiduous public servant, who had always borne the most admirable character, and whose sedentary employment and close confinement had gone a long way towards ruining his sight, was being so greatly overlooked, to take the matter into consideration and apply a remedy. If this were done, it would gratify many persons in Ireland of the most opposite shades of political opinion, and who had no further sympathy with Mr. Richardson, except as to the admirable way in which he had performed his duties, and in regard, also, to the wretched state in which he had been placed.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, his attention should be given to the matter brought forward by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell). No one could sympathize more than he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) with the misfortunes of those who by some infirmity of body were stopped in the middle of a useful career. All he could at present say was, that he believed the case referred to bore the proportion according to which such superannuations or pensions were regulated; but, at the same time, he was aware that in many of these cases there were circumstances which might warrant further consideration. He would certainly look into the case. He regretted that the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) who had brought forward the cases of Mr. Moore and Mr. Doria, was not present, as he had since ascertained that both those gentlemen were, under the Act of Parliament by which their retiring allowances were regulated, entitled to what was designated a fourth-class pension, which carried with it £700 a-year; the only limitation being that the £700 a-year was not to be in excess of the actual salary received by the person retiring. Mr. Doria retired on a pension of £700 a-year, his salary having been £1,050; but Mr. Moore, who had retired through illness, and who had been in receipt of £500 a-year, had his pension limited to the salary he had received; otherwise, he might have had the same pension as Mr. Doria.

(9.) £15,650, to complete the sum for the Merchant Seamen's Fund, Pensions, &c.

(10.) £22,400, to complete the sum for the Relief of Distressed British Seamen Abroad.

(11.) £380,000, for Pauper Lunatics, England.

MR. BRISTOWE asked the reason for the increase of the Vote from £340,000 last year?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the increase arose from the increase in the number of cases. It was, unfortunately, found that the demands upon the asylums throughout the country were growing far too rapidly; but, of course, the patients must be duly provided for.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £68,000, for Pauper Lunatics, Scotland.

(13.) £20,900, to complete the sum for Pauper Lunatics, Ireland.

(14.) £13,387, to complete the sum for Hospitals and Infirmarys, Ireland.

(15.) £127,617, for Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Deficiency.

(16.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. O'DONNELL objected to an item of £500 for the Clarges Annuity, and moved its omission from the Vote.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £500, for the Clarges Annuity, be omitted from the proposed Vote."
—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained, that this had been a charge upon the coal duties of the Port of London, and on the repeal of those duties, it was found that the Customs Department had lost sight of the annuity, and failed to provide for it. The Law Officers of the Crown at the time advised that the Government were liable for the amount; and, as there was no particular Vote to which it could be charged, it was necessary to propose it in the present form.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 12; Noes 58: Majority 46. — (Div. List, No. 168.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(17.) £3,097, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous, Charitable, and other Allowances, Ireland.

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS, SPECIAL, AND TEMPORARY OBJECTS.

(18.) £16,579, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions.

(19.) £7,152, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Expenses.

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

(20.) £735,698, to complete the sum for the Customs.

(21.) £1,359,270, to complete the sum for the Inland Revenue.

(24.) £743,372, to complete the sum for the Post Office Telegraphs.

MR. PARNELL asked, whether any further expenditure would be required in connection with this Department, for acquiring works for which the original Estimate was supposed to provide, an Estimate which had already been exceeded by about five or six times its amount? In many cases, as he understood the matter, the Government, after having thought they had purchased the whole of the lines, found they had only acquired a right to the lease of them, and had afterwards to buy the fee simple.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON explained that the sum now asked was for working expenses simply. Several of the outstanding accounts between Her Majesty's Government and the former Telegraph Companies, to which the hon. Member for Meath had referred, had been settled in the course of the last year; and he believed that only a few remained to be arranged, but he could not give any particulars.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock;

Committee to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

ADMIRALTY AND WAR OFFICE (RETIREMENT OF OFFICERS) BILL.

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Colonel Stanley, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

[BILL 169.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, many changes had been made in the Admiralty Office and in the War Office—amalgamations of offices to a considerable extent had been made, and the result as years went on was that the number of officers in those Departments was in excess of the requirements of the country. In the interests of the Public Service, therefore, it had been suggested that a reduction of the number of officers would produce very good results. The efficiency of the officers would be promoted, and officers not so highly paid would be introduced whose powers would be more in accordance with the mechanical work to be performed. For that purpose, it had been found desirable to introduce the present Bill to provide for the retirement of the present officers.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked, on what previous occasions a similar course had been taken for increasing the facilities for retirement?

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that a special Bill had been introduced because the circumstances were most unusual. Under the Superannuation Act, the custom was to allow gentlemen to choose their own time to retire; but, in a large re-organization, that custom was injurious both to the Service and to individuals.

MR. DODSON inquired, as to the amount of reduction to be affected under the proposed scheme?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the evidence before the Treasury went to show that the reduction in both the Departments concerned would be a distinct saving to the Exchequer.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had exactly answered the Question raised by his hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke)—namely, why exceptional facilities were to be given for retirement in the present instance?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the case was peculiar. A large re-organization was being effected in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee presided over by the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair). They involved a division of clerks into two classes, upper and lower, and a diminution in the number of upper clerks. In large offices, like the Admiralty and War Departments, such a change could not be made piecemeal. It could have been done by the Treasury under the Superannuation Act, which enabled them to make certain provisions for superannuation allowances; but when the matter came under their consideration, the Treasury felt that it would not be right to exercise that power on so large a scale without consulting Parliament, because it might lead to abuse hereafter. The immediate saving at the War Office would be £14,000 a-year, and, ultimately, much more. The immediate saving at the Admiralty would be £10,000 a-year, and, ultimately, £14,000 a-year.

MR. PARNELL feared that this subversion of the Superannuation Act would involve injustice to clerks, who ought to have a reasonable time—more than 10 days—to decide what they would do, and who ought to be told what they would be relinquishing, and what the future establishment was to be.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that so far from the Bill inflicting hardship, it would obviate hardships which might result from the necessity of insisting on the provisions of the Superannuation Act. In the War Office the re-arrangement was being carried out by a Committee, and the names of those whose services it was desirable to retain would be submitted to the Secretary of State. A certain time would be allowed gentlemen to anticipate the operation of the scheme if they preferred to do so; but when that time had elapsed, the Committee would be compelled to commence their painful labours. He failed to see how it would be possible to ascertain and state with precision what future position might be relinquished by gentlemen who chose to retire. He thought the Bill represented the whole equity of the case, and that, in opposing the Bill, hon. Members would injure rather than assist the public servants whose cause they might be inclined to espouse. He regretted that any public servants should be compelled to retire at a time when they thought themselves fit for further work; but the question was one which ought to be decided on the responsibility of the heads of the Departments in which the officials were engaged.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, that as far as the Navy was concerned, there were already a considerable number of volunteers for retirement, so satisfied were the officials with the terms offered to them.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

TRAMWAYS ORDERS CONFIRMATION
(No. 1) (re-committed) BILL—[Bill 151.]

(Mr. J. G. Talbot, Viscount Sandon.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT wished to know when the Committee would be resumed, as it was important that the House should have a full opportunity of considering the question of employing steam power on public roads?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he would fix the Committee for a Morning Sitting on the 14th instant.

Bill reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 207]; re-committed for Friday, 14th June, at Two of the clock.

VALUATION OF PROPERTY BILL.

(Mr. Selater-Booth, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Salt.)

[BILL 94.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that he had on two occasions, and at some length, explained the object with which it was introduced, and on each it was read a second time without a division. Last Session Notice was given of a number of Amendments, and those Amendments had received careful consideration at the hands of the able draftsman of the Bill, with this result—that many of the Amendments had been adopted, and would be found incorporated in the Bill which was now before the House. He was quite ready to consider any suggestion that might be made for the further improvement of the Bill, the main object of which was to consolidate two Acts—the Union Assessment Committee Act and the Metropolis Valuation Act, the latter containing most of the improvements which it was desired to incorporate into the Union Assessment Committee Act, and apply to the country at large. He was satisfied that the Bill as it now stood was well understood, and was approved by the great majority of the authorities throughout the Kingdom by whom, when it became law, it would have to be administered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Solator-Booth.)

MR. DODSON said, he did not rise to oppose the second reading of the Bill, but to protest against its being accepted as merely a Consolidation Bill. It was, in fact, something very different from a Consolidation Bill, combining, as it did, an Act which applied to the country generally with one which had reference to the Metropolis only.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT regarded the Bill as one of great importance and deserving of mature consideration. Unhappily, the time of the House had been occupied—he would not say by obstructive tactics, but by methods of discussion which had deprived them of the opportunity of giving to important measures of legislation the attention to which they were entitled. It was true, as his right hon. Friend had observed, that a Valuation Bill had been twice read a second time by the House; but the present Bill was not that which the House had before them last year, as it had been materially altered by the incorporation of Amendments. The Bill, if it were passed as it now stood, would fail in this—that it would not secure uniformity of assessment in any county. The County Government Bill was, as they all knew, gone for this year, and that being so, there would be nobody to say whether the assessment in each Union was fair and equal in each county. This he could not help regarding as a great defect. He was very sorry his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) was not in his place. He had a most important Amendment upon the Paper, which certainly deserved the serious consideration of the House. If the Bill went into Committee, as he concluded it would, he hoped that Amendment would be passed, as no one could read the Bill without seeing that its intention was to raise the valuation up as high as possible. That being so, and as by the Bill all rates were to be levied on the same assessment, if they had only put that Imperial taxes as well as local should be levied on the net instead of the gross estimated rental, he would not push this question further. But he hoped that if the Bill became law, its provisions would secure equal rating throughout the country.

MR. J. COWEN thought that, upon the whole, the Bill was an improvement upon that of last year. Several objectionable clauses had been removed, and new clauses of which he approved had been added. They were, however, proposing to legislate on a wrong principle. The Bill should follow, and not precede, the establishment of County Boards. Take it altogether, however, considering the difficulty in the way of proposing a county government system which would meet the wishes of the House, he was glad that the Bill was being proceeded with. Many alterations might be fairly made in it when in Committee.

MR. MUNTZ saw no reason why the Bill should not go into Committee. It was an immense improvement on the Bill of last year, and he trusted that the House would agree to the second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday 14th June, at Two of the clock.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE moved that the debate be adjourned. They had not sufficient information with regard to the objects of the measure.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the hon. Baronet would allow the Bill to proceed. This was a matter under the Inclosure Act, and it had been fully discussed before the Committee upstairs; and he believed the Committee had reported unanimously in favour of the Bill. Owing to the arrangements in "another place," unless the Bill was now allowed to proceed, considerable loss would be entailed.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, the Committee on this Bill had taken the greatest care with regard to it, and he hoped the second reading would be agreed to. If Committees were not to be trusted with a scheme of this kind, their labours were thrown away.

MR. DODSON said, it was not fair that a Bill of this kind should be placed before them, and that then they should be told they must pass it because the House of Lords had made a Rule that they would not proceed with it after a certain day. He protested against that.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman. The House was placed in a very awkward position by the action of the other branch of the Legislature. He should take care that the attention of those responsible for the conduct of Business in the House of Lords should be drawn to the great inconvenience to which their Rule, in Bills of this kind, subjected not only the House of Commons, but the country.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 21, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 22 (Saving as to registration under 21 and 22 Vict. c. 90).

MR. YOUNG moved an Amendment, the object of which, he said, was that a person registered under this Act should not be privileged to call himself "surgeon," or "surgeon-dentist," or otherwise to incorporate the word "surgeon" with any other word, so as to give the public an idea that he was a duly qualified surgeon. In point of fact, gentlemen registered under this Act would be licensed dentists, and, as such, the Profession had no objection to their calling themselves what they were; but they did object to their describing themselves as what they were not. The Committee would see that the objection he took was not only in the interest of the Profession, but likewise in the interest of the public. It was fair for the Profession to prevent interlopers from going into another branch of the Profession, and holding themselves out as having the same rank as ordinary medical men. Regularly qualified medical practitioners had borne "the burden and heat of the day," and had gone to large expense, and taken up much time in their education; and, if they did take to a speciality, they were, he submitted, fairly entitled to describe themselves as "surgeon-dentists," or anything else that would not deceive the public, but would give a right description of their real position. At the same time, he had no objection to the Bill, as it would be a register of gentlemen who practised the art of dentistry; but he did not think it right that they should be able to mix themselves up in the public mind with the other branch of the Profession. In the interest of the public it was right to encourage, so far as legislation could, gentlemen who had gone through the whole curriculum and had made themselves well acquainted with the human body, to take up dentistry as a speciality. When they were compelled to sit in that uncomfortable chair, it was a satisfaction to know that the operator knew something else besides dentistry. That was hardly possible with gentlemen who were only registered under this Act. Therefore, he thought that it was in the interest of the public that the Profession should be supported by this Amendment. A Petition had been presented by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke), very numerous signed, in support of the Amendment. That Petition had been signed by the present Royal College of Physicians, by Sir William Gull, Mr. Holt, Mr. Girling, Dr. Johnson, and many other gentlemen of eminence in the Medical Profession. He objected to the clause as it stood, because it might lead to great confusion; and, therefore, he moved to insert, in page 7, line 3, after the word "name," the word "or."

Question proposed, "That the word 'or' be inserted."

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that from time immemorial the title surgeon-dentist had been allowed. In 1860 an attempt was made to prosecute a Mr. Gill for assuming this title. The Lord Chief Justice then said that immemorial usage had sanctioned the use of the title. Under the circumstances, he thought it undesirable to complicate matters by introducing a question on which, in the Medical Profession, there was a wide difference of opinion. If the Amendment were adopted, he did not know that it would have the effect of preventing the use of this title, since it was not against the common law of the land. The real object of the Bill was to prevent quackery, and enable the public to distinguish between educated dentists, and those who had really no title to the name.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE hoped the Government would say something with regard to the prospective value of this Amendment, which was exceedingly interesting to medical gentlemen, of whom 200 had signed a Petition in favour of it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was sorry that the Vice President of the Council was not at the moment in his place, and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had not had his attention strictly called to the Amendment. He would look into the matter, and, if it were necessary, an Amendment could be introduced on the Report.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE suggested that some words should be altered in the clause, otherwise there would be no Report.

MR. YOUNG suggested that the word "or" might be inserted, and he would refrain from moving the consequential Amendments on the understanding that this subject would be re-considered on the Report.

MR. GREGORY objected that the word "or" would then be surplusage, having no meaning.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH protested against the insertion of an Amendment with the sole object of inflicting on the Bill an additional stage. There were already sufficient safeguards in the Bill against anyone assuming a title to which he had no right.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER suggested that an opportunity of inserting Amendments might be had in the House of Lords

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that not only the dentists, but the Medical Profession generally were strongly in favour of the Bill as it now stood.

MR. CHARLEY moved to report Progress. The Bill had only just been printed, and the next clauses effected important changes in the lodger franchise.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Charley.)

MR. ALFRED MARTEN, as Chairman of the Select Committee which reported the Bill, hoped the Motion would not be pressed. The Bill had been most carefully considered in the Select Committee, and had received the approval of all parties. The only alteration as to the lodger franchise, in respect of the claim to vote, was one which would protect the lodger who made a just claim and would insure that claims were bond fide.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE hoped the hon. and learned Member for Salford would not press his Motion. Every word of the Bill had been carefully considered, and no sweeping changes had been proposed; but the Bill, as it stood, was a compromise agreed to by both sides.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [15th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, that the measure now before the House could not be spoken of as one affecting exclusively either political Party, since its object really concerned both sides alike. It was intended to redress a manifest grievance which applied, in some boroughs, to the one political Party and in others to their opponents. So that he felt, if really fairness were desired or desirable, he might claim the sympathies of Gentlemen alike who generally supported or opposed him. He knew that in one borough—that which he represented—the boast had been made that the Municipal Council should never have another Tory Alderman or Tory Mayor, and for upwards of 30 years the Council had uninterruptedly acted upon the boast, since nothing could induce the Borough Council of Leeds to admit a political opponent to the so-called

"honours" of the Aldermanic Bench or Civic Chair, and he did not hesitate to say that a more complete violation of the spirit of the Statute was never realized. The method by which Aldermen were expected by the Municipal Corporations Act, to be chosen was inserted in that Statute in order to guard against an unfair preponderance, and still they saw the consequence of straining it. But he regretted to say that the Corporation of Leeds was not the only municipal body which carried this exclusive system into operation. While Leeds did it on the one side Exeter did it on the other, and to a greater or less extent the same course of conduct was pursued elsewhere. Indeed, it was pretty generally well known that the vast preponderance, if not the whole of the representatives on the several Aldermanic benches was engrossed by one particular shade of politicians; and if the system remained, it would continue to have—as it already had had—the effect of excluding from the representation the better part of those who ought to hold Aldermanic seats. Surely they were not going to perpetuate one of the most unfair grievances that had ever been discovered? If it were right to adopt the cumulative vote with reference to school board elections, à fortiori, it was far more in accordance with common sense, fairness, and justice that no Corporation should have the power to say that it would only for 30 years have one particular class of politicians as its representatives, and keep the exclusive power in its own hands. If the cumulative system was a good one for school board elections, it should also be applied to municipal elections. He had never heard a satisfactory excuse urged in favour of the present system of electing Aldermen; for, in nine cases out of ten, those elections were merely political. He thought it was no part of the duty of Municipal Corporations to enter into the political arena, their business being, and the purpose of their election being, that they should see to the sanitary and other arrangements of their constituencies; and the moment they arrogated to themselves the functions of Imperial legislation, or were even elected ostensibly on political grounds, he did not hesitate to say that they not only infringed the duties of another province, but to that extent

they also confused their own. He, therefore, hoped that the House would read the Bill a second time.

MR. DODDS moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He did not think that any case had been made out for the radical change in the existing law which the measure proposed—a change for which there had been no application from any Corporation in the Kingdom.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Dodds.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

MR. MUNTZ contended that the Bill was a mistake.

Question put.

Clause 2 (Holdings in Ulster to be subject to the Ulster Tenant Right Custom at the expirations of leases in certain cases).

LORD EDWIN HILL - TREVOR moved, in page 1, line 14, after “first,” to insert “and second section of the principal Act.”

LORD EDWIN HILL-TREVOR next moved, in page 1, line 15, to leave out “in the Province of Ulster.”

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CHARLEY (for Sir ANDREW LEWIS) moved, in page 1, line 21, after “lease,” to insert “granted after the passing of this Act.” The Act was retrospective in its operation, and applied to leases—the parties to which had not the present measure in contemplation when they made them. It would be unfair, he said, to lessors, unless it were limited to leases granted after the passing of the Act.

LORD EDWIN HILL - TREVOR could not assent to the Amendment, the effect of which would be to nullify the provisions of the Bill.

MR. CHARLEY (for Sir SYDNEY WATERLOW) moved, in page 1, line 24, after “custom,” to insert—

“The Court, in determining the amount of compensation to be paid to any person making any such claim, shall take into consideration the terms of the lease, the rent at which the premises were held, and any stipulation, proviso, covenant, or agreement therein contained or referred to for the erection of buildings or the making any improvements by the lessee.”

In the Amendment, as it stood on the Paper; he would substitute for the words “shall make all reasonable deductions in respect of,” “shall take into consideration the terms of.” He understood that the noble Lord did not object to the Amendment as so altered.

LORD EDWIN HILL-TREVOR accepted the Amendment as so altered.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. MACARTNEY had a Notice on the Paper to move the following clauses:—

“That whenever in any district of the Province of Ulster in which the Ulster tenant-right custom prevails, a land claim affecting an agricultural or pastoral holding, or a holding partly agricultural and partly pastoral, situate within such district, shall be brought before the Court appointed to hear and determine land claims, the Court shall assume that the estate of which such holding forms a part has been and still continues to be subject to the Ulster tenant-right custom, unless the owner or owners thereof shall prove that such estate has not, at any time within 40 years next previous to the enactment of the ‘Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,’ been subject to said Ulster tenant-right custom, or unless the said owner or owners shall prove that the tenant-right of such holding has been purchased or acquired by said owner or owners, or his or their predecessor or predecessors in title.

"That whenever on the hearing of any such land claim, it shall have been either proved or admitted that the Ulster tenant-right custom prevails upon any particular estate situate in the Province of Ulster, and that such custom has been subjected on said estate to any so-called 'estate office rule,' fixing an arbitrary price per acre, or a certain determined number of years' purchase, to be paid to an out-going tenant on such estate for the tenant-right of his holding, such so-called 'estate office rule' shall not debar any outgoing tenant or occupier of any holding on such estate from receiving, on the termination of his occupancy of such holding, the full amount which his tenant-right would be worth if no such 'estate office rule' were in existence on such estate."

THE CHAIRMAN: I see there is an Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Tyrone. I think it right to state to the Committee that it is not in Order for him to move it.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

ARMY EXAMINATIONS—LITERARY AND PHYSICAL COMPETITIONS.

ADDRESS FOR A PAPER.

LORD HAMPTON, in moving an Address for the Report of the Joint Committee of the War Office and the Civil Service Commissioners appointed to consider the question whether the present literary examinations for the Army should be supplemented by physical competition, said, he had no desire to obtain any premature expression of the views of the Government, or to obtain from his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War any promise that the Report would be adopted. But various reports had been circulated with regard to this Report, and it was very desirable that the public should be made acquainted with its real character. There was a strong impression in the public mind that the examinations for commissions in the Army had been of too exclusively a literary character, and that it was very desirable, in the interests of the young men themselves and of the public, that some supplementary test should be adopted; and it had been stated that the object of the Committee was to entirely change the present system; and it was to correct this erroneous impression that he hoped the Report would be produced. The Committee did not desire to put an end to competitive examination; they merely proposed that young men desiring to enter the Army should be permitted voluntarily to take up physical exercises, and were to be permitted to select three out of six branches of physical and manly exercise, and to obtain in these a maximum of 1,200 marks. He could not help thinking that this was a recommendation which would meet with general approval. He might add that letters of inquiry had been addressed to the different Head Masters of the Public Schools and similar institutions, asking for their views on the subject. Their answers were contained in the Appendix to the Report; and, with one or two exceptions, they expressed the strongest opinion in favour of the change which the Committee had ventured to recommend.

Moved, That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty for Report of the Joint Committee of the War Office and the Civil Service Commissioners appointed to consider the question whether the present literary examinations for the Army should be supplemented by physical competition.—(The Lord Hampton.)

VISCOUNT BURY said, that there would be no objection on the part of Her Majesty's Government to the production of the Report. In saying this, however, it must be understood that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War reserved full discretion as to his future course of action. He could not pledge himself to the adoption of the Report, or any portion of it; he reserved to himself power, after deliberation and consultation with the illustrious Duke at the head of the Army and others acquainted with the subject, either to modify the recommendations of the Report, or even to pass it by altogether. It seemed to him, in looking at the Report, that it would be necessary to modify it in several important particulars. For instance, it was true that the Committee had not made competitive examination essential in walking, running, or swimming; but they had established a very high standard in regard to those qualifications—so high, that when, the other day, he spoke upon the subject to a young gentleman who was now in Her Majesty's Service, and his reply was—"If that is to be the standard, I would ather take up Greek." No doubt, some alterations in the examinations would be necessary. If physical competitions were made part of the examination through which young gentlemen had to pass in order to enter the Army, it would, no doubt, be an additional safeguard for securing the finest and best men to Her Majesty's Service.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he had for some years publicly recommended the change, not in the interests of any class, but in that of the Service; not for the sake of any young men, for the sake of the nation. He wished the Queen to have, so far as examinations could act as a guide in their selection, the men likely to make the best and most efficient officers. After what had been said the other day, he retracted his statement that the present system had been hastily, but not that it had been crudely, adopted by the late Government. A concurrence of professional opinion, from field marshals downwards, as well as common sense, was in favour of proficiency in martial and athletic exercises counting for something in the competitive examinations for commissions as well as mere book learning. In the majority of instances, superior intellectual attainments were far from being incompatible with athletic excellence. The cricket and football Elevens of the Engineers, the corps which comprised those who had most distinguished themselves in the Woolwich examinations, had long been notoriously very strong. He had no wish to see the lot of candidates who came out at the top of the list superseded by others, and he did not believe that the adoption of this change would have at all that effect; but he did believe that, in a certain number of instances, the lowest lot of the non-successful competitors might be replaced by others very little behind them in book learning, and very much superior to them in bodily strength and athletic proficiency, much better riders, better runners, better walkers, better swimmers, with great advantage to the Service; and if it were urged that learning to ride involved some expense, so much the better for the Queen if she got officers already proficient in equitation, without having to incur the expense of instructing them in the first rudiments of the art. The object was simply this, that Her Majesty should get the best article she could for her money.

EARL GREY said, he had heard with satisfaction that though the Government were not prepared to promise that they would adopt it, they were, on the other hand, by no means disposed to reject the principle that skill in physical exercises should form part of the competitive examinations for commissions in the Army. It was, in his opinion, of great importance that this principle should be acted upon. He believed that even those who were most sanguine as to the advantages likely to result from competitive examinations did not deny that the system was attended with some serious dangers, and required to be acted upon with caution. There was no doubt that over-exertion in youth sometimes did irreparable mischief to the delicate and curious organization of the human brain. He remembered to have heard the late Sir Benjamin Brodie—whose opinion on such a subject he need not say was of the highest authority—speak in the strongest manner of the many cases he had seen in which permanent mischief had been done to young men of the highest promise by over-stimulating the intellectual powers in early life. It was notorious that there were too many melancholy instances of young men of high natural endowments and qualified to have become distinguished and useful members of society, but whose careers had been ruined, and their prospects in life blighted by excessive work in the pursuit of University honours. But the competition for commissions was still more keen than that for University honours, and that there had arisen a growing desire on the part of parents and teachers to insure success by carrying to the very utmost the training given to candidates for commissions in the Army. The strain thus brought on their minds was very injurious to them in after life, yet it was impossible to check this evil by any regulations for limiting the amount of training to be given, or the amount of knowledge required from those who presented themselves for examination. This would be inconsistent with the very idea of competition. But what could not be done directly, might perhaps be done indirectly, and it appeared to him that if they were not merely to allow a considerable number of marks in these examinations for skill in physical exercises, but to make a certain minimum of marks in these exercises necessary in order to pass, a good deal would be done to check the over-driving of young men in intellectual study. It would then become necessary, in order to obtain success, that candidates for commissions should keep up their health and strength by devoting a fair proportion of their time to those bodily exercises in which more skill would be required from them in order that they might pass. The adoption of the principle contended for would thus afford some security against the greatest danger arising from the system of competition, and would tend to secure better officers for the Army.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH said, he concurred generally with the views of the noble Earl who spoke last but one (Earl Fortescue) which would be given effect to in reference to officers of the Army, by a certificate of qualification in military equitation being required of candidates, and, under any circumstances, a certain number of marks to be given when certificates of a thoroughly competent knowledge were produced; and, in the case of candidates for the Cavalry, Artillery, and Engineers, made compulsory the enforcement rigidly of proper rules for this purpose would insure a practical elucidation of the views of both the noble Earls who last addressed the House. The evil of paramount importance, to prevent, and render impossible, of field officers of Infantry riding on parade for the first time at 45 years of age, was inconvenient in the highest degree, their time being taken up in a nervous endeavour to control their horses, in place of giving proper attention to their duties on parade, remaining outside because unable to enter a square. He left their Lordships to judge the injury that would necessarily accrue to Her Majesty's Service, when field officers thus unqualified were employed on active service in the field; and would conclude, on the present occasion, with merely assuring their Lordships that this was a subject of paramount importance, if only in respect to the efficiency of Her Majesty's Service, and one, in his humble judgment, admitting of an easy solution.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, it was desirable that every man who entered the Army should be a good rider; but great care should be taken that no plan was adopted which would put candidates who could not have had the facilities for practice in riding and athletic exercises enjoyed by young men in high society at a disadvantage with the latter in competing for commissions in the Army. He thought that if such a qualification were required from every candidate, it would exclude from the Army the sons of less opulent parents, otherwise in every way fit for the Service. He had not a word to say against the idea of proficiency in these exercises; but any plan such as that suggested by the noble Lord (Lord Hampton) must be considered with a deliberation which the authorities had not been as yet able to afford to it—and he did not know that, even with such deliberation, an unobjectionable plan could be arranged.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL thought there could be no objection to the production of the Report; but he hoped their Lordships would refrain from expressing any opinion until they knew what the Report really was, and on what grounds the advice it contained was given. The subject was a difficult one; and it appeared that the Secretary of State for War, than whom no one was more competent to form an opinion, had been unable, so far, to decide as to the best plan to be adopted. He must say, however, that there appeared to him to be no real reason to believe that there was any great need to stimulate the public schools, or other educational establishments to encourage athletic exercises. He thought there was much force in what had been said by the illustrious Duke, and that they had great reason to be careful lest the sanction of Parliament should be given to anything calculated to discourage intellectual proficiency in candidates for commissions in the Army.

Motion agreed to.

FORCES OF THE CROWN IN IRELAND.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

LORD PENZANCE moved—

“That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty for Return of the numbers of Forces of the Crown raised and maintained on the Irish Establishment in Ireland between A.D. 1700 and A.D. 1800, distinguishing the numbers the raising and maintenance of which were authorized by the Parliament of England from the numbers not so authorized.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: On the part of Her Majesty's Government, I have no objection whatever to the Return moved for by my noble and learned Friend; and, on my own part, I am very glad that my noble and learned Friend moved for it. Your Lordships will remember that, during a discussion raised in your Lordships' House a short time ago, I had occasion incidentally to state that during the last century Forces of the Crown had been raised and maintained in Ireland without the assent of the English Parliament. I understand that statement has since been challenged. I am told that it has been denied with great strength and energy. I am told that it has been said that the statement was “absolutely without foundation.” Now, my Lords, I do not complain of any observations of that kind—I have no personal feeling on the subject—I am only anxious to put your Lordships in possession of any information on the subject which I may possess; and I hope the Return moved for by my noble and learned Friend will verify my statement. The argument, as I understood it, that was used was this—that in an Act passed shortly before the beginning of the 18th century—the Disbanding Act, passed for the disbanding of English and Irish troops—it was provided that in Ireland a certain number of troops not exceeding 12,000 should be maintained—the King having the power of determining what the number of troops should be. Those troops were on the Irish establishment. I am aware that some persons consider that that Act, in the circumstances in which it was passed, was not meant to be an Act giving the authority of Parliament to the maintenance of a certain number of troops; but I should rather take the ordinary, and, as I think, the more correct construction, and look on it as an Act for the maintenance of 12,000 troops in Ireland. I will go further, and admit that there was an Act supplementing that one, and authorizing the maintenance of 3,000 additional troops in Ireland. Those were both English Acts of Parliament. But that does not exhaust the history of the last century, and it does not touch that part of the history of Ireland to which I made reference. What number of additional instances may appear from the Return moved for by my noble Friend I do not know; but I can refer to no fewer than seven instances during the last century in which troops in very considerable numbers were raised and maintained in Ireland on the Irish establishment without the assent and authority, as far as I am aware, of the English Parliament. The seven instances to which I refer were in the years 1793, 1795, 1796, 1797, 1798, 1799, and 1800; and your Lordships will find that in those seven years, and, indeed, throughout the whole of the last century, the 12,000 men and the 3,000 men were kept perfectly distinct from the force raised in these seven years. In 1793, the new forces or augmentations were 5,000; in 1795, they were 8,246; in 1796, they were 7,012; in 1797, they were 25,667; in 1798, they were 17,620; in 1799, they were 20,281; and in 1800, they were 33,839—all in addition to the old nucleus of the Irish Army of 12,000 and 3,000 men. I now take the liberty of repeating the statement which I made on a former occasion—namely, that these troops, so numerous, were raised and maintained on the Irish establishment without any assent or authority from the English Parliament. I hope it will appear from the figures which I have just quoted to your Lordships that the statement I then made was not absolutely without foundation? I am very glad that my noble and learned Friend has moved for the Return, and I would suggest to him that he should make an addition to it having reference to a matter closely connected with this subject. The question as to the raising of troops—whether they must be raised with or without the authority of Parliament—appears to me to be a theoretical or speculative question rather than a practical one. Nobody can imagine that any troops are now going to be raised without the authority of Parliament—and certainly no proposition of that kind has been raised by anybody. The question brought before your Lordships' House the other night by my noble and learned Friend, not now present (Lord Selborne), was a very different one. It was a very practical question. It was this—there being an Army in India of Native troops, authorized by Parliament to be raised, what is the power of the Crown as to the employment of those troops? Your Lordships will see how extremely relevant the question of the employment of the 12,000 troops in Ireland is to the employment of the Native Indian troops. The 12,000 Irish troops were authorized by Parliament to be raised, and it was provided that they were to be kept on the Irish, and not on the English, establishment. The Mutiny Act passed by Parliament year after year referred to the Army provided for the defence of this country and the Colonies—the Imperial Army—but did not include nor in any way touch upon the 12,000 troops maintained in Ireland. Now, just in like manner the Native Indian Army is authorized to be raised by Statute; and just in the same way as the 12,000 troops were to be raised and employed in Ireland, so the Native Indian Army is authorized to be raised by Statute, to be on the Indian Establishment, and to be employed for service in India. In like manner, also, the Mutiny Act does not refer to the Native Indian Army; and, in that respect, the position of the 12,000 troops in Ireland was extremely similar to the position of the Native Indian Army. Now, it would be desirable to have some information as to the manner in which the 12,000 troops on the Irish establishment were used and employed by the Crown during the first half of the last century; and, with reference to that point, I ask my noble and learned Friend to make an addition to his Motion by wording it so as to include a State Paper on the subject which your Lordships will find of considerable interest. In the year 1736, a question was raised between one of the Principal Secretaries of State and the Irish Government as to the employment of troops on the Irish establishment out of Ireland. The answers were given from the Office of the Secretary at War to questions sent from the Office of His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State. A dispute which had arisen as to the mode of payment of those troops seems to have been referred to the decision of Lord Hardwicke, and questions were prepared for the instruction of Lord Hardwicke. The first Question was this—

“When regiments on the Irish establishment were first sent to do duty out of Ireland and yet received the Irish pay, with an advanced pay from England?”

Now, this is the statement of the Secretary at War as to the employment of those 12,000 troops to whom I have referred—

“Regiments on the Irish establishment have been sent to do duty out of Ireland time out of mind when required by England, and to my own knowledge troops were sent from thence in the reign of Queen Anne and divers times since; and when Irish regiments are brought over from Ireland or sent upon foreign service, it has always been the custom from the day of their embarkation in Ireland inclusive to place them upon the English establishment, or to allow them English pay, although continued with Irish numbers, or, if detained upon the establishment of Ireland, the difference between the Irish and English pay is made good to the commission, non-commission officers, and private men by England; a fresh proof of which is that although the right hon. the Earl of Rothes's regiment of Foot has been several years at Gibraltar, it hath, during the whole time, been kept upon Irish numbers and upon the establishment of that Kingdom, and the difference between the English and Irish pay is made good by the Parliament of Great Britain annually and not repaid by Ireland.”

This points to that which is also part of the history of that period. It appears, my Lords—and there can be no question about it, because it appears from the Estimates, which are in your Lordships'

Library—that the regiments of the Irish establishment were sent to Gibraltar and garrisoned Gibraltar simply by the orders of the Crown—they were not in any way included in the Vote of men in England, and no consent of Parliament was asked on the subject. Another thing that was done was this. After they had gone to Gibraltar, after they had got there—just as has been done in the case of the Indian troops at Malta—an application was made to Parliament for the cost of transports, &c. There is a great number of instances where that was done in the first half of the last century. I will cite only one. I find in the Estimates of the year 1727, which were laid on the Table on the 6th of February, 1727, that the Estimates are divided into two portions. There is, first, the Estimate for the coming year, just as we have now—giving the number of men on the English establishment and the pay for them. But the second part of the Estimates is “an account of services incurred and not provided for by Parliament.” That is expenditure for which no Vote had been taken; and here are two of the items—

“For the charge, &c., of transporting the regiments of Colonel Hayes and Colonel Middleton from Ireland to Gibraltar, and for the service of some of the transport while detained there,” so much money. Then there is the item—

“For the difference of pay between the English and Irish establishments for the two regiments of Hayes and Middleton from the respective days of their embarkation to the 24th of December, 1727,” a further sum. Therefore, the regiments were sent under the orders of the Crown to Gibraltar from the Irish establishment, and application in the following year was made to the English Parliament for the charge for the transports and for the pay of the two regiments—thus forming a perfect analogy to what has now been done in the case of the Indian regiments. I would, therefore, suggest to my noble and learned Friend that he would allow me to add to the Return, for which he now moves, these words—

“Copy of answers in 1736 from the Office of the Secretary at War to queries of the Principal Secretary of State as to the employment of troops on the Irish Establishment.”

LORD PENZANCE said, he had no objection to offer to the additional words suggested by his noble and learned Friend.

VISCOUNT BURY was understood to say he was afraid that the Records of the Adjutant General's Offices would not furnish the information now sought for, as far as regarded the earlier part of the last century.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Address for—

“Return of the numbers of Forces of the Crown raised and maintained on the Irish Establishment in Ireland between A.D. 1700 and A.D. 1800, distinguishing the numbers the raising and maintenance of which were authorized by the Parliament of England from the numbers not so authorized: And also,

“Copy of answers in 1736 from the Office of the Secretary at War to queries of the Principal Secretary of State as to the employment of troops on the Irish Establishment.”—(Lord Penzance.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, to Monday the 17th instant, a quarter before Four o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE — NEWSPAPER REGISTRATION.—QUESTION.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD asked the Postmaster General, Whether any rules have been laid down by the Post Office for the construction of the Post Office Act, 1870, as regards the definition of a newspaper contained in that Act; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay those rules upon the Table of the House; whether he holds that he is empowered under the Act of 1870 to call upon proprietors of publications presented for registration to make alterations in the character or matter of the publications, and whether this has been done since the passing of the Act; whether it is the case that his refusal to register any publication claiming to be a newspaper subjects that publication to a heavier rate of charge on every occasion of its transmission through the post; and, whether he has considered if stitched newspapers may, with public advantage, be registered and posted as newspapers?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, no such rules as those referred to have been laid down. When application is made for the registration of a publication as a newspaper, it is entered on the register if it be found to be in accordance with the definition of a newspaper contained in the Act. If it be not in accordance with the definition, it is explained in what respect the publication fails to meet the requirements of the Act. The refusal to register a newspaper might render it liable to a heavier rate of charge. It is considered that it would not be advantageous to allow publications if stitched to be registered as newspapers.

FOREIGN OFFICE REPORTS. QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What is the rule laid down as to the printing of the Reports of Her Majesty's Secretaries of Embassies and Legations on the manufactures and commerce of the countries in which they reside, and why some very important Reports, such as that of Mr. Trench on the Finance of the United States, and Mr. Drummond on the Silver Currency question, have not been printed?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that those Reports were printed as fast as possible after they were received. There was, however, a very large amount of business before the Government printers, and that fact made it impossible sometimes for them to print the Reports as speedily as was desired. The Reports referred to by the hon. Gentleman were very voluminous, and would necessarily take a good deal of time to print them. He could only say that the Government were anxious to give the public the full benefit of those Reports as soon as possible.

CORRUPT PRACTICES ACTS—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, With reference to the promises made by the Home Secretary in 1876, and by himself and by the Attorney General in 1877, that the Government would, at an early date, bring in and press forward a Bill to amend the Corrupt Practices Acts, when the Bill will be introduced?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am afraid I can only say we have been very anxious to bring in this Bill, but the pressure of Business during the last few Sessions has rendered it very difficult to do so. The Bill has been prepared, and is ready to be brought in; but I do not think, at the present moment, I can make any promise on the subject.

INLAND REVENUE—BREWERS' LICENCE TAX.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that 13,000 small brewers have given up their trade in the last twelve years; whether brewers can escape any extra payment on account of the Licence Tax by reducing their payments to the Malt Tax; and, whether hereby the Brewers' Licence Tax is not unproductive in many cases?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I believe it is perfectly true that there are now 13,000 fewer brewers than there were 12 years ago, and also that there are about 23,000 fewer than there were 40 years ago. That is, in fact, the result of the competition of large brewers, which necessarily tells on the trade in the same way as it tells on other trades—by driving small men out. With regard to the second part of the Question, it is undoubtedly true that, if brewers put less malt in their beer, they can escape a certain amount of malt tax and also a certain amount of licence tax; but, at the same time, of course, they reduce the quality of their beer, and they have to consider whether that would be to their advantage as traders. With regard to the last part of the Question, as to whether the brewers' licence tax is not unproductive in many cases, I do not know whether that is quite so. Within the last 12 years the amount of Revenue from that source has increased from £360,000 to £411,000 per annum.

POOR LAW—COMPENSATION ALLOWANCES TO UNION OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he will explain to the House on what principle the Local Government Board determine the number of years which they sometimes add to the actual period served by union officers when establishing the basis on which to calculate the amount of annual compensation allowance to be granted to such officers when the offices they may have held have been abolished; and, whether he is aware that some persons still in the receipt of such annual compensation allowances also hold salaried offices under union authorities; and, if so, whether he has considered how such a state of things should be made to cease?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, the Local Government Board, in determining the number of years to be added to the actual period served, follow the scale laid down by the Treasury in the cases of members of the Civil Service whose offices are abolished—namely, in the case of persons who have served less than five years, an addition of one year; less than 10 years, an addition of three years; less than 15 years, an addition of five years; less than 20 years, an addition of seven years; and for 20 years and upwards, an addition of 10 years. It is quite true that some persons to whom compensation allowances have been awarded under the Metropolitan Poor Act have since been appointed to salaried offices under other Union authorities; but the Local Government Board, as administrators of the common poor fund, out of which both the pensions and salaries are defrayed, take care that the second salary, together with the pension, shall not exceed the original salary in respect of which the pension was granted.

NAVY—WIDOWS' PENSION FUND.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the question of a pension fund for the widows of seamen and marines has been considered by him and with what result?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the Question has been submitted to Mr. Finlaison, the Actuary of the National Debt Office, and he has reported that on the basis of 20,000 members, each paying 1s. 8d. a-month, a Government contribution of £130,000 a-year in perpetuity would be required to pay pensions of £20 a-year to widows. I shall be exceedingly glad to lay the Papers upon the Table, if my hon. and gallant Friend will move for them.

ARMY—THE TYRONE FUSILIERS.

QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to discontent among the men of the Tyrone Fusiliers, in barracks at Omagh, at the quality of the rations supplied to them; and, if he will make inquiries into the circumstances attending the contract for the supply of beef, mutton, and especially pork?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, I have no information with respect to this subject. No complaint of any kind has reached the War Office. I have telegraphed for information to the General commanding in Ireland, and have not yet received an answer. I would ask the hon. Gentleman, if he can furnish me with any information on the subject which may lead to further inquiry?

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. PARNELL asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in view of the fact that the County Government Bill is not to be proceeded with, he proposes to withdraw the Grand Jury Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the terms of the hon. Gentleman's Question, as it appears upon the Paper, seems to me to place the County Government Bill in a different position from that which it really occupies. I do not understand that any positive announcement has been made that it will not be proceeded with this Session, but merely that other measures would be placed before it. Even if the County Bill were to be withdrawn, I should not be disposed to consider that the Grand Jury Bill would necessarily be carried down with it. On the contrary, I should consider that one of the rival claimants for the time at the disposal of the Government was thereby disposed of, and I should be most reluctant to abandon the Grand Jury Bill. I still cling to the hope that hon. Gentlemen on both sides will afford such assistance as may enable us to progress with it this Session.

MR. KNATCHBULL: HUGESSEN remarked, that the impression on that—the Opposition—side of the House, from the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day, was that the County Government Bill was not to be proceeded with. He ventured to ask, Whether that impression was correct, inasmuch as the subject was really one of too much importance to make it proper that the country should be left in a state of uncertainty upon it, and the Government measure dangled before the eyes of Parliament, to be carried forward, or dropped, as accident might determine?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it is really very difficult at this period of the Session to give absolute answers with regard to Bills; but I must confess that, in making my statement the other day with regard to the precedence which was to be given to other Bills, the impression I had was that in all probability the County Government Bill could not be fully considered this Session. At the same time, I do not like to withdraw it so early in the Session, as an opportunity for passing it may still arise.

ARMY—THE NORTHAMPTON MILITIA.

QUESTION.

MR. HAYTER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is able to give to the House any information respecting the outbreak of the Northampton Militia, and whether the character of it is likely to prove sufficiently grave to necessitate the removal of the regiment from the town?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that, by some mistake, he had not received Notice of the Question in time to make full inquiry; but he believed there had been riots—the accounts of which, he thought, were exaggerated—between the Militia and the townspeople at Northampton. He had no reason to suppose that there had been any serious danger either to life or property. As the Militia training would cease tomorrow or Monday, it was not thought advisable to remove them to another place. Orders had been sent down that they were to deliver in their arms and clothing that evening, and it was probable that a large proportion of the men would then be sent home.

PARLIAMENT — THE WHITSUNTIDE HOLIDAYS.—MOTION.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved, "That the House, at its rising, should adjourn till Thursday next."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE suggested that as there was a general understanding that no Evening Sitting should be taken, the Motion should be so framed as to render it unnecessary for the Speaker to attend at 9 o'clock.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the difficulty would be got over by some hon. Member at 7 o'clock moving that the House should then adjourn.

Motion agreed to.

Colonel Stanley

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—o—

HIGHWAYS BILL—[BILL 95.]

(Mr. Solater-Booth, Mr. Salt.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH moved that the Bill pass through Committee pro forma, in order to be reprinted with Amendments.

MR. CLARE READ said, the amended Bill would be quite a different measure from that now before the House; and he trusted, therefore, that ample time would be given for its consideration by the country.

MR. RYLANDS thought the House was entitled to know definitely, whether the Government, in amending the Bill, intended to throw over County Boards or not?

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, if he found, after conversation with other hon. Gentlemen who were interested in the question, that he was likely to receive substantial support, he should, when the Bill was in Committee, move Amendments which would have the effect of making highway districts compulsory, so as to establish an uniform system throughout the country.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, if the right hon. Member wanted to stop a Highway Bill, that was the very way to do it, because the country was opposed to the compulsory establishment of Highway Boards. He thought everybody must be of opinion that a Bill of this kind was absolutely necessary now that turnpike roads had been abolished. If the power were vested in the magistrates, they would exercise it as economically as possible, and this arrangement would not interfere with any future measure for the establishment of County Boards.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, the mode in which the Bill had been altered was as follows:—The word "authority" had been substituted for the word "Board" throughout the Bill, and there was another provision to the effect that the County Justices should be the "authority" for administering the Act. The framework of the measure would be applicable in future years in case County Boards should be eventually established.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 25, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 26 (Interpretation).

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH moved, in page 11, after line 15, to insert—

" 'Highway authority' means as respects an urban sanitary district the urban sanitary authority, and as respects a highway district the highway board, and as respects a highway parish the surveyor or surveyors or other officers performing similar duties."

MR. W. E. FORSTER entered his protest against any such general Amendment being taken as a precedent in the case of other Bills.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH moved, in page 4, after clause 13, to insert the following clauses:—

Main roads.

(Disturnpiked roads to become main roads, and half the expense of maintenance to be contributed out of county rate.)

"For the purposes of this Act, any road which has within the period between the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and seventy, and the date of the passing of this Act, ceased to be a turnpike road, and any road, which being at the time of the passing of this Act a turnpike road, may afterwards cease to be such, shall be deemed to be a main road; and one half of the expenses of the maintenance of such road shall, as to every part thereof which is within the limits of any highway area, be paid by the county authority of the county in which such road is situate, out of the county rate, on the certificate of the surveyor of the county authority to the effect that such main road has been maintained to his satisfaction.

(Description of highway areas.)

"The following areas shall be deemed to be highway areas for the purposes of this Act (that is to say):

- (1.) Urban sanitary districts other than boroughs having separate courts of quarter sessions;
- (2.) Highway districts;
- (3.) Highway parishes not included within any highway district or any urban sanitary district.

(Power to declare ordinary highway to be a main road.)

"Where it appears to any highway authority that any highway within their district ought to become a main road by reason of its being a medium of communication between great towns, or a thoroughfare to a railway station, or otherwise, such highway authority may apply to the county authority for a Provisional Order declaring such road, as to such parts as aforesaid, to be a main road; and the county authority, if of opinion that there is probable cause for the application, shall cause the road to be inspected, and, if satisfied that it ought to be a main road, shall make a Provisional Order accordingly; a copy of the order so made shall be forthwith deposited at the office of the clerk of the peace of the county, and shall be open to the inspection of persons interested at all reasonable hours; and the order so made shall not be of any validity unless and until it is confirmed by a further order of the county authority made within a period of not more than six months after the making of the Provisional Order.

"If it appears to a county authority that any road within their county, within the period between the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and seventy and the date of the passing of this Act ceased to be a turnpike road, ought not to become a main road in pursuance of this Act, such authority shall, before the first day of January one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, make an application to the Local Government Board for a Provisional Order declaring that such road ought not to become a main road.

"Subject as aforesaid, where it appears to a county authority that any road within their county, which has become a main road in pursuance of this Act, ought to cease to be a main road and become an ordinary highway, such authority may apply to the Local Government Board for a Provisional Order declaring that such road has ceased to be a main road and become an ordinary highway.

"The Local Government Board, if of opinion that there is probable cause for an application under this section, shall cause the road to be inspected, and if satisfied that it ought to cease to be a main road and become an ordinary highway shall make an order accordingly, to be confirmed as hereinafter mentioned.

"All expenses incurred in or incidental to the making or confirmation of any order under this section shall be defrayed by the county authority applying for such order.

(Turnpike road in several counties.)

"Where a turnpike road subject to one trust extends into divers counties, such road, for the purposes of this Act, shall be treated as a separate turnpike road in each county through which it passes.

(Accounts of expenses of maintenance of main roads.)

"Every highway authority shall keep, in such form as may be directed by the county authority, a separate account of the expenses of the maintenance of the main roads within their area, and shall forward copies thereof to the county authority at such time or times in every year as may be required by the county authority, and the accounts so kept shall be subject to such audit as the county authority may direct.

"If any highway authority makes default in complying with the provisions of this section, or with any directions given in pursuance thereof by the county authority, the county authority may withhold all or any part of the contribution payable by them under the Act towards the expenses of the maintenance of main roads by such highway authority for the year in which such default occurs.

(Highway district situate in more than one county.)

"Where a highway district is situate in more than one county the provisions of this Act with respect to the expenses of the maintenance of main roads shall apply as if the portion of such district situate in each county were a separate highway district in that county."

Clauses agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Bill reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 214]; re-committed for Friday next, at Two of the clock.

INCLOSURE PROVISIONAL ORDER (ORFORD) BILL—[BILL 189.]

(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Secretary Cross.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Matthew Ridley.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, two Inclosure Bills were brought before the House last night, when one of them was passed a stage, though not without much remonstrance, on the ground that there had been no opposition to it before the Select Committee. He understood, however, that this Orford Bill was objected to by a Committee upstairs. The evidence taken before the Committee had not been printed and circulated; and, in these circumstances, whatever the Standing Order of the House of Lords might be, he thought it would be impossible to go on with the Bill at present. He, therefore, moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY hoped the hon. Baronet would not press his Motion. In consequence of the Standing Order of the House of Lords, there would be a difficulty in passing the Bill this Session if the second reading were not now agreed to. He would give an undertaking that the evidence adduced before the Select Committee should be printed and placed in the hands of hon. Members before the next stage of the Bill was taken.

Mr. Selater-Booth

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE thought it was rather unsatisfactory that the House should be called upon to proceed at once with a Bill of this kind in consequence of a Standing Order of the House of Lords.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the circumstances of the evidence not having yet been printed was not owing to any fault on the part of the promoters. The simple fact was that the printer of the House had not been able to get through the work. He had, however, received a letter from Mr. Hansard, who undertook that the evidence should be in the hands of hon. Members on Wednesday morning. He entirely agreed that, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer observed last night, the Rules made "elsewhere" were extremely harsh, not only to this House, but to the public at large. Indeed, the Government would exert their influence in order to bring about a revision of those Rules. In this particular case, however, he thought no hardship would be inflicted on the opponents of the Bill if the second reading were now passed.

MR. DODSON said, the Secretary of State had just remarked that the Rule of the House of Lords was mischievous in regard to the public. He begged the House to take note of that expression. The Rule was introduced into the other House on the 4th of February and adopted on the 5th; but the Government then offered no opposition to it. After the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, it might be hoped that the Government would use their influence to get the Rule rescinded. If it were not rescinded, the Government ought to introduce their Bills early in the Session, so that this House might have ample opportunity for discussing them.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he agreed with much that had been said by the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, and he had no doubt that the Home Secretary would see that the restriction imposed by the other House would be removed. It should be borne in mind, however, it was not common but commonable land that this Bill dealt with, and there was great difference between the two. By the liberality of an individual, a large recreation ground had been set out for the benefit of the public, and more than an equivalent would be given them. It would be a great advantage that this commonable land should be inclosed.

MR. DILLWYN objected to the second reading, on the ground that the reasons for the passing of the Bill had not been stated to the House.

MR. HARDCASTLE remarked, without expressing an opinion on the merits of the Bill, that the Standing Orders of the House of Lords interfered very much with the Business of the House. The Manchester Waterworks Bill, for instance, had been thrown out on the ground that the Notices should have been served last November of Amendments which, in fact, were not proposed by the promoters of the Bill at all, but were forced upon them by a Committee of this House sitting in May.

MR. RAIKES said, that it was essential for the transaction of Parliamentary Business that some day should be fixed, after which Private Bills would not be proceeded with, otherwise the other House would have a number of Bills sent up so late in the Session that it would be impossible to deal with them properly. He was not prepared to say, however, that the day which had been fixed by the other House was necessarily the best.

MR. RYLANDS opposed the second reading, on the ground that if they were to advance the Bill a stage they might be taking a line which, if they had the evidence before them, they would not have taken.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) had seized upon a phrase of his right hon. Friend and made it the topic for a severe attack upon the Government. But, in these matters, it must be borne in mind that the Standing Orders were made in conformity with the usual practice of both Houses, and upon the authority of those Gentlemen who took the lead in the regulation of Private Business, and that the attention of the Government was not attracted to alterations of this kind until some circumstances forced it upon their notice. He could only say, as he said last night, the Government were very desirous to bring about an accommodation between the Rules and Orders of the other House of Parliament and the proceedings of the House of Commons so as to avoid such difficulties as they now found themselves confronted with. But, as the Chairman of Committees had pointed out, it was necessary to have certain days fixed, after which Business was not to be taken, and the question was whether or not the days were conveniently fixed. It was difficult to say a priori; but after what they had seen to-day it might be that the day fixed by the House of Lords, the 18th of June, was too early. At all events, it was a matter for consultation between the authorities of the two Houses, in order to see whether some modifications might not be introduced. He promised last night, and he promised again, that in concert with the authorities of the House, the Government would endeavour to see whether some modifications might not be made so as to give effect to the Rule with the least inconvenience to the Business of the House. They had always to choose between difficulties, and they were very much in the position of the man who had to put five horses into four stalls. With reference to the Bill, he understood that the Report of the proceedings and the evidence would be delivered at the Vote Office for circulation on Wednesday. He did not think that any harm would be done if the Bill were read a second time.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN rose to defend his right hon. Friend the Member for Chester from the attack made on him by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer complained that his right hon. Friend had taken advantage of a phrase used by the Home Secretary. But when the right hon. Gentleman stigmatized this Rule as a mischievous one, his right hon. Friend was quite justified in what he had said. If a young and enthusiastic Member of the House used such expressions in the heat of debate, no one would take much notice of it; but when a responsible Minister of the Crown deliberately branded a Rule of the other House of Parliament as a mischievous Rule, it was a little too much to speak of such an expression as a mere "phrase," which meant nothing. He would also remark, that when they were asked to pass a Bill only because the House of Lords had made a Rule that they would receive no Bill after a certain date, it should be remembered that they, the House of Commons, had made no similar Rule as regarded the other House, and he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) could not see why they were bound to pay any deference to such a Rule. No one wished to throw any impediment in the way of the Bill, if they only knew what the Bill was; but the question was, were they to proceed with a Bill about which they were not informed? If the Government consented to the adjournment of the debate, no harm would be done to anybody.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 69: Majority 21.—(Div. List, No. 170.)

Question again proposed. "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. E. JENKINS moved the adjournment of the House. He strongly objected to the House being driven into a corner, and forced to accept the second reading of the Bill without the opportunity of reading the evidence given before the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not persevere in this Motion. Whether they approved or disapproved the Rule which had been established in "another place," they must all recognize the fact of its existence, and must remember that this matter involved the convenience of many parties, and might lead to considerable expense. It might be more convenient to be in possession of the evidence before the second reading; but if they read the Bill a second time now, and did not part with the control over it till the next stage, they might still either amend or reject it if necessary.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, there was no reason why the House should have been driven into a corner like this, for the scheme was prepared before the meeting of Parliament. He understood that, according to precedent, the present Bill would be withdrawn, and a new Bill introduced in the House of Lords.

MR. DODSON said, he did not think there was any necessity for the House to be driven into a corner in regard to the Bill, nor did he altogether assent to the doctrine laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the House should give way. But he hoped this Motion would not be pressed, the Government having promised to use their influence to obtain, if not the removal, at all events the modification, of the Rule objected to.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday next, at Two of the clock.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he should not press his Motion as to debtors undergoing imprisonment, because the Home Secretary, having had the Correspondence laid before him, had modified the rules of which complaint had been made. He had to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the readiness and promptness with which he had dealt with the matter, simply brought to his notice by a Question in that House. There was still some complaint that the wives of debtors were searched, and often partially undressed, before entering their husband's cells, and with this he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would deal.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was ready to admit that the position of debtors, while prisoners under the provisions of the Prisons Act of last Session, was somewhat anomalous. He thoroughly sympathized with the poor men who were imprisoned, because they were, in reality, unable to pay their debts. While in prison, they had to be maintained formerly by the county, and now by the State, their wives and families passing in the meantime into the workhouse, to be maintained out of the rates, so that society would actually gain by at once paying off their debts. But, having had much experience of prisons, he knew that there were many debtors imprisoned who were able to pay, but refused to do so. His view was that no one should be imprisoned except for crime; but a great many debtors, who were able to discharge their liabilities, chose to be kept in prison at the public expense rather than part with their money. Such men were acting with fraud, and ought to be punished for it. In one case, the Visiting Justices of a gaol had most successfully dealt with such persons by a timely increase of prison discipline, from which the debtors were glad to escape by paying their debts. He could not recommend the abolition of imprisonment for debt, but thought that the Attorney General might make some addition to the Act of 1877, which would meet cases such as those he had mentioned.

PERAK.—QUESTIONS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to an article in the "London and China Telegraph" of May 27th, 1878, in which the writer, after commenting upon the Estimates for the State of Perak, recently framed by the British Resident, Mr. Low, who, "acting under the advice of the Government of the Straits Settlements," declined to sanction a proposed new tax, goes on to remark, in conclusion—

"that, as Perak matters seem to be all regulated by the governor of Singapore, it would be better and more straightforward at once to announce the annexation of the country, and not to keep up a state of things which is farcical and far from creditable;"

and, whether, looking to the fact that on the 1st June, 1876, Lord Carnarvon expressly declared that—"government of the country by British officers in the name of the Sultan (a measure very little removed from annexation) could not be allowed,"

he will lay upon the Table further Papers showing, for the information of the House, the policy, instructions, and authority under which the proceedings of British Residents in Perak are now regulated; and in what respects the present condition of Perak differs from that of an annexed province, and the functions of the residents there from those proposed for the Commissioners appointed by Sir William Jervois, but, subsequently, set aside by Lord Carnarvon?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished also to ask a Question in regard to the payment of the Indian troops employed in the Perak Expedition. It was acknowledged that the extra expenses caused by the removal of those troops would have to be charged either to the colony or the mother country; but he would like to know, Whether the Government intended to move an Estimate not only for the extraordinary charges of the Expedition, but also for the ordinary pay and allowances of the soldiers during the period they were employed beyond the Indian territory? If not, it would be a clear case of the Indian Treasury being charged with the expenses of the troops while on foreign service.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that if the hon. Baronet the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had given Notice of his Question with reference to the payment of the Indian troops, he should have been able to give him a definite answer. He might, however, say that the financial control of the House would ultimately be complete over any expenditure on account of the Indian troops in question, though there had been considerable delay, owing to the difficulty of settling the accounts between the different parties concerned. No doubt, pending that settlement, there had been a charge of £40,000 upon the revenues of India. He did not understand the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) to raise the general question of Perak or the history of the war, but rather to ask a Question with regard to the relations between the British Resident at Perak and the Native Rulers. A greater responsibility, of course, attached to Residents than that of merely advising Native rulers, and that responsibility had been clearly pointed out by his noble Predecessor. In Perak the position was one of some little difficulty, but the duties attending it seemed to have been performed successfully.

LAND TAXATION.

RESOLUTION.

MR. O'DONNELL, on rising to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the present system of Land Taxation is inequitable, and requires to be amended,” said, the land tax appeared to be an extremely valuable contribution to the public revenues, for it purported to be assessed at the rate of 4s. in the pound on the yearly value of lands, tenements, and hereditaments throughout Great Britain. The lands throughout this country, as the House was aware, were all originally held on certain tenures from the Crown, and the idea of actual property in land was an idea which had only sprung up comparatively recently. The primary idea of landholding was a trust and enjoyment of certain benefits on condition of performing that trust. The landowner held lands on condition of supplying men and arms for the Public Service for the defence of the country. The original signification and purport of what was now called the land tax was to provide for the Military Estimates of the Kingdom by various forms of knight service. By the Restoration Parliament, however, all the old knight tenures and military burdens upon land were swept away. After the Restoration the relief of land from taxation laid the foundation of the whole of that system of taxing commodities which rose to such an enormous height during the 18th and a portion of the 19th centuries. When the Revolution resulted in setting William and Mary upon the Throne in the year 1692, there was a new arrangement. The landed gentry were somewhat at a discount at that period. They generally espoused the cause of the exiled Sovereigns, and owing to the pressing necessities of the new Government, recourse was at once had to the historical methods of raising taxes, and thus a land tax to the amount of 4s. in the pound was imposed. Under the Act of William and Mary the yearly value was returned at £2,000,000, in round numbers; more than 100 years afterwards, in 1798, when another change took place, notwithstanding the immense increase in the value of land, the Return was principally the same as it was in 1690. The landed gentry were still largely actuated by feelings of loyalty to the exiled house, and were probably objects of greater suspicion than Irish tenant-righters of the present day. Sir Robert Walpole, therefore, thought it necessary to instil feelings of loyalty by a system very nearly tantamount to bribery. Under the powers granted by the Act of George III., about half of the land tax existing at the end of the last century had been redeemed, and he admitted that that fact threw some difficulty in the way of a re-adjustment of land taxation. If they looked at the yearly value of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, they could easily arrive at some knowledge of the great inequalities of the land taxation. In Surrey the nominal tax of 4s. in the pound upon the full actual value of the lands really amounted to 7½d. in the pound. In Yorkshire it amounted to 7½d. in the pound; in Middlesex it realized 1½d. in the pound; in Lancashire only ½d. in the pound; in Bedfordshire 4½d. in the pound; in Berks, 3½d.; and in Bucks, 3 1-16d. If the full rate of 4s. were levied it would bring in £26,000,000, and yet it now only produced £1,000,000 per annum. There was the greatest possible difference in the incidence of the tax throughout the different counties in Great Britain, and if the Government were to do nothing more than introduce some equalization of the incidence of the tax—if they were only to make a 3d. or a 6d. tax all round—it would abolish what was only a farcical contribution to the Imperial Revenues. He had no doubt whatever that the reform of the land tax in this country and the simplification of the whole system of raising Revenue were questions that would have to be faced, if not by a Conservative, certainly by a Liberal Administration. The taxation on land still bore on its face the impress of the process which was had recourse to in olden time for the purpose of reconciling the landholding class to important constitutional changes. It was time to relieve the public burdens from the evils which they suffered owing to the bribing of Jacobite gentlemen into accepting the Hanoverian dynasty.

MR. O'CLERY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the present system of Land Taxation is inequitable, and requires to be amended,"—(Mr. O'Donnell,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Motion covered a much larger ground than the speech in which it was introduced. The Motion had reference to the present system of land taxation, whereas the speech was entirely confined to the land tax, and he did not know whether it was even reasonable to call the land tax a part of their present system of land taxation. If, however, it were reckoned a part, it certainly constituted only a very small part of the system, and it would be perfectly impossible to discuss the question of the land taxation of this country on the exceedingly narrow basis suggested by the land tax. With regard to the land tax, he did not think it desirable to go into the historical arguments which the hon. Member had suggested to the House. The effect of all the proceedings, taken together, was that the land tax, as a source of taxation, was, in point of fact, abolished by the change which was made by Mr. Pitt, when it became no longer a tax, but a rent-charge upon the land. For the last century, or nearly so, land had changed hands subject to that burden. About the time Mr. Pitt dealt in this way with the land tax, he instituted a different system of taxing landed and other property by the introduction of the property and income tax. In treating of the taxation of land, they must consider the burden of taxation which fell upon land through the instrumentality of that which was really a tax—namely, the income tax, in as far as it fell upon landed property. That, however, would lead them into a very wide field, into which they ought not to be tempted to enter by a speech which was confined to the land tax. With regard to the land tax itself, he believed there was nothing to be done except to leave it as it was; but if it were changed, some system of compulsory redemption ought to be applied to it, so as to extinguish it altogether, and then the matter might be dealt with de novo. But to re-arrange the land tax, and to bring about what the hon. Member for Dungarvan had termed an equitable adjustment of the tax, in relation to its charge upon one class of the country and upon another, would be quite impossible, and would itself lead to inequitable consequences.

MR. PARNELL denied that it was Mr. Pitt's intention to convert the land tax into a rent-charge, and hoped that next Session the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) would have an opportunity on the Budget of going more fully and clearly into his views upon the question of land taxation.

MR. O'DONNELL expressed a wish to withdraw his Amendment, announcing, at the same time, his intention to bring the whole subject forward again next Session.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

(1.) £28,416, to complete the sum for Royal Palaces.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE pointed out that the Vote contained an item of £693—which was a slight increase on the Vote of the previous year—for the Hampton Court Stud House, and Paddocks and Buildings in Hampton Court Park appropriated to the stud establishment. He understood that these paddocks were formerly part of Hampton Court Park, and were inclosed for the purposes of the stud establishment. These inclosures had gone on from year to year, and had been steadily increasing. In 1872, at a time when Mr. Ayrton was First Commissioner of Works, a Return was laid before the House of the lodges, houses, official residences, rights of pasture, &c., occupied, or enjoyed, within the parks under the charge of the Commissioners of Public Works. In that Return, Hampton Court was entered as Hampton Court Park, and, he presumed, a Vote for its maintenance as a park would be proposed in connection with the Parks' Vote, notwithstanding that a considerable sum was asked for in the Vote now before the Committee. At the time to which he was referring, it was decided, as he believed, that the Master of the Horse was to be charged a rent for the use of the paddocks, and that he was also to pay for the herbage and grazing rights in the park. He wished to know, whether the conditions of the occupation had been so arranged as that the Master of the Horse did so pay as determined?

MR. GERARD NOEL replied, that the present Vote was for the maintenance, and that Hampton Court Palace had nothing to do with the park. There was a slight excess this year over last, and that was due chiefly to a fact which he stated when laying a Supplementary Estimate before the Committee—dry rot having found its way into the palace, considerable painting and structural repairs had been rendered necessary. With regard to the park, an arrangement was made about a year ago, under which the Master of the Horse paid a rent on account of the matters alluded to by the hon. Baronet. It was found very difficult to fix the amount, and the matter had been very carefully considered. First of all, the Master of the Horse had to pay for hay for the deer; he had also to pay a keeper, to pay for a horse and cart, and everything, in fact, connected with the keeping and feeding of the deer. Owing to the fact that there were a very great number of trees in the park, the herbage was not so good as might be expected; but the Commissioners had taken for their guidance the somewhat similar case of Bushey Park, and the Master of the Horse had agreed to pay the same rent in proportion to the acreage that he paid for Bushey Park.

(2.) £4,950, to complete the sum for Marlborough House.

MR. ADAM asked, whether this Vote would complete all that was necessary to be done at Marlborough House?

MR. GERARD NOEL said, he was happy to inform the right hon. Gentleman that this was the last Vote at all likely to be required for the completion of Marlborough House. On examination, it was found that the sanitary arrangements in the residence of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales were about as bad as they could be, and it had, therefore, been found necessary to make extensive alterations; but he believed no further sanitary arrangements would be required.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £24,723, to complete the sum for Houses of Parliament Buildings.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he understood that this Vote included a grant for the restoration of St. Margaret's Church. He was sorry that his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) was not in his place, as he would have had something to say on that matter. The works being done at St. Margaret's Church were a dreadful example of how very often old buildings might be ruined and destroyed by what was called restoration.

Mr. Parnell

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the hon. Baronet was in error. The Vote for St. Margaret's Church was granted last year.

(4.) £97,608, to complete the sum for Public Buildings.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE wished to know, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee on Public Buildings, of which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Adam) was a Member? It was a disgrace to the country that our public buildings should continue in their present state, and that there should be no great buildings erected for the War Office and the Admiralty. A late Secretary for War stated on one occasion that he could not possibly continue to carry on his business in the Office, unless it was altered; and here, again, the Vote came before the Committee, without any statement being made as to the intentions of the Government to carry out the recommendations of the Committee to which he had referred. There was no reason why, in a great country like this, because there was a political crisis abroad, and England had found it necessary, in consequence, to spend a large sum of money, the Government was not to carry out certain recommendations made on the highest authority, and in the belief that they were necessary for the well-being of the Public Service and the dignity of the country. He found in the Vote an item of £36,000 a-year for the rent of hired offices, scattered all over London. There were some 15 houses hired for the use of the War Office alone, and other Departments were housed in the same way. The Committee, over which he presided, went fully and fairly into the whole question. There were different opinions in the Committee on certain points, mainly connected with the plans; but on one point the Members were unanimous—namely, that 12 months ought not to be allowed to elapse before something was done to improve the Public Offices; but a considerable time had already passed, and nothing had been done. As far as he could see, Parliament would rise about the usual time; another Session would have passed, and nothing would have been done. He wanted to know, whether this state of things was to continue? The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the then Secretary to the Treasury—now First Lord of the Admiralty—were most anxious that some steps should be taken, and were keenly alive to the fact that by delay an enormous increase in the ultimate expenditure would be incurred. The buildings that it would be necessary to buy for the erection of the new Public Offices were increasing in value, and the knowledge that they would, at some time or other, have to be bought was inducing their present owners and occupiers to spend money on them, with a view to increased compensation. What was the case in France last year? The House well knew what the French nation had had to pay within the last year in the shape of war indemnity to Germany, and for her own charges and losses in connection with the war, yet the French Chamber last year voted £5,600,000 sterling for the improvement of Paris, and the Municipality of Paris voted another £2,000,000. In this country, however, Parliament would not vote £1,500,000 or £2,000,000, at most, in order that the War and Admiralty Departments might be properly housed, and Parliament Street, which, in its present state, was a disgrace to the country, be widened, so as to give a proper and adequate approach to the Houses of Parliament. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman for an assurance that the Session should not be allowed to pass without something being done to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that since he had had a seat in that House they had spent a great deal of money in building new and increasing and improving old Public Offices; but he failed to see any corresponding decrease in the expense of those Departments. He feared that if the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight had his way, and large new offices were built, the old ones would be kept on, and there would be an increase of expense, rather than a saving of public money.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he regretted that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present, as he had, on a previous occasion, stated some very cogent reasons against acting upon the scheme propounded by his hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), and which he seemed to have very much at heart. He did not think it could be said that the Government had ever accepted the site which the hon. Member referred to as being the only one which was possible for carrying out this work. There were as many as three sites under the consideration of the Government, and Papers on the subject had been before him in reference to the matter ever since he had had the honour of holding his present Office. In the interest of the Public Service, he thought the site suggested by his hon. Friend was not the one best suited for the purpose.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he had recommended no site. The site to which he referred was the one which the Government had chosen, and was not the one which he should have himself preferred.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON repeated, that the Government had decided upon no site at all. At the present moment they had before them three different sites, the advantages of which varied very considerably. He had concluded that the site which the hon. Member meant, was the one opposite to the new block of official buildings, inasmuch as he mentioned among its advantages the widening of Parliament Street. In his judgment, it would not be to the interest of the Public Service, and it certainly would not be to the interest of the public purse, that the site in question should be adopted. However much there might be of advantage in getting all the Public Offices concentrated in large blocks of building, this was not, perhaps, the time at which the country was financially prepared to enter upon a very large outlay for a work of that kind. The position of things was different from that which existed at the time when the Committee first sat to consider the matter. The War Office had been considerably improved by the purchase and addition to it of Winchester House and certain other buildings; and he doubted very much whether the noble Lord the present Secretary of State for India and former Minister for War would now think it so necessary as he once did to have a new War Office erected. It might be advantageous eventually to bring the whole of the War Office departments together on one site, and at a time when the country was in a position to undertake such a work, the improvement might be carried out, and the whole of the Public Offices concentrated. The answer which his right hon. Friend gave the other evening with regard to financial difficulties was the real reason which had caused the hesitation of the Government and the Treasury as to a decision upon the recommendations of the Committee, and the plans involved therein.

MR. ADAM admitted that the financial difficulty to which the hon. Baronet had referred was one which called for careful consideration. The plan was a very serious undertaking, and in the present state of the finances of the country, it might not be advisable to press the Government too strongly to carry out the recommendations which had been laid before them; but, at the same time, he hoped they would not lose sight of the matter, and would, as soon as possible, take it actively in hand. The expense now incurred in renting a large number of houses all over the town for use as temporary offices, and which would be saved by the erection of permanent ones, would go far towards paying the cost of a great many of the improvements. He wished to know whether any decision had been come to in reference to finishing or erecting the corner towers on the new building in Whitehall? The Committee would remember that the original plan of the late Sir Gilbert Scott included some very handsome cupola towers, which would have very considerably improved the appearance of the building. They would, without doubt, cost a great deal of money in the erection. He would like to know whether it was intended to build them; and, if not, how the corners were to be finished, for at present they were far from being strikingly handsome? He should also like to know whether the sum of £3,000 included in the Estimate for supplying water from Orange Street to the new Law Courts and to Somerset House would cover the whole expense; and, whether there was sufficient water in the wells to supply the other large public buildings? He supposed the Law Courts were hardly in a sufficient stage of advancement to require much water at present.

Mr. GERARD NOEL said, he thought the towers to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded were not approved; but were, in fact, condemned by one of his Predecessors in Office. Since then Sir Gilbert Scott produced some other plans and designs; but they also were considered unsatisfactory, and at the present moment he could not give any promise of the corners being completed. With regard to the water supply, as far as he was informed, the £3,000 asked for would be amply sufficient to provide all the necessary requirements. Most of the Public Offices were already supplied from Orange Street; but in order to meet any extra demands that might arise, the well had been deepened, and nothing more would be necessary to be done.

Mr. RYLANDS said, he was glad to hear that the Government were not prepared, at the present time, to enter upon a large and costly scheme for the erection of public buildings. The sum paid at present for the rent of temporary public offices seemed to him very large; but he supposed a portion of it would be saved when the Law Courts were completed, as doubtless some of the Departments might be accommodated there. A considerable economy might be effected by a careful scrutiny of the rents paid for hired buildings. It must be very well known that there were several Departments, the business of which was carried on in hired buildings whose work was of the most trifling character. For instance, £421 a-year were paid for an office for the Department of the Lord Privy Seal, who did nothing that could not be just as well done in a small room that could easily be spared in one of the Houses of Parliament, or in one of the existing Public Offices. He said this entirely apart from the fact that the holder of the Office was a distinguished sinecurist, and simply because the country was paying a large annual sum for the rent of an office in which absolutely nothing was done. Then, again, he found that the country was paying £310 a-year as the rent of 31, Lincoln's Inn Fields for a Land Registry Office, in which, practically, nothing was done. It might, however, be necessary in these two cases, and in the cases of other public Departments where little or no work was done that they should each have a local habitation. He was, however, prepared to mention to the Secretary to the Treasury, and also to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner, where they could find ample accommodation for those offices. He believed that at the top of the Houses of Parliament there were a number of rooms over the Committee Rooms, and those rooms were not occupied for any purpose at all; why should not those rooms be turned to some public service? There was no reason why they should not be made use of in place of offices in which there was very little business done. Why should not the Lord Privy Seal go there, and they would be saved £420 per annum, and he would be still further exalted? And why should not the Land Registry people go there too? There were many rooms in the Houses of Parliament, which, he understood, had never been utilized that might be used for the Public Service, and he believed if his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury would give his attention to the matter, he might find suitable accommodation for the purposes of such public offices as were wanted. He ventured to throw out that suggestion to the hon. Gentleman, by which he believed £2,000 or £3,000 per annum could be saved by utilizing the empty rooms at the top of the Houses of Parliament.

Mr. GREGORY said, he thought, as the result of some professional experience in connection with the acquisition of land, that it would be most unwise on the part of the Government to disclose the sites on which they had decided to erect public buildings. The proper course with a view to economy was gradually and silently to buy up the interests of persons owning or holding property which they might require, and then announce the use to which they intended to put it. By this means they would get what they wanted on reasonable terms; but if they stated beforehand what property they wanted, and for what purpose, the property would suddenly rise by, perhaps, 50 per cent in price. When they came to the Vote for the Law Courts, he hoped his right hon. Friend would be able to give some account of the progress that was being made with the works. If he was rightly informed, it would not be very long before the offices in connection with the Courts of Law which now occupied hired buildings would be removed into the rooms intended for them in the New Law Courts, that portion of the building being rapidly pushed forward. The contractor had laboured under most peculiar difficulties in consequence of strikes and other matters; but notwithstanding that he had done work which reflected great credit upon him, and had on the whole made very satisfactory progress.

MR. E. JENKINS was surprised when he heard that the Government had not yet fixed upon a site for carrying out the recommendations of the Select Committee to which reference had been made. It seemed curious that while taking a credit of £6,000,000 for war-like purposes, they could not afford £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 for a more peaceful and more useful object. The hon. Gentleman who made the statement must know perfectly well that notices to treat were served upon the occupiers and owners of the property between Great George Street and the Government buildings already erected in Whitehall, and between Queen Street and the Park. In one case, he believed, the Government actually took possession of one block of buildings, and he certainly could not reconcile these facts with the statement of the hon. Baronet. There were other two items in the Estimate which required explanation; one was a sum of £935 for adapting additional rooms at South Kensington for the National Portrait Gallery, and the other was a sum of £1,500 in connection with the Southern Galleries there. It was a curious fact that South Kensington appeared in some form or other in almost every Vote. The people connected with that institution managed to get hold of public money in almost every direction; and he thought it would be as well if all the money expended on that institution could be set forth in a concentrated form, so that the confusion which now existed could be unravelled. It was not at all clear that the £1,500, for instance, was not intended for the purpose of some exhibition for which Parliamentary sanction had not been obtained; or for some purpose connected with the Horticultural Gardens, or, indeed, for any other in-nominate purpose.

MR. GERARD NOEL, in answer to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), said, the questions relating to the Office of the Lord Privy Seal were too large to be discussed now, even if the occasion was an appropriate one, which it was not. He had no knowledge of the suite of rooms over the Committee Rooms, to which the hon. Member had referred. In any case, he did not see how rooms in such a position could be applied to the Public Service—at any rate in the manner suggested. The sum of £1,500 was not a new Vote, but had been paid for many years, as rent for rooms used in the course of the Civil Service examinations, and also in connection with the Science and Art Department, and for other purposes. The £935 would be used for the purpose of effecting the much-needed improvements in the National Portrait Gallery.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE did not think the sum set apart for the National Portrait Gallery was sufficient to make any substantial improvement in a gallery for the accommodation of some £70,000 worth of most valuable historical paintings.

MR. DILLWYN wished to have a distinct statement as to whether it was or was not intended to erect the new Public Offices.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he was afraid there was no intention, for the reasons he had already stated, to proceed at present.

MR. DILLWYN complained that, with regard to the Estimates generally, and with regard to these public buildings in particular, the Government did not take the Committee sufficiently into its confidence. Parliament found small items creeping into the Estimates, and they went on increasing from year to year without proper explanation, until they mounted up, in course of time, into very large sums indeed. When the Government proposed to erect new Public Offices, Museums, or anything else of that description, they should give the House as complete information on the subject as they possibly could, and not keep on tacking on bit by bit, and adding year by year, to the Estimates. When the latter course was followed, hon. Members not unnaturally cavilled, and looked much more closely at the Estimates than they would otherwise do. It was within his own knowledge that, from small beginnings, very bulky Estimates had frequently resulted. In the present instance, he should like to know what it was the Government really contemplated. Was it intended to complete or to commence certain buildings this year or not?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am not quite sure that I clearly understand what the scope of the hon. Gentleman's question is. I understood him to be speaking partly of any great plan for the re-construction of Public Offices, and partly of enlargements, from time to time, of existing buildings. With regard to the re-construction and re-organization of large blocks of buildings devoted to the Public Service, I entirely agree with him. I think that the Government ought to bring any plan of that sort before the House in such a shape that the House might be able to form a judgment as to its whole scope, and as to what its probable cost might be; and that, I will undertake to say, the present Government would be ready to promise. In reference to temporary, or rather occasional additions, to existing offices, that is a matter which must really be left to our judgment as the necessity may, from time to time, arise. Sometimes additions are made to collections in a Museum, which require that more room should be provided; sometimes it is found that a Department enlarges, and it is necessary to secure accommodation for extra clerks, or something of that kind; and, in these and other ways, additions have to be made from time to time, and those additions can only be brought forward as they are felt to be required. But with regard to any great scheme, such as that which, for several years now, has been more or less talked about, I quite concur with the hon. Gentleman that, whenever the Government are in a position to see their way to a conclusion as to what should be done, and are prepared to proceed with any particular scheme, they ought to come to the House, lay the plans upon the Table, and take the opinion of the House upon those plans before commencing work. I stated some little time ago, with regard to the War Office and the Admiralty, to which reference has so often been made, that we do not consider the present year to be a favourable one for undertaking a large expenditure on public buildings; and, therefore, although undoubtedly those offices are being carried on at some inconvenience, and although it is certainly desirable that before very long something should be done to provide more suitable accommodation—I do not think that we are actually in a position to make any proposal with regard to them at the present moment. But certain proposals have been under our consideration; and, when the proper time arrives, it will be our endeavour to adopt that plan, which, in our opinion, and in the opinion of the House, most combines efficiency with economy.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY said, he had been pleased to hear the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, that the improvements on the National Portrait Gallery would now be proceeded with. He should have experienced still more satisfaction in listening to the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, in reply to the question which had been addressed to him on that subject, had he not remembered that at the beginning of the Session, a precisely similar reply had been given to the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who was now Secretary of State for War, but who was at that time Secretary to the Treasury (Colonel Stanley). The right hon. and gallant Member had told his hon. Friend that the improvements on the National Portrait Gallery would be proceeded with immediately. Some months had passed since then, but nothing had been done; and, in these circumstances, he must express the hope that the "immediately" of the First Commissioner of Works would mean something more immediate and prompt than it had done in the case of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He observed that there was a sum for the National Gallery included in the Vote which was now before the Committee; and therefore he must express another hope, and that was that the hon. Gentleman would see his way towards keeping that Gallery open for a longer period during the summer months. There was a large number of persons, belonging to the mercantile and professional classes, who were practically debarred, at present, from the privilege of inspecting its large and interesting collections, because the time for closing the Gallery was fixed at what seemed to him an unnecessarily early hour. The National Gallery was a public institution which should be rendered more available during the summer evenings to those who, by their avocations, were precluded from visiting it in the course of the day. With reference to the Government Offices, of which mention had been made, he sincerely trusted that if the Government were really going to take that matter in hand, there would not be a repetition of the scandals which had arisen in connection with the Home Office, the Local Government Board Office, and other Offices. What advantage would be gained by transferring the War Office to new buildings if, when the new buildings were obtained, it was found that they were as ill-drained, as ill-ventilated, and as unsuitable in the matter of accommodation as the premises which had been left behind? He hoped that the House would be taken into the confidence of the Government on this subject; and that due opportunity would be given to it of examining the plans, of overhauling the work of the architects, and of securing for the Public Service some more healthy and suitable accommodation than those eminent men who designed public buildings seemed sometimes inclined to provide. He would say nothing of the sham architecture which hon. Members saw as they came down to the House, of the five-storeyed building which pretended to have but three storeys, or of the false architectural proportions by which the upper and lower floors had been completely sacrificed to the grand tier.

MR. GERARD NOEL said, he could assure the noble Lord that there had been no unnecessary delay in connection with the National Portrait Gallery. With regard to the hours during which the National Gallery should be kept open, that was a matter with which he had nothing to do.

MR. RYLANDS thought the noble Lord had made observations which were well worthy of the attention of the Government; but if the noble Lord supposed for a moment that Government Departments thought they could be mistaken, or that they believed Parliament could in any way assist them, he must have been somewhat unobservant of their general course of action. Government Departments, and the permanent officials of those Departments, always acted upon the idea that they knew better than anybody else what was good for everybody all over the Kingdom. What was the result? The noble Lord had called attention to the gross public scandals that had arisen in connection with important buildings which had been erected at an enormous expense, under the control of Public Departments, but which had become pestilential spots in consequence of the want of proper arrangements and the neglect of ordinary sanitary precautions. But under the Vote which the Committee were now asked to pass, there was an item of £2,000 for Broadmoor Asylum. That sum was asked for in connection with a building which was only erected some 15 years ago; but which, he understood, had been already condemned as a "White Elephant," which the Government must get rid of in some way. The Government, he believed, contemplated pulling it down; but that, and other charges of a similar nature, were constantly cropping up in relation to buildings which were found to be altogether unsuitable for the purposes for which they had been reared. He alluded to this for the purpose of remarking that when the Government Departments, and their permanent officials, were so often making such serious blunders, they ought not to arrogate to themselves immunity from error.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he believed that some criticism had been passed upon the work which had been performed in connection with St. Margaret's Church. He thought it only right to say, out of regard to the very eminent architect under whom that work had been carried out, that the result of his labours had been a very careful and accurate revival of the building as it had appeared in the age of Henry VIII.

MR. DILLWYN said, that before the Vote was passed he should like to have some explanation with respect to the item of Ordnance Survey Maintenance Offices. In that item he observed a considerable increase. Last year the amount was £1,050; this year it was £2,520. ~~That~~ increase had been made in a pushing on of the work. There was no complaint to make; but he had heard objections in many quarters that the completion of the Survey had already been too long delayed. He did not know how the additional accommodation which was represented by the increase in the Vote was likely to advance the rate at which the work would be proceeded with; and, certainly, if that increase had merely the effect of rendering those who were engaged in the work more comfortable, the result, he was afraid, would be still greater delay in its completion.

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the increase to which the hon. Member referred had arisen from the absolute necessity of increased accommodation.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £11,650, to complete the sum for Furniture of Public Offices.

(6.) £141,045, to complete the sum for the Revenue Department Buildings, Great Britain.

(7.) £33,330, to complete the sum for County Court Buildings.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he found in connection with this Vote, another instance of that which was constantly occurring throughout the Estimates. He observed that the Liverpool County Court had been estimated to cost £32,000; but now the figure was £40,000. That was what generally happened. A certain sum was mentioned originally, and this sum was relied on; but the architect afterwards came forward with an increased Estimate, and the House looked at it, and passed it. He should like to know whether, in this particular case, the increased Estimate of £40,000 was likely to cover all the expenditure?

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the explanation of the increase which had taken place was very simple. The building referred to had been originally intended simply for the purposes of a County Court; but, in addition to the business of such a Court, it would now be devoted also to Registration and Inland Revenue purposes.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £11,534, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police Court Buildings.

MR. RYLANDS said, he should like to have an assurance that the Estimate, as a whole, would not be exceeded. He had great doubts as to whether these grants ought to be made to the Metropolitan Police Courts at all. In the provinces such charges were borne by the local authorities; and he did not see why such should not be the case in London. In one particular case, that of Bow Street, a new building had been but recently commenced; and he recollected that last year a Vote on account was proposed in connection with the expenditure which its erection would probably necessitate. At that time he objected, because the House had not been furnished with an Estimate of the total amount that would be required, and the Government were good enough to postpone the Vote in consequence. But, then, the ordinary course of things happened. The Vote was adjourned for some time; and he remembered being told by one of the police magistrates that great inconvenience was being caused in consequence of the uncertainty which existed as to whether the Vote would be proceeded with or not. At the end of the Session, however, when it was impossible to give proper attention to the question, the Vote was passed. He was not sure whether hon. Members who were interested in the matter were present on that occasion—at all events, a Vote which had been hung up for some months was taken at a time, when, necessarily, it could not be considered in such a way as its importance demanded. He could not say that he was prepared to state, upon recollection, whether before that Vote on account was brought forward, there was an Estimate laid on the Table of the House as to the total sum which would be required; but he presumed, and took for granted, that there was. But, whether that were so, or not, he desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, whether he could give a positive assurance that the Estimate of £30,000 for Bow Street would cover the cost, or whether it would become £35,000, £40,000, or £50,000?

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the hon. Gentleman was perfectly right. Last year there was no time for the preparation of a formal Estimate in connection with Bow Street, and the Vote was withdrawn; but a general Estimate was made, and he had great hopes that that general Estimate would not be exceeded. It was impossible, however, to give the hon. Gentleman an absolute assurance on the matter; but the Estimate had been framed in the most careful manner.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £90,300, to complete the sum for the New Courts of Justices and Offices.

MR. ADAM asked the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he could give any information to the Committee as to the progress of the buildings?

MR. GERARD NOEL said, that the works ought to have been completed on the 1st of December last, even giving an allowance to the extent of three months, which was allowed by the strike clauses in the contract; but, he was sorry to say, that, in consequence of the masons' strike, they had not progressed in a satisfactory manner during that month and the months of January and February. Since the contractors had obtained foreign labour, however, considerable progress had been made; and he hoped that by the end of September or October the eastern portion of the buildings would be opened.

(10.) £100,200, to complete the sum for the Survey of the United Kingdom.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he desired to ask his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works, a question on the subject to which the Vote referred. It had been stated in that House about a fortnight ago, that it would be 18 years before the Survey was finished; and when that statement was made there was a general feeling on the part of hon. Members that the work ought to be completed as soon as possible. He now wished to ask his right hon. Friend, whether he had had any communication with the Treasury on the subject; and, whether there was any hope or prospect of the Survey being brought to a conclusion with greater rapidity? Nothing could be of more importance to the country than that the Survey should be completed without delay. He could speak without any prejudice on the matter; because the whole of his own county had been surveyed, and he was only anxious that others who had not been so fortunate should have their counties surveyed as well. This was one of those works which ought to be pressed forward; and he was sure that the Committee would agree to any recommendation which the Government might bring forward for bringing the Survey to a speedy termination.

MR. GERARD NOEL thought he might say that the Survey of the United Kingdom was going on satisfactorily, so far as the sum voted by Parliament would permit. Up to a certain point the experience of the Director of the Survey had been based on what had been done in the Northern parts of England, which were purely agricultural counties; but, when he came to the Midland district, where there were coal, iron, and large towns and villages, the difficulties to contend with were much greater, and the Survey had not, perhaps, been as rapid as might have been anticipated. He might state that 13 counties in England had now been surveyed; that 17 others were in process of being surveyed; and that all Scotland and the greater part, if not the whole, of Ireland had also been surveyed. He had communicated a short time ago with the Director of the Survey, and had asked him whether, in the event of the Parliamentary grant being doubled, he could finish the work in from five to ten years. The gentleman to whom he referred had replied that he did not think it would be possible to complete the Survey of England and Wales in that time, inasmuch as a sufficient number of eligible men could not be secured for the purpose, and that even if the grant were largely increased the Survey, in all probability, would still take 12 or 14 years.

SIR ANDREW LUSK remarked that questions and answers on this subject were becoming tiresome. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had just made a statement precisely similar to that which he remembered hearing in the House 14 years ago. Every year the Government were asked—"How is the Ordnance Survey getting on?" and the reply was—"Oh! we are getting on as well as can be expected." To all those who were really interested in this matter the delay which had taken place with the Survey was most disappointing; and, so far as he was concerned, he should like to know on what principle the work was being carried out. Any little land which he possessed had been surveyed twice during recent years. Having gone over it once, the surveyors had put up a pole with a flag on it; and had not come back until after the lapse of four years. Why was it that the survey was not in some way facilitated? If one of the well-conducted railway companies desired to examine a district, and to bring the results before Parliament, they would go over an enormous amount of ground in a very short time, and, having done so, they would come to the Legislature with very accurate plans and specifications. But in this matter of the survey the result was the same year after year; and, if matters went on as they had been doing, the result of the whole work would be of comparatively little use, for, by the time the survey would be finished, almost a new generation would have sprung up, and almost everything would have materially changed.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, there were, no doubt, vested interests connected with this survey question which it was somewhat difficult to get rid of; but, from information which he had received from other quarters, he did not think there was any real foundation for the difficulties which appeared to have been suggested by the gentleman who was at the head of the work. The present staff might be insufficient; but it might easily be increased if money were forthcoming to pay for additional men. Hon. Members must know that, at the present time, the number of engineers and surveyors in this country was excessive. There were many such men who were employed only half their time and at unremunerative rates; and all that was required was to get some of those men—skilled and trained—to assist in the work. There was nothing magical in the Ordnance Survey, as compared with surveys made for landowners and railway companies. The present Ordnance Survey on the large scale was, in appearance, like an ordinary estate survey. There might be some little difficulty, no doubt, in the mountainous districts; but those districts were limited in extent. There would be no difficulty whatever as regarded the portions of England that were not mountainous; and, by employing other surveyors to help with the work, the survey might be completed within a reasonable time. If it was worth doing at all, it ought to be done quickly. If it was of value to the country, the sooner it was done the better. Why should future generations alone have the benefit of it?

(11.) £11,509, to complete the sum for the Science and Art Department Buildings.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he observed that it was proposed under the Vote to take an addition of £1,000 for the enlargement of a sketch by Mr. Leighton. He should like to know what the sketch was? Was it a sketch of the plans of the new buildings which had not been estimated for, or was it a sketch upon the walls of the interior? Again, there was an item for "works and internal decorations;" but this was only another instance of the fact that the Estimates had been so manipulated that hon. Members were not really able to find out how the money which they were asked to vote was expended. That might seem a strong statement to make; but he could prove it. There were items for "works and internal decorations," for "schools," for "ordinary maintenance and repairs;" and, further on, there was a very large Vote taken in connection with the South Kensington Museum—for artizans, for labourers, for repairs, and for incidental expenses of various kinds, all of which might be included under the same head, and in reference to which, undoubtedly, persons were employed. But the Estimates were so presented that it was almost impossible to separate the different items, and to ascertain exactly what amount was expended in this or that direction. Money was voted under the general heads, "Repairs," "Artizans," "Students," &c.; but Parliament was not furnished with any detailed information on the subject. Whether intentionally or not the science of bungling statistics, and of deceiving people by so bungling them, had been carried to perfection in connection with South Kensington Museum; and it was full time that the Committee should make a stand against the way in which these accounts were presented to the House. There were various Departments which appeared to be over-lapping each other in the most extraordinary manner; and at the present time it was impossible exactly to define how much money went to the Science and Art Department, how much to South Kensington, and how much to other bodies who had a temporary or permanent resting-place in that focus of genius.

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the sketch by Mr. Leighton, to which the hon. Member had referred, was not a design of the buildings, but a picture for which a Vote had already been passed in the House. The picture was to be seen in one of the Central Halls, and was, if he might so express it, in continuation of another piece of decoration which had also been already sanctioned. About £1,025 had been expended in works of internal decoration; and £125 remained to be applied to the embellishment of the Refreshment Room, the South Court, and the Lecture Hall. With regard to the other remarks of the hon. Member, he hoped to be able to give him a satisfactory explanation when a subsequent Vote was reached.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was glad that the hon. Member for Dundee had called attention to this Estimate on the present occasion. He had often heard discussions upon it; and he was not surprised that these discussions had taken place. South Kensington did not appear to be governed by the same rules which were in operation in other establishments of a similar nature. There were payments for sketches by Mr. Leighton, and for so-called decorations; but, if really good decorations were wanted, why not employ proper professional men to do the work, as was done in the British Museum, the National Gallery, and other places? The loose way of spending money in carrying out decorations, which prevailed in South Kensington, was not followed in other institutions where there was a real love of pure Art. Indeed, he doubted whether either Science or Art was pure at South Kensington. He thought the Committee should regard with the greatest jealousy the way in which the accounts were drawn up. As those accounts were now brought forward, it was extremely difficult to find out what was really done in connection with that institution every year; and, in his opinion, there ought to be a Committee appointed to inquire into the subject. He objected very much to the money which was voted for South Kensington; because he did not think that, under existing arrangements, that establishment tended to promote real Science or Art at all. He was glad that the question had been brought forward; and that he had an opportunity of making an emphatic protest against the perpetuation of the present way of bringing the Estimates before the Committee.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT could not understand what became of the money which was voted for the South Kensington Museum. Nearly every item of the expenditure upon it was over-estimated; and he wished to draw the attention of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury particularly to the subject, in order that as accurate an Estimate as possible might in future be presented to the House, and that money voted for one specific object might not be expended on another. He did not for one moment mean to say that there was any intention to deceive the House in the matter; but it was quite clear the accounts in connection with the Science and Art Department were not so correctly kept as in other Departments. He should prefer to see a Supplementary Estimate asked for, to having a larger sum than was required voted for an establishment such as South Kensington.

MR. J. COWEN had no desire unnecessarily to prolong the present discussion, but could not refrain from recording his protest against the systematic attempts which were made to disparage an institution like South Kensington, of whose value, in an educational point of view, direct proof was being given at the present moment. The magnificent specimens of English pottery which were to be seen at the Paris Exhibition were, he did not hesitate to say, to a great extent due to the educational influence which was exercised by that institution. Those specimens reflected great honour and credit on this country; and but for the existence of South Kensington we should not, he believed, have them to boast of.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER entirely concurred in the observations which had fallen from his hon. Friend who spoke last, and must strongly protest against the Museum being described, as it had been by another hon. Friend of his, as a peep-show. He looked upon South Kensington as being of the utmost importance in opening peoples eyes to what, in reality, constituted true Art. In England there was only one style of Art cultivated—the Gothic; but those who went to South Kensington had the opportunity afforded them of seeing the Italian and other styles of Art, and he felt quite sure that artists and others who did not happen to have travelled on the Continent, derived great advantage from their visits to the Museum where they found specimens of good taste and pure Art.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON could assure the Committee that neither he nor his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works wished at all to undervalue the educational influences of South Kensington Museum; neither did he understand his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) to have spoken in disparagement of those influences. His hon. and gallant Friend had merely called attention to a matter of accounts; and he must at once admit that it was the duty of the Secretary to the Treasury to take care that the Estimates presented to the House really accorded with the expenditure which was incurred within the financial year for which they were proposed. The object of the Estimate, in the present instance, would certainly not be attained if the Government were to show any disposition to depreciate Art.

SIR ANDREW LUSK, while fully recognizing the value of Art, and while desirous of promoting its progress in every legitimate way, could not help, at the same time, thinking that a great deal of money was wasted in connection with the Museum at South Kensington. He very well recollected when considerable defalcations had been discovered there; and he hoped, therefore, the accounts would be presented to the House in such a way that hon. Members might be able to see how the money voted for the Museum was actually spent.

(12.) £3,795, to complete the sum for British Museum Buildings.

(13.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £60,050, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1879, for the Erection of a Natural History Museum.”

MR. E. JENKINS rose to move that the Vote be struck out. The original Estimate for the erection of the Natural History Museum was £350,000. A revised Estimate was subsequently presented to the House for £45,000 more, or £395,000. Last year he asked the noble Lord who, at the time, occupied the position of Vice President of the Committee of Council for Education (Viscount Sandon)—but who had since been raised to a higher office—whether the new building which he had been watching with the greatest interest for some time was likely to be completed for anything like the sum set forth in the revised Estimate? and the reply was that more money would be required. Well, not only had the whole of the £395,000 which he had just mentioned been expended, but what was called an approximate Estimate, amounting to £177,750, was presented for the purpose of putting fixings and fittings in the new building. Under these circumstances, he should like to have some explanation from the First Commissioner of Works on the subject. He should like to know whether, in the original plan of the building, it was contemplated to erect those annexes which had since been added, and which were to be seen sprawling behind it in that part of South Kensington in which it was situated? As for the building itself, it was almost a disgrace to the architecture of the metropolis. Looked at from one point of view, it had the appearance of a home for lost dogs, with its gargoyles, corbels, and mastiffs; from another, it reminded one of a cattle-market; while any person seeing it from the rear would imagine it was a railway station. Such was the building for which the Committee were asked to pay an enormous sum in excess of the original Estimate. Was that excess to be accounted for by the fact that a number of new annexes had been added in the rear of the building, and a sort of Campanile tower? he did not know exactly what it was termed in architecture. The matter required explanation; and, as a protest against the mode of proceeding to which he had called the attention of the Committee, he should move that the Vote be omitted.

MR. GERARD NOEL said, that it was not until after the original Estimate had been framed that it had been determined to make the additions to the building to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Fixtures had also to be put up.

MR. E. JENKINS pointed out that the original Estimate included the cost of those fixtures.

MR. GERARD NOEL replied that it did not include the entire cost, and that, besides, it had been found necessary to provide fittings for the exhibition of the different specimens of animals—as, for example, the specimens which had been brought from India.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he was not satisfied with the explanation. He understood that the original Estimate was to include everything, except the construction of cases in which to place the animals.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the words “internal fittings” were not in the original Estimate, and that it was necessary to have proper cases for the collection. A special contract had been entered into showing the amount of work to be done, and the sum which was to be paid for it, and that contract, having been carefully examined, had been sanctioned by the Treasury.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he would divide the Committee against the Vote, and would also move that the original Estimate, as well as the new Estimate, should be laid on the Table of the House.

MR. DILLWYN wished to know, whether any Estimate had been drawn up for the making of the cases? The approximate Estimate appeared to him to be very vague.

MR. HERSCHELL asked, what was to become of the cases in which the animals had hitherto been exhibited? Were they to be transferred from the British Museum, or left behind and entirely new ones constructed?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the question was a difficult one to answer. The cases at present in use might not be found to fit the new building. They might, in many instances, be either too small or too large.

Mr. E. Jenkins

MR. MONK would recommend his hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) not to divide the Committee against the entire Vote. There was, however, an item of £20,000 for internal fittings, which he thought the Committee ought not to be asked to vote until full information was laid before them as to what those fittings were to be.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he would accept the suggestion of his hon. Friend, and move not the omission of the Vote, but its reduction by the sum of £20,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR PHILIP EGERTON said, the Trustees of the British Museum had pressed the Treasury very hard with respect to the construction of cases, which was a matter of considerable difficulty, inasmuch as it was necessary to provide for the exclusion of dust, the prevention of depredations, and the exhibition of the various specimens to the best possible advantage. They had to ask that experimental cases should be made of the very best kind; and in that fact some reason might, he thought, be found for the proposal of an approximate Estimate. It was stated in evidence, by the heads of departments, that the fittings of the Museum might be delayed in transmission a period of six months, and the Trustees had, therefore, been exceedingly anxious to procure the cases. The increase in the Estimate for the new building might, he believed, be ascribed in a great degree to the decision which had been arrived at to carry one of the towers to the height which was originally proposed, and so to provide a sufficient elevation for a tank by means of which an adequate supply of water might be secured.

SIR ANDREW LUSK should like to know who was responsible for the work? Things, it appeared to him, were conducted in a very loose way at South Kensington. In the present case, there really seemed to be nobody who knew anything either about the contract or the Estimate.

Question put, and negatived.

(14.) £11,283, to complete the sum for Harbours, &c. under the Board of Trade.

MR. MONK asked, what harbours were included in the Vote? In the case of Harwich, which he found mentioned as one of them, there were, he believed, certain dues which covered the Vote; but there were no such dues in connection with the harbours of Dover and Holyhead. Why, too, he should like to know, was the Committee called upon to vote money for the two last-named harbours and not for Folkestone. Again, there was a sum set down for repairs at Spurn Point; why was that sum to be paid by the country instead of by the local authorities? He could understand why a grant should be made in the case of Dover and Holyhead, because they were packet-stations, but Spurn Point had no such claim.

VISCOUNT SANDON pointed out that Dover and Holyhead were harbours of great importance in a national point of view, and that the arrangement in the case of Harwich was one of very old standing. He was sorry to say he could not give his hon. Friend any further information at present; but he would take care that the whole subject should be carefully inquired into.

MR. MONK was obliged to the noble Viscount for his information, but it really amounted to nothing at all. The noble Viscount said nothing about Spurn Point. Unless some more satisfactory explanation were given, he should feel it to be his duty to divide the Committee against the Vote.

MR. NORWOOD said, that Spurn Point was a narrow slip of land at the northern entrance of the Humber, on the extremity of which was an important lighthouse, the safety of which was threatened by the action of the sea, which the Board of Trade was endeavouring to arrest by groynes, &c.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON would remind the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) that there were certain harbours in receipt of aid from the Government, because they were harbours of refuge. Dover, which had been transferred to the control of the Board of Trade in 1866, was one of those harbours, and Spurn Point was another.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he would explain more fully the details of the Vote on a future occasion.

(15.) £133,091, to complete the sum for rates on Government property.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked, whether the allowances granted in lieu of rates were made upon any principle, or simply by guess-work, and whether a certain sum was allowed by arrangement to one locality, and a certain sum to another? It seemed to him that the local rates on Government property should be levied upon the same principle as upon every other kind of property, there being some one to represent the Government as well as the local authorities, to see that the assessment was a fair one.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that the sum contributed was regulated according to the amount at which the property in question would be rated if it did not belong to the Government.

(16.) £7,500, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Fire Brigade.

MR. HAYTER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, what steps had been taken to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee which sat a short time ago to inquire into the constitution and management of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, and over which the hon. Baronet himself had so ably presided? Was it the intention of the Government, he should like to know, to transfer the control of the Brigade, in accordance with one of those recommendations, from the Metropolitan Board of Works to the Secretary of State for the Home Department? As to another recommendation—the transference of the central station from Watling Street to Southwark Bridge—he saw by the newspapers that that had been acted upon within the last few days. But perhaps the hon. Baronet could inform him whether it was proposed to make any addition to the number of men in the Brigade? as the force was at present seriously overworked in the performance of its duties.

the Law Courts, he hoped his right hon. Friend would be able to give some account of the progress that was being made with the works. If he was rightly informed, it would not be very long before the offices in connection with the Courts of Law which now occupied hired buildings would be removed into the rooms intended for them in the New Law Courts, that portion of the building being rapidly pushed forward. The contractor had laboured under most peculiar difficulties in consequence of strikes and other matters; but notwithstanding that he had done work which reflected great credit upon him, and had on the whole made very satisfactory progress.

MR. E. JENKINS was surprised when he heard that the Government had not yet fixed upon a site for carrying out the recommendations of the Select Committee to which reference had been made. It seemed curious that while taking a credit of £6,000,000 for war-like purposes, they could not afford £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 for a more peaceful and more useful object. The hon. Gentleman who made the statement must know perfectly well that notices to treat were served upon the occupiers and owners of the property between Great George Street and the Government buildings already erected in Whitehall, and between Queen Street and the Park. In one case, he believed, the Government actually took possession of one block of buildings, and he certainly could not reconcile these facts with the statement of the hon. Baronet. There were other two items in the Estimate which required explanation; one was a sum of £935 for adapting additional rooms at South Kensington for the National Portrait Gallery, and the other was a sum of £1,500 in connection with the Southern Galleries there. It was a curious fact that South Kensington appeared in some form or other in almost every Vote. The people connected with that institution managed to get hold of public money in almost every direction; and he thought it would be as well if all the money expended on that institution could be set forth in a concentrated form, so that the confusion which now existed could be unravelled. It was not at all clear that the £1,500, for instance, was not intended for the purpose of some exhibition for which Parliamentary sanction had not been obtained; or for some purpose connected with the Horticultural Gardens, or, indeed, for any other in-nominate purpose.

MR. GERARD NOEL, in answer to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), said, the questions relating to the Office of the Lord Privy Seal were too large to be discussed now, even if the occasion was an appropriate one, which it was not. He had no knowledge of the suite of rooms over the Committee Rooms, to which the hon. Member had referred. In any case, he did not see how rooms in such a position could be applied to the Public Service—at any rate in the manner suggested. The sum of £1,500 was not a new Vote, but had been paid for many years, as rent for rooms used in the course of the Civil Service examinations, and also in connection with the Science and Art Department, and for other purposes. The £935 would be used for the purpose of effecting the much-needed improvements in the National Portrait Gallery.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE did not think the sum set apart for the National Portrait Gallery was sufficient to make any substantial improvement in a gallery for the accommodation of some £70,000 worth of most valuable historical paintings.

MR. DILLWYN wished to have a distinct statement as to whether it was or was not intended to erect the new Public Offices.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he was afraid there was no intention, for the reasons he had already stated, to proceed at present.

MR. DILLWYN complained that, with regard to the Estimates generally, and with regard to these public buildings in particular, the Government did not take the Committee sufficiently into its confidence. Parliament found small items creeping into the Estimates, and they went on increasing from year to year without proper explanation, until they mounted up, in course of time, into very large sums indeed. When the Government proposed to erect new Public Offices, Museums, or anything else of that description, they should give the House as complete information on the subject as they possibly could, and not keep on tacking on bit by bit, and adding year by year, to the Estimates. When the latter course was followed, hon. Members not unnaturally cavilled, and looked much more closely at the Estimates than they would otherwise do. It was within his own knowledge that, from small beginnings, very bulky Estimates had frequently resulted. In the present instance, he should like to know what it was the Government really contemplated. Was it intended to complete or to commence certain buildings this year or not?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am not quite sure that I clearly understand what the scope of the hon. Gentleman's question is. I understood him to be speaking partly of any great plan for the re-construction of Public Offices, and partly of enlargements, from time to time, of existing buildings. With regard to the re-construction and re-organization of large blocks of buildings devoted to the Public Service, I entirely agree with him. I think that the Government ought to bring any plan of that sort before the House in such a shape that the House might be able to form a judgment as to its whole scope, and as to what its probable cost might be; and that, I will undertake to say, the present Government would be ready to promise. In reference to temporary, or rather occasional additions, to existing offices, that is a matter which must really be left to our judgment as the necessity may, from time to time, arise. Sometimes additions are made to collections in a Museum, which require that more room should be provided; sometimes it is found that a Department enlarges, and it is necessary to secure accommodation for extra clerks, or something of that kind; and, in these and other ways, additions have to be made from time to time, and those additions can only be brought forward as they are felt to be required. But with regard to any great scheme, such as that which, for several years now, has been more or less talked about, I quite concur with the hon. Gentleman that, whenever the Government are in a position to see their way to a conclusion as to what should be done, and are prepared to proceed with any particular scheme, they ought to come to the House, lay the plans upon the Table, and take the opinion of the House upon those plans before commencing work. I stated some little time ago, with regard to the War Office and the Admiralty, to which reference has so often been made, that we do not consider the present year to be a favourable one for undertaking a large expenditure on public buildings; and, therefore, although undoubtedly those offices are being carried on at some inconvenience, and although it is certainly desirable that before very long something should be done to provide more suitable accommodation—I do not think that we are actually in a position to make any proposal with regard to them at the present moment. But certain proposals have been under our consideration; and, when the proper time arrives, it will be our endeavour to adopt that plan, which, in our opinion, and in the opinion of the House, most combines efficiency with economy.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY said, he had been pleased to hear the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, that the improvements on the National Portrait Gallery would now be proceeded with. He should have experienced still more satisfaction in listening to the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, in reply to the question which had been addressed to him on that subject, had he not remembered that at the beginning of the Session, a precisely similar reply had been given to the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who was now Secretary of State for War, but who was at that time Secretary to the Treasury (Colonel Stanley). The right hon. and gallant Member had told his hon. Friend that the improvements on the National Portrait Gallery would be proceeded with immediately. Some months had passed since then, but nothing had been done; and, in these circumstances, he must express the hope that the "immediately" of the First Commissioner of Works would mean something more immediate and prompt than it had done in the case of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He observed that there was a sum for the National Gallery included in the Vote which was now before the Committee; and therefore he must express another hope, and that was that the hon. Gentleman would see his way towards keeping that Gallery open for a longer period during the summer months. There was a large number of persons, belonging to the mercantile and professional classes, who were practically debarred, at present, from the privilege of inspecting its large and interesting collections, because the time for closing the Gallery was fixed at what seemed to him an unnecessarily early hour. The National Gallery was a public institution which should be rendered more available during the summer evenings to those who, by their avocations, were precluded from visiting it in the course of the day. With reference to the Government Offices, of which mention had been made, he sincerely trusted that if the Government were really going to take that matter in hand, there would not be a repetition of the scandals which had arisen in connection with the Home Office, the Local Government Board Office, and other Offices. What advantage would be gained by transferring the War Office to new buildings if, when the new buildings were obtained, it was found that they were as ill-drained, as ill-ventilated, and as unsuitable in the matter of accommodation as the premises which had been left behind? He hoped that the House would be taken into the confidence of the Government on this subject; and that due opportunity would be given to it of examining the plans, of overhauling the work of the architects, and of securing for the Public Service some more healthy and suitable accommodation than those eminent men who designed public buildings seemed sometimes inclined to provide. He would say nothing of the sham architecture which hon. Members saw as they came down to the House, of the five-storeyed building which pretended to have but three storeys, or of the false architectural proportions by which the upper and lower floors had been completely sacrificed to the grand tier.

MR. GERARD NOEL said, he could assure the noble Lord that there had been no unnecessary delay in connection with the National Portrait Gallery. With regard to the hours during which the National Gallery should be kept open, that was a matter with which he had nothing to do.

MR. RYLANDS thought the noble Lord had made observations which were well worthy of the attention of the Government; but if the noble Lord supposed for a moment that Government Departments thought they could be mistaken, or that they believed Parliament could in any way assist them, he must have been somewhat unobservant of their general course of action. Government Departments, and the permanent officials of those Departments, always acted upon the idea that they knew better than anybody else what was good for everybody all over the Kingdom. What was the result? The noble Lord had called attention to the gross public scandals that had arisen in connection with important buildings which had been erected at an enormous expense, under the control of Public Departments, but which had become pestilential spots in consequence of the want of proper arrangements and the neglect of ordinary sanitary precautions. But under the Vote which the Committee were now asked to pass, there was an item of £2,000 for Broadmoor Asylum. That sum was asked for in connection with a building which was only erected some 15 years ago; but which, he understood, had been already condemned as a "White Elephant," which the Government must get rid of in some way. The Government, he believed, contemplated pulling it down; but that, and other charges of a similar nature, were constantly cropping up in relation to buildings which were found to be altogether unsuitable for the purposes for which they had been reared. He alluded to this for the purpose of remarking that when the Government Departments, and their permanent officials, were so often making such serious blunders, they ought not to arrogate to themselves immunity from error.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he believed that some criticism had been passed upon the work which had been performed in connection with St. Margaret's Church. He thought it only right to say, out of regard to the very eminent architect under whom that work had been carried out, that the result of his labours had been a very careful and accurate revival of the building as it had appeared in the age of Henry VIII.

MR. DILLWYN said, that before the Vote was passed he should like to have some explanation with respect to the item of Ordnance Survey Maintenance Offices. In that item he observed a considerable increase. Last year the amount was £1,050; this year it was £2,520. If that increase had been made in consequence of a pushing on of the work, he should have no complaint to make; but he had heard objections in many quarters that the completion of the Survey had already been too long delayed. He did not know how the additional accommodation which was represented by the increase in the Vote was likely to advance the rate at which the work would be proceeded with; and, certainly, if that increase had merely the effect of rendering those who were engaged in the work more comfortable, the result, he was afraid, would be still greater delay in its completion.

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the increase to which the hon. Member referred had arisen from the absolute necessity of increased accommodation.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £11,650, to complete the sum for Furniture of Public Offices.

(7.) £33,330, to complete the sum for County Court Buildings.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he found in connection with this Vote, another instance of that which was constantly occurring throughout the Estimates. He observed that the Liverpool County Court had been estimated to cost £32,000; but now the figure was £40,000. That was what generally happened. A certain sum was mentioned originally, and this sum was relied on; but the architect afterwards came forward with an increased Estimate, and the House looked at it, and passed it. He should like to know whether, in this particular case, the increased Estimate of £40,000 was likely to cover all the expenditure?

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the explanation of the increase which had taken place was very simple. The building referred to had been originally intended simply for the purposes of a County Court; but, in addition to the business of such a Court, it would now be devoted also to Registration and Inland Revenue purposes.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £11,534, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police Court Buildings.

MR. RYLANDS said, he should like to have an assurance that the Estimate, as a whole, would not be exceeded. He had great doubts as to whether these grants ought to be made to the Metropolitan Police Courts at all. In the provinces such charges were borne by the local authorities; and he did not see why such should not be the case in London. In one particular case, that of Bow Street, a new building had been but recently commenced; and he recollected that last year a Vote on account was proposed in connection with the expenditure which its erection would probably necessitate. At that time he objected, because the House had not been furnished with an Estimate of the total amount that would be required, and the Government were good enough to postpone the Vote in consequence. But, then, the ordinary course of things happened. The Vote was adjourned for some time; and he remembered being told by one of the police magistrates that great inconvenience was being caused in consequence of the uncertainty which existed as to whether the Vote would be proceeded with or not. At the end of the Session, however, when it was impossible to give proper attention to the question, the Vote was passed. He was not sure whether hon. Members who were interested in the matter were present on that occasion—at all events, a Vote which had been hung up for some months was taken at a time, when, necessarily, it could not be considered in such a way as its importance demanded. He could not say that he was prepared to state, upon recollection, whether before that Vote on account was brought forward, there was an Estimate laid on the Table of the House as to the total sum which would be required; but he presumed, and took for granted, that there was. But, whether that were so, or not, he desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, whether he could give a positive assurance that the Estimate of £30,000 for Bow Street would cover the cost, or whether it would become £35,000, £40,000, or £50,000?

MR. GERARD NOEL said, the hon. Gentleman was perfectly right. Last year there was no time for the preparation of a formal Estimate in connection with Bow Street, and the Vote was withdrawn; but a general Estimate was made, and he had great hopes that that general Estimate would not be exceeded. It was impossible, however, to give the hon. Gentleman an absolute assurance on the matter; but the Estimate had been framed in the most careful manner.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £90,300, to complete the sum for the New Courts of Justices and Offices.

MR. ADAM asked the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he could give any information to the Committee as to the progress of the buildings?

MR. GERARD NOEL said, that the works ought to have been completed on the 1st of December last, even giving an allowance to the extent of three months, which was allowed by the strike clauses in the contract; but, he was sorry to say, that, in consequence of the masons' strike, they had not progressed in a satisfactory manner during that month and the months of January and February. Since the contractors had obtained foreign labour, however, considerable progress had been made; and he hoped that by the end of September or October the eastern portion of the buildings would be opened.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he desired to ask his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works, a question on the subject to which the Vote referred. It had been stated in that House about a fortnight ago, that it would be 18 years before the Survey was finished; and when that statement was made there was a general feeling on the part of hon. Members that the work ought to be completed as soon as possible. He now wished to ask his right hon. Friend, whether he had had any communication with the Treasury on the subject; and, whether there was any hope or prospect of the Survey being brought to a conclusion with greater rapidity? Nothing could be of more importance to the country than that the Survey should be completed without delay. He could speak without any prejudice on the matter; because the whole of his own county had been surveyed, and he was only anxious that others who had not been so fortunate should have their counties surveyed as well. This was one of those works which ought to be pressed forward; and he was sure that the Committee would agree to any recommendation which the Government might bring forward for bringing the Survey to a speedy termination.

MR. GERARD NOEL thought he might say that the Survey of the United Kingdom was going on satisfactorily, so far as the sum voted by Parliament would permit. Up to a certain point the experience of the Director of the Survey had been based on what had been done in the Northern parts of England, which were purely agricultural counties; but, when he came to the Midland district, where there were coal, iron, and large towns and villages, the difficulties to contend with were much greater, and the Survey had not, perhaps, been as rapid as might have been anticipated. He might state that 13 counties in England had now been surveyed; that 17 others were in process of being surveyed; and that all Scotland and the greater part, if not the whole, of Ireland had also been surveyed. He had communicated a short time ago with the Director of the Survey, and had asked him whether, in the event of the Parliamentary grant being doubled, he could finish the work in from five to ten years. The gentleman to whom he referred had replied that he did not think it would be possible to complete the Survey of England and Wales in that time, inasmuch as a sufficient number of eligible men could not be secured for the purpose, and that even if the grant were largely increased the Survey, in all probability, would still take 12 or 14 years.

SIR ANDREW LUSK remarked that questions and answers on this subject were becoming tiresome. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had just made a statement precisely similar to that which he remembered hearing in the House 14 years ago. Every year the Government were asked—"How is the Ordnance Survey getting on?" and the reply was—"Oh! we are getting on as well as can be expected." To all those who were really interested in this matter the delay which had taken place with the Survey was most disappointing; and, so far as he was concerned, he should like to know on what principle the work was being carried out. Any little land which he possessed had been surveyed twice during recent years. Having gone over it once, the surveyors had put up a pole with a flag on it; and had not come back until after the lapse of four years. Why was it that the survey was not in some way facilitated? If one of the well-conducted railway companies desired to examine a district, and to bring the results before Parliament, they would go over an enormous amount of ground in a very short time, and, having done so, they would come to the Legislature with very accurate plans and specifications. But in this matter of the survey the result was the same year after year; and, if matters went on as they had been doing, the result of the whole work would be of comparatively little use, for, by the time the survey would be finished, almost a new generation would have sprung up, and almost everything would have materially changed.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, there were, no doubt, vested interests connected with this survey question which it was somewhat difficult to get rid of; but, from information which he had received from other quarters, he did not think there was any real foundation for the difficulties which appeared to have been suggested by the gentleman who was at the head of the work. The present staff might be insufficient; but it might easily be increased if money were forthcoming to pay for additional men. Hon. Members must know that, at the present time, the number of engineers and surveyors in this country was excessive. There were many such men who were employed only half their time and at unremunerative rates; and all that was required was to get some of those men—skilled and trained—to assist in the work. There was nothing magical in the Ordnance Survey, as compared with surveys made for landowners and railway companies. The present Ordnance Survey on the large scale was, in appearance, like an ordinary estate survey. There might be some little difficulty, no doubt, in the mountainous districts; but those districts were limited in extent. There would be no difficulty whatever as regarded the portions of England that were not mountainous; and, by employing other surveyors to help with the work, the survey might be completed within a reasonable time. If it was worth doing at all, it ought to be done quickly. If it was of value to the country, the sooner it was done the better. Why should future generations alone have the benefit of it?

(11.) £11,509, to complete the sum for the Science and Art Department Buildings.

MR. E. JENKINS said, he observed that it was proposed under the Vote to take an addition of £1,000 for the enlargement of a sketch by Mr. Leighton. He should like to know what the sketch was? Was it a sketch of the plans of the new buildings which had not been estimated for, or was it a sketch upon the walls of the interior? Again, there was an item for "works and internal decorations;" but this was only another instance of the fact that the Estimates had been so manipulated that hon. Members were not really able to find out how the money which they were asked to vote was expended. That might seem a strong statement to make; but he could prove it. There were items for "works and internal decorations," for "schools," for "ordinary maintenance and repairs;" and, further on, there was a very large Vote taken in connection with the South Kensington Museum—for artizans, for labourers, for repairs, and for incidental expenses of various kinds, all of which might be included under the same head, and in reference to which, undoubtedly, persons were employed. But the Estimates were so presented that it was almost impossible to separate the different items, and to ascertain exactly what amount was expended in this or that direction. Money was voted under the general heads, "Repairs," "Artizans," "Students," &c.; but Parliament was not furnished with any detailed information on the subject. Whether intentionally or not the science of bungling statistics, and of deceiving people by so bungling them, had been carried to perfection in connection with South Kensington Museum; and it was full time that the Committee should make a stand against the way in which these accounts were presented to the House. There were at all, it is that we absolutely bound ourselves to maintain the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire by force of arms; and it had been gravely argued that if Austria and France had called upon us in the name of that Treaty to join them, or either of them—in order to fulfil the obligations—we should have been bound in honour to have gone to war, and we should have found ourselves in this position—we should have had to choose between evading our obligation, and undertaking to fight for maintaining the Turkish despotism. Supposing Austria had had some desire to slice out a portion of the European territory; or, supposing France or Austria had any advantage to gain by going to war, they might, with reference to this Treaty, have claimed us to join them. And I say that that is a very dangerous position for this country to be in; and my object is now, that there may not be arising out of the present negotiations any possibility of this country being placed under obligations of this kind, which might involve British honour for purposes for which there could be no justification as connected with British policy or British interests. There is another danger with reference to those Treaty guarantees—that nobody can tell when they will come to an end. John Stuart Mill said, on a former occasion, that “Treaties are not eternal.” They are, in fact, as a rule, very short-lived instruments, and the most evanescent of public engagements. The fields of diplomacy are strewn over with the relics of defunct Treaties; but, unfortunately, there are statesmen of a peculiar turn of mind, who seem to take a delight in groping among these dry bones in order to obtain some sign of life, and Lord Beaconsfield is one of these Treaty resurrectionists, and he is constantly looking out for some vitality amongst the remains of these dead Treaties. I remember, at the breaking out of the Franco-German War, that Mr. Disraeli got up and with solemn import told the House that, under the Treaty of Vienna, we had joined in a guarantee of a strip of Saxony to Prussia, and that, if in the course of the war the French armies took possession of that strip, we should be bound in our Treaty right and obligation to interfere. That seems most absurd now. It is a laughing matter now that we should be called upon to interfere under such a contingency, but it was no laughing matter in 1870. We could see that the pressure then put upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich by the Opposition, that we should be involved in war one way or another, had the effect of inducing the late Government to ask for a Vote of Credit for £2,000,000, which, I fear, was to a great extent wasted. The attachment of the Premier to these Treaties is a matter not alone of the past, it is a matter of very recent date; and, perhaps, the way in which the Government has been maintaining the Treaties of 1856 and 1871 during the past two years, has been the occasion of some of the greatest mischiefs which have arisen out of their policy. The fact is, that the attempt to maintain the obligations of those Treaties was far from promoting peace, for it tended directly to war, and, instead of promoting European concert, it raised obstacles to the joint action of the Powers. The Government upheld those Treaties up to a very late period. Lord Beaconsfield has again and again, with all the force of his rhetoric and the influence of his position, said that this country was absolutely bound to support the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire. His Mansion House speech of November, 1876, was full of our Treaty obligations towards Turkey; and Her Majesty's Speech, at the close of the Session of 1876, recognized the duties imposed upon Her under those Treaties. At the opening of the Session of 1877, again Her Majesty said—

“My object has throughout been to maintain the peace of Europe, and to bring about the better government of the disturbed provinces, without infringing upon the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire.”

What effect had all this language about the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire? We know what effect it had. It bolstered up Turkey to resist the Councils of Europe; and Her Majesty's Government refused to join in a European concert, on the grounds stated in the Blue Books—that they could not join in the steps proposed by Russia, Austria, or Germany, because they would interfere with the maintenance of the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire. We have been held in suspense as to whether the Government had or had not given up the Treties of 1856 and 1871. There ought certainly to have been no mistake on this matter, considering that no other Government in Europe was maintaining those Treaties except ourselves. It has been a most unfortunate and dangerous circumstance, during the past two years, that the Government have had two voices in their foreign policy; and, until a recent period, they have had two voices in relation to these Treaty obligations. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told us, a short time since, that these Treaties were shattered and destroyed—very distinct language—and I was glad to hear it. But almost on the very same day Lord Beaconsfield in "another place," dealing with the obligations to be enforced upon Russia, said—"This is the key-note of our policy; this is the diapason of our diplomacy." Diapason! Why, so far from being the key-note of harmony, it was the key-note of discord in your own Cabinet—the key-note of disunion and animosity in the country, and of alarm and apprehension and distrust throughout Europe. The Congress meets to-day, and I suppose that now we may assume that these Treaties of 1856 and 1871 have disappeared for ever, or, at all events, we have got rid of their mischievous obligations. But of what will take place we are left in ignorance by the Government. They refuse to give us any distinct statement of their aims and policy; they point to Lord Salisbury's despatch; and, no doubt, that celebrated despatch was a masterpiece of cavilling at the Treaty of San Stefano; but it absolutely failed to lay down any definite scheme for the settlement of the Eastern Question. Sir, I am afraid that some of the worst features of the Treaty of 1856 may appear again in the new Treaty which is about to be made. I am afraid that attempts may be made to bolster up the power of Turkey under the guarantee of Europe, under some delusion that that Empire still constitutes a barrier against the growth of Russia. I am afraid that South Bulgaria, the scene of those recent frightful atrocities, may remain under the misrule of Turkey; I am afraid that in Bosnia and Herzegovina, where the people have lived under Turkish oppression for centuries, there is little prospect for improvement; I am afraid that the aspirations of the Greek nation may be disappointed. I hope these things may not happen, but they are possible. If they do happen, or anything like them happens, then I say that any such policy on the part of the British Government in dealing with this great question would be repugnant to the great masses of the British people; and I believe that nothing could be more unwise or unjust than that a policy repugnant to a great portion of the British people should be irrevocably sealed in a Treaty of Europe with which we are bound, and in which we, as a Parliament, have no voice whatever in the terms of its provisions. I hope I may be disappointed. I hope we may all find that the great mistake of 1856 may not be repeated now. But, whatever the Treaty may be, I do think it is very desirable that the opinion of Parliament should be obtained upon its provisions before it is absolutely ratified. Therefore, Sir, I move this Resolution, which recognises the right of Parliament to have a voice in the discussion of the Treaty before its ratification. The Resolution which I intend to move is one which might apply to all Treaties; but I have confined it to Treaties of Guarantee. I think that Treaties of Guarantee ought to come under the view of the Houses of Parliament, for they impose serious obligations which may lead to heavy expenditure, to an increase of the burdens of taxation on the people; or they may carry us into war, endangering the best interests of the country. I say that no Treaty, having such responsibilities, ought to be ratified without having the approval of Parliament. I may be told that I am striking at the Royal Prerogative. It is really, and in fact, the Ministers of the Crown who determine the Treaties of obligation in which the country enters—and I wish to point out to the House how remarkable it is that we, who are so jealous of our privileges that we will not allow the Ministers of the Crown to impose taxation upon the people without first consulting us; that we, who will not even allow them to pass a Turnpike Act without our consent, give them absolute power to impose obligations upon us which may cost hereafter hundreds of millions of money. It may be said that if my Resolution were carried, it would render the negotiations of Treaties still more difficult; but that, in my judgment, is a positive advantage rather than otherwise. It seems to me that no Treaty of Guarantee should be entered into, unless there is the most pressing and justifiable necessity it is possible to conceive. I have not attempted to say in which way the opinion of the House should be taken on a Treaty of Guarantee. If the House thinks there should be some check upon Government, I am quite sure that the wisdom of Parliament and the ability of leading statesmen on both sides of the House would have no difficulty in determining the best mode. I am only concerned in the principle, and I think I am right in recommending the subject to the attention of the House. I might mention several eminent authorities on the point; but I will simply refer to Lord Derby, who, on June 12, 1871, said—

“No doubt, there is a great deal to be said, both on theoretical and on practical grounds, for the principle that the Parliament and the country ought not to be bound by the acts of the Executive, whoever at the time may compose it, in making International Treaties, without having an opportunity of considering the merits of those Treaties.”—[3 Hansard, ccvi. 1864.]

We are all looking forward to a peaceful solution of the Eastern Question. The Times Correspondent at Vienna recently remarked upon the craving for peace which exists everywhere, and to the longing for some sort of solution to the question which has weighed down Europe for well-nigh three years. No doubt that is the feeling in Europe. It is, undoubtedly, the feeling in this country. I have never had great doubt as to the preservation of peace; not because the action of the Government has been calculated to promote the peace of Europe, for it has had a contrary effect. I will tell you why I think peace is certain. I think it is because Russia is exhausted; Germany has great interests in peace; France requires repose; and Austria would by war endanger her very existence. I can only hope that a peaceful solution may be arrived at. I do not think the terms of that peace will be very narrowly scanned; it will meet with a very ready acceptance on the part of the people of this country; and I trust that Her Majesty's Government will not seek to obtain any mere diplomatic triumph in this matter, but will use their influence to bring about a peace on the only basis that gives promise of permanence—by securing the recognition of the national desires of the peoples of the European Provinces of Turkey. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

MR. E. JENKINS, in rising to second the Amendment, said, he did so with some misgiving, not, however, because he had anything to object to in its nature or terms, or in regard to its opportuneness, but because it was not likely to be appreciated by the Government or the House as it would be by the country. It was right that attention should be called to the subject; for he did not know whether it was within the knowledge of the Government, though it was certainly within the knowledge of many in that House, that there had been a growing public opinion, especially in the Midland and Northern counties, and in Scotland, that the manner in which Her Majesty had been advised to exercise the Prerogative was dangerous to the Constitution as all desired to maintain it. It could not but be dangerous that Ministers should advise Her Majesty to use the rights of the Prerogative in such a way that they should become unpopular in England. The Resolution of his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands), he admitted, proposed distinctly to limit the Royal Prerogative, but only so far as to bring it into harmony with the existing state of Constitutional Government in this country. In discussing this matter they were little concerned with historical questions on the one hand, or with ideas of philosophical perfection on the other. What they had to do was to consider the actual facts, and the practical expediency of the Amendment, which would fall to the ground if it could not be shown that the illimitable exercise of the Prerogative was absurd, inconvenient, or perilous. He would observe, in anticipation of what might be said on the other side, that peculiar notions were entertained by some hon. Gentlemen with respect to the use of the Royal Prerogative; and he thought it desirable that some definition should be laid down as to the meaning of the word “Prerogative.” Now, in his opinion, the use of the Royal Prerogative was only such as the law allowed. It was as much the creature of law as were the rights of any subject; it was not an original, but a derived right, and depended upon the will of the people, and it ought to be from time to time defined, in order to bring it into conformity with the Constitutional development of their freedom. This had been done, in fact, from time to time, as when judicial powers, nominally vested in the Crown, were delegated to those from whom they could not now be taken away. The precise right claimed for the Crown in this case was the making of Treaties; but, was there, he asked, no danger, inconvenience, or impropriety, in permitting the Crown, upon the advice of Ministers, to exercise this Prerogative? One result of the exercise of this right had been seen during the course of the recent negotiations—the concealment from Parliament of the facts, the nature of the issues, and the difficulties upon which a judgment was arrived at. The consequence was that the House of Commons, which was the most responsible power in the country, and had the duty of seeing that the Executive carried out its functions in such a way as not to overstep the limits of the Constitution on the one hand, nor prejudice the interests of the country on the other, was absolutely without any information as to the facts on which the Government were acting. The Cabinet had for months been carrying on a policy so secret that they had been induced to vote £6,000,000, and to condone a gross breach of the Constitution, on the ground of dangers which the Government had not deemed it necessary to communicate. He could conceive the case of an ambitious and unscrupulous Minister—a gambler, who fancied he saw his way to the attainment of a certain end—advising the Crown to do such things upon information which was inaccurate, and upon a state of facts that did not justify it, and months after they might find it was too late to remedy the evil, and the Minister might save himself from impeachment by being buried in Westminster Abbey. The exercise of the Prerogative was, practically, at this moment in the hands of the Prime Minister. Within an hour of his being in Berlin he had walked round to Prince Bismarck, the Minister of a practically autocratic Sovereign, and with him he discussed matters of the deepest importance. Lord Salisbury, who was supposed to be at Berlin as a check upon Lord Beaconsfield's ambitious views, was not present at that interview, and would only learn from the Prime Minister as much as he chose to tell him. At home was what might be called the "rump" of the Government, and they also would know no more of those negotiations than the Prime Minister chose to communicate to them. Was that a safe and proper position for this country to be in? We might be committed by the will of one man—and one by no means the most competent—to guarantees, obligations, and expenditure, which might have a lasting influence upon the destinies of this Empire, but of which the supreme Power in Great Britain—the Houses of Parliament—would only know when they were irrevocable. Could the propriety of such a result be maintainable in the face of the great facts of Constitutional Government and the freedom of the people, especially when extravagant claims as to extensions of right had been claimed by the Government on other matters under the name of the Royal Prerogative? Probably two checks on the Ministers would be mentioned by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and it would be said, in the first place, that a Minister might be impeached. But he (Mr. Jenkins) could attach no great value to that argument, for it was hardly conceivable that any Minister would be foolish enough to lay himself open to an impeachment while there were many ways of evading the Constitution. But, it might be urged, Parliament had the right of refusing Supplies, and had, in short, what was known as Parliamentary control. That, too, was an illusory check, for there was little likelihood of seeing it pushed to its direst conclusion, as the events of the last few weeks had shown; and it would be fresh in the memory of everyone that the majority had readily condoned or justified the unconstitutional acts of which Ministers had been guilty. And even if, in the last resort, the Ministry were to be dismissed, it was possible to conceive the case of one who would be ready to run that risk if only he could set his hand to a Treaty that would make himself celebrated. Besides, dismissal would not take place till the guarantees had been given, and till Treaties had been signed, when the House would have no power but that of initiating an unreal debate. A thoughtful writer on politics, the late Mr. W. Bagehot, had referred to the subject, and had argued that Parliament ought to have more control over foreign policy than it at present possessed. Besides, the Representatives themselves were responsible to the country, and ought for that reason to have opportunities not only for review, but also for criticism. It was true that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had offered objections to the proposition in 1874, on the ground of the necessity which existed for placing implicit confidence in the Ministers who had the conduct of negotiations, and for secrecy during their progress; but he (Mr. Jenkins) believed it would be better for this country if secret diplomacy were swept away; and if they insisted that their diplomatic transactions should be done in the light of day, letting other nations know that when we negotiated with them these negotiations would be subject to daily communications to the Parliament and the country. He saw the Chancellor of the Exchequer blandly smiling at such an idea; but he (Mr. Jenkins) had no doubt that, by-and-bye, they would not only limit the Government in the exercise of this Prerogative in regard to Treaty-making, but expect it to be perfectly open in its negotiations with foreign Powers. He believed it would come to that. He felt that putting forward the proposition of his hon. Friend did not in any degree tend to tarnish the lustre of the Crown of England, and rather hoped that the acceptance of such a proposition might tend to give it greater strength in international negotiations, and more confidence among people abroad.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, all future Treaties between this Country and Foreign Powers under which this Country is engaged, separately or in conjunction with any other Power, to interfere by force of arms, or by armed demonstration, or by the contribution of any military contingent or pecuniary subsidy, to attack or defend any Government or Nation with reference to its internal arrangements or foreign relations, or on any other contingency whatsoever, ought to be laid upon the Table of both Houses of Parliament before being ratified, in order that an opportunity may be afforded to both Houses of expressing their opinion upon the provisions of such Treaties,"—(Mr. Rylands,)

—instead thereof.

Mr. E. Jenkins

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend who has submitted this Motion to the House (Mr. Rylands) has, I think, framed it, and likewise his speech upon it, in such a temper as to facilitate a perfectly unbiassed and temperate consideration of the question; and I feel strongly that we ought to avoid whatever temptation may beset us upon the present occasion to mix up a discussion of this kind on a question Constitutional in its nature with the particular differences which have arisen during the last year or two between the two sides of the House upon questions of foreign policy. I think such a course would tend very much to perplex and obscure our judgment, if, for example, because some of us think that unconstitutional doctrines have been laid down, or inconsistent acts committed in certain other respects, we were to revenge ourselves for these acts by adopting a Resolution which might have inconvenient consequences, and which could not be defended upon its own general grounds of substantive policy. I am sure my hon. Friends will agree with me in thinking that we should separate recent controversies from the discussion we have before us. What I would urge in regard to the Motion, and the Treaties of 1856 and 1871, is particularly this—that neither has the Mover nor the Seconder shown a case of practical inconvenience which has arisen out of the exercise of this power to which he refers by the Executive. They have shown, I admit, that were the Executive Government, with large powers placed in its hands, to use those powers in a reckless manner, without regard to the interests or the well-understood sentiments of the country, the greatest possible public evils would result. But it is a choice of inconveniences and difficulties. You must, on the one hand, trust the Executive Government in these matters very largely, or you must, on the other hand, run into a greater mischief still—namely, that of committing the transaction of foreign affairs and the conduct of difficult foreign negotiations to bodies—the Houses of Parliament—which are essentially, from their own composition, unfit for the discharge of such tasks. My hon. Friend has agreed with me, in the course of this Eastern Question, in objecting to a great deal that has been done by Her Majesty's Government. He never felt, nor has my hon. Friend succeeded in showing that that conduct of the Government was pursued necessarily in consequence of the Treaties of 1856 or 1871, or of the guarantees into which we entered in respect to those Treaties. I can speak with the same impartiality as my hon. Friend; because, not having been a Member of the Government at the time, I am not responsible for the guarantees of 1856, and the guarantee of 1871 was only a renewal of the milder of the guarantees. Practically, I feel that I look upon these questions rather as a spectator than as an actor in the original transactions. Now, if Her Majesty's Government had thought it their duty to act upon these guarantees in the strict interpretation of them, particularly on the guarantees of the Tripartite Treaties, then my hon. Friend would have had a prima facie ground; because, in that case, Her Majesty's Government would, upon their own responsibility, have committed themselves to some warlike measures as a direct consequence of the obligation of that guarantee. But they have done nothing of the sort; and when, during the last few months, they have made military preparations, and taken proceedings to which some of us have strongly objected, they have not done it upon the ground that they were bound to do it by the guarantees of those Treaties, but in the exercise of their discretion, and in obedience to what they call public motives. My hon. Friend has, therefore, not supplied a link in the argument which would be absolutely wanting to sustain his Motion. I think Her Majesty's Government have used the Treaties of 1856 and 1871 very much as they pleased, that is to say—and I am making no accusation against them—they have acted very largely upon what I believe to have been a dictum of Lord Palmerston and a traditional doctrine of the Foreign Office, that a guarantee gives a title to interfere, but does not impose an absolute obligation to interfere. Under cover of a doctrine of that kind, there is room enough to avoid most serious inconveniences that might arise from these guarantees. We must be content to judge these matters very much in the light of history. I admit that enormous powers are intrusted to Government, and that the misuse of these powers might entail most mischievous and ruinous consequences. That is a condition of necessity attaching to the work of Government. Have these consequences arisen? We must not judge this Motion of my hon. Friend by the opinion we may this moment entertain, aided by the light of experience, as to this or that particular guarantee. It may be there are guarantees which we now see to have been inconvenient and dangerous; but that is not the question. The main question is this—Were these guarantees entered into in conformity with what were believed to be the interests and duty of the country at the time, and in conformity with what were known to be the sentiments of the country at the time? If my hon. Friend goes over the list of the guarantees which have been embodied in various Treaties—guarantees aimed at by this Resolution—I doubt whether he could produce a single instance of a guarantee entered into by preceding Governments, except where it has been agreeable to the actually prevailing sense of the country. If that is so, it shows that the adoption of my hon. Friend's Motion would only tend to entail a great responsibility upon Parliament; but it does not show that it would have any other practical effect whatever. My opinion, I confess, is that, upon the whole, the Government has upon no occasion known to me run ahead of the public opinion and conviction of the country in any of these guarantees. The guarantees of 1856 were, I think, decidedly agreeable to the generally prevailing sense of the nation at the time. Guarantees have seldom been the subject of such direct discussion in Parliament as to enable the laying down of very positive conclusions upon this subject; but there is one case which is very well worth notice, as it tends to throw light upon this question. It was the Guaranteed Loan of 1855. According to the established practice of this country, the Crown does not make absolute engagements of this kind, but only engages to apply to Parliament for a pecuniary subsidy. In my opinion, this Guaranteed Loan to Egypt was an absolutely bad engagement; and, thinking so at the time, I concurred with others in opposing the Bill. So strong was the objection felt in the House to it, that there was not only a debate and division; but in a rather full House, the Government carried that loan only by a majority of 4.

But while that was the case, the Bill passed through every other stage without opposition, because the Government of the day were determined to adhere to it; and it was well understood that if the opposition were prolonged, they would dissolve Parliament, and perfectly well known that if they dissolved Parliament, the country would sustain them to all lengths in that guarantee. What we really desire, and the best we can obtain, is not an infallible security that there shall be no unwise guarantee, but that the Government will carefully adhere to its own views and convictions of what the interests of the country require, and what the opinion and well-understood conviction of the country will approve. We come to the application of these considerations of the case which is now before us. All I can say is this—that I think it would be very dangerous if, because we have not been in harmony with the general course thus far of Her Majesty's Government on the Eastern Question, we were on that account to lay down and establish a new Constitutional principle, with respect to which I feel the greatest possible difficulty of giving to it any kind of practical operation. I can conceive it quite possible that we might embarrass, and impede, and distract the course of proceedings, and might discredit the country in the face of Europe, by depriving its Executive Government of that degree of independence and free agency which are absolutely necessary to maintain its influence. How it would be possible, in the midst of diplomatic negotiations, by a constant interchange of information and opinion between Government and Parliament, to arrive at anything like a community of action, I do not know. However much we may have differed from Her Majesty's Government in these matters, yet there are two things which I wish to keep in view. The first is, that we have arrived at a point in which it is not altogether unreasonable to hope that much of the subjects of these differences have disappeared. It is hardly possible to conceive that we may be going into the European Congress which we are now about to enter with any very wide discrepancies of view amongst ourselves generally as to the aims towards which the influence and efforts of this country should be directed. It would be unjust to the Government to suppose that whereas all other Administrations, in all other times and in all other affairs, took a pretence of accurate admeasurement of the sentiment of the country on the subject of the guarantees upon which they were about to enter—it would be unjust to them, say, to suppose that they are likely to rush into new guarantees without having regard to the sentiment of the country. I can scarcely believe such a thing on general grounds, still less should I be justified in believing it when I look at the special circumstances and tendencies of the country at the present time; because it is quite clear, irrespective of any matters which are and have been in controversy, that guarantees at this moment are somewhat damaged in public estimation. I do not wish to push that proposition too far, or to lay it down as an abstract principle; but I think there has been, both on the one side and the other of this great Eastern Question, a dissatisfaction—an uneasy sense of dissatisfaction which prevails even at this moment—that guarantees, upon the whole, have been an embarrassment and an impediment in the way of right action in the management of this Eastern Question. Some may be dissatisfied—no doubt some are dissatisfied—because those guarantees have not been acted upon up to their fullest extent and with the utmost rigour of construction; others are dissatisfied because they have been used, more or less, to promote a line of policy which, in principle, they can no longer approve. But I, for one, entertain no doubt—while carefully avoiding the assertion of any abstract principle—that Her Majesty's Government at the present time have no great disposition to welcome the announcement that a new set of guarantees has been entered into in regard to the state of affairs in the East. Whether any such guarantees should be required or not is not for me to decide; but I entertain the hope that Her Majesty's Government will, in respect to this question of guarantees, bear in mind the principal proposition of the Motion, that this vast power—for it is a vast power—has always been exercised with a due regard to the general sentiments and convictions of the country. And if the Government still continue to act in the same spirit which animated their Predecessors in all former time, then I confess the present arrangement seems to be the best arrangement which, in the many difficulties of the case, is possible; and, in fact, the only arrangement compatible with the effective transaction of the very important class of Business with which the Motion of my hon. Friend deals.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought, after what had just fallen from his right hon. Friend, and the evident desire of the House not to further debate the subject, that it was scarcely necessary for him to make many remarks upon it. He entirely concurred in what had been said as to the spirit and temper in which both the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment had addressed themselves to the subject. There could be no doubt that it was a very important question, and one which it was perfectly fair and reasonable for hon. Gentlemen holding their views to bring forward for the purpose of challenging the opinion of the House. They knew that that was not a new subject with the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), and that his Motion had not been prompted by recent or any particular circumstances. Five years since, the hon. Member brought forward a similar Motion in another House of Commons, and with reference to a wholly different set of circumstances to that which now prevailed; and no one could deny that the opinion it contained was one which it was perfectly competent for him and those who agreed with him to express; but, at the same time, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) thought that the effect of such a Motion being brought forward at a time like the present might lead others who were not aware of the circumstances of the case, especially foreign Powers, to suppose that it had a more direct reference to existing negotiations than he presumed was really the fact, and that thus a misunderstanding might be created which they would all desire to avoid. He fully understood, however, that that was not the spirit in which it was brought forward, but rather that while it was the intention of the hon. Gentleman to take advantage of the existing state of things or of negotiations which had lately been going on, and were still going on, only for the purpose of illustration in support of his argument, the proposition which he advocated, itself was based on general grounds. When he last submitted it to the consideration of the House it was of a still more general character, and was founded on cases connected with our Commercial Treaties, particularly the Commercial Treaty with France. On that occasion the hon. Gentleman had been met very much in the same way as he had that evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who was then Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman put the question, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) thought, very properly in this way—on the ground that it was not a question of merely abstract doctrine, but one of a practical character, and that it was necessary, if we were to assert great changes of Constitutional principle such as would be involved in the acceptance of the Motion, to face the consequences and be prepared to see how effect could be given to the new proposition. Nobody could deny that they were necessarily liable to inconveniences in our form of government, for in it, as, indeed, in every form of government, there must be inconveniences of some kind. Those inconveniences and difficulties came very much to the surface when we were dealing with questions of foreign policy; but he did not see how, if the Constitution of the country were to remain as it was, it would be practically possible to work upon the lines upon which the hon. Gentleman would have us proceed. There was no similarity between the state of things which existed in this country and in the United States of America, to which the hon. Gentleman on a former occasion referred. There, undoubtedly, the negotiations of Treaties was subjected to the control of a portion, at all events, of the Legislative Body—the Senate, or practically to a Committee of Foreign Affairs of the Senate, which was a kind of supplementary Cabinet, and which acted in correspondence with the Ministry of the day and in secret communication with them. Now, that was a mode of proceeding in accordance with which it would be impossible to act in this country, the Cabinet being placed in a different position towards the House of Commons and Parliament. It would be necessary, too, to have everything done in public and in the face of Parliament and the country. So far, of course, as Parliament and the country were concerned, there would be

But while that was the case, the Bill passed through every other stage without opposition, because the Government of the day were determined to adhere to it; and it was well understood that if the opposition were prolonged, they would dissolve Parliament, and perfectly well known that if they dissolved Parliament, the country would sustain them to all lengths in that guarantee. mitted it to the consideration of the House it was of a still more general character, and was founded on cases connected with our Commercial Treaties, particularly the Commercial Treaty with France. On that occasion the hon. Gentleman had been met very much in the same way as he had that evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who was then Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman put the question, he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) thought, very properly in this way—on the ground that it was not a question of merely abstract doctrine, but one of a practical character, and that it was necessary, if we were to assert great changes of Constitutional principle such as would be involved in the acceptance of the Motion, to face the consequences and be prepared to see how effect could be given to the new proposition. Nobody could deny that they were necessarily liable to inconveniences in our form of government, for in it, as, indeed, in every form of government, there must be inconveniences of some kind. Those inconveniences and difficulties came very much to the surface when we were dealing with questions of foreign policy; but he did not see how, if the Constitution of the country were to remain as it was, it would be practically possible to work upon the lines upon which the hon. Gentleman would have us proceed. There was no similarity between the state of things which existed in this country and in the United States of America, to which the hon. Gentleman on a former occasion referred. There, undoubtedly, the negotiations of Treaties was subjected to the control of a portion, at all events, of the Legislative Body—the Senate, or practically to a Committee of Foreign Affairs of the Senate, which was a kind of supplementary Cabinet, and which acted in correspondence with the Ministry of the day and in secret communication with them. Now, that was a mode of proceeding in accordance with which it would be impossible to act in this country, the Cabinet being placed in a different position towards the House of Commons and Parliament. It would be necessary, too, to have everything done in public and in the face of Parliament and the country. So far, of course, as Parliament and the country were concerned, there would be no objection to that publicity; but, then, everything thus openly discussed was discussed in the face of the whole world, and it would, he believed, be found practically impossible to conduct negotiations with other Powers if they were to be conducted on such conditions. During all the recent negotiations, for instance, delicate as they had been, it would have been absolutely fatal to them if the Government were obliged to say that everything that was advanced must be discussed in public, subject to the criticisms not only of Parliament, but also of the Press and the public, before any step could be taken. Other Powers would, no doubt, look upon us with great suspicion, if when four or five of them had pledged themselves to the terms of a Treaty which England also accepted, that Treaty were subject, after all, to be controlled and generally criticized in the way which the hon. Gentleman suggested. The hon. Gentleman, indeed, did not probably think that there would be any great evil in such a state of things, for a great portion of his argument was directed against Treaties altogether, which he treated as being on the one hand useless, and on the other embarrassing—embarrassing to the honest signatories, and useless to those who were not disposed to act honestly. That was a difficulty which it was impossible to escape, whether a Treaty was ratified by Parliament or not; and if the argument of the hon. Gentleman was worth anything, it would not, he thought, be found easy to stop short of the conclusion that Treaties ought to be dispensed with, and our business carried on independently of other Powers. He was far from saying that there were not some grounds to justify some of the observations which the hon. Gentleman had made; but he was sure that Europe—he was sure that the people of this country would be very much surprised if we were to enunciate it as a general maxim that we were to do without Treaties altogether, and that in those European affairs in which we were interested, things must be trusted to go on without those international understandings and engagements. He ventured, he might add, to hope that the hon. Gentleman would not deem it necessary to divide the House on his Motion. To do so, might lead to misunderstanding not only at home, but abroad; and the case had been so exceedingly well put by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that there was, in his opinion, no ground for pressing the subject to a division. It was not a question affecting one Party more than another, or a question of overstraining the Prerogative, or anything of that sort. As he had ventured to say the other day, Prerogative was not a question of the personal right or assertion of the Sovereign; it was a part, and an important part, of the Constitution; and if they desired to make so great a change in the Constitution as would be involved directly, and still more by its consequences, in the adoption of such a principle as that would be, the change was not one which ought to be made by a mere Amendment on the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply; but it would be a matter which ought to be most solemnly raised, and debated not only in that House, but also in the other House of Parliament. They did not dispute for a moment the right to raise, and, perhaps, the advantage of raising, such a discussion as the present one; but he would repeat his hope that it might not be made the occasion of a division.

MR. RYLANDS said, that after the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman, he would not press his Motion to a division; but, with the leave of the House, would withdraw it. ["No, no!"]

MILITARY FORCES LOCALIZATION ACT —THE COMPTROLLER AND AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in rising to call attention to the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General, dated 15th March, 1878, upon the "Account of money raised and issued under the provisions of the Military Forces Localization Act (35 and 36 Vic. c. 68)," which was laid before the House in Parliamentary Paper, No. 121, of the present Session, said, the Report in question showed that they had no security that the money voted by the House was expended in the manner in which it was intended to be expended. In 1872 the House voted

£3,500,000 on behalf of the Military Forces Localization Act; £300,000 of that sum was intended to be applied to a tactical station in the North of England. In 1876 he drew attention to the fact that it was intended to apply part of that sum to a tactical station at Aldershot, and not in the North of England; but the then Secretary of State for War told him he had better not interfere with a subject on which he had no practical knowledge. Since then the matter had remained in abeyance; but he had now found that the Auditor General had taken precisely the same view of it as he had when he brought the subject before the House in 1876. In his Report the Auditor General drew attention to the fact that £150,000 out of £300,000 voted for a tactical station in Yorkshire had been applied to increasing the area of Aldershot. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) would not discuss the question whether that increased area at Aldershot was required or not. The point was, that by an Act they had voted a sum for a particular purpose; that the Auditor General thought £150,000 of that sum had been misapplied; and on that officer applying to the Treasury for their reasons for allowing the War Office so to appropriate that money, the answer they gave was—"My Lords see no reason to object to the manner in which the money has been appropriated." During the last two or three years the Departments had shown an increasing disregard of the remarks of the Auditor General, and the information which he required to enable him to do his duty to the House—whose servant he, in fact, was—in respect to the public expenditure was withheld from him, and he received no reply to his queries. The House, he thought, ought to sustain him in the independent position he took up; for, in his examination of the accounts, it was not for him to take the opinion of the Department as to the way the money was expended, but to follow his own opinion, so as to enable him to perform his duties to the House. He was responsible to that House, and not to the War Department, and they should uphold him in the course he was taking in making these Reports to them, and should insist that he should be furnished with the materials which would enable him to do his duty to the public, or they might as well cease to have such an officer at all. In addition to the sum under consideration in that Report, it would be found from the Appropriation Account for this year that no less than £476,728, out of a total saving of £617,973, had been re-appropriated to purposes of which the House knew nothing, and over which it could, therefore, exercise no control whatever.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—THE MILITIA.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HAYTER said, that before an answer was given by the Government, he wished to call the attention of the House to the present condition of the Militia, though he could not now, as he had intended to do, move—

"That the Militia being now reduced in available strength of rank and file by nearly one-half of the entire number borne upon their establishment, it is expedient to adopt the recommendation of the Militia Committee of last year—viz., 'That a Peace Establishment be given to the Militia, reduced, exclusive of staff, to seventy-five men per company.'"

The hon. Member said that it was an appropriate time for considering that subject, because the system inaugurated by General Peel, and afterwards adopted by Lord Cardwell, of having a large Militia Reserve which might, on an emergency, be summoned to join the active Army, had now been subjected to the crucial test of actual experiment. The Militia and Army Reserve had responded to the call lately made upon them in a manner which reflected the highest credit on the individual men, and also on the excellence of the system adopted under General Peel and Lord Cardwell for the formation of Reserves for our small Army in this country. But, however, excellent that might be as an experiment for the active Army, at the same time it was, under existing arrangements, altogether destructive of the Militia—the backbone of our actual fighting Reserve. Instead of having a Militia Force amounting in round numbers to 120,000, we had, according to the latest Return, not more than half that number of men on whom we could rely. In 1875 the nominal establishment was 123,000; but we had really only 101,000 enrolled. In 1876 the nominal figure was 118,349; but we had only 100,217 enrolled. He was speaking only of the rank and file. Last year we had a nominal Militia establishment of 120,660; but the number really enrolled was 103,298. From that number he had to deduct upwards of 27,000 who had been called upon as Militia Reserve men to fill up the active Army. That reduced the number to 75,000. The number of men who were absent on the day on which the efficiency of the regiments was tested had increased from 10,000 to 15,000 last year. Those 15,000 must be deducted from the 75,000, and the effective strength of the Militia was thereby reduced to 60,000. There was no jealousy towards the Militia upon the part of the Volunteer Service; but if it was to be the main support of the Reserves, his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War must draw tighter the reins of discipline to make the Militia Force come out as on former occasions, or be effective in times of emergency. Within the last fortnight the Under Secretary of State for War (Viscount Bury) stated in the other House that in the Militia there were 102,877 efficient; but when they deducted the Militia Reserve men who had joined the Army, amounting to 27,343, and the number of men absent without leave on the day of inspection, amounting to 15,007, there remained 60,527, against a nominal establishment of 120,650. There was no difficulty in accounting for the deficiency when the state of the following Militia regiments was taken into consideration:—He had selected these regiments as the weakest from the official list, and it would be found that they came from the manufacturing districts in Lancashire, from the Metropolis, from Scotland, from the mining county of Cornwall, from two Midland counties—Northampton and Rutland—and from the purely agricultural counties of Devon and Wilts. For example—The 2nd Devon, whose establishment in rank and file was 800, had present at inspection only 332; wanting to complete, 468. The 4th Lancashire, establishment, 1,200; present at inspection, 432; wanting to complete, 472. The 5th Lancashire, establishment, 1,200; present at inspection, 573; wanting to complete, 536. The Northampton and Rutland, establishment, 1,400; present at inspection, 742; wanting to complete, 597. The 2nd Surrey, establishment, 1,000; present at inspection, 339; wanting to complete, 531. Wilts, establishment, 800; present at inspection, 480; wanting to complete, 302. Aberdeen, establishment, 800; present at inspection, 289; wanting to complete, 489. Cornwall Rangers, establishment, 800; present at inspection, 371; wanting to complete, 384. The total number of those present at the inspection of these regiments was 3,658; but the total of those who were wanting to complete their establishment was 3,765. On the other hand, he was glad to say that these things might be altered. The Hertford Militia, on the day of inspection, had 598 men out of a total strength of 800; while the regiment had sent 188 men to the Army. Fourteen only of their total establishment were wanting, and only two of their Reserve men failed to join the colours. Militiamen who had joined the Army were liable, under an Act passed by General Peel, to serve the remainder of their five years with the Militia. He (Mr. Hayter) was not alone in thinking that a great many of these men might be disposed to change the terms of their engagement, if admitted to do so by a short Act to be passed for that purpose, and join the Army Reserve. They had possibly contracted a taste for soldiering amongst the comrades with whom they had been thrown; and, at any rate, should be allowed an option as to continuing their service with the colours. If only the half of their number joined the Army Reserve, that Reserve would be risen at once to more than double its present proportions. As for the Militia Establishment, it was really a War Establishment; and he would ask, whether it was advisable to keep up a nominal War Establishment which within the past three years had not been approximated by 17,000, 18,000, and 20,000 men?

LORD ELCHO said, he was glad that the subject had been brought forward, seeing that it affected a Force which had been said to be, and which he believed really was, the backbone of the Army; and he regretted that the Government had not taken steps to prevent things remaining so long in their present invertebrate and unsatisfactory state. The Force had always been short by 20,000 or 30,000. The remedy proposed was reduction; but the Secretary of State and the Government of the day had allowed things to remain in this condition, and had not taken the necessary measures to keep the Militia Forces in a thoroughly healthy state. With regard to the suggestion to reduce the numbers, he was afraid that if such a proposition was carried into effect, the numbers would get small by degrees and beautifully less. He considered it to be the duty of Government, who were responsible for these matters, to take such steps as the Constitution placed at their disposal to bring into the Force, by inducements or otherwise, a sufficient number of men to keep up the establishment. When General Peel created the Militia Reserve, his intention was that it should be maintained in excess of the established strength of the regiments, and that for every man who volunteered from the Militia to join the Reserve, the colonel of the regiment should be allowed to raise another to fill his place. He ventured to say that such a course would be found beneficial.

COLONEL NAGHTEN said, he knew what trouble and expense asking for Returns caused; but, nevertheless, he would like to know how much Militia Reserve men had cost? They were all astonished and delighted at the way the Reserve men answered to the call; but he could not help thinking the same number of men, or more, might have been obtained by giving £2 or £3 bounty to single men, who had served two or more years in the Militia; and, by that means, many married men would not have had to leave their wives and families on the parish, and a good deal of money might have been saved to the country. He would suggest the re-opening of the retirement scheme to the adjutants under the old system; and those adjutants who had joined as young men, and wished to remain on, might be allowed to count their former Army service and Militia service for honorary rank, as given to Militia officers. It would be a great advantage to all ranks to know what description of quarters a regiment would have to occupy beforehand, as almost every year he knew, from experience, that within 24 hours of being called out the officers did not know whether they were to be quartered in billets, forts, or under canvas. If the War Office authorities and the Quartermaster General's Department would think over this matter during the winter, and more consideration was shown to the Militia, it would increase the popularity of the Force.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend that it was the duty of the House to support the Comptroller and Auditor General in every way they could. Having served on the Public Accounts Committee, he well knew the value of that gentleman's Report. The Committee looked most carefully into any item brought before them, because they thought it was their duty to prevent any money which had been voted by the House for one particular purpose being appropriated to any other purpose. He, for one, objected most strongly to the way in which the £3,500,000 was voted. When money was voted in a lump sum, the House had no control over the expenditure of it. With regard to the Militia Reserves, he thought that the men who had been called out ought at the end of their temporary service to have the option of joining the Army Reserve if they proved themselves efficient soldiers. This would have the effect of adding nearly 30,000 men to the Army Reserve, though the men elect to go into that Reserve, and would also enable the Militia to be filled up to its proper number. A slight alteration of the existing Act would be necessary in order to make this possible, but he thought there would be no real difficulty in effecting what was necessary.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he thought it would be as well to postpone the further consideration of the question until after the Public Accounts Committee had reported. As he understood the matter, a sum of £300,000 was voted for the purpose of constructing a tactical camp in the North of England; but only a small portion of land had been bought in furtherance of that object. The War Office, however, had appropriated £150,000 of this money to extend the camp at Aldershot, and had purchased two or three commons, which were at present just as much at the disposal of the troops at Aldershot for the purposes of manœuvring as they were at the disposal of the public for recreation. That proceeding appeared to him to be very unwise, and he certainly must protest against money voted by Parliament for a specific purpose being diverted into a different channel. He hoped the question would not be finally settled until after it had been considered by the Public Accounts Committee and reported upon to the House.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was glad that a supporter of the Government had brought forward a subject in which the conduct of the Government had been called in question. It was highly necessary that Parliament should look more closely after this matter. The various Departments were too ready to lay hold of unappropriated balances, and transfer them from one purpose to another.

COLONEL NORTH supported the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that the men in the Militia Reserve should be allowed the option of joining the Army Reserve, if they chose, after completing their term of service with the Force to which they belonged. The Militia Reserve had come forward on this occasion in a manner that was deserving of all praise. It was generally supposed that the Reserves of the Army and the Militia were due to Lord Cardwell; but the credit in connection with the Militia Reserve was due to General Peel.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, there could not be a more important point connected with the whole range of the Army Estimates than that to which his hon. and gallant Friend (Mr. Hayter) had drawn attention; and he thought that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had done well to treat it separately before the House went on with the Estimates, lest it might then have been swallowed up in the consideration of other matters. The whole subject of the position of the Militia Reserve and of the establishment of the Militia must, of course, come under fresh consideration now that the Reserve Forces had been actually called out. The noble Lord below the Gangway (Lord Elcho) had spoken of the Militia in terms of high praise, as being the old Constitutional Force and the backbone of the Army; but he had also alluded to it as being invertebrate. It appeared to him that that was an expression which had been somewhat misapplied, because, all that had been proved by his hon. and gallant Friend (Mr. Hayter) was, that the backbone was somewhat shorter than it ought to be. No fault was found with the backbone so far as it went. Had they required any means of testing the efficiency of the Militia, it would have been found in the condition of the Militia Reserve men who had joined the Army within the last few weeks. There was the extraordinary fact that not only those men had obeyed the call which was made upon them in such large numbers, but also that they had turned out to be men in every respect qualified to take their places with the Regular Army. That was not due to the fact of their being Militia Reserve men, but to the fact of their being Militiamen; and it proved that the training of the Militia was such that under it a man of intelligence was enabled to stand alongside of those who constituted the Regular Army. That was an important fact, and it was one which was encouraging and satisfactory in every aspect of the matter. The question as to what was to be done with the establishment of the Militia, whether that establishment ought to be reduced, and the Militia Reserve men to be treated in future as supernumerary to it, or whether they should in future, after being called out and serving in the Line, have the option of being passed into the Army Reserve, and other questions which had been raised in the course of the discussion, were unquestionably of great importance, and required grave and deliberate consideration; but all that he and others who were interested in them could do at present was to direct attention to them, and especially the attention of the Secretary of State for War, without expecting the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to give any opinion just now as to what he thought ought to be done in connection with them. He believed that the War Secretary must have derived some assistance from what had been said on this occasion. As to the point which had been raised by the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), he certainly thought there was some need for explanation. Power had been taken under the Act to expend a certain sum of money upon "a tactical training station," and, undoubtedly, it was intended that that station should be in the North of England. Insuperable difficulties, however, appeared to have arisen; one site after another had been proposed, only to be rejected; and the question which he thought the Government ought to clear up was this—all that being so, why did they expend the money upon Aldershot, instead of leaving it unexpended, when they found that it could not be applied to the purpose for which it was originally designed? No doubt, Aldershot was technically and literally a tactical training station; but, apart from the question of the rights of commoners, which was mixed up in the matter, it remained with the Government to show that the expenditure of this particular money in that locality was really within the proper purview of Parliament at the time the Act was passed.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he felt sure that the country was greatly indebted to the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire for having raised the question which he had that evening brought before the House, of using public funds voted for one purpose to another purpose; and though it was not likely in the present day that any personal abuse would arise, yet this division of funds was nothing less than misappropriation. He (Sir George Balfour) had on various occasions found in that House the misappropriation of money voted by Parliament. He had suggested that the power of making transfers of money from one head of the same Vote to another head of that Vote should be withdrawn from the Departments, and the power lodged with the Treasury when Parliament was not sitting to provide for the then requirements of the Service by an assignment of funds suitable for the Service. The voted sum no longer needed for the purpose sanctioned by Parliament should then absolutely lapse. Until that was done Parliament would not be able to prevent money being transferred from one purpose to another entirely different from that which Parliament intended. The Comptroller and Auditor General had more than once protested ineffectually against such transfers. He hoped in future the express purpose for which the money was required would be inserted in the Estimates. He made this remark because the £3,000,000 Vote for the Localization of the Forces was put before Parliament in a form so condensed and so obscure, that it was difficult for Parliament to compare the application of the funds in detail, with the brief and obscure entries in the original Estimate. Indeed, he had discovered expenditure out of that Vote which was not only not covered by the entries in the Estimate, but was opposed to the financial rules which were formerly laid down for the management of the financial business of the country. With regard to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member (Mr. Hayter) he would urge that the greatest latitude should be allowed to men to join the Reserves.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he must fully recognize the kindness which the House was in the habit of extending to individuals holding the Office he now held, provided the statements they had to make were satisfactory. Although he might differ in some matters of detail from the views expressed by the hon. and gallant Member behind him, still he concurred in the general opinion that he had advanced, that all possible attention should be paid to the advice of the Auditor General in respect of matters which came under his notice officially. During the tenure of Office by Lord Cranbrook the system of a test audit was for the first time introduced; and he believed the First Lord of the Treasury had been communicated with respecting the application of the same principle to the accounts of his Department. He was, therefore, entitled to say that the Government would by no means be opposed to the system of audit. That system was good up to a certain point. It was the duty of the Auditor General in his Report to state, as an independent officer, his opinion as to the validity of a charge, and as to whether the vouchers and other documents connected with it were satisfactory. It must not be forgotten, however, that behind him there was a body which was regarded with great deference by that House—namely, the Public Accounts Committee. The Report of the Auditor General was laid before that Committee, which carefully investigated all matters that were fairly open to challenge. Not being a Member of that Committee, he was unable to state positively whether the Report had come before it this year, but his impression was that it had, and that it passed either without any remark at all or with a mere casual question. After all, what was the actual state of the case? Certain large sums were reported to the House for the localization scheme of his noble Friend Lord Cardwell. In that amount was included a sum for a Northern tactical station. Reasons had been adduced both by Lord Cardwell and his Successor (Lord Cranbrook), showing why it was impossible to apply that money to the purpose for which it was originally intended. What with mining rights, the character of the soil, the difference in climate, and other difficulties, it had been found almost impossible to meet with land at a low level in the Northern parts of this country with a sufficient area of open space to afford a tactical ground which would be of practical value. Over and over again it had been thought that such and such a place would answer the purpose. One was found to be cut up with mining and other rights which would interfere with its free use, while another was found to be on too high a level with such inequality of ground as to render it practically useless. These difficulties occurred year after year, and the completion of a Northern tactical station became more and more pressing. Therefore, his noble Friend, looking at the use to which this money was originally destined, and regarding as a secondary consideration the locality in which that use was to be exercised, thought that he should be acting in the spirit in which the money was voted if he applied it in increasing the existing training grounds, and in giving opportunities for regiments in the North to be trained at the great training grounds which they already possessed. The question had been before Parliament on many occasions. In 1876 his noble Friend distinctly stated that the question mentioned by his Predecessor of a tactical station in the North of England still remained in abeyance; but he added that negotiations were going on for the purchase of land suitable for the purpose. Inasmuch as some of the money had been applied with the consent of the Treasury to an extension of land at Aldershot, where Northern regiments could be trained, he thought he might claim that the spirit, if not the letter, of the Vote had been fulfilled. With regard to the remarks of the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), he thought his hon. Friend, when he objected to give to the War Office power over the land at Aldershot, seemed to forget that a much smaller area would be placed under the control of the Department than it was originally intended to obtain in another place. As regarded the transfer from one Vote to another, that was in itself a most important matter; but the power of transfer with the consent of the Treasury was expressly given to the Naval and Military Departments by Act of Parliament. His hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Mr. Hayter) had called attention to the manifold deficiencies which, unhappily, continued to exist in the establishment of the Militia Force. Now, as far as the scope of his Resolution went, his hon. and gallant Friend was teaching a very willing disciple; for his hon. and gallant Friend cited as his text the Report of a Committee over which he himself presided two or three years ago. Undoubtedly, the discrepancy existing between the establishment and the enrolled members of the Militia, showed a state of things which was far from satisfactory. At the same time, it should be borne in mind that the conditions under which the Militia served rendered it impossible to contrast with fairness and accuracy the number of absentees with the absentees from ordinary regiments. He ventured to say that if the men in a regiment of the Line were allowed to go back to civil life for 11 months in the year, that circumstance would, to a great extent, account for many of these absentees, although he freely admitted that even then there would be a large number of whom it would be impossible to give a satisfactory account. His hon. and gallant Friend had taken three principal classes—from the metropolitan, the mining, and the agricultural districts respectively. Now, it should be remembered that at the present time the Militia was at about its worst. Considerable disturbance was given to that Force by Lord Cardwell's scheme for the localization of regiments, which, for some years, he was sorry to say, produced among the men an indifference to comply with those engagements into which they had formally entered. The men, instead of being in the pleasant places they expected, found themselves suddenly transferred far away to the middle of a large camp or garrison, to perform duties very different, perhaps, from those which they looked for when they joined. But though, on the whole, the localization scheme appeared to be very carefully worked out, he did not feel sure that the original allocation of the Militia regiments was such as, after more experience, could be accepted without some slight modifications. He always entertained the opinion that those who framed the regulations must have had some vague notion of compulsory service, inasmuch as their calculations were founded, not on the number likely to enlist, but on the number of males in the district. However, the regulations could not be altered without careful consideration. Then, in the metropolitan and other districts in the neighbourhood of large towns, there was another class of absentees. In those districts they must always reckon upon losing a certain percentage. The class of men enlisting were taken from a shifting population, and owing to the fluctuations of labour, the opening of fresh pits, and other causes, the men went to other districts or to sea. Of course, every effort was, and would still be, used to trace accurately where the men went. He had no doubt, however, that some regiments returned as absent from training men who had been up for training and had been afterwards sent down. That he knew to be the case. With regard to the question whether it would not have been better, instead of giving a larger bounty to the Militia, to let the money accumulate in a fund, and then give a larger bounty when men were wanted to volunteer for the Line?—that subject had been considered by the Committee to which reference had been made, and it had been found to be an unsatisfactory proposal. The fund would accumulate indefinitely, demurs would naturally be made to the money lying idle from year to year, and it would never be known what was the actual number of men on whom they could rely. If a large bounty were given, it would be given with their eyes open to all the evils, which were now condemned, of the former bounty system. Considering the various classes of employment in which the men were ordinarily engaged, the result, on the whole, of the organization of the Militia Reserve was not unsatisfactory. The total strength on the 1st of April, 1878, was 25,111; the number who reported themselves at the Militia head-quarters was 23,372; the number who failed to report themselves was 1,739. Of those who reported themselves, rather a large proportion—2,026—were found medically unfit, some temporarily, some totally; but the medical examination, being a military one, was rather severe. The number of men, therefore, who joined the Army was 20,296. Of the 1,739 who failed to attend, 420 were accounted for, and 1,319, or about 5 per cent of the strength of the Force, were unaccounted for. All things considered, and this being the first time they were called out, that percentage was not unsatisfactory. There were taken into custody 161, discharged for fraudulent enlistment 72, dead 61, sick 54. With regard to training, these men of the Militia Reserve were fit to take their places side by side, not only with men of the Line, but with men of the Guards. The illustrious Duke at the head of the Army had informed him that he had seen with great satisfaction that the men who had been sent down to the Guards' depôt were scarcely distinguishable from the trained soldiers among whom they had taken their places. Then, as to the point whether it was advisable to keep up a war establishment, the Committee were of opinion that the Militia establishment should practically be a war establishment, and he thought the result had justified that opinion. When the Militia Reserve men came to be suddenly drafted off, it was desirable that the commanding officers who lost some of their best men should beforehand be able to know what men permanently belonged to them, and it was thought preferable that 25 per cent should be borne as supernumerary. A very important point had been raised—namely, whether Militia Reserve men, having come up to the colours, should be allowed to go into the Army Reserve instead of going down as supernumerary to the Militia? Without any wish to discourage the Militia Reserve, or to prejudge the question, he must ask the House not to be carried away by their natural sympathy for these men, who did their duty so well. It should be borne in mind that the terms of the Army Reserve were made very different from those of the Militia Reserve, avowedly because they had a different class to deal with. In the Army Reserve they had trained soldiers; the Militia Reserve was not composed of the same class of men; and it seemed, therefore, natural that there should be a different rate of pay for the highly trained men. He hoped he had not trespassed unduly on the attention of the House, in endeavouring, as far as he could, to meet the various questions which had been raised. He should be prepared to answer any other Questions which might be put, and he hoped the House would now consent to go into Committee of Supply.

MR. BIGGAR objected to any Department having the power of devoting any grant of money to a purpose other than that for which it had been voted. He believed that some of the Militia regiments, especially those in the North of Ireland, were thoroughly worthless, and that, in case of emergency, instead of being a source of strength, they would prove the very reverse. He would recommend that the Government should do something to improve the morale of the Force.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, that as he was not in the House when the Army Estimates were last under discussion, he might, perhaps, be allowed to say a few words. He thought the manner in which the Army Reserve had responded to the call which had been made for their services was highly creditable to them and eminently gratifying to all concerned. For this result they were greatly indebted to Lord Cardwell, whose legislation upon this subject was based on sound principles. That noble Lord had made very large changes, but he left Office before he had time to reconstruct or replace what he had demolished. To his Successor belonged the credit of having provided a system of promotion and retirement for officers in place of what had been abolished; and he provided such attractions for the men as not only filled the ranks with the usual number of recruits, but supplied the extra number required by short service. He altered the system of organization in the Royal Artillery; he took steps very materially to improve the condition of the administrative Department of the Army; he altered the system of education at Sandhurst; and, above all, he did away with the ridiculous and mischievous restrictions on exchanges. There were, however, many difficult matters connected with our military system, some of them arising out of the changes recently made, still awaiting settlement. He believed that the Secretary of State would have to reconsider the policy of both his Predecessors with respect to the Medical Department, and that the warrants now in force would have to be repealed. Then he would inevitably have to re-adjust the pay and allowances of officers. While there were two systems of promotion in force, purchase and non-purchase, each having their own advantages, it was all very well that what were called the scientific branches should be at some disadvantage; but now those branches must be placed at least on an equality with the others. Indeed, special advantages should be given them, if they wished to keep up their standard. At the examination for Woolwich in March, there were 92 candidates for 40 vacancies. Of these 92, only 45 qualified in the preliminary examination; while last November 476 candidates competed for 91 vacancies at Sandhurst, of whom 125 failed to qualify. The remedy must also be found for desertion. The most efficient mode of dealing with it, in his opinion, would be to resort to the old system of marking with letter D. A sentimental objection existed, however, to this, owing to a misconception that men were branded like cattle, as had been said, and that it was a painful process. It had been suggested that all who entered the Service might be marked with a Broad Arrow or Crown, to which officers would, no doubt, gladly submit; but he scarcely thought it logical to make rules under the operation of which good men would come to protect us from the crimes of the bad. Instead of imprisoning deserters, he would like to see them confined to barracks till they could be sent to India or the Colonies, whence they could not desert. If removed from the temptations incidental to English life, most of them would become good soldiers. The next point to be considered was how Indian reliefs were to be kept up under the short-service system. He would suggest that all men should do their first term of six years on the English establishment; that they should then have the option of joining the Reserve, or going for six years to India, in which latter case they must, of course, receive some gratuity or other inducement. He regretted that the Government had not accepted the offer of a portion of those 10,000 troops made by the Dominion of Canada. It would have been a grand spectacle to see the East and the West uniting in defence of the Empire. He should like to see some change introduced whereby the Forces of the Crown, on occasions of emergency, could be made available without the inconvenience and scandal attending discussions in the House on the question, and suggested whether the case could not be met by an additional clause in the Mutiny Act. He would also suggest the desirability of considering whether the Native Indian troops should not be enabled to extend their travels to this country. ["Oh, oh!"] There were differences of opinion on that subject; but he had consulted soldiers of high rank, Indians both military and civil, and Colonial Governors, and he had found that, with one exception, they were of opinion that the money would be well spent in bringing a portion of the Indian troops now at Malta to this country for a short visit, to participate in the duties of the home troops, and to mount guard at the Queen's Palaces. It would gratify the people of India and promote the unification and consolidation of the Empire, over which they were in the habit of boasting that the sun never set.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(1.) £256,500, Medical Establishments and Services.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, whether the Vote included any charge on account of Hospital services in connection with the brigade of Guards? He might mention, by way of explanation, that whilst discussing the previous Vote, before the right hon. and gallant Gentleman came into his present position, the then Secretary of State for War stated that a portion of the Stock Purse Fund only was put down in Vote I. under certain headings, and that the remaining portion of the Fund was distributed throughout the other Votes. He (Mr. Parnell) was anxious to know in what Votes the remaining portion of the Stock Purse Fund appeared, as he had not been able to trace it?

COLONEL STANLEY said, that that portion of it which related to medical purposes such as Hospital expenses was included in the present Vote; but he could not at that moment recollect under what heads the remaining portion of the Fund appeared.

MR. PARNELL said, the precise information he wanted was this—whether the Vote included any charge on account of Hospital service in the brigade of Guards?

COLONEL STANLEY said, he would endeavour to answer the question. He believed that the Stock Purse defrayed all the medical charges of the Guards; but whether the actual surgeons doing duty there were included he was not able to say. His impression, however, was that they were.

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman did not seem to be aware that the original Stock Purse Fund, known as such, had been broken up into portions and distributed amongst certain items in the Votes. He had been successful in tracing two items in Vote I., and, perhaps, he might be allowed to refer to them, as they might be a guide to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. In Vote I., there were, according to page 16, three portions of this Stock Purse Fund included—namely, £2,610 for contingent allowances, &c.; £700 for allowances in aid of band expenses; and £6,910 for the profits of the field officers of the Foot Guards, in the shape of extra pay. Perhaps it would be better to take the items in order as they appeared in the Vote. The first was Infantry and Foot Guards' profits of the field officers, in the shape of extra pay, £6,910; then, under the head of contingent allowances, deducting stoppage for repair of arms, £2,610; and then, under the head of allowances for band expenses, came the sum of £700. These were all the items which stood opposite an entry under the head of Infantry and Foot Guards, and it was found out, in the course of the discussion of Vote I., that these items were paid out of the Stock Purse Fund. The right hon. Gentleman the then Secretary of State for War further informed the Committee that the remnants of the Stock Purse Fund, which amounted to considerably more than these three items—the total amount of the Fund being £13,190—were distributed among the rest of the Votes. According to a Return, which had been produced at the instance of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore), he found that the remainder of the Fund was applied to Hospitals and recruiting purposes. The sum of £8,929 was applied to Hospital purposes for the brigade of Guards, and the sum of £145 was applied to recruiting purposes for the same brigade of Guards—making a total of £9,074. He had been very anxious to trace this Vote and to find out what had become of the different items of this Stock Purse Fund, and he would have been able to obtain information, no doubt, if the former Secretary for War had been still in Office. At present, he would direct the attention of the Secretary for War to page 29, which referred to the present Vote—Vote IV. He found, under the head of allowance to private medical practitioners and medical bills under sub-head C for home purposes, an item of £5,340; and for Colonial purposes, £5,840. There was an increase in the item for home purposes for last year of something like £2,300, and an increase in the item for last year for Colonial purposes of something considerably more than that. He could understand that the Vote for Colonial purposes would be still more increased by the War at the Cape; but he could not understand the reason for the other increase; and, in any case, he could not account for the sum proposed to be applied. In the Return produced at the instance of the hon. Member for Clonmel, there was a sum of £3,000 odd, which was stated to be taken for Hospitals in connection with the Guards. He wished to know what had become of the sum applied to the Hospitals of the Guards?

COLONEL STANLEY was afraid that he was not able offhand to trace that particular item. If he had been in the House when the previous discussion took place, his attention would have been directed to the subject probably; but, unfortunately, he was not. He thought the hon. Member would find that provision was taken for part of this Vote in the shape of Hospital services in one Vote, and in other shapes in regard to the other Votes. [Mr. PARNELL: Which Votes?] The hon. Member would see that provision was taken for Medical Services in Vote IV., and so on, in regard to the other Votes. He was unable to give more precise information at the present moment; but if the hon. Gentleman would put the question on the Report, he would then be able to give him every information in regard to the matter. He believed the way in which the Vote was applied was traceable, though in the form in which it originally stood in Vote I., it was, unquestionably, open to some doubt. He would repeat the answer he had given to a previous question—that his impression was that the Hospital services of the year were recorded in the Vote about to be taken.

MR. PARNELL said, the difficulty he found himself in was this—that the whole of the Stock Purse Fund had been broken up. It was originally in one lump sum of £13,190, and a Return was moved for by his hon. Friend the Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore), asking for further details as to the appropriation of the Fund and the application of the money. When the Return appeared, it was found that it only accounted for a very small portion of that sum of £13,190—in point of fact, it only accounted for £502 18s. 4d., for pay and allowances, apartments for the field major, fuel and light, recruiting, proceedings at courts martial, &c. Altogether there were five items, and they amounted to £502 18s. 4d. But the vast bulk of the sum of £13,000 was not accounted for at all, and was still put down as the Stock Purse Fund; so that, as far as any information to be obtained from the Return was concerned, they might just as well have been without it. In consequence of the futility of the Return, his hon. Friend moved for another. The second Return went much more into detail, but did not clear up this extraordinary matter, which was of a very complicated character, and very much required to be cleared up, and with regard to which he would suggest by-and-bye a way of clearing it up. In the second Return obtained by the hon. Member for Clonmel, he found that this sum of £11,000 and odd, not accounted for in the preceding Return, was accounted for in the following manner:—The Hospital services of the Guards were to get £8,929, recruiting services £145, band expenses £1,360; in addition to which there was an item of £970 for Staff allowances to non-commissioned officers, and an item of £6,708 5s. 6d. for average profits of field officers and captains. It was not his present purpose to object to these large profits of field officers and captains, though he thought they should be —with after the present off'd their offices. He wished more particularly to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the Hospital branch. They had there the expenses of hospitals, and a number of contingencies—wages, washing, fuel, light, repairs, &c., amounting altogether to a sum of £8,029. Now, that amount had been stowed away somewhere, and he did not know where. It was not in Vote I., because they had accounted for the item, and he thought that a considerable portion of it must be in Vote IV. The difficulty he felt was this—that when the Report was brought on, it was always difficult to discuss a question of this sort, because the Report itself was not brought up until very late. He would suggest to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that, if he were unable to point out in this Vote for medical establishment and services what portion of the sum of £8,000 and odd was included, he should postpone the Vote until some future day.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could not accept the suggestion. He had already endeavoured to explain, though, he was afraid, without success, to the hon. Member, that, so far as he was aware, charges which were made upon the Stock Purse Fund, except those which were included in Vote I., already voted, were distributed among the separate Votes of the Estimates—that was to say, in the Hospital Vote. The item for provisions, light, forage, fuel, and so forth, belonged to the Stock Purse Fund. He was not able to say precisely the amount of the charge included in each Vote; but if the hon. Member would be good enough to repeat his question on Report, he should be glad to give every information. In the meantime, he had endeavoured to answer the question, by stating that, to the best of his belief, the medical officers were included in the previous Vote—that was to say, that the medical expenses were included in the present Vote; and that the rest of the Stock Purse charges, such as fuel, light, &c., were to be found in the other Votes.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, he had intended to raise a question touching the Medical Department upon this Vote; but when he saw a matter brought forward in such a cavilling spirit, he had changed his mind, and abstained from occupying the time of the Committee with the subject. He was anxious to do all he could to forward the Estimates; but he reserved to himself the right of using an independent Member's day for the purpose of calling attention to the state of the Medical Department. He wished his right hon. and gallant Friend to regard this intimation as made in a friendly, and not in an unfriendly, spirit. He had no wish to interfere with any of the steps that were now being taken for the re-organization of the Department. His only object was to improve the present state of things.

LORD ELCHO said, he had listened to what had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), and he could not help agreeing that the question was a very important one. On the other hand, it was not desirable that they should unduly interrupt the Supply. It appeared to him that the question had been fairly met by the offer of the Secretary of State for War. He would, therefore, suggest to the hon. Member for Meath that he should allow the Vote to pass, on the understanding that the information would be given on the Report.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, the hon. Member for Meath had a perfect right to ask for information. It was certainly within his (Sir George Balfour's) own knowledge, that the origin of all the evil was allowing the Guards to conduct their own hospitals out of funds levied from the soldier. In point of fact, the Guards had been allowed, from time immemorial, to manage their own services in connection with the recruiting and hospitals. The personal allowances given to the officers of the Guards for being on duty in London, or liable to be on duty, was wrong. If the London duty was undertaken by a battalion of the Line, then the officers were also entitled to allowances; but these were fixed and regularly paid out of the voted monies, whereby the Guards raised funds under the old and objectionable form by stoppages from the pay of the men, and the consequence had been a confusion of accounts, as well as a suspicion that these were doings which could not be laid open to the country. The Secretary of State for War had now, with the honesty that was his characteristic, proposed to give all the information asked for, and he thought the hon. Member for Meath ought not further to oppose the Vote.

MR. PARNELL said, the only reason why he appeared to hesitate about accepting the offer of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was, because he very much feared, from what he had previously seen in regard to the question, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would not be able to give him the information he required. The subject was really in such a ravel and a tangle, that until a new arrangement was made to place the officers of the Guards on the same footing as the officers of the rest of the Army, it would be impossible to make head or tail out of this question of the Stock Purse Fund. This last attempt of the Government to distribute the items among the other Votes, instead of making them one bulk sum, only made confusion worse confounded. In point of fact, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman knew very well what he was talking about, when he answered the question in the first instance. The money was obviously hidden away, and where, as the right hon. and gallant Gentleman himself admitted, he did not know.

MR. BIGGAR said, the difficulty that was found in connection with all these Votes was this. The hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who had charge of the different Departments were almost all new to their particular positions, and were quite as destitute of information as the House itself. He did not wish to make any specific charge against the Government on this question, because he was disposed to make every allowance for the Secretary of State for War; but it was a very serious position to find themselves placed in—that on all occasions when a question was asked in reference to different Departments they should receive the same answer from the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen in charge of them. The evil was that they came into Office since the Estimates were framed, and that they did not know anything about them. Whenever information was asked for, the practice was to say—"I really don't know anything about it; but, if you will postpone the question until the Report, then I will give you the information required." When the Report came on, if they repeated the question, they were told that it would be wasting time to discuss it, and that the only time for raising the question was when the Vote itself was brought forward. He would suggest to the Government that it would be well to postpone all these Votes, until the heads of the different Departments got to know something about the subjects they had to bring before the Committee. As the matter existed at present, there was a frightful waste of time involved, because the Committee were unable to get any information; and at the same time, the non-official Members, who really knew a good deal more about these matters than the heads of the Departments, did not wish to press too hardly upon Gentlemen who were new to their Offices. At the same time, he really did think that that system of asking time after time for the postponement of questions until the Report, when it was well known there could be no opportunity for discussing the question, was most objectionable, and ought to be given up.

MAJOR NOLAN was sorry that the hon. and gallant Member for Hereford (Colonel Arbuthnot) had not brought the question of medical officers before the Committee. He also regretted that the Members of the Medical Profession who were also Members of the House, and who sat principally on the Opposition Benches, were not present when that Vote was under discussion. In their absence, he desired to bring forward a question which considerably affected the interests of medical officers, and which had been a subject of comment during the last two or three years. It was alluded to very recently in a letter that appeared in the newspapers from Dr. Corrigan. The question he referred to was that of providing a supply of surgeons for the Army. It was a question in which great interest was taken by the Medical Profession generally, and particularly by what might be called the Medical Schools. The Irish Members had a good deal of interest in the matter, because a large proportion of the surgeons of the Army came from Ireland. The letter he referred to really summed up the whole subject. It showed that there was at present a great want of medical officers in the Army, and it put forward as the chief reason, not the want of pay, or of material advantages, but the fact that the medical officers in the Army were not properly treated. One grievance was that they were required to cease to be members of regiments and members of messes, this being carried out by an Order of the Secretary of State for War. Personally, he (Major Nolan) had taken great pains at various times to put the question to various Army surgeons he had been brought into contact with, and he certainly found that all the younger members were unanimous. The older members of the Army Medical Profession took the same view, although perhaps not so strongly. All the younger medical men, however, felt very strongly indeed upon the fact that at the present moment they were not members of regiments, and had no locus standi. They found that when they went into a mess they had, as it were, no home. An ordinary officer had his home and his mess, to which he could ask his friends, but the Army medical officers were only there on sufferance, and could ask no friends. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would read the very important letter to which he had referred, which fully summed up the views of the surgeons in the Army. He (Major Nolan) had no doubt that it was a real grievance, and the effect of it was witnessed by the diminished number of candidates for appointments in the Army. He believed that if it went on much longer, the Army Medical Department would drift into a state of hopeless inefficiency. He was satisfied that the condition of the Medical Profession in the Army would be much different if the Government would adopt measures for improving the present status of the Medical Profession. If something of this kind were not done, the Army itself would suffer in the end; because, if the country went into war, the Medical Department would certainly break down. It would be of no use then for Her Majesty's Ministers to say it was not their fault; that they were anxious to employ the men, if they could procure them. It would be the fault of the Government entirely, if they did not take proper precautions to secure an efficient establishment in a time of peace. It was impossible to get an efficient Staff in a time of war, because it required a certain amount of discipline; and civilian practitioners, obtained on the spur of the moment, would require considerable time and training before they could be rendered efficient. He believed that the application of the regimental system, as far as medical officers were concerned, would be wise economy in the end. The hard work entailed by the business of an efficient Staff told hardly upon the private soldier as well as upon the surgeons themselves. At present, there were not a sufficient number of medical officers to enable them to obtain proper leave, and the whole of the Profession was in consequence greatly dissatisfied. He was sorry that his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Dr. Ward) was not present, because he knew that he was anxious to bring the question forward. In the absence of his hon. Friend, he (Major Nolan) had ventured to introduce the question; and he would only add that, in regard to the medical officers themselves, they were all of them unanimous upon the subject. He wished to ask what steps the Government intended to take in the matter?

After a pause—

MAJOR NOLAN said, that unless he obtained an answer to his question, he would feel it necessary to move that the Chairman report Progress.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he had no wish to leave the hon. and gallant Member without an answer. He had only waited to see whether any other hon. Member was desirous of continuing the discussion. The House was already aware that his noble Friend and Predecessor (Viscount Cranbrook) had already referred to a small Committee the very important case of the medical officers of the Army, and had issued general instructions to that Committee to confer with all the large medical centres, with eminent physicians, and the principal medical councils, so as to ascertain really what in the eyes of the Profession were the practical difficulties in the way of obtaining a sufficient supply of medical officers for the Army. Of course, they all had a certain bias in the matter, and however carefully they might endeavour to weigh the question, they would have a prejudicial feeling either one way or the other. It must be borne in mind that the present system was adopted after very careful consideration. It was adopted mainly in consequence of the action taken by a number of the members of the Profession in the view of what they regarded as their grievances. His Predecessor in the Office of Secretary of State for War after weighing fully the representations of the Profession and considering how their grievances could best be met, came to the conclusion that they were only to be met by the re-arrangement of the Medical Service on a basis very distinct from that which had hitherto obtained. Whatever merits might attach to the regimental medical services, Lord Cranbrook considered that it was not absolutely perfect with regard to the position of the officers in the regiment. Therefore, all these things had to be very carefully considered and weighed, in reference to how they would press in particular cases. He feared that it would never be possible so to deal with the matter as to do away altogether with complaints of grievances; but he should hail any opportunity that might arise of putting the gentlemen in the Army Medical Service on a satisfactory footing. At present he was speaking in the dark, because the position of medical men both in the Army and the Navy was changing from day to day, and he had not as yet had opportunity for consulting as many authorities as he should like to consult on such a subject before coming to a decisive opinion upon it. No one could have a more earnest desire for the amelioration of the service than he had, and he hoped he should receive such assistance as would enable him to put his hand upon any blot or defect in the system with a view to its removal; but, at the present moment, he did not think he would be justified in prejudging the question to any extent; at the same time, he was most anxious to consider it.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to refer to a question affecting the health of the troops in India. A correspondence was going on between a general officer who had seen much service in India, the Medical Department, and the Commander-in-Chief, with reference to the hour at which dinner should be served to the troops serving in India. The general officer said he had found that by postponing the hour from 1 o'clock until 4—a cooler part of the day—the regiment under his command had not suffered, to any great extent, from the complaints to which other European regiments serving in India were subject. He hoped the question would be carefully considered by the authorities.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, he should like to know, whether the Committee which had sat to inquire into the subject were likely to report shortly, and whether the Report was likely to be published, or whether the inquiry was merely a departmental one?

COLONEL STANLEY said, he could not answer the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, because it would depend upon the form and not upon the substance of the answers given by the medical witnesses, whether their evidence could be made public. If it should appear that the evidence was not of a strictly confidential character, he should be happy to produce the Report.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £535,400, Pay and Allowances of the Militia, including Militia Reserve.

MR. HAYTER called attention to the large and increasing number of men absent without leave. In the year 1875 the number was 10,860; in 1876 it was 11,291; and in last year it was 15,007. The exact figures for this year were not yet available, but there had been an alarming increase already as compared with 1875.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he thought the apparent increase was due to the fact that the Returns had in late years been made out in a different way as far as the permanent Staff was concerned.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE wished to make a suggestion with regard to the fund which had accumulated, in the shape of fines for drunkenness, and which now amounted to about £4,000. He thought it would be well to expend this sum in the purchase of newspapers and periodicals, and in providing other forms of recreation, in order, as far as possible, to keep the men out of the public-houses during their periods of training.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, the difficulty had been how to allot so small a sum as £4,000, so as to produce any real and practical benefit. A Departmental Committee was appointed to consider the matter, and it was determined on their Report to dispose of the money in the shape of small indulgences to militiamen during their periods of service.

LORD ELCHO referred to the debate which had taken place earlier in the evening upon the state of the Militia, and to the remarks which were then made by the Secretary of State for War. His contention was that the Militia establishment, when it was fixed in 1852 by the Government of that day, was fixed at a standard which was not believed to be a war standard, but the proper standard for the Militia of this country to be maintained at for our home defence. He hoped the strength of the Militia would be kept up, and that the present Secretary of State for War would not shirk his responsibility, as some of his Predecessors had done, but would ask Parliament either for more money, or for compulsory power to enrol men in the Militia. At the time to which he had referred, Mr. Walpole, the then Home Secretary, said the number of the Militia necessary for home defence was 80,000, and that if the number was obtained by voluntary enlistment, the Bill had been so drawn that there would be no necessity to resort to the compulsory clauses.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON pointed out what he deemed to be a great injustice—namely, that money drawn from the fines paid for drunkenness by the Militia was distributed in the shape of gratuities to men in the Regular Army. This was a course likely to cause much dissatisfaction in the Militia, and it was a course, moreover, which, if he was correctly informed, had not received the sanction of the Treasury.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT thought greater consideration should be shown to non-commissioned officers in the Militia when they were called upon to serve with the Regular Army. At present they only drew the pay of privates, although some of them were very valuable non-commissioned officers. He thought that, after a short period of probation, they should be allowed to receive the full pay of their respective ranks.

MR. PARNELL asked for some information as to the fact that there appeared to be a decrease of about 3,000 in the rank and file of the Militia as compared with last year?

COLONEL STANLEY said, the apparent decrease was, in fact, no decrease at all, and was due to the partial absorption of the regular Staff of the Militia into brigade depôts. As had been already stated, the amount of money received in the shape of fines for drunkenness had, on the recommendation of a Committee, been applied in the direction of recreation for the men by whom the fines had been paid. A Committee had just completed the consideration of the question as to the best means of utilizing the services of half-pay officers. The question was a very complicated one, and he had not at present had time to master the details of the Report. The matter should have his immediate attention, for he was anxious to hit upon some plan by which half-pay officers could be utilized in time of war.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War must have misunderstood the question which he had put to him with reference to the diminution in the rank and file of the Militia. That diminution amounted to 3,000 men, consisting of corporals and privates. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had referred him to page 132 of the Appendix, which contained an account of all the different brigade depôts at home and abroad; but he found, on consulting it, that the strength of the Militia in those depôts was only 64 men, and it was obvious that the withdrawal of 64 men from their regiments to brigade depôts would not account for the deficiency in the number of the Force for this year and last year, to which he had called the attention of the Committee.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he was unable, at the present moment, to enter into any further details in explanation of the discrepancy to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, beyond the information which he had already given to the Committee.

MR. PARNELL said, it was somewhat remarkable that while the number of the rank and file of the Militia had been reduced by 3,000 men last year, there was an increase from £181,000 to £207,000 this year in the amount asked for for bounties and new enrolments. Another very curious point connected with the matter was, that according to the statement set forth in page 48, which gave the details of the charges for clothing, the sum required for the purpose this year was put down as only £117,955, as against £212,555 last year; so that, with a Force smaller by 3,000, there was an increase for bounties and enrolment of £26,000, while the charge for clothing was less. He was afraid the Estimates had been very carelessly drawn. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman was not, of course, responsible for them, inasmuch as they had been framed long before he entered upon the duties of his present Office. On looking over them, however, he discovered traces of carelessness in almost every page, due, perhaps, to the system which prevailed at the War Office, which, no doubt, required re-organization. It was quite clear, at all events, that if the Estimates had been framed with that attention which ought to have been bestowed upon them, he would not have been able to point out such extraordinary anomalies as those to which he had just called attention.

COLONEL STANLEY explained, that the payments in the shape of bounties had been increased, and that, as clothing was not served out every year to the men, there was a variation in the quantity supplied, which accounted for the charge under that head being less one year than another.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £74,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Yeomanry Cavalry Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879."

MAJOR O'BEIRNE called attention to the fact that several officers of the Regular Army were serving as adjutants to the Yeomanry at home, while their brother officers were employed with their regiments abroad, running all the risks which resulted from bad climates and other causes. Those adjutants, too, derived all the advantages in the way of promotion which they would be entitled to if they had gone on foreign service, and in that way he thought a great injustice was done to those who had to bear the brunt of the Service.

COLONEL STANLEY said, his noble Friend who had preceded him in the Office which he had the honour to hold considered that it would be very advantageous to apply to the Yeomanry the rule which had already been applied by Lord Cardwell to the Infantry—namely, to appoint as adjutants to the Force officers on full pay in the Regular Army, who would be entitled to hold those appointments only for five years. That was regarded as a fair line so far as the rest of the Service was concerned, and as not being so long as to render it probable that an officer would become rusty for the performance of his regular duties.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, he thought the answer of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman was so unsatisfactory, that he should feel it his duty to take a division on the Vote. He, therefore, begged to move that it be reduced by the sum of £5,960, the pay of Yeomanry adjutants. He strongly objected to having an officer getting from £200 to £350 in one of those appointments, who had, perhaps, never served one day abroad. There was a rule, he might add, that the adjutantcy of a Yeomanry regiment should not be given to an officer with less than two years' service; but that rule had been very recently set aside in the case of the Royal Dragoons and the Carbineers.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £68,440, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Yeomanry Cavalry Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879."
—(Major O'Beirne.)

MR. BIGGAR was also of opinion that the answer of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was most unsatisfactory. The Vote appeared to him to be one which was liable to be applied in a direction to which he strongly objected—namely, that of undue favouritism. The practical result would be that the appointment in question would be conferred upon officers who happened to have political or other influence at their command, and who desired to be able to put in their time in England instead of taking foreign service in the same rotation as their brother officers. Besides, young officers would be far more likely to acquire a knowledge of their profession if they were to go with their regiments when sent abroad, than if they were to stay at home in positions, which, after all, were nothing more than semi-sinecures. For those reasons, he hoped his hon. and gallant Friend would press his Motion for the reduction of the Vote to a division.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £485,300, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Volunteer Corps Pay and Allowances, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879."

MR. O'CLERY said, when he gave Notice of his Motion for the reduction of the Vote, it was his intention that it should be reduced by the sum of £16,663, the amount of increase in the present Estimate over the sum provided for last year; but he found that by so doing he should still be under the responsibility of sanctioning the payment for English and Scotch Volunteer Corps, while his countrymen in Ireland were debarred from the right of enrolling themselves as Volunteers. Of the sum of £485,300 required for the English and Scotch Volunteer Corps, it appeared that as nearly as possible the proportion of one-sixth part, or about £80,000, would have to be paid by Ireland. In view, therefore, of this contribution to Imperial taxation for the purpose of the Volunteer Service, in which the people of Ireland were not allowed to participate, and in order to secure to Ireland an immunity from this payment in the future, he was now compelled to move the reduction of the Vote by about six times the amount he originally intended—namely, £80,000—which would still leave Ireland under a very unfair amount of taxation. It appeared that the Vote asked for was made up as follows:—Pay to adjutants of Volunteer Corps, £61,000; sergeant instructors, £63,000; Capitation grants, £335,488; miscellaneous charges, £25,900; in all, £485,388. He did not object to the establishment of Volunteer Corps—on the contrary, he was strongly in favour of the claim of England and Scotland to possess them; and he held that it was the right of every free citizen of a free country to be trained to arms, a right that had been exercised and encouraged in England from time immemorial. He was also bound to admit, that since their establishment, notwithstanding the fact that every year a number of trained officers had found it absolutely necessary to throw up their commissions, the Volunteer Forces had continued to increase both in England and Scotland.

The sum demanded annually for the Volunteers was constantly increasing. The Capitation Grant did away with the expense to the Volunteer individually, inasmuch as the Government paid his corps a sum which enabled the administrative of that corps to give him his training and outfit practically free of charge, provided he was at all efficient. But why were the Irish people debarred from sharing the advantages of a military training, while they were called upon to contribute a large sum annually for Volunteer purposes in this country? He believed that no charge of inefficiency had ever been made against those of his countrymen who had enrolled themselves as Volunteers in England and Scotland; on the contrary, it was admitted by competent authorities that two of the most efficient corps in this country were the Liverpool Irish Brigade and the London Irish Volunteer Corps; and he ventured to say that, as far as marching was concerned, those Irish Volunteer Brigades were not to be surpassed by any regiment in Her Majesty's Service, while he was sure their officers would resent any charge made against their personal bravery or devotion. He found no difference whatever existed in these respects as between his countrymen who were serving in England and Scotland, and those who remained in Ireland. On what grounds, then, should the Irish, living in Ireland, be deprived of the privilege of raising Volunteer Corps—a privilege which was of more importance to them than to the English or Scotch, because they were a more martial race? The latter, although a great commercial people, did not take to the pursuit of arms with the readiness of the Irish; and he would say, for the information of any officer, be he Irish, Scotch, or English, that the Irish Volunteer would learn his drill in a far shorter time than the English Volunteer. His sense of duty and discipline was higher than that of the ordinary English soldier taken from any county in this country. When it was found that the people of Ireland had the desire to be trained to arms, when it was seen that this natural desire was discouraged in every possible way, he was forced to the conclusion that a corresponding feeling of disgust at being thus debarred would arise in the minds of the Irish people; and he questioned whether it was to the interest of the State that such a feeling should be excited. The Irish Militia regiments had always shown themselves to be perfectly efficient and loyal, and it was to be remembered that they were, to a certain extent, recruited from a stratum of the people socially lower than the ordinary Volunteers, and that the Volunteers who were likely to come forward and offer their services in Ireland would be of the same standard as the Irish Constabulary Force, whose loyalty had been over and over again the subject of compliment — one hon. and gallant Gentleman having said that this Force, taken from the ranks of the people, was at that present moment, man for man, almost the finest in Europe. It was found from year to year that by their training and discipline they were becoming practically a military Force; and, at the present time, they were actually so in Ireland. The military taste of the Irish people was manifested by that body of horse police, and he would add that the police of this country would require a good deal of training before it attained to the efficiency of the Irish Constabulary. Why, then, should they not allow a Volunteer Force to be created in Ireland? He had devoted attention last year to the subject of the establishment of Volunteer Corps in Ireland, and by the permission of the House he had introduced a Bill for that purpose, modelled upon the Volunteer Bill passed in 1859-60, by which every restriction contained in the latter was to apply to the Irish Volunteers; but, as in the case of all Irish measures, he had found it impossible to bring this Bill to the stage of a second reading, and therefore allowed it to drop, with the intention of again bringing forward the subject in the form of a Resolution to the effect "that it was desirable to establish Volunteer Corps in Ireland." That, however, might not have been listened to, and it now seemed to him that the best way was to direct attention to the question in that Vote, because it must in that way receive the attention of the House, and there was no chance of its being shelved. This question of establishing Volunteer Corps in Ireland was one of very great importance. There had been a time when the Empire had on hand a great European war, such as was perhaps now before it, when the requirements of England were so pressing that she was compelled to withdraw all the troops from Ireland. At this time the Privy Council and the Parliament permitted the Irish to enrol Volunteers. The result was, although no Catholics could be officers in the Force, that in a single year, and at a time when the population of Ireland amounted to but 4,000,000, 100,000 men sprang to arms; and, looking at that percentage, he considered that it afforded fair evidence of the desire of the Irish people to come forward in defence of their country. The great reliance of the Irish Parliament was on that Volunteer Force, which would have continued to exist had not the English Minister, in his designs on the Parliament of Ireland, and with the intention of destroying the Irish Constitution, sapped its foundations, putting every obstacle in the way of its working, until the year 1796, when the Yeomanry Force was established instead, and the Ministerial plan was carried out. A state of mistrust then ensued; there were no Volunteer Corps in the country, and the Parliament by bribery and corruption sanctioned the measure by which Ireland lost her Constitution. At that moment the Irish regiments were true to their oaths and colours, and from that period to the present no Irish soldier in Her Majesty's Service had ever flinched in the time of danger. He would not say that had always been the case with English soldiers. Two or three years ago the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) publicly stated in that House that on the morning of the assault on the Redan, there were many recruits who flung themselves down in the trenches, and had to be twitted into something like manhood by Irish sergeants. It was, no doubt, a disagreeable thing to hear; but he must say that no Irish soldiers had ever to be so treated. He would now look at this question as affecting the defence of the Empire. For a considerable time past every English patriot had been thinking how best to make England present a very bold front before Europe, going even to the extent of bringing Indian troops to Malta; but all this time a very important portion of the Empire was left practically defenceless. That fact alone clearly showed where the danger to the Empire lay, and where was the vulnerable point of her armour. A Power hostile to this Kingdom would find in Ireland a people deprived of arms, denied their use in every possible way, and treated in a manner that would almost throw them into the arms of an enemy. He questioned whether this was a state of things to be passed over lightly. It had been often said that one reason why Volunteer Corps could not be allowed in Ireland as in England and Scotland, was the possibility of religious differences; but he had not found that the embodiment of the old Irish Volunteers led to any differences of this kind, nor did he doubt that precautions could easily be taken to prevent their occurrence in the future. It was true there were some districts in Ireland that had been disgraced by the manner in which the population observed certain anniversaries; but that was no reason why all Ireland should be denied the privilege of forming Volunteer Corps; but he thought it would be a good arrangement, if the districts in which these disturbances had occurred, were denied this privilege until they could show themselves worthy of it. He would now look at the case of a foreign State. In the year 1849, the same system was practised towards the ancient Kingdom of Hungary as was applied to Ireland in 1796-1797. The Hungarians took up arms, and the result of the struggle was that, when peace was established, the Hungarian corps were disbanded. Everybody who studied the question would know that those regiments were, by the very nature of things, more or less dissatisfied with the denial of their ancient right to serve with the National Forces, and the Austrian Government afterwards saw the necessity of restoring more or less nationality to Hungary. With what effect? At this moment, Hungary, which a few years ago was treated so contemptuously by the Austrian Government, was the bulwark of the Empire, and the power of all others looked to as a defence against Russia; and he ventured to think that if His Majesty's Forces were actually called into the field, it would not be thought that the security of the Army would be lessened by its having Hungarian regiments on its side. Again, in the case of Norway and Sweden—the Norwegian law allowed the levy of a National Militia in the country, and, by the very fact of their being trusted, the Norwegians have always stood by Sweden honestly and faithfully. In the event of these two countries being menaced by any foreign Power, Norway could not be looked upon as the weak point of the Swedish-Norwegian Monarchy, neither could Hungary be so regarded with reference to the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Ireland, however, must be considered as the weak point of the three Kingdoms, generally known as the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Every enemy of England must be aware that the mistrust engendered by the denial to Irishmen of the rights enjoyed by the English and Scotch people must recoil upon this country. He believed a movement had been set on foot quite recently, with the object of endeavouring to raise a Volunteer Force in Ireland on a footing different to that which existed in England, and he understood this movement to be so far advanced that the promoters were in a position to communicate with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who had consented to receive next day a deputation on the subject. He thought it right to state that in his opinion the basis of this movement was a false one, because the gentlemen who were promoting it asked for the enrolment of Volunteers on a much narrower basis than that which existed in England. The promoters were quite content that no man should be allowed to join the Volunteer Service throughout Ireland without the strictest investigation being made into his character, and at the same time they were willing that obstacles of every kind should be put in the way of the Volunteer. The rule was different in England, where anyone who was ready to do his duty simply came forward, and after satisfying the officers that he was a fit and proper man, was admitted without any regard being paid to his religious opinions. In England it was in the interest of the officers to keep a man who was worthy of the Corps; but in Ireland the system, put forward by the gentlemen to whom he had referred, would be but a system of national espionage, and would lead to evils greater than it was intended to remedy; and would, moreover, practically result in arming the Orangemen of the North to the exclusion of the rest of the population. In his opinion, a system which provided for the arming of a section only of the Irish people would be much worse than the present system of disarming the whole population. It was his duty to state that he felt as strongly upon this question of voting money on the part of his countrymen towards the maintenance of English and Scotch Volunteer Corps as if it were a question of education. He objected to the voting of any money for the English Volunteer Service until he heard from the Secretary of State for War, who was best entitled to speak on the subject, a full and satisfactory explanation of the reason why the system was not extended to Ireland. The only satisfactory solution of the question would be to establish in Ireland Volunteer Corps on exactly the same basis as those in England, and with no other restrictions or conditions in reference to their members. He would now move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £485,280.

THE CHAIRMAN: Do I understand the hon. Member to move the reduction of the Vote by £485,280?

MR. O'CLERY said, that was his proposition. The reason he did not move to reduce the Vote by £80,000, the amount Ireland contributed, was that that reduction would be distributed over England and Scotland as well as Ireland, and therefore the latter country would still contribute towards the Volunteer charges of England and Scotland.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Vote is for £485,300, and I understand the hon. Member proposes to reduce it by £485,280, which will leave the Vote at £20.

MR. O'CLERY said, that was his proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN: The practice of the Committee in such cases is to move to reject the whole Vote, there being no object or reason for leaving £20 to be voted.

MR. O'CLERY said, he would have moved the rejection of the Vote; but he understood an hon. Member wished to propose its reduction by the amount in excess of last year's charge. He asked the opinion of the Chairman whether his moving the rejection of the whole Vote would prevent any other hon. Member moving its reduction?

THE CHAIRMAN: Any hon. Member would be in Order in proposing the reduction of the Vote, and the proposition for reduction would be taken first.

MR. O'CLERY: I move to reduce the Vote by £485,280.

Mr. O'Clery

THE CHAIRMAN: The course which the hon. Member proposes to take is contrary to the practice of the Committee. The reduction he mentions is tantamount to the rejection of the whole Vote. The order of Business is either to put the rejection of the whole Vote, if it is moved, or such reduction as can reasonably be distinguished from the whole Vote.

MR. O'CLERY said, in that case he would move the rejection of the Vote.

MR. PARNELL asked, whether it was not competent for an hon. Member to move the reduction of a Vote by any sum he thought right?

THE CHAIRMAN: The practice which has prevailed has been to move to reduce a Vote by a reasonable amount. But it is impossible to draw a distinction between such an Amendment as the hon. Member proposes to submit and the rejection of the whole Vote; and it is, therefore, my duty to put the Question on the whole Vote.

MR. HAYTER asked the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, whether it was his intention to make public the Report of the Departmental Committee now sitting at the War Office, considering the whole question of the Volunteer Force? All commanding officers of Volunteer regiments had had a series of questions submitted to them by that Committee, and replies had been forwarded. Of course, those answers would be laid before the Departmental Committee, and he should be glad to know if the Government would make their Report public? There was one decrease in the Volunteer Estimates which could hardly be regarded as satisfactory — he meant the reduction in the allowance for Volunteer officers attending Schools of Instruction. Last year, £1,300 was granted for the purpose; this year, only £1,000 was asked for. He hoped this did not indicate a falling-off of the desire on the part of Volunteer officers to attend such schools, the instruction at which was of so much value, and attendance at which should be encouraged as much as possible. There was a question raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Worcestershire (Mr. Knight) at the early part of the Session, which he regarded as being of considerable importance—he referred to the retiring allowance to adjutants appointed previous to the present arrangements, whereby captains of the Line were appointed for five years as adjutants of Volunteer regiments. Lord Cranbrook, when questioned on the subject, said he could not entertain the idea of reviewing the decision arrived at, which was that adjutants appointed previous to the present arrangement should not have more than £100 a-year retiring pension, and the honorary rank of major. The Secretary of State for War must be aware that these old officers, who had served their country for lengthened periods, now had £275 a-year, with allowances for lodgings and forage, and if they were not to receive retiring allowances which they considered adequate to the services they had performed, it would be impossible to get rid of them, although they might, by old age, become somewhat incapable. Speaking from personal intercourse with Volunteer adjutants, he could say they considered they were suffering under a very serious grievance, and he considered if they were to be got rid of, the process should be carried out with something like liberality. The argument of Lord Cranbrook, that nothing more could be given these officers, as they took the positions on the terms now set forth, would not hold good; because, as the Secretary of State for War well knew, the officers who entered the Army under the Purchase-system had no claim whatever to compensation on the abolition of Purchase, and yet they were paid the over-regulation money. Hence, he hoped the old adjutants would be treated properly by the Government.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT did not find fault with the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. O'Clery) for having brought forward the question of Volunteer Corps for Ireland. But had the hon. Gentleman confined himself to that matter, he would have done much more good for the cause he advocated. Instead of that, however, he had gone out of his way to accuse English recruits of cowardice, and had said that they had behaved badly in the face of the enemy at the Redan.

MR. O'CLERY desired to explain. The hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) had stated that at the Redan the English recruits had to be kept at their posts by Irishmen.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT was sure no one would be more surprised than his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) to hear the statement of the hon. Member for Wexford. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had never said the soldiers he was alluding to were Englishmen, Scotchmen, or Irishmen. He might have said they were recruits. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was quite sure his hon. and gallant Friend had never made such a statement. The hon. Member for Wexford had spoken of a distinction drawn between Irishmen, Scotchmen, and Englishmen. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was an old soldier, and he was proud to say that in the Army they never made such a distinction, and they were glad to have men from either country in the ranks. It was the last thing in the world that officers would do to draw an invidious comparison between the men from either England, Scotland, or Ireland. Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen, had in the past, and, he was sure, would in the future, serve their country to the best of their ability; and he considered it a most mischievous thing for any hon. Member, be he Irishman, Scotchman, or Englishman, to get up in that House and try to detract from the merits of those who had fought and bled for their country wherever they had been called on to do so. Had the hon. Member for Wexford merely said there was a desire to form a Volunteer Corps in Ireland, and had he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to calmly consider the question, he might have done some service to his country. But the Committee could not forget what was said by hon. Gentlemen who sat on the Benches nearest the hon. Member for Wexford, as to what would happen if Irishmen were called upon to fight. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was surprised that any man, calling himself what he might, a Nationalist or Home Ruler, should say, that if called on to fight in the interests of the British nation, Irishmen would refuse to defend their Queen and country. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) never believed such a statement; but, still, he could not conceal from himself the fact that the hon. Member for Wexford, when he claimed the right for all Irishmen to carry arms, forgot the statement of those around him, that they were not to be trusted with arms in the service of their country. He only wished the hon. Member for Wexford had shown that Irishmen, if trusted with arms, would use them as loyally, gallantly, and honestly, as any other men in the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Wexford had said that, as far as the Volunteer Forces of England and Scotland was concerned, he did not for a moment wish to interfere with the Vote, and yet he moved its absolute rejection. If that was Irish logic, it certainly was not English. Instead of acting in that way, the hon. Member should produce such reasons and such arguments to the House as would induce the Government to establish Volunteer Corps in Ireland, and he would then find the House of Commons as ready to grant money to Ireland as to England or Scotland. The hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter) had stated there was a Committee now sitting to inquire into the constitution of the Volunteer Force generally. He hoped the result of the deliberations would be to enable his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War to produce a scheme which would have for its object the placing of the Volunteer Corps on an even better footing than at present. Everyone who had watched the Volunteer movement from the commencement must see that that part of the defensive Force of the country was in a very different position now compared with the time it was inaugurated. A great deal had been learned by the Volunteers; their discipline had very much improved; and many battalions had adopted the important point of going into camp annually. This going into camp cost a great deal of money; and, as an illustration, he would take the case of his own battalion. They went into camp every year in Arundel Park, and he was bound to say that one of his captains, the premier Duke stayed in the camp from its formation to the close of the training, and did all in his power to promote the interest of the battalion. But it cost the battalion, over and above what they were allowed by the War Office, something like £560 in hard cash during the time his 600 or 700 men were under canvas. This sum was made up by the extra things they had to provide—such as water, wash-houses, latrines, extra tents, and mess tents. This large sum of money was a heavy charge on the officers who went into camp. Seeing that so many Volunteers were willing to go into camp for eight days with a view to learning that which would be of advantage to them if ever called upon to defend their country, he contended that every encouragement ought to be given them, and such sum of money voted as would do away with the heavy tax now regularly placed upon those who spent eight days under canvas. No one could deny that if men could be got into camp, and taught all that men in the Regular Army had to do under such conditions, they would learn more in eight days than they would by four times the number of drills carried on at different parts of the year. He especially hoped the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would consider the question of administrative battalions. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was quite satisfied that administrative battalions, as such, ought to be abolished, and all battalions consolidated. Then a commanding officer would have more power, greater uniformity would be carried out, and discipline better enforced. It was apparent that a battalion would be far better if commanded absolutely by one man than when made up of corps with several commanding officers. Another question to which he wished to direct attention required careful consideration, and that was whether Volunteers ought or ought not to be enrolled for a longer period than at present. All sorts of terms had been suggested, and three years, he was told, had been specially considered. But whatever term might be agreed upon, he believed it would be a great advantage to the Volunteer Corps if men were enrolled for a longer time than now. Although he was aware his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) did not quite agree with him on that point, still he thought it was one which should be fairly considered. As a matter of course, if a term of service was agreed upon, men leaving one locality would be entitled to transfer their services to the regiment in the place they had removed to. He hoped this subject would be brought under the attention of the Departmental Committee which was now sitting. A question, of small importance it might be, also deserved consideration—he referred to the clothing of Volunteers. Without saying whether it ought to be changed or not, one thing was quite clear—that the Volunteers ought to have the same kind of uniform and accoutrements, and as to the belts which should be supplied them, he considered those made of brown leather would be the best, they being very durable, besides which they would distinguish Volunteers from other soldiers. He was sure he need not press on the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who so worthily filled the Office of Secretary of State for War the importance of seeing all the points to which he had referred fairly and deliberately looked into, and every information and advice given to the Departmental Committee, so that they might consider what was best to be done in the interests of a Force which the country thoroughly appreciated. He also hoped his right hon. and gallant Friend would consider the cases of the Volunteer adjutants. The country would be put to very little expense if they were offered the same terms as were proposed to the Militia adjutants in 1875. Those who would not accept such an arrangement must, of course, go on as at present; but there were some who would embrace the offer, and thus the feeling that they had been hardly dealt with would be dissipated, and the country would have a body of contented servants who really had done a great deal for the Volunteer Force.

MR. O'CLERY desired to say a few words in reply to the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). The hon. Member had said that until he (Mr. O'Clery) could show that Irishmen, if intrusted with arms, would do their duty faithfully and manfully, his desire to establish a Volunteer Corps for Ireland could not be agreed to. He had met that argument by showing that wherever Irishmen were intrusted with arms, not only in Line regiments, but in the Militia, whose ranks were recruited from a lower strata than Volunteers would come from, they had done their duty. In order to give force to his argument, he mentioned the case of the Redan, and although he regretted very much to allude to acts of cowardice, he referred to the remarks made by the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), when drawing attention to the class of recruits being taken into the Army. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had regretted that the Irish peasants and Scottish Highlanders were not now joining the Army. The hon. and gallant Member had also said, referring to the disaster at the Redan, that the men who acted the cowards' part were taken from the slums of large towns in England, and men's work could not be expected of them. Irishmen living in large towns in England had quite a different physique, and, that being so, he thought he had fairly made out his argument in favour of Irishmen being allowed to carry arms and form a Volunteer Corps.

MR. DODSON asked, if it were the intention of the War Office to arm the Volunteers with Martini-Henry rifles?

LORD ELCHO said, he was sure the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. O'Clery) had mistaken the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) in reference to the disaster at the Redan, and he hoped no military question would be brought forward in such a way again. He trusted the Secretary of State for War would endeavour to have the Volunteers armed with the Martini-Henry rifle. The late war had shown how effective a weapon it was, and how inferior any other arms were. The Russians had found this disadvantage around Plevna, and he was sure the Secretary of State for War would not wish English troops to be similarly situated. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had said a great deal about the discipline of Volunteers being very much improved of late. He (Lord Elcho) had before now doubted whether the adverse criticisms on Volunteer discipline were deserved. It had suited a certain portion of the Press of this country to adversely criticize the Volunteer discipline in former times and to allege that the Corps was unnecessary. Now it suited these newspapers to say the Volunteers were necessary. He had been connected with the Volunteer movement since 1859, and he did not believe the men were ever undisciplined. At any rate, he was certain of this, the commanding officers had the power to maintain discipline, and if that did not prevail it was the fault of the commanding officers and them only. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex hoped the question of terms of service would come before the Departmental Committee. He (Lord Elcho) had a strong feeling on the whole question, and, seeing that the Volunteer Corps had grown so steadily in numbers and efficiency, he thought they had better observe the old principle of letting well alone. The same idea was contained in the epitaph—"I was well, I would be better—here I lie," while Lord Melbourne put it still more tersely, when he said—"Damn it, why can't you leave it alone." He hoped these sayings would be in the minds of the Committee in dealing with this matter, and that they would remember that the Volunteer Force was not intended to be a Force ready at once to take the field, but was intended to make this nation an armed nation. The Volunteer Force did not pretend to be in a state of complete efficiency as regarded training; but it rested on the assumption that, existing as it did in large numbers, it would be ready to meet the enemy if it had that sufficient warning which they all anticipated would precede an invasion—a warning which would enable it to be embodied, and to receive that additional training which would be necessary to enable it effectively to meet the enemy. He warned the Committee against endeavouring to draw too closely the bonds by which this Force was held together. Its term of service was 14 days. The men came up of their own free will; they received no pay; they did their duty efficiently and well according to the requirements of the Service; and they were free to go on giving 14 days' notice. The success of the Service depended on that freedom of service, and no greater mistake could be made by those in authority than attempting to make this service more stringent, and to get a greater hold over the Volunteer Force. If that were done, he believed they would run the danger of losing the Force altogether. That danger had taken another form of late. The advice of Talleyrand to his young diplomatists would apply equally well to young Volunteer officers. A great many men had joined lately who had come from the Army, and seeing the defects of the Force, and noticing that it was not quite under command, they were very full of zeal to make it as complete as possible, and bring it up to the level of their own ideas. To these gentlemen, to the Committee, and to the Government, he would say, with Talleyrand—"Surtout, point de zèle." Too much zeal would lose them the Force altogether, and in no form was it more to be avoided than in the question of what was called volunteering for active service. He knew that the late Secretary of State for War did not look upon the proposal with favour, from communications he had had with him, though he did not think it advisable to say that the services of these Volunteers would not be accepted, because it would damp the zeal of the men in the Force. Even supposing they had a certain number of men, neither in the Army nor in the Militia, their number must be necessarily comparatively few, and as an addition to the Army they must be comparatively worthless and trifling; but, on the other hand, there would be a danger that the Force, instead of being as now, numbered by hundreds of thousands—for upwards of 600,000 had passed through their ranks, besides the 182,000 now serving—would be numbered by tens of thousands on that account. At present, men entered who could not afford to enter the Regular Army, who did not expect to go on foreign service, but who were willing to give their time and service for the defence of their hearths and homes. But, if it were to be supposed that no man was to be considered a zealous Volunteer, and a loyal subject of the Crown who did not enter for foreign service, if there were to be two classes—the men who go abroad and the men who stayed at home—then the latter class would certainly become a reproach; they would be chaffed and sneered at by the others, and this would eventually break up the Corps. He could not conceive a greater error than to encourage this movement. He did not wish to enter into the question of Committees at the War Office; but knowing that this Committee was now sitting, having had to answer a great many questions about it, and as he would probably have to appear before it, he had ventured to speak freely on this subject, in the interest of that Force whose value in these times of danger the public were beginning to appreciate. What would have been the condition of the country now, with the Militia in the state of which they had heard to-night, if there had been no Volunteer Service. They would certainly have had to ballot for men. He trusted that the House and the country, appreciating the value of this Force, would be content to leave it alone, only giving those things necessary, besides an equipment, for allowing it to go into camp, which most of the regiments were unable to get out of their capitulation.

MR. H. SAMUELSON also wished to press the Secretary of State for War to make some allowance for small regimental camps of instruction. He had heard complaints in his constituency of the expenses the men—mostly poor men—were put to in these camps, and he knew it was a very great pressure upon both officers and men. In some corps they actually charged gate-money for admission into the camp, in order to eke out the very small allowance they received. The admittance of a crowd of spectators must necessarily interfere with the drill and efficiency of the men, and he thought it should be discouraged. It was not every corps which was so lucky as to be commanded by the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), who had a Duke for one of his captains, and Arundel Park in which to camp out. Some of the corps, on the contrary, had to pay for the hire of the land on which they camped. Englishmen had a national privilege of grumbling; but none were less ready to grumble than Volunteers, and they were always ready to give up their time, which was often their money. If the Secretary of State for War could do anything for them, he would earn the gratitude of a body of men whose gratitude was certainly worth having. At the present moment, especially, the Government ought to feel kindly towards the Volunteers, for if they had not been in existence they certainly could not have carried out their policy on the Eastern Question.

MR. DILLWYN did not wish the debate to close without enforcing, as strongly as he could, the remarks of his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho). He did not know what the Committee, of which so much had been said, would do; but he feared that its tendency was to increase the stringency of the discipline of the Volunteers, and he felt that there was very great danger in that. If the Force were worth having at all, it should be worked as it was at present. He had taken an active part in the Volunteer movement since 1859, as the commander of a corps, and he had always succeeded in maintaining and enforcing the rules with the present system. In his opinion, the power they at present possessed was quite enough, and it would be very unwise and dangerous to strain the conditions under which Volunteers enlisted, and to make the discipline more stringent. Further, he thought it would create an unwillingness to serve on the part of men who had already passed through the ranks. He hoped what had been said would have some weight with the Secretary of State for War, more especially as he had heard it said that the Committee was likely to report adversely to his view.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the debate had been turned aside a little from the point raised by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. O'Clery), and Irish Members could not join in a discussion of the details of the Volunteer Force, because they were not allowed to have Volunteers in Ireland. He was glad his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford had brought this subject forward, and he considered it was a reproach to Irish Members that the subject had not been discussed before. They tried to do so, however, last year, when they could not get a day; and, even now, he was sorry it was not brought forward as a Bill or a Resolution, instead of in the form of a protest against Englishmen having Volunteers. However, this was the only course left open to them, although he fully recognized the great value of the English and Scotch Volunteers, and believed they got full return for the money they spent on them. But Ireland did not get full value for her share of the money; and, therefore, he could not support this Vote, which was in reality a reproach to Ireland. The hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) said that Ireland must show that she was good and faithful before she could be trusted with arms. How splendidly that argument would have come from a Turkish Pasha to some Christians, who asked for arms to defend themselves. But the Irish were worse off than the Christians of Turkey, for they were not allowed, even though they were Protestants, to enter the Army until the Irishmen who fought for France altered the views of Englishmen. Was it in accordance with Irish self-respect to insist on this difference? Of course, they would be out-voted, and they would get a very bad vote, because many Irish Members had not yet returned; but they would get a better vote next year if the Ministry did not give way. Why should not this boon be granted to them? The Government would get 30,000 or 40,000 more Volunteers; and it was impossible to say there could be any danger, unless they believed the statement which his hon. Friend had quoted from the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), and which he did not accept, that the Irish troops were so very much better than the English. He believed the Volunteer movement was an exceedingly useful one; but he was compelled, entirely against his professional prejudices, to go into the Lobby for this reduction, because he believed the refusal of Volunteer Corps to Ireland was a very great wrong.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he understood the hon. Member to move the reduction of the Vote as a protest, and not as a serious objection to the Volunteer Force; and, therefore, he did not think it necessary to follow him through all his speech, though he might point out that the Hungarian Honveds were Militia rather than Volunteers. Nor would he follow him in his remarks about Irish gallantry and the smartness of Irish regiments, because all that he took to be admitted on both sides of the House. On the question of Volunteers for Ireland, he hoped he might be excused if he spoke with considerable reserve. He had not long had the War Office under his control, and he therefore spoke on this matter rather from a military than from a general point of view. He was bound in all candour to say, from a military point of view, and leaving all other considerations aside, that he had never been able entirely to see a reason why some step should not be taken in the direction which the hon. Gentleman indicated. He was saying that as his personal opinion, based on military grounds alone; but the question must be dealt with not as a matter of sentiment, but as a matter of business, and points must be considered, which he had then neither the time nor the ability to discuss. The events of the last few months had left very little time for matters other than those of immediate importance to the State, and he had not had time for consultation with his Colleagues upon the matter, and therefore he did not feel justified in expressing anything more than his individual view. It must be considered, too, that in the formation of any new Force, there were many local considerations to be dealt with, which would render the establishment of any such Force liable to be conducted under very different arrangements from that under which the Volunteers at present were. The locality of the mode of concentration had to be regarded from a military point of view. If the Corps were to be re-formed in England a great many points would have to be re-considered, and if Corps were formed in Ireland, he did not say that matters could be arranged precisely upon the same lines as in this country. In all these matters, too, he thought Party feeling and Party distinctions should be laid aside, and the Volunteer should only remember that he was the servant of the Crown and the country. As to what had been said in the discussion, it was far from the fact that Volunteers were taken into these Corps without inquiry. In all regiments—certainly all good ones—a very careful inquiry was made into the character of every man, and in some Corps the candidate had even to be proposed and seconded as in a club. Therefore, the observation of his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would apply to Irish Volunteers in the same way that it did to English and Scotch. Of course, he could not accept the Amendment; and, after this expression of his personal views, he might perhaps be permitted to pass to other questions. He saw no reason why the Report of the Committee now sitting should not be made public. If these things were to stand at all, they must stand ventilation, and, so far as he was concerned, he had no desire whatever to withhold any information. With regard to the question of the adjutants, that was now under consideration before that very Committee, and he did not therefore wish to express any opinion on it, further than that he was bound, in honour and allegiance to his Predecessor and late Superior, to say that in the refusal which he had given year after year upon the question he had been fully borne out by the facts. With regard to the question raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter) as to the adjutants, he believed that some representations had been made to the War Office; and he had authority for saying that if the hon. and gallant Member wished to bring the matter before the Committee, he would have ample opportunity for doing so, and that the Committee would be very much obliged for any information he could give them. He was sorry to be obliged to give an indefinite answer upon the point; but, pendente lite, he did not like to express even an individual opinion. As regarded camp allowances, that had become one of the most prominent questions connected with volunteering; but he had to ask Volunteer officers and others who heard him to bear in mind that there was a very wide difference between a necessary expenditure, and the actual amount of which Volunteer officers and others camping out were out of pocket. He only mentioned that in order that there should be no possible room for misapprehension. Well, then, with respect to the clothing and discipline, he was not at the moment in a position to know what recommendations the Committee were likely to make. All he could say was that his hon. Friend had an inkling of what was going on in the Committee, and knew what their Report was likely to be—in fact, a great deal more than he (Colonel Stanley) himself, or even any Member of the Committee.

LORD ELOHO said, that what he wanted to know was not the tendency of the Report, but of the Inquiry.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that what he had seen had led him to the conclusion that the inquiry was of as general a character as possible, though undoubtedly there might be certain questions which would be matters of argument, and if stress had been laid upon certain of the questions which were put, those questions had really been asked with the view of eliciting the widest possible range of information, and encouraging those officers to whom they had been addressed to answer them as fully as possible, and to give all the information which they possessed. With regard to the question as to the Martini-Henry rifle, he was sorry he could not give his right hon. Friend (Mr. Dodson), who had put the question, an answer which would be satisfactory to him. At the present time they did not deem it to be advisable to place in the hands of the Auxiliary Forces the arms which they had in store until the store, which was now being largely drawn upon, was very considerably developed. He did not, therefore, see his way to issuing those arms to Volunteers. At the same time, he need hardly say that they had the most earnest desire as soon as a legitimate opportunity might occur, to place that which they believed to be the best possible arm in the hands of the Auxiliary Forces as well as those of the Regulars. As regarded the accustoming of the Auxiliary Forces to the use of that arm, he believed it was the intention of his noble Friend to issue such a number of them—about 2,000—as would suffice for a very efficient training of Volunteers at Wimbledon. He thought that he had now answered all the questions which had been put to him.

MR. PARNELL did not wish to suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. O'Clery) any course which he should take on the occasion; because, whether he took a division on the Vote or not, there had been so much attention given to it, that he thought that they, as Irish Members, ought to be satisfied with whatever course the hon. Member took. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had expressed his opinion on Irish Volunteers as an individual. He did not understand him to speak as a Minister, when expressing his opinion in favour of some extension of the principle of volunteering to Ireland; and so far, of course, his utterances had not had that authority which they could have wished them to have under the circumstances. But neither did those utterances come up to what they had a right to expect. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had said that Volunteers must exist under different conditions from those in England. He had said that a certificate of character would be necessary, and had also pointed out that a certificate of character was necessary for admission into English Volunteer regiments. But he very much feared that if the conditions—he would not say the conditions which he had named—but he very much feared that in any scheme for Volunteers in Ireland, conditions would be attached which would result in allowing only a section, and a very small section—in fact, the minority of the people—to join the Volunteer regiments. If the system of volunteering were to be used for the purpose of continuing partizanship and keeping up Party spirit; if it were to be confined to a certain section of the people of Ireland; and if certificates were not to be given to all Irishmen of good character, then, he said, that they, as Irish Members, ought not to accept such an offer; and therefore it was that he looked with considerable doubt at the utterances of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. But he had been sorry to see the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex reply with so much heat to the very temperate speech of the hon. Member for Wexford. His hon. Friend had not intended to impute any want of courage to the English soldiers when he said that the English recruits had behaved badly during the Crimean War. It was a common saying amongst soldiers that when an English Army went into action the Irish regiments went first to break the line, the Scotch regiments came next to take the prisoners, and that the English regiments came last to secure the booty—a very good operation, which had resulted in the English gaining so much more wealth than the Irish or the Scotch. But why should England deny to Ireland that which she herself possessed? She had Volunteers herself, and she refused them to Ireland. If there were to be a war the next day—and he was glad to remind the Committee that the origin of raising Volunteers was the necessity of defending Ireland from the French—while they denied to Ireland the privilege of defending herself, they insisted upon her paying them for the purpose of defending themselves. How long were they going on like that? How long were they going to give it out to foreign nations that they had a disaffected people in their midst? He had merely suggested these considerations to the Secretary of State for War, as he understood that a proposition was going to be made with reference to the formation of Volunteer Corps in Ireland, and he hoped that if it were acceded to those corps might be formed in such a way as to please and satisfy all sections and all classes in Ireland.

GENERAL SHUTE said, he had often heard complaints with regard to the numerous speeches they heard, that there had been generally a great waste of the Irish wit that was so much talked about, and of which he had seen much; but with reference to the association which had just been made by the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) as to what sort of feeling existed in the Army, he must say that it had astonished him. Both the hon. and gallant Baron the Member for West Sussex and himself had been in the Union Brigade of Cavalry, and he could therefore bring him out when he assured the hon. Member opposite that no such feeling ever existed in the English Army. English, Scotch, and Irish, had always fought together like true Britons whenever there was a chance, and always would. With regard to the Volunteer question, he had always taken an interest in the movement. He had been in Ireland for 12 years, and he would honestly state that there would be a great difficulty in finding in Ireland a class of men similar to that from which they drew their Volunteers in England. He did not believe that that especial class actually existed in Ireland. With regard to character, good character as to loyalty and respect for law and order was essential not only for men but for officers; and he confessed in the present state of affairs he did not think that Irish Members who took an interest in Ireland would honestly and truly advocate at the present moment the formation of a Volunteer Force in Ireland.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) had raised the point that they could not produce in Ireland the same class as that from which the Volunteers were taken in England. Now, he had heard it stated that the English Volunteers were shopmen with soldiers' coats on. But they in Ireland could produce a better class than that—namely, farmers' sons, and in that point he thought they could fairly compete with the English Volunteers as they existed. Now, upon the question of Irish Volunteers several points had been raised, and one was the form in which the Amendment had been put before the Committee. Now, they all knew it was not competent for a private Member to move to increase the Vote. Of course, if it had been so, the proper way would have been to move to increase the number of Volunteers in Ireland to that in England; but, as matters stood, the only way was to vote against the sum altogether. Now his hon. Friend had decided upon the system of moving to reject the Vote altogether, and in that he thought he was perfectly right. On the question of Volunteers for England, Scotland, and Ireland, he thought the Irish had suffered great injustice; because, after all, the system of volunteering really meant that gentlemen were only playing at soldiers, because it was never intended that they should fight except in a contingency, which they did not expect to see in their life-time—namely, the invasion of England. Now, if they were only to put on soldiers' clothes and do nothing else, he thought that £485,000 was so much money thrown away. But if it had been understood that a large proportion of these Volunteers would volunteer for active service, he thought there would then be some practical argument in favour of the system of English volunteering, and from that point of view he thought the Irish were very hardly treated. For these reasons, he felt thoroughly justified in moving to reject the whole of the Vote; because, unless these men were intended for soldiers, he did not know what they were intended for.

Mr. O'CLERY said, he must admit that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had spoken as a soldier, and not as a Member of the Government; and, therefore, there had practically been no answer to the desirability of forming Volunteer Corps in Ireland. He supposed it was only right to say there that they all felt that England really feared to intrust Irish people with arms. They had deprived Ireland of its own Parliament; but when it had its own Parliament it was able to maintain 100,000 Volunteers. Now they had endeavoured to govern the country themselves, and the result was that they were not able to intrust the Irish people with arms. He thought that was a very dangerous state of things as regarded foreign countries. It was not nice year after year to have coercion laws passed nominally against crime in Ireland, but really to perpetuate English rule and to keep the people from their natural military tastes. He had brought that Motion on as a protest, and he did not think he should be giving sufficient emphasis to the protest if he did not divide; and he at the same time hoped that he should find an opportunity of bringing the question on in the form of a Motion, when he and his Colleagues would be prepared to bear testimony to the right of the Irish people to carry arms.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 126; Noes 7: Majority 119.—(Div. List, No. 171.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £185,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay, Allowances, &c. of a number of Army Reserve First Class, not exceeding 19,000, and of the Army Reserve Second Class, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879.”

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to direct the attention of the Secretary of State for War to this Vote. It appeared to him that the Estimate of this Vote rather came in the same category as some of those other Votes to which he had directed the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's attention. He found that there was no sort of proportion to be observed during a series of years between the actual expenditure and the Estimate of expenditure, and he could not at all see why that should be so. For instance, he found that in 1875-6, the number of men estimated for the First Class Reserve was 10,000, and the estimated expenditure was £121,000, but only £99,000 was spent. In 1876-7, there was the same number of men estimated, and the total estimated expenditure was £122,000. In that year, again, only £94,000 was spent. Then, in the year 1877-8, the number of men estimated was 15,000, and the expenditure estimated and taken was £132,000; but there were no Returns with respect to that sum. This year, the number of men estimated was 19,000, and £185,000 was estimated for the expenses of those men. It appeared to him, in view of the fact that the Army Reserve had been called out now for some time, and that in all probability it would remain out for some time longer, and that, consequently, the charge for the Army Reserve was not now, and would not be, in this Vote while it was called out, that a very much less sum of money than £185,000 would be sufficient to cover the expenditure. In no year during the years he had mentioned had the War Office spent nearly the amount of money that had been voted. In 1875 the expenditure was £22,000 short of the sum voted, and in 1876 it was £28,000. He really did not see why these exaggerated Estimates should be necessary. He would suggest to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that the sum of £185,000, for which he asked, was entirely too much. Looking at the figures which he had quoted, he could not see how the expenditure could possibly exceed much more than, say, the amount of £90,000 or £95,000. Therefore, he begged to reduce the Vote by the sum of £90,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £95,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge for the Pay, Allowances, &c. of a number of Army Reserve First Class, not exceeding 19,000, and of the Army Reserve Second Class, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1879."—(Mr. Parnell.)

COLONEL ALEXANDER remarked, that there was one subject in connection with this Vote which he should like to bring to the notice of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He would ask him to consider the propriety of instituting a periodical medical examination of the men of the First Class Army Reserve when not serving with the colours, and he would shortly state the reason why he made this request. When lately these men responded, as had been stated that evening, with great alacrity and patriotism, to the call which their country made upon them, a certain proportion, though not a very large proportion, of the men were found to be medically unfit for service, and this had caused considerable inconvenience and expense to the public. But what was much worse was, that he believed that several of the men who were pronounced as medically unfit for military service had been obliged to abandon lucrative civil employment. He thought that if the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would take into consideration the question of instituting periodically such an examination as he had suggested when the men were not serving with the colours, the inconvenience and also the hardship which he had pointed out might be obviated.

MAJOR NOLAN desired, before the Secretary of State for War rose to reply, to make a suggestion to him with respect to the wives and children of the men of the Reserves who had been called out. It must be obvious to everyone that the allowance which was at present given to the former was wholly inadequate. He had received several letters on the subject. Out of the 3s. 6d. a-week which the wife of a Reserve man now received, she would have to pay 2s. or 2s. 6d. for lodgings, so that there would be 1s. left to provide clothes and food. No doubt some of the women were able to earn money for themselves; but a great many others, owing to various reasons, would not be able so to do, while nearly all the children left behind were of a helpless age. As a rule, the men would have only married after leaving the Army; they would, therefore, have been married, probably, for five or six years, and thus all the children would be of so tender an age as not to be capable of affording any assistance to their mothers. Moreover, if a soldier were ever so careful, he could not save more than 4d. or 5d. a-day, and he believed that generally it would be found that he saved much less. Indeed, it had been admitted in that House that the soldier could only save 3d. When the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) brought forward the question of making soldiers contribute to the support of their wives whom they had deserted, or of their illegitimate children, the late Secretary of State for War maintained—and so, also, did many others on the same side—that 3d. a-day was the most which a soldier could spare to his wife. Therefore, the most a soldier could be reckoned on to spare to his wife would be 1s. 9d. a-week, and that, with the 3s. 6d., was a totally inadequate allowance. He thought the Government ought to do something to mitigate the distress that was at present being caused by the Reserves having been called out. He put a Question the other day to the Under Secretary of State for India, in order to show how differently this matter was treated in that country. The reason for this different treatment was, that there the ordinary conditions of service often necessitated separation between the soldiers and their wives and children, and it was customary to fix a certain monthly allowance. That allowance represented nearly 6d. a-day to the wife, with a further allowance for the children; but, in addition, they got free quarters and half-rations. They saw, therefore, that where it was the custom to separate wives from their husbands, adequate provision was made for the former. But there the Reserve Forces were an entirely new institution. See what Continental nations had done. When, during the late war, they began to call out men—not only of the age of 20, but of seven, eight, and nine-and-twenty—they made sometimes elaborate distinctions. They first took the bachelors for the Army, leaving the married men at home; they next called out the married men who had no children; and then they took the men who had only one child. They in this country now saw the necessity for making these distinctions. For the first time they were brought face to face with the fact, that there was a large number of soldiers' wives for whom the nation ought to provide an adequate allowance. What could be more cruel than to send soldiers abroad to fight the battles of the country, and leave their wives at home to starve, or very nearly so? In some instances they were worse off than if they had no allowance at all, because the Unions actually made it a ground for refusing to do anything for them. He would remind the Committee that it was rather different with the Reserves in this respect than with the Army. It had never been the policy of the authorities to discourage marriage in the Reserve Forces. On the contrary, the policy had been, as regarded them, to interfere as little as possible with the ordinary population laws of the Kingdom; and, therefore, when a national emergency arose, and the men were called out, it was somewhat hard and unfair that their wives and children should not be properly cared for.

LORD ELCHO said, it must be admitted that his hon. and gallant Friend who had just sat down had done his best to procure for the Reserve men and their families the best possible terms. He thought his hon. and gallant Friend had done wisely in this, because no money could, in his opinion, be better spent than that which was devoted to popularizing the Reserve Forces. The whole success of the movement in the future would depend upon the endeavour which was now made to give, as far as possible, satisfaction to these men and their families. There was one point in connection with the Reserve Force on which he should like to have some information from his right hon. and gallant Friend. When this subject was under discussion before, a question arose as to what would be the probable future strength of the Force, and the then Secretary of State for War, now Lord Cranbrook, said that an expectation had been raised which was not likely to be realized. He understood his noble Friend to have stated that in 1883 it was anticipated that the Reserve Force would amount to 80,000 men, but that he did not think it would number more than 40,000. Some hon. Members understood him to have said 60,000; and he was desirous that any figures which his right hon. and gallant Friend might have in his possession should be given to the Committee in order that they might be in a position to judge as to the probable future success of this Force.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, he entirely agreed with the noble Lord as to the desirability of popularizing, in every possible way, the Reserve Force. His object in rising was, however, to say a word or two with respect to the subject of the question which he had put to the Secretary of State for War in the earlier part of the Sitting. He should say that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's answer was entirely satisfactory to him. It would be satisfactory, too, to the men of the Reserve to know that the just claims and expectations of those who had entered under certain conditions would be fulfilled to the letter. But the suggestion which he had made raised a point which, he was rather afraid from the tenour of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's answer, was likely to be overlooked. It was, that all the men who behaved themselves well while with the Colours, should be allowed to count their Reserve service towards good conduct pay as well as towards pension. It would only be possible for those men during their six years' service to obtain one more good conduct badge, so that it would only be a question of adding 1d. a-day to their pay, while it would operate as an inducement to men to join the Reserves, and to conduct themselves well while with the Colours during their first six years of service.

COLONEL STANLEY said, that before he proceeded to reply to the points which had been raised, it might be satisfactory to the Committee to know what had been the result of the organization of the Army Reserve Force. The strength of that Force on the 1st of April was 14,154 men. Of those, 13,677 had reported themselves for mobilization, leaving only 477 men who had failed to report themselves. But that was not all. Of those 477 absentees, 132 were accounted for in various ways, leaving only 345 bond fide absentees, or less than 2½ per cent on the whole. A good many of those had, however, since turned up, and were even now dropping in. He thought that after the gloomy forebodings which one heard some two years ago, it was only right to give all due credit to Viscount Cardwell, who had instituted the system of Army Reserves. It was a bold experiment; but the success which had attended it had fully justified the confidence of those who were responsible for proposing it. Of course, in connection with the calling out of the Reserves, various questions had arisen; and, undoubtedly, the case of the families of those men was one of considerable difficulty. But he must ask the Committee, in considering this question, to draw a distinction—and it was a very necessary one—between cases of hardship and cases of destitution; because many cases of reported destitution, when they came to be investigated, turned out to be cases of hardship rather than of actual want. Of the latter, there were very few instances, but there were, undoubtedly, some cases of hardship—as, for example, when a man was called out to serve who was in the receipt of good wages; and who, although he might be able to leave his wife a certain amount for her support, yet could not give her that assistance to which she had been accustomed. But, painful as such cases were, and much inconvenience as was thus created, it must be borne in mind by those who were anxious that liberal allowances should be made to the families of our Reserve men, that it should not be taken for granted that they would have to be made only for a period of one, or two, or three months, but that the necessity of continuing them for a considerably longer period would have to be taken into account. There was another point which he must also ask the Committee not to lose sight of. He regretted to have to use what might seem hard words; but if the allowances were unduly increased, a tendency would be likely to be encouraged, on the part of those who received them, to avoid seeking employment, or in any way endeavouring to support themselves. He was not speaking without book, for he knew some cases in which charitable funds had been expended in relieving the widows of men who had fallen in action, with the result that the mere fact of those women having been in the receipt of sums more than sufficient for their support had not conduced to either their social or moral improvement. He had, he might add, consulted his noble Friend (Lord Eustace Cecil) and his hon. and gallant Friend who sat near him (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) on the subject, and they had informed him that they had heard of no complaints of hardships officially from the persons actually concerned. There had been cases raised by individual members of Boards of Guardians, and he himself had had two instances of considerable inconvenience and hardship brought to his notice; but these were only isolated cases, by which the general principle involved was not affected. The scale of allowances to the wives and families of Reserve men had, he believed, been wisely and not expensively fixed in the first instance; but, as the Committee were already aware, directions had been issued from the War Office that payments should be made in advance, and another step had also been taken which, in his opinion, was a perfectly legitimate one, and which would have a considerable effect in giving indirect relief to those families. They had been placed on the same footing as the families of soldiers, and thereby had conferred upon their children the benefits of a free education where there were Army schools, there being a Warrant under which they obtained for those children the payment of the school fees. That would be a material assistance, and one which would, perhaps, meet the greatest change which had occurred since the Reserve men had entered into their present engagements with the Government. He did not wish to press the question of contract unduly; but it should not be forgotten that those men knew perfectly well what it was they would be entitled to receive, so that if they did not wish to take employment that was a matter for which the Government could not fairly be held to be responsible. He had been asked why a reduction had not been made in the Vote? That was a matter which he had considered; but he had not deemed it desirable that it should be reduced. There was, he hoped, at all events, a possibility that only a certain portion of the Army Reserve Vote would be required before the end of the financial year. But, whether that turned out to be so or not, in view of the possibility—he might almost say the certainty—of having to apply for another Vote for those men before they could serve with the Army, he did not think that any practical benefit was to be obtained from restoring money on the one hand, while an additional amount would have to be voted on the other. Considerations of general convenience had induced him to come to the conclusion that the Vote should be allowed to stand as it was originally proposed, and any money which might be left unexpended would, of course, be surrendered at the close of the financial year. He had been asked a question with regard to good-conduct pay, and he had to say, in reply, that prior to 1874 the men belonging to Section A of the Army Reserve were entitled to reckon all their previous service, both in the Army and the Reserve, towards good-conduct pay, as well as a pension. In February of that year, however, Viscount Cardwell came to the conclusion that there was no good reason why good-conduct pay should continue when the men were called out for service, and a Warrant was issued which cancelled the Memorandum which previously existed. Unfortunately, there was a printed Paper, on which the men were supposed to rely, promising the continuance of the advantages which they had enjoyed, and he need not say that a few days after they were called out attention was invited to the grievance of which he was speaking; and, acting on the principle that faith must be kept with them, a General Order had been issued, and further modifications were either about to be made, or were actually made at the present moment, in accordance with which the men in Section A would be able to reckon all their previous service in the Army as well as in the Reserve towards good-conduct pay. The men in Sections B and C would be allowed to reckon all their previous service in the Army, together with their service in the Army Reserve, towards good-conduct pay and pension. By that means good faith would be kept with the men, and the justice of the case would, he believed, be substantially met. He had been asked if he could furnish the Committee with any data to show why the number of the Army Reserve did not come up to that which was originally expected? He was afraid he did not possess any such data in a form in which they could be laid on the Table of the House; but those which had been left him by his noble Friend and Predecessor went to show that, in the first instance, sufficient allowance had not been made for desertions, for the fact that the system of short service tended a good deal in that direction, or for the number of men who purchased their discharge. These were the causes which had been in operation, and, so far as he could gather, the result would be that the number of the Reserve should be fixed at 60,000 instead of 80,000, which was the number originally stated. He gave that calculation for what it was worth; but it would, he believed, be found to be substantially correct.

COLONEL ALEXANDER reminded the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, that he had forgotten to answer his question with reference to the medical examinations.

COLONEL STANLEY believed that measures would shortly be taken to make the medical examination periodical, as well as more stringent. Every attention would be paid to that point.

MR. PARNELL said, he had not asked why the Vote had not been reduced, but why it had been very largely increased? At present the Reserves were on another Vote, and he felt perfectly convinced that not more than £100,000 need be spent upon the Army Reserve, although the Committee were called upon to vote a sum of £185,000. Under these circumstances, he must press for the reduction of the Vote.

MEDICAL ACT (1858) AMENDMENT

(No. 2) BILL—[BILL 196.]

(Mr. Arthur Mills, Mr. Childers, Mr. Goldney.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. A. MILLS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to provide for a conjoint scheme of examinations, making uniform the test of admission to the Profession in the three Kingdoms, and providing for the direct representation of the Profession in the Medical Council. The measure contained provisions in regard to the double qualification of medical and surgical practitioners, and further provisions as to the registration of Colonial practitioners.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. A. Mills.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE did not think the House ought to go on with the Bill at so late an hour of the night. Hon. Members were aware that a large and important Government measure on this subject had been printed in "another place." The subject was very intricate, and this Bill appeared to be a very long one. Under the circumstances, he begged to move that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. DILLWYN seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

MR. A. MILLS said, he had no objection whatever to the adjournment of the debate, and he would put off the second reading till Wednesday next.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday next.

RACECOURSES (LICENSING) BILL.

(Mr. Anderson, Sir Thomas Chambers, Sir James Laicrence.)

[BILL 76.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Definitions).

MR. ISAAC said, he thought it was too late to go on with the Bill, and therefore he would move that the Chairman should now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Isaac.)

MR. J. LOWTHER observed, that the Bill passed the second reading by a narrow majority of only two votes. He himself had taken part in the discussion on the second reading, in the same capacity in which he now appeared—namely, as a private individual, and not as in any respect representing the Government. On the former occasion he stated that the subject of race meetings within the Metropolitan district was about to be brought under the notice of the Jockey Club. To make sure that that course would be adopted, he himself took the earliest opportunity of laying the matter before the Club. At that meeting, a resolution was passed to the effect that the stewards should be requested to take steps to oppose the Bill. The question was mooted at the meeting as to whether a Petition against the Bill should be adopted; but as some of the members of the Jockey Club were persons who occupied high positions in the political world—one steward being the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, and another steward being also a Member of the House of Commons—it was thought that it would be more decorous to leave the matter in the hands of the stewards. The noble Lord undertook at that meeting to oppose this Bill, and his hon. Friend the Member for North Lincolnshire (Sir John Astley), at that time a steward, also undertook to adopt a similar course. The Jockey Club were not content with merely opposing this Bill; but, on a subsequent occasion, their attention was again drawn to the subject. He was not himself present at the meeting; but it appeared, from the records of the proceedings, that an assurance was given on that occasion that the Jockey Club would take cognizance of abuses which were brought to their knowledge with reference to race meetings. The complaints to which the hon. Member who introduced the Bill referred, had not been submitted to the Jockey Club in a tangible form. If, instead of being communicated anonymously or otherwise to the newspapers, they were brought before the Club, notice would be taken of them. The magistrates, at the present moment, had considerable power with regard to the licensing of refreshment booths. By declining to grant occasional licences, disturbances and nuisances could be put down by the magistrates. Other evils could be dealt with by the Jockey Club. It was sometimes said that the Jockey Club had no absolute power over these race meetings. He ventured to say, however, that it had complete power. If the publication of the programme of a meeting in the official Calendar were prevented by the Jockey Club, the meeting would ipso facto come to an end. As a body existed which possessed this power, and had signified its intention of exercising it with a view to checking abuses at race meetings, he hoped the Committee would hesitate before it took jurisdiction from that body and put it in hands which, in his judgment, were unfit to exercise it. It would be impossible to confine the operation of the principle established by this Bill to the narrow limits proposed by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson). How would it be possible, for example, to limit its operation to the Metropolis, and not to extend it to Provincial towns? He thought it would be most unwise for the Committee to adopt this measure, and he believed it would best suit the convenience of hon. Members to take the sense of the Committee on the Question, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair?" This was what was called an "open question;" and whichever way the matter was determined, the existence of Her Majesty's Government would not be affected. On the previous occasion, Members on both sides of the House voted in accordance with their individual views, and he felt sure they would do so now.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, this question occupied for some time the attention of the Office to which he lately belonged. Whilst he was at the Home Office, numerous complaints were received from the Metropolitan Police Force as to these race meetings. Indeed, the complaints were of so grave a character that it was seriously considered whether a Bill ought not to be brought in by the Government to do very much what the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) proposed to do by this Bill. When this measure came on before in the House, he abstained from supporting it in consequence of the assurance of his right hon. Friend that the Jockey Club had the power, and that they were prepared to deal with this particular question. Since that discussion took place, the matter had been under the consideration of the Jockey Club, and one hon. Member belonging to that Club had since withdrawn his opposition to this Bill, and had stated that the Jockey Club would not do what they were thought to be able to do. Under these circumstances, he thought the Committee would see that it was placed in a position very different to that which it occupied when his right hon. Friend last opposed the measure. On that occasion his right hon. Friend had induced him not to vote against it by stating that there was another remedy for the evil complained of. That remedy had failed, the nuisance of these race meetings in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis was as great as ever, and he thought the House should itself take some step, instead of leaving the matter to a body which was wholly inadequate to deal with it.

MR. ANDERSON had nothing to say in addition to what had fallen from the Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF thought that if this Bill were so extremely desirable, it ought to have been introduced by the Government. The definition of races in the Bill was of the widest possible character. He scarcely thought the Committee could pass a definition of this kind merely on the responsibility of a private Member. He hoped his hon. Friend would persist in the Motion that the Chairman should leave the Chair. This was a Bill of a most tyrannical character, and, if introduced at all, it ought to have been brought forward on the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. J. LOWTHER desired to correct his hon. Friend (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) in one point. His hon. Friend, who had, of course, as much right to his opinion as he (Mr. J. Lowther) had to his, and with whom he cheerfully could agree to differ, said an assurance was given on the last occasion when this question was under discussion that the Jockey Club would do something. He was one of those who gave that assurance, and he wished to inform the Committee that the Jockey Club had done something. As the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had stated at a recent meeting of the Club, the Jockey Club had published a notification requesting gentlemen who might be asked to act as stewards at race meetings not to do so until they had assured themselves that such meetings would be conducted on a proper footing. This notification had been published in the official Calendar during the last few weeks. His hon. Friend appeared not to be aware of that fact. In the event of this notification not being found sufficient, further measures would, he had no doubt, be adopted by the Jockey Club. It was sometimes said that the persons who took part in these race meetings did not care for the opinion of the Jockey Club; but he maintained that they did, and that the Jockey Club could stop them by simply putting a veto on the publication of the programme. If complaints were addressed to the Jockey Club instead of being sent, anonymously or otherwise, to the newspapers, they would be much more efficiently dealt with.

MR. ANDERSON observed, that the Grand National Hunt Committee had done exactly the same thing as the Jockey Club. They also had requested their members not to act as stewards at these meetings, but actually two members of the very Committee which had made this request went down to Stratford and acted as stewards within three months. The Jockey Club had not even carried out their own rules, which had now been in existence for a year and a-half, and they knew it would be inexpedient for them to do so. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) was well aware of that, and, consequently, he had withdrawn his opposition. The hon. Member was satisfied that the Jockey Club could not deal with the matter, and that it would be better for some other parties to undertake the task. For that reason, the hon. Member's opposition to the Bill had been withdrawn, and there was no longer any bond fide opposition to it. The hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had objected to the wording of the Bill. To that he would only remark that the Bill had been four months before the House, since it gained second reading, and that during that time not a single Amendment relating to the wording of the Preamble or the clauses had been placed on the Paper. The measure was not intended to put down any racing, but only to cause certain race meetings to be conducted in a better style than they had been in time past. Those who opposed the Bill were fighting the battle of the "welshers," the blackguards, and the swindlers who attended those race-meetings. In doing all he could to fight the battle of the "welshers," the right hon. Gentleman opposite had placed himself in a most unenviable position.

Clauses 2 to 5, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Penalty on owners and occupiers of ground where unlicensed horse-races take place).

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF moved to report Progress, as it was too late now to discuss properly the amount of the fines.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

MR. ANDERSON said, the amounts of the fines were adjusted in consultation with the Government last year. They were made rather heavier than was originally proposed, in order to please the Government; and, therefore, he could not consent to change them without the consent of the Government.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the hon. Member for Glasgow was correct in saying that the fines, as they appeared in the Bill, were agreed upon by the Home Office and the hon. Gentleman last year. Still, he now thought that smaller fines would be sufficient to meet the object in view.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF moved to leave out "ten pounds," in order to insert "five pounds."

Amendment agreed to.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF moved to insert "twenty-five pounds" instead of "fifty pounds."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. J. Lowther

MR. ONSLOW thought, that as the amount of the fine had been diminished, he would propose that the term of imprisonment should be reduced. He moved to reduce it from "three months" to "three weeks."

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped his hon. Friend would not press this Amendment. A fine of £5 would carry three months' imprisonment, and a week's imprisonment would be no penalty at all in a case of this kind.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER thought the punishment should be sufficiently severe.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

On Question, "That the Preamble stand part of the Bill?"

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he should like to ask his hon. Friend (Mr. Anderson), whether his definition of a horse-race was sufficient? The Preamble made the Bill apply to horse-races, and in the 1st clause a horse-race was defined as a race in which a horse ran against a horse or against time. There were, however, various other forms of horse-racing. For example, there was the racing of horses against bicycles; and he doubted very much whether the definition would apply to races of that kind. He objected to the Bill altogether; but if it were to pass at all, it ought to be in proper form.

MR. ANDERSON promised to consider the point. He thought, however, that the definition did cover every reasonable thing in the shape of a horse-race. If there were any kind of swindling transactions going on in bicycle-racing, the Bill, of course, ought to be extended to that also.

MR. DILLWYN asked when his hon. Friend proposed to take the Consideration?

MR. ANDERSON: To-morrow.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF objected to this arrangement.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had intended to fix the Consideration for to-morrow; but he would not persist in that resolution, if any objection was raised.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

TENANT RIGHT (IRELAND) BILL.

(Lord Hill-Trevor, The Marquess of Hamilton, Mr. Mulholland, Captain Corry, Mr. Chaine.)

[BILL 31.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now considered."—(Lord Hill-Trevor.)

MR. MACARTNEY said, he had supported the second reading of the Bill. He placed on the Paper some clauses which he proposed to add to it; but he was not in the House when the adjournment took place just before the Whitsuntide Recess. His only opportunity, therefore, of moving the new clauses now would be upon the Report. He did not suppose that the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill wished to avoid discussion of the new clauses which he desired to propose. Therefore, he hoped that an opportunity would be given to him of bringing those clauses forward. In conclusion, he moved that the consideration of the Bill, as amended, should be postponed till Monday.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon Monday next."—(Mr. Macartney.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

LORD ARTHUR HILL-TREVOR, having referred to what occurred the other day, expressed his opinion that the hon. Gentleman was entirely out of Order in moving the adjournment.

MR. RAIKES was quite aware that the new clauses might sometimes be moved on the Report of a Bill which could not be considered in the Committee. At the same time, he was of opinion that the Amendments of the hon. Member for Tyrone had been inadmissible at the earlier stage, inasmuch as they dealt with a larger question than that to which the Bill related. The Bill proposed to amend the law of Tenant Right in the case of leasehold property. The Amendments of the hon. Member for Tyrone proposed to make the Bill applicable to all property held by any tenure whatever. That, it appeared to him, would extend the operation of the Bill, and make it quite a different measure from the one which had been submitted to the Committee. Accordingly, he had intimated on a previous occasion that these Amendments were at that time out of Order. He understood his hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone now to propose to adjourn the debate. He should advise his noble Friend to accede to the proposal, as this was a matter requiring consideration, and the clauses which were objectionable in Committee might be regarded as not being open to objection in the House. The subject would, he trusted, be discussed on an early day.

MR. MACARTNEY said, it was his intention that the matter should be discussed at the earliest opportunity.

Question put, and negatived.

QUESTIONS.

UNITED STATES—TREATY OF WASHINGTON — THE TWENTY-SECOND ARTICLE—AWARD OF THE FISHERIES COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will be good enough to inform the House of the nature of the communications received from the United States Government relative to the Award recently made by the Fisheries Commissioners under Article 22 of the Treaty of Washington; if the amount awarded is equivalent to the value of the inshore fisheries of the North American Colonies, or if the Award requires modification as indicated in the Report made to the Senate by the United States Committee on Foreign Relations on the 28th May last, and in which the value of the fisheries is alleged to be only 25,000 dollars per annum in place of the amount awarded; and, further (if not inconvenient to the public service), if he will cause all the Correspondence between the several contracting parties to be placed upon the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I believe that up to the present time no communication has been received from the United States Government relative to this Award. I am, however, having all the Papers examined, and, I believe, we shall be in a position shortly to present Papers on the subject.

POOR LAW—THE DOLGELLY GUARDIANS—CURE OF CHILDREN.

QUESTION.

MR. WHEELHOUSE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the following alleged entry, said to have been made by Mr. Brown, the District Inspector under the Local Government Board, and read at the last meeting of the Dolgelly Guardians, be correct, namely :—

“ I must again request the special attention of the guardians to the notes made by me on both my last previous visits as to the care of the children and others being left to the ‘ imbeciles.’ This is no fault of the master, as he has no other person to place in charge. At present the male nurse is an ‘ imbecile,’ and Jane Richards, also an ‘ imbecile ’ of violent temper, and the mother of illegitimate children, is in charge of the children. I can only characterise such a condition of things as a disgrace to the union ; ”

if such entry be correctly reported, whether the Local Government Board is actually powerless to put a stop to a state of things which has already lasted apparently for a considerable length of time ; or, if the Local Government Board is not so actually powerless, whether it will immediately exercise any power it possesses for the purpose of causing such a condition of things to be remedied and removed ?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH : Sir, I am not aware of the terms in which Mr. Brown expressed himself in the visitors’ book of the Board of Guardians of the Union referred to ; but a statement of his to the same effect as that now quoted was communicated to the Local Government Board so long ago as the 24th of May last. On the 1st of June following the Local Government Board addressed a communication to the Board of Guardians, informing them of the statement made by the inspector, and stating that the arrangements referred to by him were most objectionable, and must be immediately discontinued. The Board pointed out that if the Guardians could not place a trustworthy inmate in charge of the children, it was their duty to appoint a paid officer. Their reply has not yet been received, but the subject shall not be lost sight of.

THE EASTERN QUESTION — THE AGREEMENT BETWEEN RUSSIA AND ENGLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. W. H. JAMES wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question, of which he had given him private Notice—namely, Whether the document published in “ The Globe ” of this afternoon, purporting to be the full text of the terms of an agreement between England and Russia relative to the Congress, is authentic ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER : Sir, my hon. Friend informed me of this Question only two minutes ago. When he did so, I had not seen The Globe ; and, though he has placed a copy of it in my hands, I have not yet had time to examine the document to which he has referred. I can only say that the document has not, in any way, been communicated by Her Majesty’s Government—of that I am quite certain ; but, as to whether it is correct or not—authentic or not—that is a question which I cannot, without examination, profess to answer.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. J. COWEN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he proposes to proceed with the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill on Thursday next ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he would not be able to take the second reading of the Bill in question until Thursday week.

VALUATION OF PROPERTY BILL.

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Salt.)

[BILL 94.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that although the measure had been twice before Parliament, and although, after he had introduced it at considerable length, it had received the sanction of the House so far as the debate which followed enabled him to judge, it had not as yet made any further progress. Although that was the case, however, the Bill had passed through a crucial ordeal. It had been considered and examined by the various local authorities throughout the country, and Amendments and points for consideration in connection with it had been suggested by those bodies. They had freely communicated with him on the subject, and he had received not only innumerable letters on the question, but also a large number of deputations. The result was a Bill which, he believed, approached very nearly to that which the most competent and experienced authorities believed to be a practical and effective measure of improvement and reform. The first object of the Bill was to secure a uniform system of valuation, instead of having property valued by three different authorities, as at present; and the second intention of the measure was to insure uniformity in the charge for the county rate, a step which, in his opinion, would pave the way for other administrative reforms. The Bill now before the House had also this to be said in support of it—that a similar measure had been in operation in the Metropolis for 10 years, and, on the whole, had proved remarkably successful. The necessity for some such reform as it proposed could not be denied, especially in view of the fact that the subventions paid out of the Exchequer for local purposes were growing larger year by year. The Government itself had a peculiar interest in the question, inasmuch as it was the largest ratepayer in the Kingdom, being assessed at something like £600,000 a-year. This Bill was not a root-and-branch measure, but only one of a lengthened series of steps in the direction of improvement in this branch of the Public Service. It might be that in the opinion of some the whole of the present system should have been swept away and a fresh scheme devised. If the present system had appeared to be incapable of amendment, some fresh scheme might no doubt have been devised, but no such case had been made out. The Bill introduced no alarming innovation which the House need fear to sanction. The means by which the Government hoped to attain the object in view were twofold. In the first place, they required the assessment committees to take into their consideration the Returns which were furnished to the Inland Revenue officers as a basis for the income and property tax, in order to secure an average uniformity. The Government believed the operation of that plan would be to secure uniformity in the assessment of the gross estimated rental on which the property tax was now to be charged. The Bill further provided, by a scale of deductions which would be found in the Schedule, a means by which uniformity would likewise be attained in regard to the rateable value column of the valuation list or rate book. They had the experience of a number of counties which had adopted the principle. In England no fewer than 17 counties absolutely relied on the property tax Returns to check and correct the totals arrived at by the overseers. On going into Committee he was met with four Amendments. He would say nothing now as to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), which, if carried, would be fatal to the further progress of the Bill, because he was not yet aware on what arguments it was likely to be founded; and, moreover, after the support given to the measure of last year, he did not imagine that the Amendment would be pressed. Then there were the Amendments of his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), who repeated the Amendments placed on the Paper last year in the name of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen), the effect of which was that the question of valuation should be postponed until after the County Board had been established. For his own part, he had always insisted on the importance of a Valuation Bill as the foundation of all other Local Government improvements. The other day, his hon. Friend assumed he would strike out the 25th clause, which had been designed to introduce the functions of a County Board. He had not, however, thought it right to expunge that clause, but he proposed an interim arrangement by the appointment, for the discharge of those duties, of a committee of magistrates. He should have been very willing to associate with that committee of magistrates the chairman or some other member of the various assessment committees; but he refrained from putting that proposal on the Paper, because he might be told that by so doing he would prejudge the future establishment of the County Board. He should, however, have had no such intention or wish. The Government believed that a great, although not a complete, approach towards uniformity would be achieved by the provisions as to county supervision as they now stood in the Bill. He felt satisfied that the passing of the measure would advance the object his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk had in view. He trusted the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied to assist in its further progress, and he thought the time would speedily arrive when the hon. Gentleman's views would admit of a more practical solution. He could say the same thing with regard to his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard). His right hon. Friend desired an improvement in the assessment to the income tax; but to adopt the Motion of his right hon. Friend at present would oblige the Chancellor of the Exchequer to part with property tax on £20,000,000. With all respect to his right hon. Friend, he must say he thought it unfair that a measure which had for its object the uniform valuation of the country should be hampered with a proposal relating to the incidence of the income tax, with which, prima facie, it had nothing to do. An hon. Gentleman who represented the Scotch system of valuation (Mr. Ramsay) had also a proposal on the Paper to discharge the Order for Committee at present, and refer the matter to a Select Committee. He need not say that the Government would not for a moment entertain such a proposal, and they had some reason to complain that the hon. Member pressed his own measure before the House, having regard to the circumstances under which that measure was read a second time. A Morning Sitting had been devoted to it, and interesting speeches were made upon it; but he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) had no opportunity of replying to them; while a subsequent opportunity was taken of bringing on the Bill between a quarter to 6 and 6 o'clock on a Wednesday afternoon. However desirable it might be to begin a system ab initio of county administration as it existed in Scotland, there were many fatal practical objections to the measure. When the hon. Member moved his Motion, he should have an opportunity of replying to it. The House was aware of the great and increasing difficulties which the Government had to encounter in passing through Parliament a measure of extreme detail which was not of such a character as to excite a strong feeling in the country. The experience of the last three years had shown how a measure of this kind, which he really believed to be approved, in the main, by all the local authorities in the Kingdom—men who were the most conversant with the subject, the most interested in the matter, and who would have to put the law into operation—had been defeated; and he thought that his right hon. and hon. Friends who were here to-day would best consult the objects they had at heart, as well as the wishes of the country, by assisting the Government to go into Committee and shape a satisfactory measure. He merely wished to introduce by this Bill those amendments which were required in the law of rateable property, and to remove the absurdities which now prevailed of assessing the value of the same house and the same acre of land at three different figures for taxing purposes. It was with the hope that they should this day make some progress in passing the clauses of a Bill which was intended to remove such absurdities that he now begged to move that the Speaker do leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

MR. B. T. WILLIAMS said, he wished to make a few observations which had struck him on reading the clauses of the Bill. The assessment committees, as far as his experience went, were composed of the men best able to form a correct valuation of the property in their neighbourhood. On the assessment committees with which he was connected were landed proprietors, land agents, colliery proprietors, and colliery engineers. Assessment committees composed of such men were the most likely to arrive at a correct valuation of the property with which they were immediately acquainted. The error of the Bill consisted in this, that it did not give due weight to the conclusions which might be arrived at by the assessment committees. The Bill subjected the deliberate decision of the assessment committees to the most complex and multifarious mode of correction and appeal. Even the committee itself was to be compelled by the provisions of the Bill to state a case for the opinion of the High Court of Justice. In addition, there was an appeal to the petty sessions, an appeal to the quarter sessions, and an appeal to the special petty sessions and quarter sessions, and the quarter sessions also had power to state a case for the High Court of Justice. Further, the decision of the assessment committee would be subject to supervision by the County Board, or it might be, as the right hon. Gentleman had intimated, by a committee of the quarter sessions. He could understand an appeal from the overseers of the parish to the petty sessions; but when they had the most competent men that could be appointed, what was the object of appealing from a body of special aptitude to the petty sessions? It was nothing more than an appeal from a superior to an inferior tribunal. The Bill further enabled a party before the assessment committee to make that committee state a special case for the decision of the High Court of Justice. There were great difficulties connected with a special case. What did it mean? He knew nothing that was attended with so much delay and expense to parties as stating their special case. When stated, it was entered in the Court List, and a year or 18 months might expire before it came on to be argued. It was not desirable, at this early stage, to complicate the proceedings by giving parties the opportunity of at once taking their argument and difficulties to Westminster Hall. The proper course would be to abolish entirely appeals to petty sessions and also abolish the power of the assessment committee to state a case for the High Court of Justice. In old times the appeal to the court of quarter sessions worked very well; but, the assessment committee once established, he did not think the few magistrates at quarter sessions who remained to hear appeals formed the best tribunal for overruling the decisions of the assessment committee, and he thought some new body ought to be established for that purpose. They had now a suggestion from the right hon. Gentleman of a committee of the court of quarter sessions to consider the valuation arrived at by the assessment committee. What could be the object of the right hon. Gentleman in appointing a committee of quarter sessions to act independently of quarter sessions, although forming part of the court? It was altogether a most incongruous and impracticable proposal. The right hon. Gentleman was in difficulty in dealing with this question, because the County Government Bill which was the basis of this Bill, had been taken away. Hopes had been held out of a County Government Bill and there was a growing desire in the country to have some scheme to enable counties to select for the management of their business those who might appear competent; but he feared there was a little hope of a County Government Bill being passed this Session. He would therefore suggest that it would be much better to postpone the consideration of the present Bill until the whole subject could be dealt with in the shape of a comprehensive measure of which this could only be considered a portion; and he should therefore support the Amendment of which Notice had been given by the hon. Member for South Norfolk.

MR. CLARE READ, in rising move the following Amendment:—

“That no re-adjustment of the system of assessment will be complete or satisfactory until a representative County Board is established, with power of hearing appeals, questions of value, and for securing uniformity of assessment,” said, he so entirely agreed with what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Carmarthen (Mr. B. Williams), that he thought he might second the Amendment of which he had given Notice. He could not help thinking the conduct of the Government in regard to this Bill had been somewhat peculiar. It was ordered to be printed on the 28th of January, and it was not delivered to hon. Members till the 11th of May; consequently, his right hon. Friend had been 15 weeks in perfecting this Bill. Although read a second time the Bill was really considered dead and buried till the other day, when intimation was given of the withdrawal of the County Government Bill. His right hon. Friend said this Bill had been before the country for years, but the fact was it had not been before the country at all. No meeting, and, as far as he was aware, not a single Chamber of Agriculture, had had the opportunity of considering it in its present form or discussing the Amendments which had been placed on the Paper. In pressing forward this measure, the Government had departed from the principle of the Resolution passed last year in favour of the establishment of County Boards. It was obvious that legislation on the subject of county government should precede any settlement of the question of valuation; but, in spite of that, the Government persisted in putting the cart before the horse; and if this and other kindred Bills were passed, the ratepayers would have to wait a long time before obtaining that system of county government which they so greatly desired to see established. If the Government had sufficient time at their disposal, they had no right to abandon the County Government Bill. If they had not sufficient time to proceed with it, they ought not to fritter away their time in proceeding with a small measure like this, but to have proceeded with the Cattle Diseases Bill. They had been told that this Bill was the same as that brought forward some years ago. He thought it was the same principle as the Bill introduced by Mr. Hunt in 1868. It was no Government Bill at all. It was a Local Government Board special scheme. His right hon. Friend had renewed his argument in favour of the Bill by saying that Government subventions required a new arrangement of assessments. He could not understand that argument, because the Government subventions for the police and lunatics did not depend on assessment at all. He had wondered very much that hon. Gentlemen opposite did not oppose this Bill because of its centralizing tendencies. They objected to the Prisons Bill, under which the Government reduced the authority of the local magistrates to a nullity. They objected to that; but they had never said a word here, when the Government were introducing into every assessment committee in the Kingdom one of their own paid officials—the surveyor of taxes. He was not aware that there was any excuse for the State meddling in this matter. He always thought it was the duty of the locality to see that the rates were levied fairly, not to look after taxes. He always fancied that the matter of taxes was a duty between the individual taxpayer and the State; but now they were going to assist the State to levy the taxes, and the State was going to assist them in assessing the rates. That union might be productive of great good, but he very much questioned it. The locality, like the wife, would be the weaker vessel, and the State, the stronger vessel, would very likely say to the locality—"What is yours is mine, and what is mine is my own." He contended that the scheme, as it was proposed, would inflict considerable hardship upon the owners of property. He knew it was said that taking rent as the basis was good for Scotland, but that it was not good for England? and some hon. Members had said that there were a great many cheap rents in England. He would like to know where they were to be found. Where was there most land unlet at the present moment in Scotland and England? Where did the greatest distress exist, and where was the profit made in the last 20 years? He held that the greatest profit was made by the Scotch farmer, rather than in England. When the Scotch farmer paid his rent, he paid the most of his outgoings at the same time. He had no tithes, and very few rates. But in England, where a man paid £1 an acre for arable land, he had 10s. or 12s. more to pay in tithes, &c. It was proposed that rent should be no longer the minimum; but if they had a surveyor of taxes, then the rent must be the minimum of assessment. If rent were adopted as the basis of rating, there would be few appeals, and there would not be any great necessity for the Amendment of which he had given Notice. Rent was a fact against which they could not appeal, although they might multiply appeals against opinions as to value. Let rent be accepted, and then if a man went before the assessment committee and said—"My rent is 30s. an acre, but I do not think it ought to be assessed at more than 20s.," the committee would say—"As a fact you do pay 30s., and that must be your assessment." It was stated in the debate on the second reading of the Scotch Valuation Bill, that there had been only 122 appeals since rent was made the basis of assessment; but in England appeals were being multiplied by hundreds and thousands. Take rent as the basis, and appeals would be simplified and reduced in number. According to the Bill, there would be first of all the assessment committee, then the petty sessions, then the quarter sessions, and then the Courts of Law; but that was a roundabout way of getting justice, and would compel the majority of poor ratepayers to put up with any inequality. He would say that, if County Boards should come into existence, the only question to be entertained by a County Board should be one of value, and points of law should go direct to the High Court of Justice. Of course, a County Board would also enforce a uniform system of deductions. It was said that, if his Amendment were adopted, it would stop the Bill; but he did not think so at all. Though he was not in favour of it, he did not wish to stop it if there was a desire to pass it; and he should be quite content, for the present, with the suggested Amendments of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) for a temporary County Valuation Board power, the chairmen or members of the different assessment committees. Too much power was still left to the surveyor of taxes, who must be a perpetual screw-jack, putting all up to a higher level, but never putting anyone down; and, possibly, doing injustice to many because some man chose to pay more for property than it was worth. There was, of course, ample opportunity for a cantankerous and litigious man to cause appeals to be made against every assessment in a county. There was no very urgent necessity for the Bill, which had been before the House for 10 or 12 years, and the assessment committees were doing their work fairly well, although the law left them too much discretion; but give them the principle of rent to go on, and then they would do their work better. It was boasted that the Government had abstained from harassing and annoying classes and individuals; but this Bill would harass every assessment committee in the Kingdom. The Bill would really settle nothing; it would only be a temporary measure if it ever came into force; and it would be impossible to work it with that zest which was essential to good administration. It must be unpopular, because everyone whose assessment was raised would immediately say it was done by the surveyor of taxes, who was acting for the Government. The chief effect of the Bill would be to extract possibly more rates, and certainly more taxes, from the owners and occupiers of real property, without giving the slightest additional advantage or satisfaction in the county districts. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. J. R. YORKE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no re-adjustment of the system of assessment will be complete or satisfactory to ratepayers until a representative County Board is established, with power of hearing appeals on questions of value, and for securing uniformity of assessment,"—(Mr. Clare Read,)

—instead thereof.

MR. EVANS said, it had been his fate to sit on the hearing of many appeals, and never was any work so unsatisfactory to him. Whatever attention men of ordinary intelligence might give to the appeals, it was impossible to come to satisfactory conclusions. He had been sometimes inclined to say that as good a result might have been obtained by the tossing of a halfpenny; he therefore hoped there would be no increase in the number of appeals, unless a plan were devised of deciding them in a more satisfactory manner. He was much impressed with what had fallen from the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), that the effect of this Bill would be to stave off legislation on the question of local government. The County Government Bill seemed to him to be a good one, and he should greatly regret if the passing of the Bill now before the House should have the effect of preventing a measure based on the principle of the County Government Bill becoming law. His own constituents had strong feelings in favour of such a measure, and were beginning to think the subject had been trifled with by successive Governments. He had no great objection to this Bill in itself, but he held that rental was the proper basis of value. There might have to be occasional exceptions, but rent would furnish the only satisfactory basis of value, for rent was a fact, while value was only an opinion.

MR. PARNELL said, that under the circumstances he did not intend to move his Amendment, believing it would be more convenient to discuss that of the hon. Member for South Norfolk. He expressed his surprise that the Government should have taken the second reading of the Bill the day before the adjournment for the Whitsuntide Holidays, when the House had no expectation that the Bill would be proceeded with until some progress had been made with the County Government Bill. To the hon. Member for South Norfolk they were much indebted for the attention he had given to county government, and the influence which had induced the Government to give shape to the question; and, with the hon. Gentleman, he agreed that the Bill would have the effect of staving off the question of the establishment of County Boards. As an Irish Member, he felt great interest in the establishment of county government in England. Such might seem an extraordinary statement; but, as a matter of fact, if England suffered from the imperfection of its county government, Ireland suffered ten times as much. Both sides of the House agreed in the necessity of improvement in England; how much more desirable, then, must it be in Ireland? A Bill on such a subject should be as simple and workable as possible; and it might be well to direct attention to the Irish system, not with a view of adopting a similar system—for that was vicious, based as it was on a complete centralization—but the question of appeal was in Ireland very much simpler than the proposition made by the Bill. In Ireland there was a valuation of the whole country made by a central board of valuers at Dublin, a Government body, which sent out valuers all over the country. Yet, with this central board of superintendence, he doubted very much if there were more uniformity than in England. The English system proceeded on different lines and by a different method—that of assessment by local authorities, with appeals; and the system of appeals proposed by the Bill he could not but regard as a most vicious one. First, there was the appeal from the surveyor to the assessment committee. Practically that was so, for the committee reviewed the lists furnished by the officer. From the committee there was an appeal to the petty sessions, and those petty sessions were composed partly of the same men sitting on the assessment committee. This was a mixed and muddled system, scarcely worthy of the genius and ability of the President of the Local Government Board. After this appeal to the petty sessions there was an appeal to quarter sessions, and thence to the County Government Board. But the County Government Bill had dropped still-born, and instead there was substituted a committee of quarter sessions. That was how the matter would work, and the Bill might well be described as a County Government Bill in disguise. The right hon. Gentleman found himself unable to deal with county government, although he brought in a Bill with that object, together with two subsidiary measures—the Valuation and the Highways Bills. Then he dropped the first, making such alterations in the two latter ones as would enable them to take its place, and he (Mr. Parnell) feared they would have to wait many a long day for any alteration in the present county government from the present Government. If the hon. Member (Mr. Clare Read) went to a division, he should support him.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT thought that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Selater-Booth) had suffered from not having a seat in the Cabinet. His Bills had been put very much on one side, and a measure which might have had a chance of passing—the County Government Bill—had been absolutely shelved. The present Bill, as he had stated the other night, was an important one, far more important, perhaps, than even his right hon. Friend himself had thought it. It touched everybody in the Kingdom, from the poorest ratepayer to the highest in the land, and it ought to attract the greatest attention from all who were interested in the assessment of this country. They were bound to see that every measure they passed on the subject was a just and even one. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) was carried, the Bill, of course, would be lost. It would, as they perfectly well knew, be impossible for his right hon. Friend to frame any measure, to be passed this year, which would establish a real, permanent, and lasting County Board. Therefore, they had to consider what they were to do with regard to the Bill. The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Bill took the first place in the estimation of a large number of Members. But there was another Bill which ought to have the precedence of the present one, and which ought to be passed—namely, the Highways Bill; and if they dealt with this measure, he doubted whether they would be able to deal with the Highways Bill. Although he would not say that in every possible case rent should be their guiding star in respect to assessment, yet, as a general rule, the criterion of rent ought to be followed. Looking broadly at the question, it ought to be more definitely laid down that, except in peculiar circumstances, rent should be taken as the basis of assessment, and then they might hope to get rid of the hundreds and thousands of appeals of which the hon. Member for South Norfolk had spoken. What had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Carmarthen (Mr. B. T. Williams) went a long way in the direction of the truth. The petty sessions, as a court of appeal, was not the best that could be devised, but it was inexpensive. The quarter sessions was not a bad court of appeal, because there they had men who would carefully go into the circumstances of each case. If, however, they could obtain such a County Board as would have the confidence of the ratepayers, and also of the owners of property, that might form a satisfactory court of appeal, and there would not be the same necessity for any further appellate tribunal for such matters. If a Bill of this kind were to be passed, it ought to be fair between class and class, between the ratepayers of one parish and the ratepayers of another, between one Union and another in a county, so that the different charges thrown over a county should not be 25 per cent less in one part than in another. He was sure that a really good County Board would take care that no injustice should be done between one Union and another Union. Looking at the whole case, and at the position in which his right hon. Friend had been placed, he ventured to hope that the Bill would be allowed to proceed; because, looking at the balance of one thing with another, he believed there was a great deal of good in this Bill. He hoped if the Bill became law, it would last for many years. There was nothing in it which would prevent a County Board being hereafter appointed, and he should vote for the Bill going into Committee.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot.

MR. RAMSAY said, that in addressing the House last year he had pointed out that the Bill was very cumbrous for the purpose for which it was intended, and not likely to secure that uniform valuation throughout Great Britain, which he thought should be secured by any measure the House might pass on this subject. The complicated nature of the arrangements contained in the Bill appeared to him an insuperable objection to it, if there were no other. But the right hon. Gentleman himself had pointed out that there was no great reason why the Bill should pass at all, because he had told them that in two-fifths of the counties of England perfection and uniformity of valuation were already secured.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I said that the county rates in 17 of the counties were satisfactory; but it does not at all follow that the Union rates are satisfactory in the same counties.

MR. RAMSAY said, it was undoubted that inequality still existed in the different Unions, owing to the various modes of assessment, and there could be no marvel at that being the case under the Bill. As it stood, the overseers were enjoined, in the first place, to make up valuation lists without any definite rule being prescribed for the determination of value. These lists they were to send to the surveyor of taxes, who, after revising and signing them, sent them to the assessment committees. These committees had power to make such changes on these lists as they deemed fit. After finally approving of the lists, they were to refer them to the county authorities. The decisions of the assessment committee or the justices in petty or quarter sessions might be appealed against to the High Court of Justice. He did not disapprove of the appeal on points of law to this court; but why all this other machinery to attain what might very simply be attained by taking the real rent as the basis of valuation? On a previous occasion the right hon. Gentleman had told him that the Bill did provide for something like the real rent being taken. In the definition of the gross value which was given in the Bill, it was said it should mean the actual rent which the tenant might be reasonably expected to pay, taking one year with another; but not that the rent that the tenant actually paid should be taken. In his (Mr. Ramsay's) Bill, on the contrary, it was said, where lands and hereditaments were in good faith let for a yearly rent, without payment or consideration of any kind other than the rent, such rent should be taken and deemed to be the yearly rent and annual value of such land or hereditaments. If the right hon. Gentleman would agree to accept this definition, as an instruction to the overseers and assessment committee as contained in his (Mr. Ramsay's) Bill, it would be a very considerable improvement in the principle of the Government Bill. The great diversity produced by the action of the assessment committees of the various Unions was a cause of just complaint. It afforded no basis for Imperial valuation, as it was admitted that the valuation of the local authorities did not apply except in cases where the surveyor of taxes had approved of the valuation list. The right hon. Gentleman had shown the House that there was not much reason for his own Bill being pressed forward. If the right hon. Gentleman would agree to remit it to a Select Committee, he (Mr. Ramsay) would be glad hereafter to move to remit his Bill also, that such Committee might frame a measure consolidating the two, and thus produce a Bill, the provisions of which would operate uniformly throughout Great Britain. There might, then, be some chance of getting a satisfactory valuation list which might endure under the County Government Bill when it hereafter became law. But there was another objection he had to the provisions of the Bill, irrespective of the numerous steps it rendered necessary in framing a valuation list, and that was the duration of the list when once it had been framed. Why should the list endure for five years in England, and be annual in Scotland? He had formerly shown that a quinquennial list would not be satisfactory, and might be unjust. Instead, therefore, of only making up a supplementary list, the whole valuation list should be made up anew every year, as was done in Scotland. He could not see any good reason why the right hon. Gentleman should refuse to have this done. Although it was not incumbent upon the Inland Revenue Department in Scotland to accept the valuation roll, except in the case where the surveyor of taxes acted as assessor, he was aware of no case where that valuation roll was not accepted for the Imperial taxes. That being so, why adopt a cumbrous and complicated system in England, and so perpetuate the diversity of practice between it and Scotland—a diversity which was wholly useless to the community? The right hon. Gentleman had made a complaint of the action he (Mr. Ramsay) took in asking the House to read his Bill a second time. He was surprised to hear him do so after what had occurred with his own Bill. Anything more unreasonable than that complaint he never listened to in that House. He only took the second reading of his Bill some weeks after it had been discussed in the House, and it was months after that before the right hon. Gentleman submitted the Government Bill to the House. Considering the action of the right hon. Gentleman himself, such a complaint came with a very bad grace from him. His (Mr. Ramsay's) Bill would produce uniformity of valuation; that of the right hon. Gentleman would not. The assessments, whether local or Imperial, ought not to be based on the theories of any man, however skilful or competent, but on the basis of facts. He had never heard a complaint in Scotland of the system of assessment, which took the rent paid as the sole criterion of value. On the contrary, the system had given satisfaction to all concerned, and very little trouble to the local authorities or the Department of Inland Revenue. Considering the long delay there had been in bringing this Bill forward, he thought no harm, but much good would result from referring it, along with his own, to a Select Committee. They might then hope to have a uniform system of valuation established.

MR. RODWELL thought it would be a matter for great regret if a Bill which was of such importance, and for which the public had so long anxiously waited, should be rejected. The hon. Member for South Norfolk had urged strong objections against the Bill, but they were surely not insuperable. Were the President of the Local Government Board only to meet those objections, so to speak, half-way, no very great difficulty need be experienced in passing the measure. He admitted that the word "appeal," as used in the Bill, was unfortunate. What was wanted in these cases was uniformity and regularity.

The powers of dealing with cases that were given to the assessment committees were entirely different from those vested in a court of law, whose decisions were based upon the rules of evidence. The suggestion he would put forward was one to which effect might be given in the present Bill. A Board might be selected composed of members from each assessment committee, who would then be able to compare the different valuation lists when any difficulty, objection, or appeal arose, and deal with it precisely as the assessment committee did now. He did not see why a body should not be thus constituted somewhat analogous to the Scotch Commissioners of Supply, the decisions of which would give satisfaction. As the Bill could easily be made to contain a provision of that kind, he trusted it would be allowed to go into Committee.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN expressed his surprise at the sudden prominence given to this Bill, compared with the little respect shown to the County Board Bill, which had been abandoned on the very threshold of Committee. He complained of the manner in which the Treasury Bench had treated the House in the management and conduct of the Bill. He had a right to express his surprise that so important a measure had been set down for Committee at so late a period as the 14th of June, after having been taken through its second reading when discussion of its principle had been impossible. The Government had had ample opportunity of dealing with the whole question relating to county administration, and of deciding which scheme they should take up first. After consideration, they deliberately came to the conclusion that the County Boards Bill should be the first to be considered. That measure passed its second reading, and nearly reached the stage of Committee. Having achieved that much, however, the Government suddenly changed its mind, and withdrew the County Boards Bill, and were now endeavouring, after its second reading had been taken unexpectedly, and in a thin House, to get the Valuation Bill into Committee. Such a course of procedure was not, in his opinion, the best means for expediting Public Business, and against it he desired to enter his protest. They had heard a good deal about obstruction;

but there were others, besides private Members, who might obstruct Public Business by the course they pursued. The fact that Her Majesty's Government carried forward two or three Bills, and then unexpectedly proposed to proceed with another measure in their place, was an encouragement to hon. Members who had not had time to consider the Bill to cause practical obstruction, in order to have its principle discussed. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had asked the pertinent question whether the Cattle Diseases Bill ought not to be pushed forward rather than the County Boards Bill? and the answer he received was that the Valuation Bill would take precedence of either. But, surely, to carry two or three Bills up to a certain point, and then to drop them for a great length of time, and afterwards to carry on the last of them, was to obstruct Business; and it was certainly obstruction to bring forward, at this period of the Session, a Bill which must be discussed at great length before it could be possibly passed into law. He wanted to know what the real policy of the Government was with respect to these measures in relation to county administration? A County Board Bill had been brought forward which diminished, to some extent, the powers of the magistrates of counties. That Bill was suddenly thrown aside, and here was another Bill which increased those powers.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, the powers were not increased, but continued.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, that the powers were, if not actually increased, at least stereotyped and strengthened. It appeared to him that, in diminishing the powers of the magistracy, the Government found they had given offence to their quarter-sessions' friends throughout the country. The real truth was, that there had been no actual complaint of the way in which the affairs of the country had been administered by the magistrates; but there had been complaints against the existing system founded upon the principle that representation and taxation ought to go together. What did they really mean to do? He believed the Government had found themselves in this difficulty—that in proposing to deal with this principle of representation, they had offended those from whom they would necessarily take away some power. He trusted they would hear from Her Majesty's Government whether they meant to persevere with the County Boards Bill, or to adopt that kind of County Boards Bill which had been suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, who, in fact, desired that, under the mask of the present Bill, a County Board Bill should be carried by means of a clause incorporated with it. But let him (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) call attention to the contrast between the manner in which the late and the present Government dealt with these questions of county government. The late Government, whatever fault might be found with the measure they brought in, came forward with relief in one hand and reform in the other—that was to say, they proposed that the relief should be obtained by means of the reform. But the present Government had first given relief by subsidies from the public purse; and now, by giving an improved system of valuation and other things as improvements, they were practically and gradually taking away the levers by which county reform could be obtained, and striving to weaken the demand for that reform. He would not enter into the details of the Bill before the House, but this he would say—that his right hon. Friend had no reason to complain of the discussion which had occurred, and which he regarded as a valuable one. If the hon. Member for South Norfolk went to a division, he would receive support from that side of the House, not because they desired to delay the Bill, but because they did not like to see one Bill substituted for another. For his part, he did not believe in the permanence of any of these Bills, unless they had a good Governing Body established. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sclater-Booth) would tell them whether Government were satisfied with the existing powers of the magistracy, and did not believe that a County Board was necessary, or whether they would be content to take that kind of County Board which his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Rodwell) proposed to engraft upon their Bill. It had been said to-day that actual rent, and not probable letting value, ought to be the basis of a rate. He had to enter his protest against that idea. Rent was an accident; it depended upon an arrangement between man and man, and was an excellent guide for the determination of a rate, but it ought not to be the basis. As to the formation of a County Board, no Board could be satisfactory until the wishes of the country were previously ascertained. If a representative board was wanted, no half-and-half Board would do, bringing the magistrates into quasi-antagonism with the elective element; but if the whole Board were elected, then there would be a fairly representative Board. This, however, was a point of far too great importance to be taken on the mere clauses of a Valuation Bill. The Government were trying to weaken the demand for representation in county affairs; but he warned his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk that, in supporting the Government subsidies and the Government measures of improving the valuation, he would fail to obtain the representation in counties of which he was so strenuous an advocate. The country would have waited patiently till next year for the Valuation Bill, while had the Highways Bill taken its place and been passed, it would have redressed an admitted grievance. No opportunity had been given for considering the Amendments to this Bill, and looking to the time of the Session at which they had arrived, he thought the right hon. Gentleman would make a graceful concession by referring the Bill to a Select Committee. He certainly would give his vote against the Speaker leaving the Chair.

MR. PELL could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down as to the preferable policy of the late Government upon this question, and the relief from taxation which their measure held out. Under the course pursued by the present Government the ratepayer had obtained material relief, and there was still some promise of reform in administration. However, he thought the conduct of the Government just now savoured of sharp practice, which he could hardly have thought his right hon. Friend would have resorted to. But the County Government Bill had received a second reading, and he supposed they must not cry over spilt milk. He hoped his right hon. Friend would tell them how the Bill had got into its present position. He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to state recently, in answer to a question, that, as regarded English measures, preference should be given to the County Government Bill; but, subsequent to that statement, it appeared that there were almost insuperable difficulties in the way of passing the County Government Bill, and that there was a better opportunity of passing the Cattle Bill; it was, therefore, put in the front, and the County Government Bill would be placed behind it. Well, that was a change in the arrangement of the feast, and the House was now asked to eat the side dishes before they had partaken of the joint. How had that come about? The Premier was on the other side of the water, and it was possible that the arrangement of Public Business depended on obedience to that law which regulated the survival of the fittest. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk would not divide upon his Motion; but if the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Ramsay) should divide, he would go into the Lobby with him, as he thought his Bill was a very good one. He had supported his Bill when it was introduced, and it embodied a very important principle—namely, the adoption of rent as a measure of valuation. A great deal had been said which was complimentary to the action of the assessment committees. For his part, he could not express unqualified satisfaction as to the way in which the assessment committees had discharged their duties. He approved the introduction by the Government of the surveyor of taxes, armed, as he was, with considerable powers. He would be a very useful officer, provided there was something in the Bill to regulate and control him—namely, rent as a measure of valuation. Rent, after all, was the measure of valuation in the Metropolis; and, as far as his experience went in London, the Metropolitan Valuation Act had worked satisfactorily. When occasion had been given for appeals by the assessments being put up, as they were in some districts, it was discovered on inquiry that it was not the surveyor of taxes but members of the assessment committee who had done so. He believed, on the whole, that rent represented as nearly as possible the value of hereditaments. Of course, they could not legislate for exceptions. It was said the assessment of cottages would be raised above the rent, but the truth was that cottages let at a low rent generally implied that the labourer worked for very moderate wages. He received a portion of his earnings in money and another portion in the low rent of his house. Thus, a cottage let to an agricultural labourer who was in the employment of the owner at £4, when occupied by a plate-layer fetched a rent of £7. But even that disparity would be preferable to leaving the assessment committee conjecturally to decide gross value. There was one omission in the Bill which he hoped would be supplied, and that was a provision for the valuation of railway property, which he should like to see dealt with by means of some such proposal as that which was contained in the Scotch Act. It was also desirable to consider whether it was not possible to make the valuation conclusion with regard to franchise, and thereby relieve the revising barrister of a great deal of trouble in matters relating to value that came under his notice. He also hoped the clauses would be withdrawn which empowered courts of special sessions to hear appeals.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not rise to enter into the question of the merits of the Bill. He merely desired to say a few words as to the position in which it had been placed. The Valuation Bill and the Highways Bill, though not identical in terms, were in principle the same. They had been introduced by the Government in previous Sessions, and had been, to a certain extent, not only discussed, but approved, by the House. At the commencement of the present Session they proposed to undertake a new group of Bills—one for the introduction of a new system of county government, and in connection with it a Highways Bill and a Valuation Bill, adapted to the altered circumstances which would arise if the County Government Bill were passed. They accordingly began by proceeding with the last-named measure; but, of course, they had always intended, and, indeed, considered it essential, that the three Bills should be carried on and passed together. They had shown by the precedence which they had in former years given to the Highways Bill and the Valuation Bill, what importance they attached to those measures in themselves, and they certainly never contemplated that the County Government Bill should override or do away with their passing into law. Well, the County Government Bill had up to a certain point been proceeded with, and had not the course of the discussion upon going into Committee upon it taken an unexpected turn, the Government would have carried out the programme with which they started. But, in consequence of that and the large share of the attention of the House which had been taken up by other Business, they found themselves thrown to a very late period of the Session in the progress which ought to have been made with the County Government Bill. That being the case, they had to consider what would be the proper and most convenient arrangement to make. Time failed them, and they could not but see that the measure involved a great matter for discussion, and questions of considerable importance and novelty which it would take some time to deal with. Then, there was the Cattle Bill, and other measures, pressing for consideration, and the question arose, how far it was possible to get through the whole of the work before them? After carefully considering the matter, he felt bound to say, and believed it was the opinion of those who took an interest in the County Government Bill, that the best way of proceeding, and the best chance for obtaining time for the discussion of the other Bills, especially the Cattle Bill, was to put off the further discussion of the County Government Bill—at all events, for the present; but he stated at the same time that, of course, the Highways and the Valuation Bills, which were part of the original scheme, would be proceeded with. The Government had endeavoured to go upon those lines. The Highways Bill was at once committed pro forma, and certain Amendments were introduced, and they had brought the Valuation Bill forward so as to get a discussion upon the Bill on going into Committee. If they were so fortunate as to advance that stage, they would be able to further proceed with it that Session. He also hoped that yet they would be able to proceed with the Highways Bill, and be also able to make such progress with this Bill as would allow them to proceed with them all, and the Cattle Bill. For himself, if the House supported the Government, he saw not the slightest difficulty in proceeding with them, and being able to discuss them in a satisfactory manner. He hoped, therefore, they would be allowed to get into Committee on the understanding that no clause would be pressed in which any complicated Amendments were proposed. There would be plenty of time for hon. Gentlemen to give Notice of any Amendments which they might wish to bring forward; but it was most desirable that time should not be lost in allowing the Speaker to leave the Chair, and that the House on future occasions should set itself to work to pass a measure which was generally recognized as being of great importance, and which he hoped they would be able to deal with satisfactorily, due allowance being made for the other Business which had to be disposed of.

MR. J. COWEN expressed his concurrence with the view which was taken by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) with respect to the County Government Bill. There could be no doubt that the entire system of county management stood in need of reformation, and that speedily; but the Bill of the Government dealing with the subject had failed because of its feebleness. For practical purposes, the Bill might be considered dead this Session. Well, then, was it necessary to proceed with the Bill before the House? The right hon. Gentleman said that it was only a tentative measure—a consolidation measure—and that it would not prevent the carrying out of that county government organization which all wished to see established. The hon. Member for South Norfolk thought the Bill was intended for taking money out of the pockets of the people; but it was probably more for the purpose of seeing how much money was in them. Clearly, a Valuation Bill ought to follow a County Government Bill, as dealing with a part of the system of county organization which would be necessary. But then he thought it possible to pass this Bill without preventing that county re-arrangement which was so desirable. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had objected to the Bill on the ground that it contained no proper provision for the valuation of railways. Neither did it contain any proper provision for the valuation of mines. He objected to one point of the Bill for the way in which it dealt with the overseer—to his mind a most objectionable parish officer—who was partly elected by the ratepayers and partly appointed by the magistrates. The overseer had very important duties to perform. He prepared the list of voters, and his appointment in the North often gave rise to popular excitement and parochial disputes. These overseers came into existence in the dark days of Tudor rule; and if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to get rid of these officials, he would do a great public service. He agreed also with what had been said by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire about surveyors of taxes, and he was surprised that greater objection was not made to them. They were very like those farmers of taxes, of which they had heard so much in the East of Europe. Their object was to get the largest possible amount of taxes out of the people; and the reason was that if they could increase the amount of taxes in their districts, they received preferment. It was an objectionable thing to import these men into the management of local affairs.

MR. FLOYER said, he could not quite agree with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, that the overseer ought to disappear from the face of the country. He had great respect for old-established customs and officers who had served their country for a long time, and he was not disposed to accede to the modern view that no service was good unless it was paid for. If there were persons who thought it right to perform public duties without salary, he trusted there was a sufficiently strong opinion in the country to support them. But the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) was a little difficult to please, because he objected to the overseer being appointed by the local authorities. The hon. Gentleman had said that the overseer was first nominated by the ratepayers, and then appointed by the local magistrates. Evidently he was altogether a local officer. The hon. Gentleman objected equally to the surveyor of taxes, because he was appointed by the Government. But if they were to have officers, they must be appointed by somebody; and if they were not to be appointed by the local authorities or by the Government, by whom were they to be appointed? He only hoped that it was not by Parliament. With respect to the Amendment, the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) suggested that, instead of appeals upon questions of value being brought before quarter sessions, they should be referred to the county authority, whatever it might be. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) advocated the same view, on the ground that a County Government Board could deal so well with different matters of principle applied to valuation. But his right hon. Friend would give to the County Board, whenever it might be established, and to the temporary authority that would be appointed by the Bill, precisely the same power that would be given to that body. The hon. Member for South Norfolk wished that the county authority should supersede the quarter sessions altogether. It might be desirable to do so, and to get rid of the appeal to the court of quarter sessions; but if it were, let them see what they were about, and that the county government, when established, should be able to deal with matters of appeal. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire thought it desirable that the authority to which appeal should be made should be of the same character as the assessment committee, the body from which the appeal was made. But the advantage of the appeal being made to the court of quarter sessions was, that it was a different body and dealt with the question in a different manner. The question was, whether the mode of procedure before the court of quarter sessions was not better calculated to bring out the true value of the different properties than that of a body like the assessment committee? The advantage of quarter sessions consisted not so much in the persons who presided over them as it did in the means at their disposal for getting at the facts and realities of the case. They had the assistance of gentlemen learned in the law, who were accustomed to deal with evidence and to present facts in a clear manner to those with whom the decision rested. The proposed new tribunal would be unable, as a general rule, to have the assistance of gentlemen of the Legal Profession. These were some of the reasons which induced him to think that the House ought to hesitate before it adopted the proposition of his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk. One body possessed the means of coming to a good decision, while the other would have to act on its own unassisted knowledge. Therefore, he thought there were grounds for believing that the old tribunal, with its old mode of procedure, might possibly be the best. When his right hon. Friend introduced his first Bill on this subject, the surveyor of taxes occupied a much more powerful position than he did under the present measure. It was formerly proposed that his fiat should be absolute. He objected to this at the time, but he did not think that the power proposed to be given by the present Bill to the surveyor of taxes was in the same sense objectionable. He believed the advice which the surveyor would give to the assessment committee would be of very great value. It was essential to the good working of the assessment committees that they should be the supreme authority, and he understood that would be the effect of the provisions of the present Bill. It was idle to expect that men in the position of the great tenantry of this country, whose occupations were most important to themselves, would take the trouble of working the assessment committees unless they were constituted the controlling authority in such matters. He could not agree with those who looked upon rent as an absolute criterion of value. Of course, he admitted that rent was a most important element in the question; but the criterion was the reasonable amount for which the land would rightly be expected to let one year with another; and he thought that where the sum appeared too high or too low, it should be competent for the assessment committee to adjust the difference. If the hon. Member for South Norfolk took a division, he should be obliged to vote against him. He hoped, however, that the House would be allowed to go into Committee without further delay, and that the Bill would be passed into law during the present Session.

Mr. GOSCHEN desired to call attention to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to the general position in which the House stood at that moment with regard to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had not attempted to deal with the arguments brought forward by the hon. and learned Member for Carmarthen (Mr. B. T. Williams), or with the main argument urged by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read)—namely, the argument of substance as contrasted with the argument of time. The argument of substance was, that if they were going to create a new Body, either in the next or some future Session, with reference to county government, it was unwise now to pass a Bill imposing new duties upon a Body which would be so shortly superseded. It appeared to him that the hon. Member for South Norfolk had argued this question in a perfectly unanswerable manner; for he had shown conclusively that, with these new duties, such a Body would not carry energy or zest into their work, as they would feel they were made a mere stop-gap, and that their powers would soon be taken away from them by a new Act of Parliament. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not alluded to that part of the argument at all. The right hon. Gentleman had defended himself simply on the question of time and the order of the Bills. Why had not the right hon. Gentleman paid the hon. Member the compliment of dealing with the substance of his argument, or noticed his suggestion to refer the Bill to a Select Committee? Was it that the right hon. Gentleman thought the hon. Member did not mean business, and that this Amendment was placed on the Paper to be afterwards withdrawn? The Amendment embodied a most important proposition; and he, for one, wished to know, whether the hon. Member stood by it to the letter? For his own part, he cordially agreed with both the substance and wording of the Amendment, and he believed that a large number of hon. Members on that side of the House, and a sprinkling of hon. Gentlemen on the other side, shared that opinion. As the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Clare Read) was a serious Member of the House, had he satisfied himself that the Government intended to assent to the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Ramsay) for referring the Bill to a Select Committee? He (Mr. Goschen) thought the Amendment ought to be pressed, especially as the Opposition had assisted the hon. Gentleman to carry his Motion as to County Boards. [Mr. CLARE READ: There was no division.] The hon. Member said there was no division; but he ought to appreciate all the more that support in debate which enabled him to beat the Government without a division, and saved him from going into the Lobby against them. Whatever the hon. Member might say, he, at any rate, would require the support of that side of the House for his reform of county government; and it was hoped that the hon. Gentleman would not discourage them in giving that support by not standing to his guns when he was in the right. The passing of the Valuation Bill now would be detrimental to the object which the hon. Member had so much at heart with regard to county government. The position was this—the Valuation Bill had been prepared with reference to another Bill that had been withdrawn, and the House had to argue upon this Bill, without knowing whether the other one was to pass or not. The fact was, that the system had broken down. There were three Bills—the County Government, Highways, and Valuation Bills—which, taken together, made a complete whole; but the County Government Bill having been withdrawn, the corner stone of the edifice had been removed; and the House was asked to agree to an arrangement which was incomplete and unsatisfactory, because it was asked to pass the Valuation Bill without the concurrent establishment of County Government Boards.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON, in supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk, said, the question to be considered was chiefly as to time, and not as to the merits of the measure. The withdrawal of the County Government Bill left this measure like the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet omitted. He hoped that the Government would be satisfied with this discussion, and that they would not proceed with the Bill until they could pass the whole group of Bills dealing with local government. With regard to the question of rent, he thought it should be taken as the basis, in order to check the surveyor.

MR. RITCHIE thought the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) were very unfair towards the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the right hon. Gentleman had distinctly stated that he rose, not for the purpose of answering any arguments on the subject of the Bill, but merely to answer remarks which had been made as to the course adopted in taking this Bill before some others. He (Mr. Ritchie) regretted that the Bill had been brought forward somewhat suddenly, as he and other hon. Members had wished to put Amendments on the Paper, some of which were of considerable importance. He was sorry that the Bill contained no clause with respect to the rating of machinery, for that subject was, at the present moment, in a very unsatisfactory state. Without going into the question of fixed machinery, there was no doubt that machinery not attached to the freehold was subject to rating in some places and not in others; while, by a recent decision of the High Court of Justice, all machinery, even though it was not fixed, was liable to be rated. If a man were to lay out a part of his capital in the purchase of removable machinery, he could not be said to add to the permanent value of his premises; but, by the decision referred to, he was liable to be assessed, not on rent alone, but on the value of all his machinery. In his opinion, the permanent letting value of the building was the true basis of assessment, and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board should have taken advantage of the Bill to insert some clause settling the existing difficulty in that way.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that he could assure hon. Gentlemen who had been taken by surprise that he had no wish to prevent them from putting Amendments on the Paper, and that he did not propose in Committee that day to proceed beyond the 1st clause. His hon. Friend who had just sat down had animadverted on the system of rating machinery, and the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) had made a similar complaint with reference to coal mines. Both those cases were very interesting, but they did not properly belong to the subject dealt with by the Valuation Bill, which merely contained directions by which rateable property was to be assessed, and was not intended to make any change in the mode of rating. He would be very glad, however, to settle the question of the rating of machinery and of coal mines, and of schools also; but such matters would better find their place in a new rating Bill, which he should not be reluctant to in-introduce if it were possible. He was surprised that the hon. Member for Newcastle should have raised the old cry with regard to the surveyor of taxes, who was only the instrument by which the Property Tax Returns were made known to the assessment committee. The object of the Bill was to oblige all the assessment committees to have regard to that officer, which meant that they were to take account of the rents actually paid; for the rent actually paid was, in nine cases out of ten, the best criterion of value. He knew that in one part of the Kingdom assessment committees had gone almost entirely by the rent actually paid; and, in the case of a large estate worth from £40,000 to £50,000 a-year, the Return specified in the new Domesday Book was within a very few pounds of the actual receipts of the owner. The right hon. Gentleman who had spoken first had mentioned the appeals set up by the Bill. The assessment committee was not a final authority, and the appeal to petty sessions had been retained in the interests of the poorer ratepayers. The Government had not felt themselves justified in taking away the court of appeal which the poor man possessed, and to which he now resorted for a remedy against any undue assessment. His right hon. Friend could hardly have studied the clauses in the Bill, because it was never intended, nor was it provided that the County Board should act as a court of appeal against the assessment of value. The assessment committees were, for the most part, to be paramount in those matters. Every hon. Gentleman who had served as a commissioner of taxes knew how frequently a case was taken for the opinion of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. There was a provision in the Bill to enable questions of importance, relating, for example, to railway and canal property, to be taken in a similar way to the High Court of Justice, assuming that the parties who were interested preferred doing that to going to the court of quarter sessions. He hoped that his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk would dismiss from his mind the idea that there was anything in the Bill which stood practically in the way of the setting up of a County Board. The County Board would be set up for a totally different object, and he had repeatedly stated that he had always regarded a Valuation Bill as the foundation of all those county reforms. If the County Government Bill were to pass without the Valuation Bill and the Highways Bill, the most important raison d'être of the County Government Bill would be entirely done away with. He denied that the officers of the Government had any interest in screwing up assessments, and he believed, so far from being multiplied by the Bill, appeals would be greatly diminished under it. As a matter of fact, appeals were rare now, and he hoped that they would be still more rare when those measures became law. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) had given Notice that he would propose certain Amendments in the Bill. Those Amendments he would have pleasure in considering. He had always held the opinion that valuation, although important, was not a primary function of a County Board. The County Board had a great future before it, and a Valuation Bill was the foundation on which the machinery of county government should be built. He had been surprised at the charge of shabby practice which had been brought against him in regard to the second reading of the Bill, and he contended that such an accusation was wholly groundless. The ratepayers would never have the same interest in the proceedings of the County Board as they had in those of the Poor Law Union, because the latter was intrusted with the expenditure of rates to a far greater extent than the former, and with the more detailed management of their local affairs. He would mention three counties as illustrations of that. In Northumberland the county expenditure was £40,000 in round numbers, and the Union expenditure was £170,000 a-year; in Staffordshire the county expenditure was £102,000, and the Union expenditure £330,000 a-year; in the county which he had the honour to represent the county expenditure was £30,000, and the Union expenditure £316,000 a-year. That would account for his not having regarded valuation as one of the most prominent functions which a County Board would have to discharge. He would not detain the House further, but ask them to go into Committee.

MR. CLARE READ was proceeding to make some observations in reply, when—

MR. SPEAKER informed the hon. Gentleman that he had no right of reply upon an Amendment.

MR. CLARE READ said, he would only remark that he was quite satisfied with the position which the question of County Boards occupied, having been unanimously passed last year; and as the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Rodwell) would give him all the opportunities he desired in Committee, he should beg, with the consent of the House, to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR thought good reasons had been given why the Bill should not be proceeded further with, at any rate this Session. In order to place before the House his own reasons for forming this opinion, he would move the adjournment of the debate. The Bill and the Amendments which it might be desirable to discuss could not now be properly considered.

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE GALTEE ESTATE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. GRAY, in rising to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the statements as to the treatment and condition of the tenants on the estate known as the 'Galtee Estate,' in the counties of Cork and Tipperary, which were made in the evidence given during the second trial of John Sarsfield Casey in the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin,"

said, the trial in question took place in November last, in the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, and was for a criminal information against Mr. Casey for an alleged criminal libel in connection with certain letters commenting upon Mr. Bridge's administration of the Galtee Estates as agent for Mr. Nathaniel Buckley. There were also certain important disclosures made in a preliminary application for an order to make absolute a conditional order for that criminal information. The Motion he brought before the House had nothing directly to do with the libel itself. He merely proposed that an investigation should be made into the circumstances disclosed incidentally at the trial. He might mention, however, that Mr. Casey was acquitted of the charge brought against him in the first counts of the indictment—namely, that he incited to, or attempted to justify, murder—and he trusted that that fact would be remembered in any discussion which might arise. Further, he might mention that on the counts charging Mr. Casey with alleging cruelty and oppressive raising of rents against Mr. Bridge, the jury failed to come to a verdict; but it was alleged that they were 11 to 1 for acquitting him. In asking the House to appoint a Committee of Inquiry, he thought he was bound to show—first, the importance of the subject itself; and, secondly, that no relief could be given to the aggrieved parties except by the method proposed. Both these points, he believed, he should be able to establish. The case—to deal with the first point—concerned the lives and well-being of some hundreds of individuals, and excited the greatest interest, not merely throughout Ireland, but in every portion of the world where the English language was spoken. Very large sums, moreover, were subscribed in order to secure for Mr. Casey a fair trial, because it was felt in Ireland that the case would be an exposure of the entire land system under which the Irish tenantry suffered. So much for the first point to which he had alluded. Passing to the second, he hoped to be able to show that no adequate remedy could be afforded to the unfortunate tenants concerned except by the machinery of a Select Committee of that House. To come now to the immediate question, he did not think he could better describe the estates than in the words of Judge Barry, in his judgment on the question of a provisional order for a criminal information against Casey. The learned Judge said—

“The portion of this district more particularly referred to in this case is described in the affidavits as of the wildest and most barren character, some of the holdings situate at a vast elevation, the soil in its natural condition covered with heath and stone, and only rendered productive of miserable crops by the most unremitting toil, involving in some cases the carrying by the tenants and their families of manure upon their backs to places inaccessible to any other means of carriage. It is sworn that if there be any remission of this laborious cultivation, the soil immediately reverts to its primitive sterility. It appears on the affidavits that a number of the tenants were in very poor circumstances, living in wretched cabins and able to afford only the meanest food and clothing; that many of them were in debt for the necessaries of life; that they were as a body most industrious; and that it was only by unceasing toil on the farms, and the wages earned by themselves or members of their families from the neighbouring farmers, that they were able to subsist and pay the former rents of their holdings. This class of tenantry was suffered by the Kingston family to make the best living they could out of this sterile district, paying rents in some cases nominal, in all cases very small. Unless tilled by such a class, the land was absolutely worthless. But the evil day came. The old lords of the soil became embarrassed; possibly, if they were made of sterner and it may be wiser stuff, of the material that would make the widow pay £1 instead of 5s., they might still have held the estates. But they got into Chancery, and a receiver was appointed, who, watched, it would seem, by jealous creditors, managed the estate till 1852, when the lands were sold in the Landed Estates Court. On the eve of the sale expressions of kindly feeling passed between this receiver, a Mr. Massey, and the tenants.”

In reply to an address from the tenantry, Mr. Massey thus wrote—

“Many a sleepless night have I had thinking on the sad scenes which the necessities of my position and the watchfulness of a most hostile party compelled me to enact. The performance of such a painful duty was, however, rendered less disagreeable by the patience, order, and excellent conduct of the tenantry—conduct which, for the twenty years I am engaged in the management of landed property, I have never seen equalled elsewhere, and which, under their privations, I consider to be almost miraculous. . . . I have ever found Lord Kingston most anxious to assist the wishes of the needy. . . . It is to be supposed that the passing of the estates into new hands is not far distant when my connection with you will be severed. Yet I trust it will be for the benefit of the tenantry, and that the new owners will treat them with the forbearance and generosity to which they are so well entitled by their honesty and excellent conduct.”

The land sold by the Landed Estates Court was bought by the Irish Land Company, of whom, at that time, the late John Sadleir was the managing spirit. Mr. Bridge became agent to that Company in 1869; but, while the Company held the estates, no ill-feeling between him and the tenantry was manifested. A small increase of rent in certain cases was exacted, but that was generally owing to an outlay by the Company itself on the land. But he never recommended to the Company, or attempted himself, to enforce any general increase. Indeed, it would have been unjust to do so; for it was to be borne in mind that, although land in general had increased in value within the last quarter of a century, the value of these mountain holdings had not increased. For one thing, wood had disappeared; in the next place, turf was more difficult to procure; and, thirdly, more manual labour was required than previously. The fact that these mountain holdings had not shared in the general prosperity of Ireland was shown by this—that on adjoining property, held by such landlords as Lord Lismore and Captain Massey, the increase put on re-valuation a little time ago was very small indeed. On the Galtee estates, on the contrary, the increase was enormous, of which, however, more anon. In 1873, Mr. Buckley, who was at one time a Member of that House, and who was a director of the Company, purchased this property from the Company—that was to say, from his co-directors and himself. What price he paid for it did not appear, as he had declined to give evidence at the trial; but it had been asserted, and never denied, that it was such as to afford him on the old rents an income of 8 per cent on his investment, whereas in England, as the House was aware, land rarely or never brought more than 3½ or 4 per cent. At the trial, the word “fraud” was used in connection with this purchase; but he believed Mr. Buckley acquired the land at its full value, and that it was only by the extraordinary means he adopted afterwards that its value was unduly enhanced. Mr. Bridge, as he had stated, became agent for the property in 1869; and, as he himself testified, he never gave a hint to the Company on the subject of raising rents.

When Mr. Buckley became proprietor of the land, however, he ordered it to be re-valued. Mr. Bridge had been held by the public to be responsible for the natural consequences of that re-valuation; but some injustice had been done him in that respect, inasmuch as it was clear from the evidence that he acted merely as the servant of Mr. Buckley. Interrogated by Mr. Butt—

“You swear that Mr. Buckley, your employer, knew that the old improvements had been made by the tenants and their predecessors?”

Mr. Bridge replied—

“I have no doubt whatever of it. And knowing that,” continued Mr. Butt, “he ordered these old improvements to be re-valued?—Most certainly, and most justly,” was the reply. This estate presented a feature not very peculiar in Ireland, but seldom seen in England—namely, that not a single improvement of any kind whatever had been effected by the landlord, such improvements as were made being solely the work of the tenants. What was the testimony of Mr. Bridge himself?

“Was not everything that was done on that mountain the work of tenants?—I suppose so. Don’t you believe it?—I suppose so.”

Again, one of the tenants in examination said, amongst other things, this—

“All the help we ever got from Mr. Bridge was to have me fined £4 for cutting a barth of heath on the mountain to put a coat of thatch on the roof.”

In a subsequent conversation with Mr. Bridge, reported in the public papers and not contradicted, the same witness said—

“And by the same token,” sir, says I, “there are two of the ould rafters split across, and I’d be thankful to you for couples to keep ’em from killing myself and the childer in the bed.—Why, then, I don’t know how you have the face of asking for rafters—how innocent you are!” said Mr. Bridge. Said he, “How nice your neighbours would look, if I charged them for the timber and gave it for nothing to you; and, indeed,” added the tenant, “it would be a rare story.”

Thomas Hyland, of Skeheenarinka, one of the tenants, swore an affidavit, in which he said—

“I hold a farm nearly at the top of the mountain from Nathaniel Buckley, Esq., consisting of about 40 acres plantation measure, at the rent of £5 sterling. Mr. Bridge says I must pay £10 10s. My farm when I got it was without a house or a home or a ditch, all covered with heath and not one foot of it tilled—all was wild and bleak as a mountain left to nature.”

Mr. Gray

Michael Regan similarly deposed that he held 47 acres of rocky mountain at Skeheenarinka, and that when he first remembered it it was only grassy heath.

“Who reclaimed it?” he was asked. “My father and me,” he replied, “and a brother of mine, with other helps we got. Did you get any help from the landlord?—No. What did you do with it to make it fit for use?—Dug it with spades and crowbars, and blasted the rock, many of which were buried. How many years were you working before you got it reclaimed?—We did it by degrees—a little each year. What food have you?—Potatoes, stirabout, and bread—everything next to hand that I can get. What rent did you pay on the land before the rise?—£5 9s. 6d. That was a fair rent. It has been raised to £15 16s. 6d. at one jump. Did you agree to pay that rent?—No, I could not pay it. If I left the farm, I have nowhere to go.”

That was the testimony of all those unfortunate tenants. If they left their farms, they had nowhere to go. Patrick Kearney, speaking of his holding, said—

“When I remember it first it was a black mountainy land, the same as the top of the Galtees—nothing but stone, and heath, and bogs. My father and myself were many a year rooting at it and reclaiming it.”

James Phelan, of Glenacunnah, swore—

“When he first got his farm it was barren mountain; there was not a house nor a ditch, nor nothing but mountain there; he had set about reclaiming it. Who helped you to reclaim it?—God Almighty and myself, and my poor old father, and he did not live long after. (Laughter). I have worked at it for 50 years.”

Denis Murphy was asked—

“Did you get any assistance from the landlord?—No, no more than you did. Or from the company? Ah! nonsense; no more than we got from God and our own industry.”

Edmond Darney, of Coolegarraunroe, swore—

“That my old rent was £2 6s.; the new rent is £4 6s. I must live on Indian meal the greater part of the year, and must buy that on credit. I reclaimed the lands, and was reclaiming it every year. Three of my children had to go to hospital, and my wife died there. I must keep goats to give a supply of food to my children when sick; I get medical Poor Law relief.”

Terence Murphy, of Caghergall, swore—

“That I am tenant of a small farm containing about 13½ acres on the estate of Nathaniel Buckley, Esq. The said farm is situate near the summit of the Galtee Mountain, and was reclaimed from the barren heath by my grandfather, my father, and myself. It is a very poor farm; only the worst kind of potatoes can be grown upon it. I have to rent a garden nearly every year on the farms of strangers to grow sufficient food for myself and family; when I sow oats, I must reap it while it is green, as the ear never fills or ripens, and it is only fit for feeding cattle. It will grow a kind of hay; I have to take meadow on other lands to feed my cows."

It was not alone the tenants that testified to the absence of any improvements by the landlord. Mr. D. J. Reardon, of Raffan, County Cork, a highly respectable and independent witness, being asked—"I suppose you did not see any landlord's improvements on the estate?" replied—

"No, indeed, they have not a road to approach even to-day; nothing but an impassable rut through the mountain."

Mr. James Byrne, J.P., County Cork, also said—

"We came by what I suppose we should call a road, but it was only the bed of the mountain torrent, and there were very large rocks down along it. I wonder how any animals could draw up an empty cart there, much less a load of any kind."

These witnesses, who were experts, swore, that to reclaim these holdings in the ordinary way would have cost from £20 to £30 an acre, and then their letting value would be only 5s. or 6s. a-year. In fact, it was only by the ceaseless toil of the tenants carrying manure and even soil on their backs up the mountains that the lands were ever made productive, even to the degree they now were. He mentioned these facts, because it was difficult for English landlords to conceive an estate in such a condition as Mr. Buckley's was. Chief Justice May, who certainly could not be accused of bias towards the tenantry, took the liberty of suggesting to this English millionaire that he should avail himself of the machinery of the Board of Works for borrowing money on easy terms in order to make some improvements; but whether the suggestion had been acted on he was not in a position to say. Now, as to the actual condition of the tenancies at the time Mr. Buckley got possession of the estate. He would quote principally from the evidence given at the trial, and from the affidavits of the tenants, as he thought it better to put unquestionable testimony of this kind before the House, than attempt any paraphrase of it himself. The only other source from which he would quote was from letters written by a special correspondent who visited the estate shortly after the trial—saw and conversed with the tenants, and published the facts which were never questioned. Richard Condon, examined by Mr. O'Brien, Q.C.—

"I am one of the tenants on Barnahoun. Are the tenants very fat there?—(Gloomily) It is easy for them. Remember when my father took my farm there could not be worse to be found, all rocks of stones and heath. I remember when the Board of Works were carrying on the relief works during the famine times. I supplied them with over 500 loads, all taken off three-quarters of an acre. I reclaimed it by rooting out the heath and stones, and bringing manure from far away. My rent was increased from 14s. to £1 18s. I agreed to pay it, because I was in dread he would turn me out of it—that is the reason. I have not paid it out of my own money, but have to borrow it and pay interest on it."

Mr. Daniel Joseph Reardon, of Raffan, County Cork, examined by Mr. Butt, Q.C.—

"As to the general character of the land, say what it appeared to you to be?—A pure mountain, almost worthless in my estimation for any agricultural purposes, without expending an immense lot of money on it. Did you observe the character of the houses of the people?—I did; they were the most miserable holdings I ever saw. They were hardly fit to call them even hovels itself. I saw some built of mud, but whether built of mud or stone they were of the same bad character."

Mr. Matthew O'Flaherty, Donaman Castle, County Limerick, swore—

"I protest to God, I would not give 20 acres of my own land for the whole of Barnahoun."

Mr. O'Flaherty was examined as to the farm of Laurence Carroll—

"Now, as to Laurence Carroll?—I went into that house. He has five children. Himself and his son work for Mr. Bridge, and there was not a worse house in Skeheenarinka than that. Was that house fit for human habitation?—No. Was it fit for the habitation of a beast?—It was not. You would not put a beast in it. A cow would be just as well off outside."

In fact, he said, the bailiff was the only well-fed man on the estate that he saw. Mr. James Byrne, J.P., County Cork, President of the Mallan Farmers' Club, said—

"I went inside the house of a man named David Hennessy, whose old rent was £2 10s., and the new one £4 5s. I saw his little dairy was in his wretched bedroom. What kind was the house altogether?—A tumble-down looking affair. In the house of John Carey, at Lyrafinne, we found a great many children. We were afraid to enter it lest it would tumble down on us, there were so many props under it, the wall hanging out, ready to burst out. The Lord Chief Justice: But it did not?—Witness: We did not delay there very long to give it time. (Laughter)."

That witticism of the Lord Chief Justice created great laughter in Court. He (Mr. Gray) did not see cause for the laughter, nor did he think the House would, when he read them the description published by the correspondent he had mentioned of the present condition of that holding. Here it was, written a few days after the great joke of the Lord Chief Justice—

"A little way off, within a sort of shelter-trench from the storm, formed of huge stone ramparts, built out of the plenteous rockeries on the farm, stood the cabin of John Carey, of Lyrefunn—stood, for it has already half tumbled about the ears of its inmates. Misery seems here to have reached its acme. The walls that remain have bulged threateningly out. Half the roof blew down one night in the storm, the day after Lord Chief Justice May had intimated that there did not seem to be much danger of it. Six children and the mother were cooped up in bed when they heard the rafters crack, and fled for their lives. In the dismantled part of the cabin the sorry little dresser and broken chair which formed the principal furniture of the demolished chamber stand still under the open heaven rotting in the rain. . . . He went to Mr. Bridge on his return, and begged for five couples to restore the roof. The answer was that Mr. Bridge was not planting, not cutting timber, and that if he got it he should pay for it. Said Carey, 'I have eight in family, no money, and no crops, trying to feed the children.' The argument did not prevail. . . . His rent for some twelve Irish acres was raised from £1 5s. 4d. to £2 2s. 'I agreed to pay it like the rest, of course, fearing to be thrown out. I will owe two years' rent in March next, and nothing to pay it.'"

Mr. Byrne was asked—

"Did you examine the holding of a man called Timothy Cullenan?—I did; his old rent was £5 13s., his new rent £7. On that land I saw the most extraordinary specimen of reclamation I ever saw in my whole life, and the most expensive. A portion of a small field was literally covered with stones 1½ feet in depth. He had been six weeks in grubbing that field, himself and two labourers, and I could only see a rood reclaimed."

He said you could take several hundred tons off each acre of Patrick Creagh's holding, and added—

"I never saw such distress, and poverty, and squalor, in all my life as I saw on the estate. Generally, now, on that townland did you make any remark about the general appearance of the people living on it?—They seemed to be a very broken-hearted people. I heard nothing there but wails and lamentations."

Hon. Members might wonder how it was possible for these wretched tenants to pay any rent at all. In truth, many of them could never pay rent if they were wholly dependent on their farms; but the evidence showed by what means they eked out the rent which was now doubled and trebled upon them. John Duggan was examined, and stated—

"That his old rent was £2 11s. 8d., and the new rent was £6 1s. 6d. Could not pay the old rent, only for a brother of his that was in a foreign country. Only for that they would not be there to-day. Always had to earn his hire outside the farm until within the last two years, when the brother helped him. Was 7½ years in service on a neighbouring farm, and gave the wages to his father and mother. Drew timber from Galtee Castle to Fermoy at 6s. a-ton. Indian meal stirabout and potatoes were the ordinary food of his family."

James Hennessy, examined by Mr. O'Brien, said—

"I live at Ballyladers, and I farm about 60 plantation acres. I am a guardian of the Mitchelstown union. On June, 1876, I went through some of the lands. The general condition of the tenantry appeared wretched, and the lands were bad. In the previous April I took a daughter in service from Denis Murphy. His condition was miserable, and so was hers too. She had not sufficient clothing to go anywhere. I had to advance him £1 in Mitchelstown soon after to buy meal."

He (Mr. Gray) would not weary the House by further evidence as to the condition of these tenants, although he could produce it in abundance. What course did Mr. Buckley, or Mr. Bridge on his behalf, take? They found a valuator, a Mr. Walker, to value the lands—a gentleman totally unacquainted with the property, and who went there in the height of summer, when everything looked its best. He inspected the lands in the months of July, August, and September. Mr. Bridge himself admitted that it would have been madness to have brought Mr. Walker there in winter, as the lands would then have been little better than a bog. Mr. Walker was not instructed to take into consideration the improvements effected by the tenants and their forefathers. Mr. Bridge said he was instructed to value on the "live and let live" principle, and not to take into consideration modern improvements. Mr. Walker said he was not to estimate the improvements made within the previous five years; but it was acknowledged that all the improvements of over five years' standing were valued, and he (Mr. Gray) held that it was demonstrated at the trial that the holdings were valued just as they stood. Mr. Bridge had had experience before of "settling" estates. He swore that he had been employed by Sadleir years ago to settle the Goold estates, and was examined as to how he did it—

"What did you do to put the Goold estate in order?—In the first place, sending the sheriff home about his business; and, in the second place, giving the tenants time to pay whatever arrears were due; and I treated them kindly, as I always do."

That was how he settled the Goold estates, according to his own testimony; but it was not the way he "settled" the Galtee estate. He (Mr. Gray) would not trouble the House with the long list of 68 re-valuations he held in his hand, but would read a few specimens of the re-valuation on the "live and let live" principle:—Patrick Macnamara—old rent, £3 6s. 0d.; new rent, £17 10s. 2d.; John M'Namara—old rent, £5 18s. 0d.; new rent, £13 12s. 0d.; James M'Guire—old rent, £3 6s. 8d.; new rent, £10 5s. 0d.; James M'Grath—old rent, £0 5s. 0d.; new rent, £3 0s. 0d.; Connor Lyons—old rent, 2s. 6d.; new rent, £1 0s. 0d. On one townland the increase was over 100 per cent, and the hardest and most pitiable portion of this most pitiable case was, that upon the poorest and most helpless class of tenants the increase was chiefly cast. Twenty-one tenants, whose old rent in the aggregate was £22 9s. 10d., were made to pay £62 16s. 6d., or an increase of 300 per cent. Taking all the tenancies set out in the alleged libels—68 or 69—the former rent of the whole was £341; the new rent, £742. The lands of Carregeen were £95—they were increased to £205. Some tenancies were increased 500 per cent, and one 1,200 per cent at a single valuation. That was done on what Mr. Bridge and Mr. Buckley called the "live and let live principle." Shortly afterwards, Mr. Bridge issued to the tenants a circular, informing them that the increase was to date from the 25th March following. Now, that was an illegal proceeding, the earliest date at which the increase could legally be made being the month of November following. The following was a specimen of that illegal notice:—

"James Maguire, I beg to inform you that the rent of your farm on Carrigeen, now £3 8s., will be £10 5s. a-year from the 25th March next, of which you will be allowed half the county cess when paying the rent."

And it was followed by this—

"Estate of Nathaniel Buckley.—The tenants are hereby noticed that it will be necessary for them to signify to the agent, during the month of November, whether they will submit to Mr. Walker's valuation, and enter into new arrangements with their landlord, &c."

Mr. Bridge was asked—

"How many of those notices did you issue?—I suppose I posted a dozen or half-a-hundred of them. Will you swear that you did not send more of them?—Begad, it might be 200 for all I know."

He (Mr. Gray) thought Mr. Bridge neither knew nor cared how many of them he issued. He would ask the House to listen to what Judge Barry, one of the most eminent Judges on the Bench, said with reference to these notices—

"But what was the course adopted upon this estate in the Galtees? The purchase is made in 1873; a stranger unknown to the tenants, of whose integrity or skill they know nothing, is brought down in July; he completes his valuation in November; and in January, 1874, printed notices are sent to the tenants, informing them that their rent is to be so-and-so—specifying the amount fixed by Mr. Walker—from the 25th March then next. I have professionally and judicially come in contact with many cases of controversy between landlord and tenant; I have seen and heard the usual charges and counter-charges of harshness on the one hand and dishonesty and unreasonableness on the other, sometimes proved and sometimes disproved; but such a demand by agent or landlord as that made by these notices under such circumstances never fell within my observation. The demand was wholly unenforceable in law, and, so far as I can see on the facts before us, indefensible as a matter of dealing between man and man. In point of law, the landlord could no more enforce the advanced rent from the 25th March than he could enforce its payment retrospectively for the antecedent 10 years, the tenants were entitled by law to hold at the old rent until the end of the year, and the service of these notices must therefore be regarded as an attempt, and so far as I can see, an unjustifiable attempt, to exact, through the terror of apprehended eviction, that increase on the coming half-year which he could not obtain by any legal process. It does not appear whether many of the tenants yielded to this demand; but in October another notice is posted. I shall not comment upon the pregnant significance of the word 'submit' in this document; but every tenant who did not submit was, so far as I can gather, served with notice to quit. It appears that about 100 notices to quit were served."

Well, what could these poor ignorant tenants do but submit? Most of them did submit. They were powerless, in fact. It might be argued that the fact of their submitting to the increase showed that they were content; the fact was far otherwise. What was the result of the submission of the tenants to the great increase of the rents? They had to pawn even portions of their clothes in order to meet the demands made upon them, and they subsisted on the commonest food—yellow meal porridge, and even turnips. Even at the risk of wearying the House, he must ask them to listen to the testimony as to the condition of the tenantry since they submitted. He knew it would be stated that all the tenants had now submitted, and that the whole matter was settled, and that inquiry would only disturb the happy relations now subsisting between a beneficent landlord and a happy and contented tenantry. But he (Mr. Gray) contended that the tenants submitted under compulsion, and that the law should protect them, as it protected other helpless persons driven to make unreasonable concessions under compulsion. Listen to the evidence of Dennis Murphy—

"What rent is he asking from you?—£6 15s., double £3 7s. 6d. . . . When this rent was doubled upon me I knew the result, and I pawned my body coat, a frieze coat, my Lord, in order to be up to the rent, and there it went from that day until this from me, in the year 1874, and I never saw it since. (Laughter.) You have never been able since to get your coat out of pawn?—No, sir; because when the terms fixed by the pawn-office was passed it was sold. Was it to pay the increased rent that you pawned your coat?—It was just as I told you; I am on my oath. Since you agreed to pay that increased rent have you yourself had sufficient food?—Upon my oath, I had nothing but Indian meal stirabout, and I would be very glad to subsist upon Swedish turnips, but it was never decreed by Almighty God a human creature should subsist on it. After eating a bellyful of it I would not be able to go 10 perches through weakness. Were you going to America yourself at the time?—No, nor I won't to-day. I would sooner die where I am to-day. If I had the courage of a man, it would be better for me; but now, when I am worn down, let me sink or swim; I have no chance now, while God leaves me the life."

Darby Naish, of Skeheenarinka, said—

"I am 70 years of age. The old rent was 10s. When the Walker (laughter) went out and he saw a little field, I whispered him to lower my rent. 'Oh,' said he, 'that's out of the question, but it will only be a few shillings;' that is what the Walker said. (Laughter.) I got my memorandum then, £1 15s., at which I trembled. (Laughter.) My father made the field out of the mountains, and the Kingstons never asked a half-penny during generations. My father broke his heart reclaiming it, nothing but wild rocky stones. Sure I should agree with the £1 15s. sooner than throw me out or put me into the poor-house. I have three boys, and my wife, and myself. Besides working at the land, I am a poor carpenter, making chairs and stools. My father built the house. Yellow meal and stirabout is my ordinary food. I don't know how much I owe. My wife died in the workhouse a year after I had been there. I live at Coolaganaure. £2 6s. a-year was the old rent; £4 6s. is the new rent. O'Loughlen, the bailiff, came to me at different times, and I went to Mr. Bridge by his orders. I offered him the land for something that would enable me to keep up my family for a little while after I came out of hospital, and he offered me nothing. I paid the new rent, for I had nowhere to go unless back to the workhouse. I had to borrow the money from the neighbours and to sell the only little cow I had for less than £10 to pay it."

Mr. Gray

The rent of James Lynch was raised from £1 17s. 6d. to £3 7s., and he was asked—

"Is it a fact that Mr. Bridge decreed you for the costs of the lease and amount?—He did, sir. (Laughter.)"

He (Mr. Gray) saw no cause for laughter here, but the fact showed the condition of the tenantry. There was the testimony of the correspondent he had mentioned as to another of these tenants—

"At the other side of the borheen lives one of the 'settled' tenants, the most wretched I had met yet. This is the woman, Johanna Fitzgerald, whose husband has gone to England as a labourer to earn bread for her four children. Mrs. Fitzgerald had not been seen at the chapel that morning, but her bare feet and coarse petticoat made a pretty eloquent apology. The children, who played about the door, had clean faces and clean rags, and the earthen floor was newly swept. A mess of Indian meal was in the pot for dinner. The family, of course, slept in one room; and a man and wife, who are lodged in consideration of help on the farm, stretched by night on the floor inside the doorway. Except a few blue plates, the dresser was only stocked with marmalade pots, whose contents were never emptied on the Galtee. Mrs. Fitzgerald said she had not heard from her husband these five weeks, and a shilling was all the money she had in the world. Her rent was raised from £2 10s. 4d. to £4 4s. Her stock of potatoes was out this month past, 'except a handful of seed,' and from this to August yellow stirabout must be bought on credit. Her other tillage was half-an-acre of oats, which cost her £1 for seed, 7s. for labour, and 10s. for a cwt. of superphosphate—which she had not paid for yet. The whole crop was sold to James Fitzgerald, a neighbour, for £2, straw and all. Two geese and some hens made the total of her live stock. It was pitiful to see the open-mouthed surprise with which a woman, supposed to be the mistress of some 20 acres, gloated over the couple of pieces of small silver given to the children, the eagerness with which she pounced upon them, and the extravagant thanks with which she repaid them."

And, with a quaint pathos which he thought might touch the heart of any man, her neighbour, Darby Mahoney, added—

"Sure, we would not mind if they let us alone; but we have no sort of spirit to root a stone or put on a bit of thatch owing to this man always promising to turn us out."

This was the condition of the Widow Roche, another "settled" tenant—

"The family sleep in two straw beds in a suffocating little apartment, some 7 feet by 10, and the rain pours through the thatch within a few inches of the head of the bed in which a withered little old man, Mrs. Roche's father-in-law, lay for three months this year with swellings and pains in the bones. How a sanitary officer could permit a man ill of rheumatism to linger in such a den I cannot imagine. Yet Mrs. Roche states that her husband lay sick here for a year and a-half, and died of dropsy and rheumatic pains. Dr. Fenton, indeed, who visited him on a dispensary red ticket, advised him not to stay in a wet house but to go to the workhouse, where he would have nourishment. He did for a time go into Clogheen workhouse hospital, where he was told that if he had come six months earlier he would have been cured. He returned, however, to the cabin to die. So said Mrs. Roche, and she informed me that her rent had been raised from 18s. to £2 4s., and that her husband had accepted the terms from the commencement. 'Sure only the mercy of God I don't know where 'tis to come from.'"

"We never will be able to pay it nor to pay what's due," said Mrs. Murphy. "We had 6lb. of pork yesterday for our Christmas dinner among 12. 'Twas the poorest Christmas day we ever had, striving to pay everybody his dues, and sure it's equal if we're there at all next Christmas."

"We would not keep it at all," said Mrs. Shaughnessy, "only about two years ago a boy of ours went out to New Zealand on the cheap emigration, with only 21s. in his pocket when he landed, and he was not landed two months when he sent us home £9, and he always told us never to give up the old place while there was a roof over it."

This was what Phelan, another "settled" tenant, said—

"We must sell the little cow for meal, and after eating her out we must sell the other one. After that we have only to trust to Providence. Sure only for the confidence the people have in our honesty they would not trust us with a cow nor a sheep."

"And, having seen the little cows," adds the correspondent, "which were more warmly housed in the outhouse than their Christian masters next door, I am disposed to think they will not long stave off the trust in Providence.

"Upon another night," says the correspondent, "I had an opportunity of seeing several other tenants whose holdings are seated amidst the stony heaths behind Phelan's. One of the houses struck me particularly by its neatness. It was that of Timothy Drislane; it was newly whitewashed for the holidays, scrupulously clean within, furnished with several handy, though cheap, little appliances that I had seen nowhere else, the children fairly dressed for peasant children, and the woman of the house clad with something like comfort. Drislane's rent was raised from £2 to £3 7s. 6d., and he accepted the increase from the beginning. Here, surely, was a case where the increase had brought no misery! But the explanation soon came. 'Ever since he paid it,' said this exceedingly quiet and respectable housewife, 'we have been falling deeper and deeper into debt every year. His means would not pay quarter of his debts this moment. We would not be able to live at all upon this unfortunate place only he goes out and earns himself here and there as a handyman, as you may see by his little jobs about the house.' And another tenant related how Phelan and himself would start at 1 o'clock in the night for Clogheen and sleep in a hayrick, to get a day's employment at harvest work, and would tramp it home the same night with a half-crown each in their pockets."

"We halted," says the correspondent, "at the farmhouse of James Lynch—dingy and scantily thatched as usual—and held conference with his busy and active-minded wife. There was evergreen stuck over the dresser—the only Christmas emblem I have yet met upon the estate. A penny print of Father Tom Burke had an honoured place on the wall; the rain came down quite near his reverence's head. Now, Lynch's rent was raised from £1 18s. 6d. to £3 7s. 3d., and he has taken a 31 years' lease at the increased rent. 'What in the world ever possessed him to do such a thing?' cried his wife, who was very poorly dressed. 'And there he is now,' she added bitterly, 'with his 31 years' lease, and he owes him a year's rent already with the hanging gale—that will be two years' rent in March. We were finding ourselves getting into debt with the old rent, and only God is good I don't know in the world how we are going to manage. You know, yourself, doctor, turning to my very reverend companion, 'I had often to put the children in off the road for fear they would be seen.'"

Patrick Creagh is another of those who took a 31 years' lease—

"What was a man to do when every person was settling, and no way out of it but the poor-house?'—his rent having been raised from £2 19s. to £3 7s. 6d. He paid two guineas for the expense of the lease, and has three acres and a-half arable acres, which himself and his father have broken with crowbars, drained, manured, and fenced. The result is that he is already a year's rent in arrear, beside the hanging gale. £35 would not pay his debts, and 'if he was thinking till the day of his death' he could not tell where the money was to come from. Richard Condon had the same dismal tale. It was he who swore in the Court of Queen's Bench that in the famine times he sold to the Board of Works 500 loads of stones, taken off three-quarters of an acre of his reclamation."

He would not test the patience of the House further than by reading the following from a letter from the respected parish priest of the district, the Very Rev. Dr. Delaney, D.D., which he (Mr. Gray) had received the previous day:—

"The tenants are here with me every day asking for food. I am here only three years, and during that time I have had such tales of misery and suffering, and seen such poverty as I thought existed only in the famine years. They were poor when your correspondent was here; they are poorer now. They were in debt then; they are hopelessly in debt now. It is true they have settled. They had no alternative but the workhouse; but those who have settled this year are convinced they never can pay the rent they have promised. Many of those who have accepted are already two years in arrear. Their troubles are only commencing. They will be evicted for non-payment of the rents which they cannot pay."

These were the people of whom Mr. Bridge's counsel said—

"They were, he believed, as well off as their neighbours, and as for eating beef or mutton they would not like it, and he did not believe they would eat it if they had it to eat; they preferred the food of their fathers."

But how if they had no food at all? Let the House contrast these facts with the following description given by the correspondent to whom he had alluded, for whose accuracy he repeated he could vouch, and whose statements had not been questioned of a neighbouring estate. It was attempted to be set up at the trial that this was a case of a Catholic tenantry at enmity with a Protestant landlord; but how far this was from the fact, let the following prove:—

"Mr. Buckley's property is confined to Barnahown East. Barnahown West, which is a continuation of the same mountainous ridge, naturally of the same obstinate barrenness, but nursed into a higher state of cultivation, forms part of the estate of the Rev. M. A. Collis, D.D., Queenstown—a vigorous hater of Papacy, I am told, but none the less passionately praised as a landlord by his Papist tenantry. I had a curiosity to know whether they managed these things better in Barnahown West, and took good care that in learning I should not be at the mercy of any over-officious underling itching for favour with his lord. I had an opportunity of questioning three of the most independent tenants on the Collis property, and their statements tally too exactly to leave any shadow of suspicion of their truth. Here, then, is the substance of the statement of James Fitzgibbon—a man of very solid intelligence, who wore the nearest approach to a silk hat and a broadcloth cape which I have seen in these latitudes:—'If we till an acre of barren mountain,' he said, 'the Rev. Dr. Collis will either give the lime or whatever it may cost to the amount of 50 or 60 barrels per statute acre, and if the land is in want of drainage, he will make full compensation to the tenant for the cost of that also. The tenant has only to give in the tickets for the lime or the cost of the drainage or of fencing, and it will be allowed out of his half year's rent. Whenever timber is wanting to repair a house Dr. Collis gives it for nothing, and if ever a tenant is short in the rent through bad times I never know it to make a difference. The estate has never been re-valued for the last 17 years, since it passed into Dr. Collis's hands in the Landed Estates Court, and kinder or better landlord there never was.' The praises of the Rev. Dr. Collis and of his agent, Mr. Thomas Perrott, of Uplanda, Fermoy, were chorussed even more warmly by my two other informants, Patrick Driane and Jeremiah Kenealy. When the tenants on Barnahown West were, by accident or design, amerced with the police tax which fell upon the rest of the townland after the first attempt on Mr. Bridge's life, Dr. Collis exerted himself warmly and with success to secure the exemption of his tenantry. It is almost superfluous to add that he is repaid with gratitude and reverence by a punctual and improving tenantry."

All honour was due to the Rev. Dr. Collis. If they had many landlords like him, they would have less of the Irish Land Question. He (Mr. Gray) had now placed the House in possession of the facts of this case. He had not given his own description of them, but had quoted evidence which was open to all. Such being the state of the tenants on the Galtee estate, the question was, whether he was right in bringing their case before Parliament? It might be said, in defence of Mr. Buckley, that it was a gross exaggeration to say that the rents had been raised 200, 500, 700, or 1,200 per cent, and that the average increase was not more than 20 or 25 per cent, which was moderate, seeing that there had been no re-valuation for many years; but this was a mere evasion. The complaint was not of the average increase, or of increases on the low-lying farms, which might bear a fair increase, but of those enormous increases on the mountain farms, which were simply ruinous. He hoped any hon. Member who wished to follow him would deal with the cases of those mountain tenants, and not go into mere generalities or averages, which were only misleading. The tenants themselves acknowledged that on some of the farms in the plains an increase might fairly be made. He (Mr. Gray) did not say that some increase on certain portions of the estate was not justifiable. The whole of his remarks were applicable to the mountain property, which was uninhabitable save from the ceaseless toil of these wretched tenants. And, with regard to Mr. Buckley's conduct, it was intolerable, insufferable, and calculated to bring them to absolute ruin. It might be said that they might go for protection to the Land Act; but the great flaw in that Act was, that it afforded protection to those who least required it, and no adequate protection to those who most required it. The sliding scale of compensation afforded no protection to the tenant who paid a few shillings a-year. The payment of seven years' rent to him, only meant keeping the recipient for a few weeks out of the workhouse. In the same way, the compensation for the reclamation of waste lands was a nullity, because there was a clause in the Act which provided that the time the land was held at a low rent was to be taken into account. But it was stated on the trial of Casey, by experienced farmers, that they would not take these lands at all. It might be asked why these tenants agreed to pay these increased rents, which only beggared and ruined them? But their case at that trial was likened to that of a shipwrecked crew on a rock, to whom a steam-tug came and demanded £2,000 for taking them off. They entered into an agreement to pay the money; but when that bargain was questioned in a Court of Equity, it was held to be an immoral contract which the law would not uphold. In like manner, these contracts by an English millionaire with these starving Irish cottiers was an immoral contract. But the law afforded them no remedy, and they came, therefore, and asked the House for help. He was not there to justify the outrages which had been committed against Mr. Bridge, but he firmly believed that the great body of the tenants had no part or hand in them. He did not ask that their case should be decided on an ex parte statement, but only that an inquiry should be made; and he was confident that if the facts were as he had stated, Englishmen, who extended their aid and sympathy to suffering Turks and Bulgarians, would not withhold it from their fellow-subjects in Ireland. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the statements as to the treatment and condition of the tenants on the estate known as the 'Galtee Estate,' in the counties of Cork and Tipperary, which were made in the evidence given during the second trial of John Sarsfield Casey in the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin,"—(Mr. Gray,)

—instead thereof.

MR. A. MOORE said, he wished to be allowed to make some observations on the case. He lived within some eight or ten miles of the scene of these troubles, had walked portions of the land, and had judged of the matter for himself. He did not rise to defend or palliate the awful crime of murder. He believed the men who fired at Mr. Bridge, and still more those who fired into a whole carful of people, killing the poor driver and wounding a policeman, were capable of any enormity. Still, the outrage could not justify Mr. Buckley's conduct; and the fact remained, that this district, which was peaceful and orderly before the time of Mr. Buckley's purchase, was now entirely demoralized from end to end. The landlord could not visit his property unless escorted by an armed force. The agent had a barrack at his door, and the police patrolled the country day and night—and this was the case amongst a people whose good conduct and peaceful disposition were recognized on all hands. He was of opinion that the lot of any ordinary labourer in the more favoured low lands was preferable to that of some of the small farmers, for their poverty could not be exceeded, whilst their industry was amazing. He entered one house a few weeks previously. He was told the mother had been reduced to a state of utter prostration by feeding on turnips. The children wore clothes sent them from Cork by a charitable lady. The land was five acres in extent, and they told him the rent had been raised from 18s. to £3 2s. 6d. In another house he found people living on Indian meal, and the bed—such a bed he never saw—some hay, with some tattered strips of what once had been bed-clothes. The rent, he said, had been raised from £2 to £3 5s. He would not weary the House with further details, of which he had plenty at his disposal; and he would only say what he had said before, in and out of the House, that he believed this man to be an oppressor; that it was the duty of the House to stay his hand, or at least inquire into his actions. He believed it was not the agent, but the landlord, that should be held responsible. Some change was necessary in the Land Laws. He would wish to see arbitrary and capricious evictions restrained by law; and he hoped to see undue additions of rent made impossible by arbitrations, and the consequent abolition of notices to quit as an engine merely for raising rent. He thought some means ought to be established of arranging rent without necessarily determining the tenancy; and, finally, he should wish to see sufficient protection for the improvements of the tenant. English landlords were too apt to forget that in Ireland, as a rule, all building, fencing, and other improvements, were effected by the tenant at his own expense. This was the crucial point of difference between the land system of the two countries. These were some of the changes he wished to see, and some change, he was convinced, was necessary. He believed, moreover, that the longer the change was delayed the worse it would be for the landlords. Men like Buckley brought odium on an entire class, and prevented good landlords from getting a legitimate rise of rent. But there was another result which followed from oppression; it demoralized the people. First, they sympathized with crime; then, perhaps, they aided in shielding its perpetrators; and, finally, if not criminals themselves, they looked upon crime at least with indifference. This indifference, painful as it was to contemplate, was widespread, he feared, in the present instance. In conclusion, he hoped that the House would, by a very distinct Vote, mark its disapproval of the conduct of a man who, with an ample income from other sources, was attempting to grind an honest, industrious, and hardy race, trafficking in their honest sweat—he might almost say their heart's blood—and that he would be told that he might not trample on his Irish tenants any more than on Lancashire operatives.

MR. BARING said, as far as any Englishman could understand an Irish question, he believed that he understood this; and, long before any speeches had been made in the House on the subject, he had felt that a case was in existence demanding such an examination as no body but a Committee of the House could give it. Therefore, he would only say, that if the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) pressed his Motion to a division, he should certainly vote with him. But he thought it would be very wise of the Government not to oppose the appointment of this Committee. If they had read, as he had for some years past, the evidence produced in courts, in newspapers, and in pamphlets without contradiction, as to what was going on in this particular district, they must feel that this was one of those real Irish grievances which an English Parliament ought not to refuse to inquire into.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, he had no intention or desire to discuss the details of the management of this property which had been brought under the notice of the House, or to consider the relationships of the particular tenants on the property to the landlord; nor was it his intention to discuss whether Mr. Buckley gave too much or too little for the property, or go at all into the question of the purchase money. He should like the House to consider what was exactly the motive and character of the inquiry into which they were gravely asked to enter through the agency of a Committee of the House. The House was asked by it to constitute a court of inquiry and appeal in the case of differences which had arisen between a landlord and his tenants. Let them consider the inconveniences which must ensue if their interposition was invited—as it might be if they acceded to the Motion—in every case where such differences arose. It was perfectly clear that this would tend materially to prolong and render more acrimonious controversies of this kind; nor, for his own part, could he see on what principle that House could base an inquiry into matters of perfectly private dispute, which fell within the executive power of the Courts of Law. That consideration seemed to him conclusive against the Motion, even if this case was a new one, and if it had never been before the Courts of Law. But the truth was, that the dispute between Mr. Buckley and his tenants had taken place some time ago. They had been more than once the subject of proceedings in the Courts of Law, in which all the facts connected with them had been as fully ascertained as they could be by an inquiry before a Committee of that House. There was really little for a Committee to ascertain; nor, even if the disputes in question were still open, did he see what that House could do. If any wrong admitting of redress had been committed, it was to the Courts of Law, not to that House, that an appeal should be made. On principle, therefore, he objected to the Motion before the House. The short facts of this case were these. An English gentleman, named Buckley, whom he had never seen, but who, he believed, had formerly sat on the opposite side of the House, had purchased the Galtee estate, it was said, as a mercantile matter, with the view of making a profit out of it in the ordinary way of business. The property had been in the occupation of the same tenants for a considerable number of years, and the rent had not been raised for some 70 or 80 years. Mr. Buckley had employed a Mr. Bridge as his agent, and it was impossible not to admire the courage and the fortitude of that gentleman in the circumstances in which he had been placed. Mr. Bridge, acting under the instructions of his employer, had raised the rents through the instrumentality of a valuer; and, no doubt, a substantial increase had been made in them. Of the 500 tenants upon the estate, only some 40 or 50 had refused to come to terms with their landlord, and the whole dispute was in train for settlement, when, unfortunately, the tenants were told by those who knew more about their business than they themselves did, that they were being very badly dealt with, and were very hardly used, and the result was that an agitation was got up, and the process of settlement was put a stop to. Upon this followed the two grave attempts to assassinate Mr. Bridge, and the subsequent trial in the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin. Matters were not now in the position in which they were a year and a half-year ago. No doubt, at that time, there was a considerable ill-feeling between Mr. Buckley and a portion of his tenants; but tranquillity now prevailed on the estate and in the neighbourhood, and it would be most inexpedient for the House to re-open the former disputes, and to rip open wounds which were in process of healing. If ever there was a time for inquiry, that time was now passed, seeing that no disputes any longer existed, but the rent had been in all cases settled by agreement between the parties. He had said, and he would adhere to the resolution, that he would not enter into the management of Mr. Buckley's estate, into the merits of the disputes between him and his tenants, or into the grievances which any of them might individually have to complain of. The hon. Member for Tipperary had drawn a graphic picture of the sufferings and hardships; but it was only fair to Mr. Buckley to say that much might be urged on the other side. He had before him a statement, from which it appeared that in many, at any rate, of these cases of alleged hardship the old rent was very low, so low, in fact, that there could hardly be a doubt that it might fairly be raised; and that, after the rent had been thus raised, the tenants were able to sell their tenant-right for larger sums, not to strangers, but to the other tenants on the estate. He would take three such cases. There was, for instance, the case of Richard Walsh, who occupied a farm of 27 acres at the old rent of 25s. a-year, and on whom a rise was put to the extent of £5 2s. Now, that did not strike him as being a very exaggerated rise; but, whether it was or not, Walsh succeeded in selling his farm to another tenant for £130. It was suggested that a man could not live on those farms; but, as a matter of fact, the purchase money for the farm of which he was speaking was supplied by another tenant farmer on the same property, who got it, he supposed, by his labour. Then there was another case of a farm of 82 acres, the whole rent of which—£5 12s. 6d.—had been raised to £6 12s. 8d., and which was sold for £250. The last case which he would mention was that of a man named O'Shaughnessy, the interest in whose farm of 55 acres, subjected to £7 4s. a-year rental, raised to £11 19s., was sold for £160. These facts, he thought, showed that the figures which had been quoted by the hon. Member for Tipperary did not present a true picture of the present condition of the Galtee estate. The tenants who appeared to give evidence before the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin appeared to be thoroughly shrewd and intelligent, and he was told that they were comfortably clad, and that their evidence went strongly to show that the majority of them were not reduced to that state of abject penury which had been suggested; but that they were able, by their own good conduct, to raise a considerable amount of stock, and when their daughters were married, or their sons went out into the world, to give them a little portion to assist them. But he would not enter into further detail on the subject. He ventured to say that no case had been made out for the application of such exceptional machinery as that proposed by the hon. Member for Tipperary to inquire into the estate of a private individual. Nothing could be gained by such an inquiry, and he therefore asked the House to reject the Motion, on the ground that it was inexpedient to interfere in the private disputes between landlords and tenants in Ireland, more especially when those disputes, after being ventilated in the Courts of Law, had now happily ceased to exist, in consequence of their having been terminated by an amicable arrangement between the parties.

MR. SULLIVAN congratulated the House upon the manner in which the subject had been introduced and discussed. The men who attempted to commit such atrocious crimes as that attempted against Mr. Bridge were the deadliest foes to justice, and those miscreants did all that their blind ignorance could do to prejudice a case which he thought must carry conviction to every impartial mind. The trial which had been held in Dublin only furnished a prima facie case for such an inquiry as that which was now asked for. He considered his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary was perfectly justified in bringing this case to the attention of Parliament—the highest tribunal in the country—which could not only inquire into the causes of those atrocious outrages, but could also take measures to prevent their recurrence in the future. The Attorney General for Ireland had said that it would be a strange and inconvenient thing if every Irish gentleman were exposed to a Parliamentary inquiry into the manner in which his estate was managed. But that was an argument which Parliament had repeatedly pushed aside. A notable precedent of the kind was furnished by an inquiry which Parliament, in 1858, granted—an inquiry into the condition of the tenants of Gweedore, in Donegal, and the outrages thence arising—an inquiry which involved, in the most direct manner, an investigation as to the manner in which the estates in that district were managed. It was well known that there were on the estate which formed the groundwork of the Motion tenants whose rents might without injustice be raised; but it was equally clear to anyone acquainted with the facts that there were on the property many tenants who had actually made the land which they cultivated by carrying soil from the low-lying lands to the mountain farms on which they lived. If there were false charges made against the landlord, an inquiry would bring the fact to light. If, on the other hand, the people were ground to the dust by oppression, the House was bound to act as the protector of the people. An impartial inquiry directed by the House of Commons would, he believed, do more to tranquilize the neighbourhood than would the presence of a battalion of soldiers, or any Coercion Act that might be passed. But how could the House expect to obtain the confidence of the Irish people if they declined to listen to grievances such as this, or to protect the people against oppression as bad as any which had been suffered by the Bulgarians?

MR. MACARTNEY admitted that it was impossible to read the evidence which had been produced before the Courts in Dublin without a feeling of pity and sorrow for the tenantry upon the Galtee estates, which had been purchased by a Lancashire gentleman as a purely commercial speculation. For his own part, he believed that a great deal of the agrarian crime which had recently taken place in Ireland was occasioned by the transfer of landed property in Ireland from the old proprietors to purchasers in the Landed Estates Court consequent upon the famine of 1846 and 1847. The old landlords might have been guilty of improvidence and extravagance; but they had never been guilty of harshness to their tenantry. There was no doubt the rise in the rents was sudden and enormous, and the tenantry were taken by surprise, no consideration being shown for the length of time they had occupied their farms; consequently, much discontent had been occasioned. The present Motion pointed, he thought, to a proceeding which would not attain the object the hon. Member for Tipperary had in view; and what he would suggest to the hon. Member was, that he should move that the evidence taken at the trial should be printed and laid upon the Table of the House. He should be sorry to regard the purchaser of the estate in question as a model specimen of an Irish landlord. In the first place, he was not an Irishman; and, in the next, he believed he had not long been a landed proprietor, or acquainted with the management of a landed estate, and perhaps he was surprised at the little return he got from his investment. On the other hand, he could not regard the tenants who were guilty of the outrage to which allusion had been made as being fair specimens of Irish tenants. He hoped the hon. Member for Tipperary would act upon the suggestion he had thrown out.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER wished to know whether the Government intended to object to this inquiry; and, if so, on what grounds? The House had a right to ask what the Government intended to do in regard to the proposal put forward by the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney). No one could deny that great injustice had been done to a portion of the Irish community, and that had resulted in the perpetration of certain outrages against other persons. He did not quite approve of the Motion. Considering the greatness of the case in hand, the Motion was too narrow. He thought his hon. Friend should say—"Here are facts brought to light by protracted inquiry in Dublin, which proved that Irish tenants are not sufficiently protected by law," and urge them to provide a remedy. The Galtee landlord was by no means a specimen of the average landlord in Ireland. If they had had the opportunity of going into the whole question, they might show that in almost every instance—certainly in the Southern and Western Provinces—where oppression had occurred, it was mainly attributable to the ambiguity of the law—the law itself being an agent of oppression. He hoped the Government would answer the question of the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney), and that his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) would defend his Motion against the objections brought against it by the Attorney General for Ireland, or accept—if he were permitted the alternative—the proposal put forward and sustained by the hon. Member for the County Tyrone.

MR. GREGORY said, he was not about to contradict the statements of the hon. Member for Tipperary. He accepted them as true. He had heard them with attention, and they had made a deep impression on his mind; but the question was, what was the object of the inquiry? It appeared that the tenantry were struggling with adversity at the time Mr. Buckley took possession. The land was in a miserable condition, and the crops that were raised would not pay the cost of cultivation. It certainly appeared to be a harsh proceeding on the part of Mr. Buckley to raise the rents so suddenly as he had done; but, while he (Mr. Gregory) admitted the industry and energy of the tenantry, and sympathized with their misfortunes, he thought it would have been better for them if they had given up their tenements and become day-labourers, rather than hold on to those patches of soil which would never remunerate the labour expended upon them. No doubt the expenditure of capital might have improved their dwellings and drained their land; but they could not expect money to be laid out without the prospect of a remunerative return, and in this case there was no prospect of such return. Mr. Buckley was wrong in attempting to extort increased rents; and, before requiring them to be paid, ought to have incurred some outlay. But, admitting this, what was to be the object of inquiry, unless some alteration of the law was to follow upon the Report of the Committee? The law ought not to be altered because of what had happened in an individual and exceptional case, and he doubted whether by change in the law they could prevent cases of hardship and oppression. Such alteration would involve an extension of the Land Act, and it would become a question where they were to stop. Where oppression was determined upon it could be carried out under any law, and certainly Parliament ought not to legislate upon individual cases. The Motion would have had all the success which the Mover of it would have anticipated in securing the condemnation of Mr. Buckley, for not a word had been said in his defence. He appeared to have been an exceptional landlord, and what had been said of him in that House could not but have its influence in deterring others from acting in a similar manner. The discussion would have effected all that could be desired.

MR. O'CLERY claimed for these poor tenants that protection, without which, such was their position, as shown by the hon. Member for Tipperary, in a short time they must be utterly ruined. It had been often said that in Ireland "Land is life;" and, undoubtedly, this was so in the case of these poor tenants on this mountain side. What alternative had they? The workhouse only; and, as had been heard, in many of these miserable homes sickness had entered; and, eviction hanging over their heads, before applications for admission to the workhouse were entertained, death would step in. It had been suggested that the subject might be brought before Parliament in the form of a Return; but it was well known that the fate of Returns and Blue Books was to be, after a delay of months, circulation silently among hon. Members, and then forgotten. What effect had the scores of Blue Books on the lives of the people in 1847-8?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, it was quite certain the inquiry would not be granted. ["No, no!"] He heartily hoped it might. But, if not, the result would be a declaration to the Irish people that, under no circumstances, would the House of Commons institute an inquiry into the treatment of tenants on any particular estate in Ireland. He confessed he could not see, if an inquiry of the kind could ever be granted, how, in this instance, it could be refused. The Attorney General for Ireland, in his amiable speech, which passed dexterously over the doubtful points, praised the tenants for the frugality which enabled them to portion their daughters out of their scanty savings. But how were those savings effected? Simply, that during their life-time, and the lives of their fathers, they had never known the ordinary comforts and decencies of civilized life. There were thousands of poor people in Ireland who did not taste butcher's meat more than two or three times in a year, but who lived in a chronic state of starvation. A landlord had no right to raise rents so as to get an exorbitant interest for his money; and Mr. Buckley, by his conduct as a landowner, had reduced his tenantry to the condition of the fellaheen of Egypt—the most miserable peasantry in the world—who toiled for earnings which were instantly swallowed up in the payment of taxes. Such wrongs ought not to pass without notice in the House of Commons, especially when they were endured by the Christian population of our own country. It was unfortunate that the Government, in the interests of order and truth, would not grant an inquiry. In his opinion, an inquiry ought to be held for the information of the whole country, not only into the circumstances of the case before the House, but also into the case of Lord Leitrim's tenantry, lest the people, having all faith in the justice of their rulers, should allow the fever of Communism to infect this country as it had infected Germany. These were disagreeable truths; but these cases had no parallel in England, where the poorest labourer was better off than his fellow in Ireland. The possession of land was a luxury, and carried with it many responsibilities; and, while eviction and the increase of rents were lightly talked of, cases of hardship and misery occurred to which other countries were absolute strangers. He hoped that even at the last moment the Government would withdraw their opposition, and allow a Committee of Inquiry to be appointed.

MR. MUNDELLA trusted that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would consent to some inquiry into that matter, even if the inquiry did not take the precise form in which it had been moved for. It had been admitted that the tenants on the Galtee estate had suffered great hardship, and if that case really illustrated, as was alleged, any defects in the Irish Land Act, surely they ought to know what the facts of the case really were? The appointment of a Parliamentary Commission to investigate the infraction of the Truck Acts had done a great deal of good; and if a similar inquiry were now instituted into these transactions, he believed it would tend to encourage the people of Ireland to confide in the justice of Parliament. He thought it would be well if the people of Ireland could understand that it was better to appeal to Parliament than to shoot at a landlord from behind a hedge.

MR. HERBERT said, he regretted this discussion, as he was going that evening to bring in a Bill which would materially affect the question before the House. They had heard that these unfortunate tenants had been ground down by a gentleman who had bought property in Ireland. His own opinion was that there ought to be some kind of arbitration adopted before a man could settle or raise the rents of his tenants in the way which had been described. No tenant in Ireland objected to pay a fair rent. There were, however, men who went to Ireland to buy estates, with the view of making some 10 per cent of their money. This was a case which ought to be investigated by a Committee of the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had hoped that it would not have been necessary for him to have addressed the House on this subject, especially after the very convincing observations of the Attorney General for Ireland; but he thought it right to make one or two remarks in reply to statements which had been made by hon. Members opposite. The Motion certainly asked for an inquiry of a very novel character, it being one not into the general administration of the law, but into the affairs of one particular estate named by the hon. Member. A very gloomy picture had been drawn of the condition of the tenantry on that estate; but that picture, however accurate it might be, was not sufficient ground for appointing a Parliamentary Committee. The name of the gentleman, the owner of that estate, had been very freely mentioned in the course of this debate; and he confessed he felt in a somewhat peculiar position in being called upon, as the Representative of a Conservative Government, to defend a gentleman who never, on any single occasion, had voted in the same Lobby with him. He, however, merely asked for justice towards a gentleman with whom he had neither personal nor political relations; but he confessed that the state of the benches opposite—upon which the hon. Gentleman in question used to sit—as they appeared at the present moment, was a matter which caused him some surprise. The hon. Member for Tipperary had spoken of the condition of the tenantry, but all he could say was that, from the description he had given of them, he did not think that they would be desirable tenants, as they were evidently without the means to cultivate the land so as to make it produce the greatest amount of food. Turning, however, to the present Motion, he must remind the House that Mr. Buckley had had the advantage of the services of Mr. Bridge, whose ability, courage, and integrity, no one could doubt, and no just fault could be found with his management of the estate. In justice to Mr. Buckley, it should be remembered that he was a gentleman who had had no experience in the management of land; and even if all that had been said could be fully established, they ought to judge leniently of one who was suddenly placed in a position for which he had had no previous training. He hoped that the advocates of what was called Free Trade in land, and who urged the granting of facilities for the indiscriminate transfer of land from one person to another, would make a note of this case which showed that considerable prejudices existed against persons who were pitchforked into a position for which they were usually not particularly well qualified, and in which they laboured under serious disadvantages as compared with those who had been practically associated with the management of landed property throughout life. There was no analogy whatever between the general inquiry undertaken by the Truck Commission to which the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had referred, and that now proposed with reference to one estate. He should like to ask the House where all this was to end? If they began inquiring into the management of one estate, why should not they also inquire into the management of the others? Allusion had been made to the case of a Peer, whose decease was matter of recent general lamentation. Should there be inquiry there?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had been speaking of an estate which had been the scene of a great crime.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, then if every estate that had been talked about were to be the subject of an inquiry by that House, every workshop and mine would be equally a fair subject for Parliamentary inquiry; and under such a system his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works would have to make fresh arrangements for Committee rooms, and they would probably have to increase the number of Members of the House. He really would ask the House to pause before it plunged into inquiries like this now proposed, which would lead them into depths of which they could not estimate the extent. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had put one point very concisely. Into what were they to inquire? Into matters now pending, into a controversy at present unsettled; or were they to re-open old disputes, and bring back discord where it was universally admitted that there now was peace? Hon. Members might find fault with the status quo, and think that matters were not as they would like them to be; but it could not be denied that a settlement had been arrived at on the Galtee estate, and that the tenants had acquiesced in the arrangement made. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) suggested that the facts should be laid before the House in a tangible form by laying certain documents already in existence on the Table, as Parliamentary Papers. He would be very glad to communicate with the hon. Member as to the nature of such Papers, and to place all the facts in that way fully before hon. Members, if it was found practicable to do so. He trusted the House would not consent to this Motion.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he had heard with some regret the tone which the right hon. Gentleman had taken in regard to this matter. He thought, of all persons, Mr. Buckley was the one most entitled to complain of it. Either he had used his position to oppress his tenants, as had been asserted in that House, and still more broadly asserted in the public Press, or he was a much maligned man. If he were in the place of his friend, Mr. Buckley, he should above all thing courts an inquiry into his conduct, in the full confidence that if the result would show that he had been unjustly accused of facts of which he was incapable. He was very well acquainted with Mr. Buckley; and when his right hon. Friend spoke about a defence of Mr. Buckley coming strangely from the Government Benches, because Mr. Buckley, when in that House, had sat upon the Opposition side, he would tell him that in such a case as this he could recognize no Party whatever; and that, on whichever side of the House he sat when a man's conduct was impugned, all he had to look at was whether the accusation was founded upon sufficiently broad and just grounds to justify an inquiry. He had seen and spoken to Mr. Buckley more than once on this matter. He had seen a list of those tenants who had had their rents raised, and he had found that not only had persons come forward to take the land at advanced rents, but they had been willing to pay a considerable sum to the out-going tenants for the good-will. That led him to suppose that if the inquiry were granted, Mr. Buckley and his agents would be able to show that they had been, if not fully, at any rate to a certain extent, justified in the course they had taken. In any event, if there were such facts, they ought to be known before Mr. Buckley was condemned in the manner in which he had been condemned. What would be the result of refusing the inquiry? Two hon. Gentlemen had spoken from the other side, and had announced their intention of voting against this inquiry; but neither of them said a word for Mr. Buckley. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) said, no consideration whatever had been shown to these tenants, and the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) said that the result of the debate had been entirely to condemn the conduct of Mr. Buckley. What he asked was, how, after such statements as those, the House could refuse an inquiry which might show Mr. Buckley to be blameless in the matter? With regard to the suggestion that certain Blue Books should be laid on the Table, nothing would be easier than to have that evidence referred to the Committee appointed, which would give it something to deal with, but merely to lay it on the Table of the House would be useless. His right

hon. Friend asked where these inquiries into the management of estates, if they once began, were to end? Well, it would be a different thing if these were general complaints; but there was a Land Act with which the Government were not satisfied, and in which they believed there were faults. [Mr. J. LOWTHER: I never said so.] He was in the memory of the House, and his right hon. Friend certainly indulged, on a former occasion, in expressions concerning the Land Act which must have led the House to think he did not consider it satisfactory; and he emphatically declared that the present Government were not responsible for it. In the interests, then, of his right hon. Friend, he supported this inquiry, in order that it might be seen whether the faults which he supposed to exist in the Land Act were really there. There was, in the present case, a specific charge that in consequence of the Land Act, certain evils had taken place; but instead of having a specific inquiry which would show whether the charges made were correct, the right hon. Gentleman said—"Oh, no, let us have a general, or none at all;" so that he would rather they should lose themselves in generalities than deal with a specific charge. With regard to this complaint, he cherished a hope that Mr. Buekley might not turn out to be the sinner he was represented; but, certainly, when charges like these were brought, nothing was more likely to make the public believe him to be guilty than to shuffle off an inquiry in this manner. In the interests of justice, then, he regretted that the Government should refuse an inquiry, and had not accepted the Select Committee in the way in which it ought to have been accepted. He thought the subject should be fairly and thoroughly inquired into, and that nothing but good would come of it.

MURDER OF MR. OGLE.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. H. SAMUELSON, in rising to call attention to the circumstances connected with the murder of Mr. Ogle,

The Times correspondent in Thessaly, said, he felt that an apology was due from him to the House for attempting, at so late an hour, to trespass upon its attention; but his Notice had been on the Paper ever since the 9th of May last, and he had not had an opportunity of bringing it forward. He did not, at that late hour, intend to go into the circumstances connected with the murder of Mr. Ogle. An inquiry had been instituted into the circumstances under which that murder was committed, and a Report had been made in reference to it; but that Report had not been published. Had it been made public, it might not have been necessary for him to call attention to this very painful matter. Its publication, had, however, been constantly put off; and, indeed, he saw no greater prospect now for its production than there existed when the House separated for the Whitsuntide Recess. He wished distinctly to state that he was not impelled to take this matter up by any Party considerations, but by the strong conviction which he entertained that justice had not been done. Mr. Ogle was an acquaintance of his own, a gentleman for whom he had the highest respect, and he should be very sorry to think that his relatives would longer be left in ignorance as to the circumstances under which he had met his untimely fate. If proper steps had been taken to ascertain the entire truth of the matter, he could not but think that it would have been brought to light. He was not aware that the hon. Baronet the Member for West Kent (Sir Charles Mills) took an interest in the question, or he certainly should not have moved in the matter without first consulting him. What he (Mr. Samuelson) complained of now was the delay which had taken place in the presentation of the Papers which had been promised. It seemed to him that the murder of an Englishman was, after all, a matter of some importance, and his object was to impress upon the Government the necessity of giving the relatives of Mr. Ogle the information which they so greatly desired to receive. He could not believe that the delay which had occurred on the part of the Government had been intentional; but he did say that it was most cruel to the relatives of the murdered man. Aspersions had been made upon the character of the late Mr. Ogle. He had been accused of rashness and a want of discretion; and it had also been said that he fell fighting against the Turks with arms in his hands. All these statements he should be prepared at the proper time to disprove. He could now inform the House that Mr. Ogle's revolver was left at home, and that, at the time of his murder, he was entirely unarmed, his only weapon of defence being a walking stick which he carried. He would only further say that he believed that no man was ever actuated by purer motives, or a greater desire to be impartial, in his investigations than Mr. Ogle. That gentleman was murdered on the 30th of March near Macrinitza. On the 9th of May he asked the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bourke)—“What was the present condition of Consul-General Fawcett's investigation into the murder of Mr. Ogle?” He was informed that an inquiry had taken place, and that it had concluded on the 6th of May, and the Under Secretary of State added—“The report will be considered by Her Majesty's Government.” That was in answer to an inquiry of his as to whether it would be laid on the Table of the House? The hon. Gentleman did not then promise that it would be laid upon the Table, though he did not know why he should have refrained from making that promise. But, on the 16th of May, he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Report had been received, and, if so, whether it would be laid on the Table as soon as possible? The right hon. Gentleman, he must say, with great courtesy, informed him that the Report had not arrived, but that when it did arrive it should, as soon as possible, be laid on the Table of the House. On the 30th of May he wrote to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and again asked him whether the Report had been received, and, if so, when it would be produced? He must here recall for a moment to hon. Gentlemen's minds the fact that all this time the bereaved relatives of Mr. Ogle were suffering under the grief which they must naturally feel at his murder, and disappointed in the desire which they must naturally experience to know how it took place, and whether he in was any way in fault or not. That was his excuse for so constantly pressing for the publication of the Papers. He could conceive no reason for withholding them. Nor did he believe that the Government had any reason or wish to withhold them. He was answered on the 30th of May by the Under Secretary of State to the effect that the Report had been received, and that there would be no delay in its publication. On the 3rd of June he again asked the hon. Gentleman in the House, when the Papers would be in the possession of hon. Members, and whether he could promise that they should have them before the House separated for the Whitsuntide Recess? The reply was, if possible; if not, they should certainly have them during the Recess. On the 12th of June, after the Recess, he asked the hon. Gentleman privately, whether the Papers were soon to be presented to the House, and whether he could explain the delay? The hon. Gentleman gave him an answer which, he must say, was not satisfactory to him, and he stated so at the time. He was sorry the hon. Gentleman was not now in his place. He said that he had done his very best, that the delay was owing to the fact that the printer had taken a holiday; and, after some hesitation, he added something about a map having to be prepared. Now, the map was a very small matter. One had already appeared in The Graphic, and he did not suppose that the map which would be printed and sent round with the Papers would be one bit better than that which had been given in that paper; and he did not think it was right that an hon. Gentleman in the position of the Under Secretary of State should have put off with such excuses even an humble Member of the House, when he was actuated by a sense of duty in the inquiries which he made. The Report had been in the hands of the Government since the 30th of May—at least a fortnight—and he should like to know what had been the finding of the Commission of Inquiry over which Consul General Fawcett presided? He should like to know whether the Turkish authorities were proved to be free from complicity in the guilt of Mr. Ogle's murder, or found guilty of complicity? He desired himself to make no assertion. He wished to know whether the Government were satisfied that the inquiry had been searching, and that the best possible evidence procurable had been obtained? If not, he should like to know whether it was the intention of the Government to institute a fresh inquiry? If so, he might not have to trouble the House further on this painful question; if not, and the evidence was not satisfactory, he should certainly feel it to be his duty to call the attention of the House to the case at greater length. The matter could not be allowed to rest where it was. A British subject had been murdered and decapitated under circumstances of the very greatest suspicion. The murder was at present shrouded in mystery. The Government had the Report in their hands, and they should be able to lift up the veil of mystery by which the crime was surrounded. If proper evidence were not given before the Commission, such evidence was at least procurable, and could be produced if the witnesses were properly protected. He should like to ask, also, if Iskender Pasha, the Turkish Commander-in-Chief, was on the Commission? He knew, as a fact, that witnesses were afraid to come forward and give evidence before him. There was much presumptive evidence that the authorities were responsible for the murder. He did not say that evidence was true; but he had in his own possession a mass of evidence all tending in one direction—namely, that a most cruel and inhuman murder had been committed. He had every reason to believe in the integrity of the witnesses; but from his knowledge of the district and the surrounding country, he knew how utterly impossible it was to suppose that they should come forward and give evidence unless they were directly assured that England would protect them while giving their evidence, and that afterwards they would be removed to a place of safety. The motives for the murder would not be far to seek. It would not be difficult to prophecy the fate of an Englishman, of whom it might be said in the language of The Times, that he had—

“Tracked murder, and rapine, and brutal lust home to the Chief of the Police of Thessaly, and denounced publicly the official miscreant.”

Who was that Chief of the Police of Thessaly? No other than Amoosh Aga, a noted brigand, of whom he should be able to say more at another time. This, as he had said, was no party question. The murder of an Englishman who was endeavouring to discharge his duty at a distance from his own country could not possibly be a matter of Party feeling. What he desired to ascertain was the true circumstances of the case. He wanted those assertions made by the people of Volo both to him and to others, to be confirmed or authoritatively contradicted. He wanted justice to be done upon the murderers, and the instigators of the crime, if any could be found; and he wanted to free from the aspersions cast upon it, by persons interested in hushing up the inquiry, the memory of Mr. Ogle, who was universally respected for his humanity, and his brave, generous, and self-denying qualities. He was a man possessed of abilities of no mean order, he was industrious, and there was a career of usefulness open to him. He thought the murder of such a man should not pass without an expression of regret from Her Majesty's Government, and the guilty persons being brought to justice. He asserted that these people could be discovered with the greatest ease, if only a proper inquiry was instituted, conducted by Englishmen, and from which Turks were excluded. If the Government wished foreign and half-barbarian countries to believe that there was still the same ægis of protection as of yore cast over Englishmen by the country on the Possessions of which they boasted the sun never set, then they ought to be in a position to say that this inquiry had actually succeeded, and that they could lay their hand upon the guilty persons; or that such an inquiry would be instituted as would bring about that desirable result.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was exceedingly sorry that his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State was not in his place at that moment. He could assure the House and the hon. Member that this was a matter with regard to which there had been, and could be, no want of interest on the part of Her Majesty's Government. He had promised, as the hon. Member had truly reminded the House, that as soon as the Papers were sent home they should, without any further delay, be laid on the Table. They had now been brought to this country, and were in the hands of the printer. The House was perfectly well aware that when Papers had been sent to be printed they were out of the control, and, to a great extent, beyond the influence of the Government, though he believed that his hon. Friend the Under Secretary had done what he could to accelerate their printing. It had, however, certainly so happened, unfortunately, that they had not been delivered in such time as it was hoped they would have been. He thought it would be inexpedient that he should attempt to give anything like an imperfect account of those Papers at that moment; but if the hon. Gentleman would put a Question on the subject on Monday, he would undertake that some answer should be given that might be deemed satisfactory. He only wished to assure the hon. Member and the House that the Government regarded this matter as one of serious importance, and that there was not the slightest intention on their part either to dally with it, or to conceal from the House the information which they possessed in reference to it.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that it would be necessary to take the second reading of the Epping Forest Bill as the first Order on Monday, in order to send it to a Committee upstairs. The Valuation Bill would be placed high up on the list of Orders—probably the second Order, not for the purpose of proceeding with it, but with the view of concluding the discussion commenced at the Morning Sitting, and getting the Bill into Committee.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE CONGRESS—ALLEGED AGREEMENT BETWEEN RUSSIA AND ENGLAND.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of putting to my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, on an important subject; and, in the absence of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Marquess of Salisbury), I feel that I can only do so by the indulgence of the House itself. I wish to ask the noble Duke, if he can state to the House whether the Memorandum which appeared last week in a London evening paper, and which purported to be an agreement between the Government of Her Majesty and the Government of Russia, is or is not substantially correct; and, if it should appear that that is really the case, I would also ask my noble Friend if he is in a position to state whether any further information will be given to the House with regard to that paragraph of the Memorandum which applies to the Protectorate of Asia Minor?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: My Lords, in answer to the Question which has just been addressed to me by the noble Earl opposite, I have to state that the Document to which he has alluded was evidently furnished to the journal in which it was published by some person who had access to Papers that were confidential. So far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, the publication of that document was totally unauthorized, and, therefore, surreptitious; and, as an explanation of the policy of the Government, it is incomplete, and, consequently, inaccurate. At the proper and earliest opportunity, Her Majesty's Government will give the fullest information to Parliament on this subject; but, in the meantime, they must appeal to Parliament, in the public interest, to justify them in declining to answer particular Questions on the matter.

EARL GRANVILLE: I think I need scarcely assure your Lordships that, in putting the Question to the noble Duke, I had no wish whatever to embarrass Her Majesty's Government, especially at a time like the present. But, if my noble Friend will permit me, I should like to ask him yet another Question—namely, whether the full information which he has just promised will be laid before the House, is likely to be given to us during the course of the negotiations which are now in progress, or when those negotiations come to a termination?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: I am not prepared at this moment to answer the Question which my noble Friend has just addressed to me.

EARL GREY: Do I understand the noble Duke to say that, though the Papers to which the attention of your Lordships has been called were surreptitiously furnished and incomplete, he does not deny that, so far as they go, they are an accurate account of certain transactions which have taken place—or, at least, that they contain the substance of a document which was drawn up and signed at an interview between Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Russian Ambassador in London?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: In answer to the noble Earl, I have simply to state that I made no such admission.

LORD HOUGHTON: It appears to me that this question is one of such vast and vital importance, that it would be alike gratifying to the Members of your Lordships' House and desirable in itself, if some more satisfactory explanation could be given on this subject than that which we have just heard. The noble Duke opposite, in his reply to the Question of the noble Earl (Earl Granville), has left the case pretty much where it originally stood; and I rise merely to suggest to him that this question is not one between the present Government of England and the Parliament of this country, but one between the Government of England and the whole of Europe. There can be no doubt that the effect produced upon Europe by the publication of the document to which reference has been made has been portentous. In France, especially, the change of public opinion which has taken place in consequence of its appearance has been most notable and most painful, in every way, to the dignity of this country. My Lords, it would not be my desire—and I am certain it would not be the desire of any Member of this House—to throw the slightest embarrassment in the way of Her Majesty's Government upon this matter; but, whatever our opinions may be upon the general question, I think we must all feel that it is a great misfortune that the document which has been alluded to should have appeared at the present time. Even if the conditions mentioned in it are not true—even if the surrender which, according to it, we would require to make, is one to which the people of England would consent—there can be no doubt that it would have been far better for all parties if the document had appeared as the issue and outcome of a general Congress, rather than as the result of a preliminary investigation. My Lords, as the matter now stands before this country and the world, England did not enter the Congress of Berlin with free hands. It stands before Europe that England went into that International Assembly with a contract which, in the main, abandoned some of the most important points which I, and other Members of your Lordships' House, considered it to be the duty of the Government of this country to maintain; and I am sure that if Her Majesty's Government can give such an explanation of the document as may serve to place England in a more dignified position than that which she at present occupies before Europe, that explanation will be thankfully received by the House generally.

EARL GREY: The noble Duke the Lord President of the Council has stated that I was wrong in understanding him to have admitted that the document recently published was accurate so far as it went; but I really think that your

Lord Houghton

Lordships have a right to expect a little more from the noble Duke than we have yet heard. It appears to me that we are entitled to know whether that alleged agreement between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Russia is true and correct or not, so far as it goes. I cannot perceive any object to be gained by making a mystery of a document which has all the appearance of an official and authentic Paper. The noble Duke has said that he does not admit it to be authentic; but, at the same time, he has not said that it is not authentic. The noble Duke might go a little further, I think, and distinctly state to the House whether that Memorandum is or is not what it professes to be.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: The noble Earl who has just spoken must really allow me to be the best judge of how far I ought to go in this matter. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Houghton), no doubt, entered into various topics which were not alluded to by the noble Earl who introduced the subject; but I think the noble Lord was irregular in the course which he thus adopted. My noble Friend (Earl Granville) asked me a Question as to the authenticity of this particular document. He was good enough to give me Notice in the morning of his intention of putting such a Question, and since then I have had time thoroughly to consider and to weigh the answer which I should give to him. I have given him that answer. I have stated that Her Majesty's Government do not consider it expedient, in the public interest, to enter further into the subject at the present time.

MONUMENTS (METROPOLIS) (No. 2)

BILL—(No. 100.)

(The Viscount Middleton.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE said, there was one clause in the Bill which raised a question of great importance. He referred to the 4th clause, which ran — "The Board" — that was the Metropolitan Board of Works—

"may from time to time accept as a gift or bequest any monument, or any moneys for the purchase of any monument, and erect or permit the erection of any monument upon the said embankment or lands."

—the Thames Embankment and the land vested in the Board—

"and the Board may preserve and maintain every such monument, and shall have the control and management thereof for the benefit of the public."

This clause suggested the question, who were to be the proper judges as to what monuments ought to be put up? And, as the matter was one which deserved careful consideration, he put it to the noble Viscount who had charge of the Bill whether he thought it would be advisable to proceed with the measure on the first day of their Lordships' re-assembling after the Whitsuntide Recess?

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, that in order to meet the wish of his noble Friend, he would postpone going into Committee on the Bill until Friday.

Committee put off to Friday next.

ABERDEEN DISTRICT TRAMWAYS BILL (by Order.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, the other night it was brought to the notice of the House that in this and five other Tramway Bills there was a power to run by steam. He ventured at the time to call the attention of the House to that fact, and those Bills had now been put down by Order for that day. He believed there were no less than six of them which were down by Order, and in every one of them there was a provision that steam engines might be run over the tramway. Now, that was a most important question, and one which he ventured to think ought not to be decided off-hand by the House. He had no desire to lay any great blame upon the Government; but, at the same time, he thought that the Board of Trade ought to have brought in Bills of that kind, and to have stated distinctly that they were going to ask the House to confer upon tramways the power of running by steam, instead of referring the Bills to a Select Committee in the ordinary course, and leaving the Select Committee to insert in the Bills provisions to give that power. Every hon. Member knew what it was to have steam power upon the roads, and if they granted it now to one tramway, they would soon be called upon to grant it to all. He thought some very stringent precautions ought to be taken in regard to the application of such a power. He was not prepared to say that these Bills might not contain some stringent precautions and powers, conferred upon the Board of Trade for regulating the work of steam engines. Still, he thought it was a great innovation, and one that ought not to be passed without the matter having been regularly brought before the House and discussed. In the streets, when a steam roller was employed, there was generally a notice put up—"Look out for the steam roller," that being done on account of the danger; but what that danger would be when they came to sanction the use of steam tramways, and found that the people who worked the engines were not very careful, and when the use of steam power came to be increased year after year, as well as the pace at which the engines might be worked, he was not in a position to say. As he had just said, they all knew at the present moment what the use of engines upon the high roads amounted to. There were several places he could name, where the traffic for carriages had been absolutely and entirely stopped, on account of the danger arising from these engines being driven over the roads. Under these circumstances, he thought it was one of those questions which demanded very serious consideration. He was sorry to appear in antagonism to the promoters of the Bill; but he thought it his duty to ask the House to reject the first Bill, in order that he might test what the opinion of the House really was. He admitted that it would be hard upon the promoters to lose their Bill, and not to be able to rely upon the investigation of the Select Committee; but he thought that the interests of the public were paramount. Without making any further remarks, he would move that the Aberdeen District Tramways Bill be rejected. He was sure there was not a Gentleman present in the House who did not know and feel what it was to have steam engines running over the roads.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

MR. ARTHUR PEEL said, he had nothing specially to do with this particular Bill, the rejection of which had been moved by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). His (Mr. Peel's) only reason for rising now was, that he had been Chairman of the Select Committee appointed to consider the whole of the subject, and they had had a very long and arduous sitting, in which they had gone into the whole question as to what should be the regulations to govern the use of steam or power other than horse power upon tramways. It had been open to the Committee to decide whether the use of steam should be permitted upon tramways, or not; but the evidence before the Committee had been so overwhelmingly in favour of steam, that they had agreed to permit it. They had not only the evidence placed before them by various witnesses, but they had referred to them the Reports of previous Committees on the subject, and the evidence in favour of steam had been really so overwhelming, that they assumed as a fact that steam ought to be permitted, although they fully recognized that it ought only to be permitted under the most stringent regulations and safeguards for the protection of the public. The hon. and gallant Baronet said that the question was one that deserved serious consideration. He (Mr. Peel) quite agreed in that view, and he thought that, considering what had passed in reference to the question, the House would see that they had arrived at the point when it ought to be definitely settled. Already three Committees had inquired into the matter. There was the Committee which sat upon the question of Locomotives on Roads in 1873. In 1877 another Committee was appointed to consider under what regulations steam should be used on tramways; and Her Majesty's Government thought proper to appoint another Committee that year, which was the Committee over which he (Mr. Peel) had had the honour of presiding, and to whose decision he had just referred. They were asked to consider almost the very same question as that referred to the Committee of last year, and they had laid down regulations which were to govern the use of steam. They had, however, done much more than that. They had entered into the whole question of the conditions under which this novel undertaking should be allowed. They had considered, on the one hand, the interests of the promoters, and, on the other, the interests of the public. The Committee had drawn up, in the Report that was now before the House, a series of principles on which their recommendations were based; and he must say that he had heard these principles canvassed in two ways. On the one side, it was said that they were much too stringent, and would not allow the promoters to carry on their undertaking; and, on the other hand, it was said they were much too favourable to the promoters, and that the public would be prejudiced by the introduction of steam in the crowded thoroughfares of the large towns. With the permission of the House, he would detain them for a short time while he stated briefly what these principles were. The Committee considered that the use of steam in lieu of horses was, comparatively speaking, a novel undertaking. It was true that it had been tried in some places in this country already. There were steam tramways at Wantage, at Batley, and at Swansea, and abroad steam was in use in Paris. Cassel, in Germany, was, however, the head-quarters of these tramways. The Committee obtained evidence from all those towns, and they had further evidence from General Hutchinson, one of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade, together with the Reports of that gentleman, who went into the whole question most minutely. After hearing General Hutchinson, the Committee came to the conclusion that, though it was a novel undertaking, it was so far established in use that it would be unwise on their part absolutely to prohibit the use of steam. At the same time, they thought that as the question was taking hold of the public mind in this country, it would be wise to lay down conditions which should protect them against abuse. They, therefore, thought that any concession to be made to the promoters should only last for a limited period of seven years, at the end of which time it would be competent for the local authorities to take up the rails on which steam tramways were used; and, in effect, to make the tramway cease, as far as it was a steam tramway, altogether. They felt, of course, that if seven years' experience had been gained, the objections raised to the use of steam would either be verified or refuted. They thought, also, that, considering the nature of the concession granted to the promoters, and considering, also, that steam tramways could be worked more cheaply than horse tramways, the public ought to be benefited by having the tolls as low as possible. They, therefore, inserted a provision that the tolls should be revised after a period of five years. They thought, generally speaking, that liberty of contract should be allowed between the local authorities and the promoters. The local authorities might be not unfairly assumed to be the best judges of the interests they were elected to maintain. The Committee were of opinion, therefore, that the local authorities should be able to make what contracts they pleased with the promoters who wished to institute steam tramways in any particular district; but they also thought that the public ought to be protected against the promoters on one side and the local authorities on the other. The local authorities, for instance, might, in some cases, be disposed to levy such an amount of black mail from the promoters of the steam tramway as would materially interfere with the undertaking. On the other hand, the local authorities might be promoters themselves, or might be induced to make such a bargain with the promoters of the Tramway Company as would be prejudicial to the interests of the public. The Committee, therefore, said that if there was anything in the contract which made it objectionable to the inhabitants of the place in which it was proposed to lay down steam tramways, the Board of Trade should be constituted the friend of the public, and should be able to step in and see whether the terms of the contract militated either against any particular interest, or against the interests of the place in general. He knew very well that there had been in past times a feeling in that House against tramways altogether. When horse tramways were first started, there was a strong feeling against them; but he thought the time had now passed by when horse tramways were regarded as objectionable. Under all the circumstances, he thought the House ought to be very careful as to prohibiting entirely the introduction of steam tramways. Anybody who consulted the Report of the Committee which sat last year, would see what great use was made of tramways in the Metropolis and in other large towns. They would be astonished at the way in which the existing horse tramways were serving the public convenience. It was stated that in London, in the year 1876, three Metropolitan Tramway Companies carried no less than 48,000,000 passengers, and in Edinburgh, he believed, the number carried in one year—out of a population of 250,000—was about 8,000,000 or 9,000,000. That applied to horse tramways alone. But the convenience of steam over horse tramways—setting aside the obvious advantages of steam—was very great. First as a question of humanity. It was stated that the working life of an omnibus horse was only 4½ years, after which it was sold, and would not fetch more than £5 or £6. The life of a horse of a tramway car was even shorter than that of an omnibus horse. It was half-a-year shorter—4 years being calculated to be, for all profitable purposes, the life of the horse used in a tramway car. If Parliament sanctioned the use of steam, they would save this immense wear and tear of horses. They would relieve Tramway Companies from being required to keep up an enormous and expensive stock, and they would give the public the benefit of the change by enabling them to go from place to place, especially in the crowded suburbs, at a much cheaper rate than they could do now. Having spoken so long upon the principles upon which the Committee based the recommendations in their Report, it was only necessary that he should add, further, that, independently of the principles they laid down, on which their suggestions were formed, they embodied a recommendation in the Report that those suggestions should be made to apply to Tramway Bills, and to Tramway Provisional Orders alike. This was a very important matter. It was important that Private Bills and Provisional Orders on this subject should be treated in the same way. Independently of this, the Committee had endeavoured to make suggestions for governing the mechanical part of the question, by laying down principles which could be put in force in the shape of bye-laws. These bye-laws would govern the ingress and egress of the passengers, the emission of steam, the regulation of the light of the furnace, and, above all, the pace at which the tramcars would be allowed to run. It was only fair to add, that upon the question of the maximum speed, although there was no division in the whole course of the Committee's inquiry, and they were generally unanimous, yet, upon this point, there was a feeling that they might have placed the maximum speed at which the engines were to be permitted to run at too high a figure—namely, at eight miles an hour in towns and 10 miles an hour in the country. It was possible that the House might think that the maximum speed ought to be altered; but, inasmuch as this question had been over and over again referred to a Committee, and as the present Committee had accepted the principle of allowing the use of steam, and had laid down regulations for its use as safeguards for the public, he earnestly hoped that the House would feel that the time had come when, in the interest of those promoting tramway schemes, and, above all, in the interests of the great body of the public, the matter ought to be definitely dealt with. He did not believe that a single Member of the Committee had any interest in the matter. They only accepted the evidence placed before them, and upon that evidence they came to the best conclusion in their power. He had now discharged his duty by laying before the House the principles by which the Committee came to their decision, and although he was anxious that the House should accept what was the result of a series of very laborious sittings on the part of the Committee, yet, so far as the Committee were concerned, he would leave the question respectfully in the hands of the House.

ADMIRAL EGERTON, as a Member of the Committee, wished to say a few words to endorse the statement of the hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. Arthur Peel). The Committee went most carefully into all the evidence placed before them in regard to these Bills; and if there were one point upon which they made up their minds more than another, it was in regard to the question of safety. What the Committee heard upon that point was almost decisive. The difficulty of stopping a horse tramway was very much greater than when steam was used, and, consequently, the liability to occasion accident would be less. But there was another point which ought to be considered. Probably, the greater portion of hon. Members of that House were not in the habit of using tramways, and for himself he could not say he was particularly partial to them; but they were used by a very large portion of the public outside. It was thought by many that they were extremely inconvenient to carriage traffic; but the enormous number of persons carried by them rendered them now almost a necessity. The evidence given to the Committee was, that at present the wear and tear of horse power was very considerable, and it appeared to the Committee that if tramways were to be extended, something must be done to provide some other motive power. It seemed to him, taking all the circumstances into consideration, that the application of steam power to tramways was indispensable, and he hoped the House would pause before they took the serious step of rejecting these Bills.

COLONEL BEAUMONT, as a Member of the first Committee, was anxious to make a few remarks. He, for one, attached the greatest importance to this legislation. He rather fancied that the objection which was raised by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) in regard to the third reading of the Bill, was not an objection to the use of mechanical power alone, but that the hon. and gallant Member wished to raise an objection to the whole system of tramways under cover of an objection to the use of mechanical power. [Sir WALTER B. BARTTELOT: No, no!] He (Colonel Beaumont) hoped he was in error.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, the hon. and gallant Member certainly was in error.

COLONEL BEAUMONT was glad to find that the hon. and gallant Baronet repudiated that idea. Still, he fancied that a good many people who objected to tramways altogether, were anxious to take that opportunity of recording their objection to the use of mechanical power as a cover to their objections to tramways altogether. The importance of the tramways generally to the poor man could not be over-estimated; and he hoped he was not out of Order in stating his belief that the question the House was now called upon to decide was one of the greatest possible importance to the travelling public. It was all very well for people, whose carriages were put to inconvenience, to say that there was a danger in the matter; but it must be borne in mind that for one person who rode in a carriage, thousands travelled by tramways. The question was not a new one to the House in any sense. For two Sessions it had been investigated by Committees, and he hoped the decision of the House would endorse the conclusion arrived at by those Committees. He sincerely hoped that the House would not arrive at a decision which would practically have the effect of throwing cold water upon tramway enterprize.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was one of those who very much agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend who had moved the Amendment (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). His objection was not at all to the use of steam, as a mechanical power on the high roads, but he did object to the use of mechanical power where the roads were not wide enough to accommodate the carriage traffic as well. He knew more than one instance in which tramways were laid down in very narrow streets. How they obtained the general power to do so, in the first instance, he did not know—probably, by an arrangement with the local authorities; but there were cases in which almost the whole road was occupied by the tramways; and the result was, that Parliament had dedicated to a private company the road which was intended for the use of the public. The hon. and gallant Member who had just addressed the House (Colonel Beaumont) stated that thousands travelled by the tramways where only one rode in a carriage; but there were thousands of carts and carriages and other vehicles that made use of the high roads as well. He knew many places where the number of persons who travelled by tramways were by no means so large as the number who made use of the roads in other ways. It must further be borne in mind that the roads were constructed at the public expense for the public convenience, and yet it was now proposed to dedicate them to the use of a section of the public alone. As he had already said, he did not object to the use of mechanical power. He had no doubt that it might be brought under proper control, and might be made to work very well; but, unless better provision were made than he thought was made by the Committee in the present Bill for insisting upon a full and ample width of roadway upon the high roads used by steam tramways, they had better have the tramways without any mechanical power at all. Mechanical power, unfortunately, was less under control than horse power. He was acquainted with places where the existing tramways without mechanical power were dangerous; but, bad as they were now, they would be worse, and still more dangerous, if the use of steam were sanctioned upon them. Whether it had been accomplished by getting round the newspapers, or the local authorities, he was unable to say; but, in many instances, tramways were laid down in roads where they ought never to have been sanctioned, as the roads themselves were not wide enough for them. In such cases carriages and carts were constantly put to great inconvenience, and although in many instances the roads were too narrow for horse tramways, the inconvenience and danger would be much greater when mechanical power was used, and the result would be that many people who now used the roads would have to abandon them altogether. He did not object to the Bill because it sanctioned the use of mechanical power; but he did object to the omission on the part of the Committee of a satisfactory provision in regard to the width of the roads. He thought no road should be given up to a tramway unless there was ample width for two or three carriages besides the tramway car. He hoped the House would pause before they read the Bill a third time, and would support the Amendment moved by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex, or refer the measure back again to a Select Committee to take some means for providing that the public, as well as the tramway companies, should have the use of the roads. Under the present Bill, he did not think they would have that use of them which they were entitled to.

MR. ASSHETON said, the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had laid down the doctrine that tramways worked by mechanical power would be less under control than those which were worked by horse power. He (Mr. Assheton) protested against that assertion. The evidence which was given before the Select Committee on tramways last year fully convinced him that tramways worked by mechanical power would be even under greater control than tramways worked by horse power. When he (Mr. Assheton) went into the Committee on Locomotives on Roads, he had certainly some misgiving as to the propriety of sanctioning the use of mechanical power on roads, on account of a fear that it might frighten the horses using the road. The same objection to the use of mechanical power was, he believed, entertained by other hon. Members. As far as he remembered the result of the investigation of the Committee as to the question of mechanical power frightening the horses, it resolved itself into this—that if they could stop the noise, or the escape of smoke or steam, they would not frighten the horses at all; but if they did not succeed in preventing noise and the escape of steam and smoke, then the use of mechanical power would frighten the horses. He understood there was not the least difficulty in preventing the escape of smoke and steam, and the regulations proposed to be laid down by the Board of Trade distinctly provided that that must be done. In all cases it was to be necessary that the tramway cars should be drawn without noise, smoke, or steam, and in that case they could be driven with safety to the animal power engaged in drawing other vehicles. Whether the House were willing to adopt the principle of permitting the use of mechanical power or not, he should oppose the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend behind him, and should vote for the third reading of the Bill.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, the Bill raised a very important question, and he did not think he would be occupying the time of the House unnecessarily if he said a few words upon it, having had personal experience of the working of these engines on a road in his immediate neighbourhood. There was an ancient tramroad, which extended for about five miles along the Bay of Swansea, and close to his own residence. It had existed as a tramroad for some 70 years, or perhaps more. It became disused for the purposes for which it was originally constructed, and it was afterwards converted into a horse tramroad for the conveyance of passengers from Swansea to the village of Oystermouth, five miles away. The tramroad had been worked for this purpose for about 15 years, and it had satisfied every possible requirement. It had conveyed a large number of passengers for this distance of five miles without the slightest inconvenience to anybody. He was not aware that any accident had ever occurred. Everybody was perfectly satisfied, and the accommodation afforded to the locality was complete and satisfactory. He had himself, when he had the honour of commanding a Volunteer regiment, conveyed the regiment, 600 strong, along the tramway line without the slightest difficulty. Of course, he meant in a series of cars, drawn by horses; and that, too, on a day when there was considerable traffic, because it was necessarily a holiday. A short while ago the tramway was purchased by a London Company, and they proceeded last year, about the month of August, to put upon it one of these locomotive engines. He had no sort of prejudice against the use of the engine; on the contrary, he was rather glad to see that the engine was placed upon it, as he hoped an improvement in the shape of lowering the fares would be secured, and that the public would gain an advantage. The engine worked very badly, and in the month of December improved engines of the same kind as those proposed to be used on street tramways were introduced, since which people residing in the district had had practical proof of the working of these so-called noiseless engines. The tramway was situated immediately adjoining the turnpike road. It was not on the turnpike road, and was, therefore, not so disadvantageously placed as an ordinary tramway. It ran alongside the turnpike road, which was not deprived of any of its original width. The House would, perhaps, consider that this was an exceptionally favourable state of things. The tramway did not occupy the centre of the road, as was usually the case, but passed alongside the road, and yet so much inconvenience was experienced from the passing of this engine, that many persons were afraid to drive along the road at all. The engines in use were the smokeless, noiseless, and steamless engines, which were to be used under this Bill; but they were neither noiseless nor steamless. He gave this as a fact within his own knowledge, and he thought that hon. Gentlemen who had sat upon this Committee had been misled by the statements of engineers; at any rate, they had not had the experience he (Mr. Hussey Vivian) had had of these engines, and he was prepared, without the slightest hesitation, to say that the engines were neither noiseless nor steamless. Smokeless they might be, because it was possible to use fuel which would not send out smoke; but noiseless or steamless they were not. On the contrary, the noise of the engines could be heard for a long distance. He had heard it himself for more than half-a-mile, and he was told by others that they had heard it for more than a mile-and-a-half. The noise made by the trains in running along the line was very considerable indeed, and he was quite certain, from the knowledge he possessed of mechanics, that they could not construct an engine and make it run at the rate of some eight miles an hour without its making considerable noise. Then, again, they could not construct a steam engine from which it would be possible to prevent steam escaping at times. It was quite clear that every steam engine must have a safety valve. It was ridiculous to suppose that they could construct a steam engine without a safety valve, and from time to time the steam must escape from the valve. Then, again, the engine would prime in consequence of the water collecting in the cylinder, and that water must be driven off by steam. He had, in fact, seen the steam constantly escaping. Horses were also frightened by the fire of the engine. At night there was the reflection of the fire on the road, and thus meeting one of these engines at night was calculated to frighten horses seriously. There was no doubt about this fact, because it occurred from day to day. Horses were constantly frightened; and, as a matter of fact, his own family had been almost driven off the road in consequence of the running of the tramway engines. He believed that engines would not have been allowed on the line, if it had not been an existing tramway; and the persons who were aggrieved contended that the Company had no right to use engines upon it, although it was an existing tramway. He had himself brought the matter before the County Road Board. They had commenced a prosecution, which was sub judice, and the decision expected shortly in the Court of Chancery. Various affidavits had been made in support of the injunction prayed for. The injunction was to restrain the use of locomotives upon the line; and, perhaps, the House would allow him to read the affidavit of a farmer with regard to an accident which happened to him not very long ago. John Beynon, a farmer of Oystermouth, in the county of Glamorgan, said that—

“On Saturday, the 22nd of December, 1877, he was returning from Swansea, about 6 o'clock in the evening, and that, after passing the turnpike gate, he heard the tram-engine coming from Swansea, there being at the time two carriages in front of him, and a large omnibus immediately behind, which wanted to pass. He had to draw his horse to the left hand side of the road, nearest the tramway, in order to allow the omnibus to pass, and as the tram-engine came up, it greatly frightened the horse, which started off and came in contact with the omnibus. The vehicle was overthrown, and his wife and himself were both thrown out. His wife had her shoulder much bruised, and he himself fell upon his head, which was badly cut. He was taken home and attended by the doctor for five weeks, during which time he was unable to leave his house, and he had not recovered yet; and, indeed, he had been told by the doctor he never would get over it completely.”

There were numerous affidavits with regard to other accidents, and he need not remind the House that this was not the case of a narrow street, but of a turnpike road with open ground around it. He asked the House if they were prepared to pass incidentally, and in this manner, clauses which would introduce such a system as this into the main thoroughfares of the large towns? He did not regard this as a broad question which had already been thoroughly discussed and settled by the House. Very few hon. Members knew that the question was coming before the House that day. When he himself heard it, he had to hunt through the Papers in order to ascertain how it was to come before the House, and he discovered that it was to be brought forward, incidentally, in certain clauses, which had been introduced into a Private Bill. It was quite true that the Committee had investigated the case; but, unfortunately, they had only had one side before them, and he had not had time to read the evidence. The Report of the Committee was dated the 7th of June. The House rose on the 7th of June for the Holidays, and he really had not had time yet to read the evidence upon which the Report was based. Indeed, he doubted whether any hon. Member had had time to read it. He contended, therefore, that if the House sanctioned this Bill, they would be passing an Act and admitting a principle which would drive the public off the roads of the country. He was perfectly certain that the House was not aware of the danger of legislating in this incidental manner. If steam power were to be sanctioned, let the question be thoroughly discussed in the House. The Report of the Committee itself showed that the Committee were in doubt whether they had sufficient evidence before them to act upon. They said—

“A difficulty at once presented itself to your Committee. Parliament had, in two instances, sanctioned the use of steam for the experimental use of mechanical power; but the instances were too few, and the trials of too partial a character, to allow a definite judgment to be formed.”

Nevertheless, although the Committee said the instances were too few to allow a definite judgment to be formed, the House was called upon to legislate as if the most definite judgment possible had been formed. He ventured to say that it would be unwise and precipitate legislation. If they were going to adopt a new principle, let them thoroughly consider and discuss it, and think it out. Some statements had been made in regard to the use of steam tramways in Paris. He was in Paris last week, but he saw no engines in use. He saw hundreds of horse-cars working well, and without any strain upon the horses. He did remember once, two or three years ago, near the Gare de Lyon, seeing one of those things running; but if they had been successful in Paris, they would, long before this, have had them running in all the great thoroughfares. The lines which run up to the Exposition were worked by horse power, and he contended that they could work tramways by horse power, not only without inhumanity, but with perfect safety and economy. He had seen them working both in Paris and Ame with proper brakes,

such as were used in those countries, the carriages could be stopped instantaneously. There was no sort of safety which could be gained by the use of locomotive power, which could not far better be gained by the use of horse power. The argument had been used that the horses were soon worked out, and rendered unfit for service. That could easily be prevented by adapting the weight of the draught to the power of the horses. In that case, the horse would be no more worn out than in drawing a carriage. There was nothing to prevent horses being used with humanity in connection with the tramway system. He would not detain the House longer, and would simply add that he did not believe the public would obtain any saving in consequence of the use of steam power. He believed that it would turn out in the end that it was just as expensive, and the public would gain no benefit. He would not have detained the House at such length if it had not been that he was anxious to give the result of his own personal experience in connection with the use of steam upon tramways.

Mr. BATES, as a Member of the Committee, supported the Bill. The Committee were intrusted by the House of Commons to take evidence, and they had formed their opinion entirely on the evidence they had taken. He must say that the evidence brought before the Committee was such that he was compelled, even against his will, to assent to the propriety of authorizing the use of steam. The only objection he took was to the speed at which engines were to travel. He did think that eight miles an hour in towns so densely populated as those of Lancashire, where these tramways were proposed to be made—such as Blackburn, Accrington, and Darwen—where factory children were coming out in large numbers at stated hours, was too great a speed, and that there ought to be some alteration in that respect.

Mr. W. HOLMS said, that having been a Member of the Select Committee on Tramways, he might be allowed to say a few words. The questions remitted to the Committee to consider were—first, whether or not steam should be allowed to apply to tramways; secondly, if so, under what rules and regulations it was to be applied; and, lastly, to adapt those rules and regulations to certain Bills and Provisional Orders? With one exception—namely, with regard to the speed at which the tramway locomotives were to run—the Committee were perfectly unanimous in the conclusions they arrived at, and the rules and regulations which they thought ought to be laid down. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had, he thought, shown undue fear as to the application of steam to tramways—especially upon narrow roads. In every case power was given to the local authorities to say whether these engines should be run on narrow roads or not. The Committee thought that the persons locally connected with the district were the best judges of the necessity of the case. Moreover, they gave the right of appeal to the general public to the Board of Trade in the event of danger being apprehended. The hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had told the House that the public roads were made at the public expense, and he seemed to infer that the tramways were allowed to use the roads for nothing. He (Mr. W. Holms) thought the evidence showed, as a rule, that the local authorities called on the tramway authorities to bear an unduly large proportion of the expense of repairing the roads. The Committee had evidence from Paris, Philadelphia, Hesse-Cassel, and Glasgow, to the effect that in those cities steam power was in use, and that the cars could be pulled up in as short a space as cars drawn by horses. Then, again, it was proved that tramcars drawn by steam could easily run over gradients that would be almost unworkable by horse power. The hon. Member for Glamorgan-shire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) said that in his part of the country steam tramways had been found neither smokeless, noiseless, nor steamless. The hon. Member ought, therefore, to accept the regulations embodied in the present Bill, because they gave power to the public to appeal to the Board of Trade to have such tramways stopped if they did not comply with the regulations laid down with reference to steam, smoke, and noise. He wished, further, to point out that, instead of fixing an indefinite period for the existence of these tramways, the Committee had laid down as one of the leading principles that should not be allowed for a longer fixed period than seven years. At the end of seven years they might be subject to further regulations, and must necessarily come under the notice both of the local authorities and the Board of Trade. He would only add that the importance of the question could scarcely be overrated. They all deplored that their great cities and towns were so over-crowded. If they were to lessen that over-crowding, the best means of attaining the object would be by passing those Tramway Bills and Provisional Orders, the object of which was to provide means for the conveyance of large masses of the people by cheap and easy methods.

MR. NEWDEGATE thought, in connection with tramways, that it would be found to be necessary to give the Board of Trade concurrent authority in all matters connected with the use of steam on railways. There were defects in the present regulations; but it was admitted that, so far, the use of steam had only been sanctioned as an experiment. He saw that the hon. and gallant Member for South Durham (Colonel Beaumont), who had already spoken in favour of the Bill, had placed upon the Notice Paper a Question upon the subject, namely—

“To ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is empowered to grant licences for the experimental use of steam or other mechanical power on Tramways, in accordance with the paragraph 8 of the Report of the Select Committee on Tramways (Use of Mechanical Power) Bills; and, if not, whether the Government will bring in a Bill authorizing the Board of Trade to place all Tramway Companies on the same footing, whether they have or have not applied during the present Session of Parliament for the Confirmation of Provisional Orders?”

It was evident that the hon. Member considered the use of steam sanctioned by the Select Committee as an experiment; and it was evident from what had fallen from the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian), that it was not always a successful experiment. He (Mr. Newdegate) doubted very much whether, as the evidence which the hon. Member had been good enough to read to the House had never reached the Committee, the Committee were fully aware of the dangers and inconveniences which might result from the use of steam power on the railways. What he would, therefore, suggest was this—that these Bills should poned, and that the House, before venturing further upon this experiment, should consider whether some extended powers, in connection with the use of steam on tramways, should not be given to the Board of Trade before such use was permitted; because, hereafter, they might be told, notwithstanding the seven years' limit, that if any interference was attempted they would be sacrificing the capital which had been invested. In justice to those who contemplated the use of steam power, he thought the Board of Trade ought at once to be armed with a power of interference.

MR. O'CONOR was anxious to say a few words in answer to the speech of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian), having been a Member of the Committee to whom these Bills had been referred. It so happened that the Committee heard a great deal, during the time they were engaged in their deliberations, of the Swansea Tramway referred to by the hon. Member, as they had to deal with another tramway, upon which it was not proposed to use steam power at all; but which was intended to join the Oystermouth Tramway, and in this way the Oystermouth Tramway came before them. They found that the Oystermouth Tramway was a tramway which had used steam power without any authority at all, and was subject to no regulations. The Board of Trade, in point of fact, had no control over it, and the Company could run any engine they liked, and at any speed they pleased. It was not wonderful that, under these circumstances, the Oystermouth Tramway had become a nuisance to the neighbourhood. But if a tramway under this Bill were authorized, the Board of Trade could stop it at any time, if the rules laid down for the regulation of tramways were not carried out, or impose penalties for their own observance. It was very important, when the House came to divide upon the question, that no hon. Member should be under the impression that the experiences related to the House by the hon. Member for Glamorganshire were likely to occur under the present Bill.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, the engines used upon the Oystermouth Tram-way were similar to those which were to be used in the case of these they were known, he believed,
"Hughes' Patent Engine," and

they were said to be noiseless and steamless, and further, they limited themselves to a speed of eight miles an hour.

MR. O'CONOR said, the Committee had evidence from the owners of the Oystermouth Tramway that they proposed to run their trams at a rate of 15 or 20 miles an hour.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, he was a perfectly impartial witness in the case; but he wished to give his experience in opposition to that of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian). After the remarks that had been made by that hon. Member and the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), he felt that he ought not to sit still and not say a word. His experience had been gained in connection with a tramway which had been constructed in his own neighbourhood—namely, in the town of Wantage. It was a tramway of about  $2\frac{1}{2}$  or 3 miles in length, and it had given universal satisfaction. [An hon. MEMBER: Is it a steam tramway?] It was a steam tramway. They had a horse tramway originally, but found that it would not pay as a horse tramway; the wear and tear of horseflesh was very large; so they determined to ask for steam power, and they obtained it. They had now been running for more than a year, and their work was perfectly satisfactory. So far as horse tramways were concerned, he believed the most painful work they could put a horse to was drawing a tramway car. It was positive cruelty to horseflesh. It reduced the life of a horse to an average of about four years, while its value was reduced to £6 or £7. In fact, when it was done with for tramway purposes, it was only fit for the knacker's yard. Since steam had been established upon the Wantage Tramways no inconvenience had been sustained by the other traffic. He had ridden his own horses by the steam car; and, in addition, he might say that it was a neighbourhood from which valuable horses were constantly being sent to and from the stables in the district to the railway station. They passed these tramcars four or five times a-day, and he had never heard of any loss or any accident. In addition to that, the poor people who used the cars were able to ride in comfort and luxury. The working men upon his farms, for a fare of 2d., could have a ride of two miles. They were able to go backwards and forwards for that small sum, and they would save the great loss of time involved in walking. Under these circumstances, he earnestly hoped that the House would not reject the Bill; but that, by passing it, they would enable the working men of other localities to enjoy the luxury and comfort of travelling which had been enjoyed not only by himself, but by a large number of poor people in the district in which he resided.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he wished to make one or two observations upon a point which had not, as yet, been adverted to. He wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if steam were to be allowed on these tramways, in what respect would the tramways differ from railways, except that they would run on roads made for them by other people, whereas the railways were on roads constructed at great expense by the companies which worked them? He should like, also, to ask, whether the tramways would, or would not, be subject to the railway passenger duty? because, if they were, he should, at least, have the satisfaction of knowing that if he voted for this Bill, he should be aiding the increase of the country's Revenue; if they were not, they would be placed in a position of very unfair advantage over the railways of the country.

MR. T. E. SMITH believed that tramways worked under steam power were worked much more quietly and noiselessly than those which were drawn by horses. In fact, one of these steam tramcars did not make one-half the noise which an ordinary tramcar made in the streets at the present time, or one-fourth of the noise which a steam roller made upon the Thames Embankment every day of the week. Under these circumstances, he thought it would be of great advantage to pass the present Bill. He believed that what had been already said had been quite true—that the opposition to the introduction of steam power was really an opposition to tramways generally, and the objection entertained to tramways was due in a great respect, he was afraid, to the unsatisfactory supervision which existed over the rails as they were now laid down. It was a most extraordinary thing that in London the rails were of a worse pattern than in any other town in Europe.

On the Continent no inconvenience whatever was sustained from the rails; but in London the rails were only equalled by those in America, and were, undoubtedly, a nuisance. He was satisfied that steam cars would be much less nuisances than horse cars.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had nothing to say in regard to the general merits of these Bills for the use of steam power on tramways; but he had risen principally to answer the question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen). He believed there was a clause in one of the Bills now before the House, by which it was proposed—

“That notwithstanding anything contained in this Order, the promoters or any persons using any tramways &c., shall be subject and liable to the provisions of any general Act which may now, or hereafter, be obtained in this or any future Session of Parliament, or by which any tax or duty may be granted or imposed for or in respect of tramways or of passengers conveyed thereupon.”

The question asked by the right hon. Gentleman was a very important one, in so far as it related to the intentions of Parliament. If Parliament passed these Bills, and gave power for the use of steam on tramways, the question of taxation must very properly be considered hereafter. At the present moment, he apprehended the position of the House to be this—The question of the use of steam on tramways had been raised upon a certain number of Provisional Orders and Private Bills. Each of the cases had been investigated upon its merits by the same Select Committee. That Committee had decided, first of all, that certain regulations should be introduced in all cases in which steam power was to be allowed; and, secondly, it had decided to recommend that in the case of each individual Bill, it was a proper case for the application of steam. It was obvious that if they were to allow steam power to be used, it was impossible not to allow it in cases where the same state of things prevailed. Of course, each case must necessarily be examined on its merits. As to what the particular merits of that Bill might be, he had no knowledge at all, except that the Committee had recommended the House to pass it. The merits of the case did not, however, attract much attention in the discussion; but the discussion had rather turned upon the question whether steam power was to be used at all. If it were to be used, it must be used under regulations. Regulations had been prepared by the Committee, which had paid great attention to the subject. These regulations were inserted to prevent danger, and they went, as far as possible, to mitigate any inconvenience which was likely to arise to the public. They also laid down further restrictions, and gave power to the public and to the local authorities to appeal for further protection to the Board of Trade. If it were necessary to give further powers, he imagined they might easily be given. He apprehended there would be no difficulty in making further regulations; and, considering the care with which the subject had been investigated by the Committee, he thought it only reasonable that the House should adopt the conclusions of the Committee.

LORD ELOHO said, that before the House went to a division, he should like to put a question. It was said that in regard to those who travelled by these tramways, the use of steam would probably cheapen the fares and facilitate the convenience to the public. The question he wished to put had reference, however, to the people who did not travel by them, but who were likely to be injured by them. In the 21st clause of the Bill, it was provided that securities for the protection and convenience of the public should be laid down by the Board of Trade, and the clause made reference to Schedule A, in which the securities were tabulated. The House had been told that the Committee had come to the conclusion that in principle it was desirable that the use of steam should be permitted, instead of horse power upon tramways, provided that due securities were taken for the protection of the public. He wished to ask the hon. Gentleman the Member for Warwick, whether, looking at the Bill as it now stood, his opinion as Chairman of the Committee was, that the securities now embodied in the Bill were such as the Committee intended the public should have, and were sufficient for the security of the public who did not travel by tramways?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL remarked, that if he were in Order in replying to the question of the noble Lord, he would say that the Committee very carefully considered the mechanical appliances that were to provide safeguards for the protection of the public; and they took as their text some regulations which had already been drawn up by the Board of Trade. They examined the regulations on their merits, and had adopted some and modified others. Certain suggestions which were made to the Committee were rejected, on the ground that they were unnecessary or were deemed to be dangerous, because they would tend to confuse the driver, and to take off from him the responsibility which should properly attach to him. Then, again, other suggestions were rejected, because they were such as mechanical science had not perfected; and therefore it was considered that the present was not the time for insisting upon them. Powers were, however, given to the Board of Trade to make fresh bye-laws from time to time in regard to these mechanical appliances, if they should consider alterations or additional regulations to be necessary; and the bye-laws, so made, would apply to every Private Bill and every Provisional Order.

LORD ELCHO said, the point he had raised was, whether the Bill would give security to the public?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL said, the securities taken were, in his opinion, sufficient.

MR. MAC IVER was of opinion that the Bill ought not to be passed until ample securities were provided for the protection of the public.

MR. GRAY trusted, that if the House did not think fit to pass the Bill, the proposal for adjourning the consideration of the question would be agreed to; because it would be a great injustice to the promoters of these six Bills, which were introduced at the beginning of the Session, to reject them after they had been affirmed by the Select Committee. He understood that these were the only Tramway Bills which contained powers for the use of steam; and he had no doubt whatever that the promoters would be ready to strike out, if it were necessary, all the provisions relating to the use of steam, rather than lose the entire measure. The Motion now proposed by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) was to reject the Bills entirely. He (Mr. Gray) thought that would be unjust and unwise.

Tramways were very much desired by the public, and, even with the clauses relating to steam struck out, the Bills now before the House would be very useful. The sweeping proposition of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex would, therefore, not only be a terrible injustice to the promoters, but would occasion great inconvenience to the public. All that discussion would have been avoided, if the Government had taken a bolder course in reference to the matter. Last year the Government introduced a Bill dealing with the question of the use of steam on tramways, and why they had not again introduced it this year he (Mr. Gray) was at a loss to know. It would have been far better for the Government to have taken up the question as proposed last year, instead of leaving it to be settled by a Select Committee upon a Private Bill.

MR. PULESTON thought it would be hard that these Bills should be rejected merely because they contained provisions for the use of steam power. He had authority from the persons who represented the promoters of two of the Bills to say that they did not value at all the provisions for the use of steam power in proportion to the passing of the rest of their measures. He would, therefore, if in Order, move that the Bill be re-committed, with the view of allowing the matter to be reconsidered.

MR. SPEAKER: There is already an Amendment before the House, and no other Amendment can be moved until that has been disposed of.

MR. PULESTON asked, if he would be in Order in moving that the debate be adjourned?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member has exhausted his right to speak upon the Question.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DELAHUNTY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

MR. RAIKES hoped the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna), who had moved the adjournment of the debate, would not persevere with that Motion. The matter had now received very full consideration at the hands of the House, and it was hardly to be expected that a greater amount of information would be supplied in any future debate than they had already before them. He (Mr. Raikes) had not intended to take any part in the debate, because he thought the course taken by the Select Committee had been sufficiently vindicated by the hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel). Whatever his (Mr. Raikes's) opinion might be in regard to the abstract question, he could not help feeling that the matter had been carefully investigated by the Committee. He spoke himself as one who was not altogether in love with the use of locomotives or steam power on the public roads. He viewed with dissatisfaction and some distrust the course taken by the Legislature of late years in allowing engines of this sort to perambulate the public roads; but, in regard to these particular Bills, he thought the House at that time was dealing too late with the question. This discussion should have been raised at the proper time, inasmuch as the objections taken by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex and the hon. Member for Glamorganshire were second reading objections, and not objections which applied to the third reading. When the matter was brought before the House in the first instance—and he (Mr. Raikes) had called attention to these Bills as early as the 8th of February in the present year—that was the proper time for raising the question. He was bound to say that it would be very hard upon the promoters of these particular Bills, that, because the House had suddenly changed its mind, they should suffer for what was not their own fault. It appeared to him—although he did not concur in all the recommendations of the Select Committee, and although he should watch with some little interest and some little doubt the result of the experiment now proposed—it appeared to him that they would be doing an injustice to the suitors to Parliament if they were to refuse to read these Bills a third time. Under these circumstances, he trusted the hon. Member for Youghal would not persevere with his Motion; but that the House would be allowed to come to a conclusion upon the Aberdeen Bill, which might facilitate the progress of the other measures. He reminded the House that the Bills would still have to go to the House of Lords, and that the principle involved in them might be raised there.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that under those circumstances, so ably pointed out by the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, he would ask leave of the House to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. PARNELL wished to ask a question before the House came to a division. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) had pointed out to the House that last year the Government proposed a Tramway Bill which was not proceeded with, but referred to a Select Committee, which Committee had since reported. He wished to know if the Government had any intention of considering the whole question of the use of steam power on tramways, and of initiating legislation upon the subject; or, whether they proposed to leave it to individual tramway companies to include provisions of this nature in their applications to Parliament? He was desirous of pointing out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the course of the House would be very much simplified if the Government would grapple with the subject by independent legislation of their own. There would then be no necessity for continual discussions on the subject of motive power on tramways, whenever Bills of this kind came on for consideration.

MR. DELAHUNTY did not think that the powers now asked for by private companies of using steam power upon the public roads had been sufficiently considered, and the Bill ought not to pass the third reading until the clauses relating to steam were removed from it. The Bill would be very easily disposed of if these clauses were taken away. He gathered from the discussion which had taken place that the public were asked to give up half the road to private companies, and, in addition, to allow steam engines to run upon the roads, which would have the effect of depriving the public of the entire use of the road in any instance. He fully endorsed what the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) had said—that by allowing steam tramways to be used upon the public road, they actually made a present of the road to the tramway company. If, then, there were to be a steam tramway upon a public road, he thought it ought to belong to the road authorities, and the Government should give power to the local authorities to establish steam tramways wherever it was considered necessary. He was in favour of having tramways and railroads in all directions, but he thought that the tramways on the public roads should be under the control of the local authorities. Under these circumstances, and being of opinion that these tramway Bills should be postponed until proper provision was made for the protection of the public, he would move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Delahunty.)

VISCOUNT SANDON stated, that he was not responsible for any legislation which had taken place upon the question, either last Session or in the present; but, in answer to the question which had been put by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Parnell), he must say that as far as the Government were concerned they did not see at the present moment any necessity for general legislation upon the question. Of course, it would be necessary for the House to consider the matter carefully. He believed, however, that it been very carefully inquired into by the Select Committee, and the reasons they gave for affirming these Bills were so strong as to make it right not to oppose the decision to which they had arrived. That was the position which the Government assumed, and he hoped the House would be satisfied that there had been no haste in the matter. The subject had been fully investigated, not only by the Committee which sat this year, but by a Committee which sat all through last year, and which reported in favour of authorizing the use of steam on tramways.

MR. BIGGAR thought it would be well to adjourn the consideration of these Bills, so as to give an opportunity for striking out the steam clauses rather than sacrifice the whole measure. The Committee who investigated the subject had reported that it was desirable that steam tramways, under certain restrictions, should be permitted; but the House did not know whether or not these particular conditions applied to the Bill now before them. Of that they had no evidence whatever. Another question also arose—namely, to what extent the Committee which sat upon these Bills were informed of the real facts of the case? He was one who thought that the evidence adduced by the promoters of the Bills was not likely to be thoroughly impartial. The promoters, no doubt, made out the best case they could, and any evidence they tendered would be that of parties who were settled with outside before the matter came on for decision. For these reasons, he thought it desirable that a general Act should be brought in by the Government, which should apply to the whole question, and upon which there might be a full opportunity for discussion. He thought the best course would be to adjourn the debate.

Question put, and negatived.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 216; Noes 119: Majority 97.—(Div. List, No. 173.)

On Question, "That the Bill be now read the third time?"

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he understood that the House had now divided in favour of the third reading of the Bill. It appeared to him that, on the part of a large number of hon. Members, there was a very serious doubt as to whether the steam clauses imported into the Bill, and which involved a most important principle, had been sufficiently considered. It was thought right to bring under the notice of the Government the propriety of giving further powers to the Board of Trade for the regulation of tramways. He was strongly of opinion that the question of authorizing the use of steam on tramways ought to be further considered. He would, therefore, move that the Bill be re-committed, with a view to the further consideration of the clauses which gave the power of working these tramways by steam.

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out to the hon. Member that, after the vote of the House upon the Amendment moved by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex, no other Amendment can be moved. The Question I have now to put is, that the Bill be now read the third time.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

ENDOWED SCHOOL COMMISSIONERS— EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. RATHBONE asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, having regard to the 12th section of "The Endowed Schools Act, 1869," which directs that "in framing schemes under this Act provision shall be made so far as conveniently may be for extending to girls the benefits of endowments," he can inform the House how far the Commissioners have been able to give effect to that direction; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a tabulated statement of the Schemes in which such provision has been made?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Endowed Schools Commissioners have not lost sight of the section referred to, nor of the intention of Parliament in passing it. They have, however, found the same practical difficulty in giving full effect to it experienced by their Predecessors, and alluded to in their Report of December, 1876. The results, though falling short of what could be wished, are not in themselves inconsiderable, but could hardly be stated within the limits of a Parliamentary answer. A tabular statement, such as is asked for, could only be given after considerable trouble and research; but if the hon. Gentleman will confer with me, I shall be glad to go as far as I can in giving him all necessary information.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF MR. JOHN DALY.—QUESTION.

MR. GRAY asked the Postmaster General, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. John Daly, late travelling clerk in the Irish Post Office Service, who was compulsorily retired subsequent to an accident to a train in which he was travelling; whether his attention has been called to the evidence given by the medical doctor to the Post Office, Dr. Toler, on the occasion of a suit for compensation instituted by Mr. Daly against the Railway Company to the effect that he was suffering from "mental derangement," which was completely disproved on the trial, and disbelieved by the jury; whether his attention has been called to the evidence given by the same gentleman, in the cases of Crawford, Darby, and Hilliard, who at various times took proceedings for compensation for injury by Railway accidents, and which referred their sufferings to totally different causes from those testified by the qualified medical witnesses who had attended them; and, whether he will cause independent inquiry to be made in the case of Daly, with a view to remedying any injustice which it may appear has been done him?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, my attention has been called to the case of John Daly, a sorter in the Irish Post Office Service; but I may say, without going into the details of the result of the inquiry that has been held, that Daly's conduct and the letters he has addressed to headquarters tend strongly to confirm the view that has been taken by Dr. Toler, and I have no reason to believe that injustice has been done, or that any advantage would be gained by further investigation. With regard to the other cases in which Crawford, Darby, and Hilliard have from time to time taken or threatened proceedings against railway companies for alleged injuries, my attention has also been called to them, and I see no reason to doubt that the opinion expressed by Dr. Toler was correct.

MR. GRAY, in consequence of the answer he had received, gave Notice of his intention to call attention to this matter at the earliest opportunity.

LAW AND JUSTICE—ASSIZES AND QUARTER SESSIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. WILLIAMS WYNN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the fact that certain Assizes have been already fixed by the Judges for the week during which the Quarter Sessions are by Act of Parliament directed to be held which will prevent those Sessions being held upon their accustomed days in that week, and to the inconvenience that will thus be caused to the magistrates, counsel, and jurors; and, if he will be prepared, by a short Act of Parliament, to extend the operation of the Act 4 and 5 Will. 4, c. 47, to the Midsummer Sessions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he was aware that it had happened in more cases than one that certain Assizes had been fixed by the Judges for the week in which the Quarter Sessions were held under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, and this, no doubt, led to some inconvenience. A Committee of Judges, together with the Lord Chancellor and himself, had been considering the subject, with a view to make arrangements for the future, by which the inconvenience which had thus been occasioned would be avoided; and it was not worth while, therefore, to bring in a Bill that Session.

INDIA — THE JOWAKI AFREEDIS EXPEDITION.—QUESTION.

MR. HERSCHELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Despatches relating to the military proceedings against the Jowaki Afreedis have been forwarded by the Governor General to this Country; and, if not, whether he can explain the cause of the delay?

MR. E. STANHOPE, in reply, said, that the despatches referring to the subject had been received.

ARMY — AUXILIARY FORCES — THE MILITIA—FINES FOR DRUNKENNESS.

QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, What decision has been come to with regard to the disposal of the amount annually derived from fines for drunkenness in Militia regiments, which it was stated last Session would be referred to a Departmental Committee, and whether that Committee will shortly make their report?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that the Departmental Committee to whom the question had been referred had made their Report, and that their recommendations on the subject had been forwarded to the Treasury, with whose approval he hoped they would meet.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—QUESTION.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he can name the day on which he will move the Education Votes in Committee of Supply?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, he was afraid he could not name the exact day, but would endeavour to inform the hon. Gentleman as early as possible when those Votes would be brought on.

PHYSICAL COMPETITION FOR THE ARMY.—QUESTION.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he intends to lay upon the Table the Report of the Joint Committee of the War Office of the Civil Service Commissioners appointed to consider the question, whether the present literary examinations for the Army should be supplemented by physical competition?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, he had no objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Report referred to. In doing so, however, it must be understood that it was without prejudice to any action that might, or might not, be taken upon it.

TRAMWAYS—MECHANICAL POWER.

QUESTION.

COLONEL BEAUMONT asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is empowered to grant licences for the experimental use of steam or other mechanical power on Tramways, in accordance with paragraph 8 of the Report of the Select Committee on Tramways (Use of Mechanical Power) Bills; and, if not, whether the Government will bring in a Bill authorizing the Board of Trade to place all Tramway Companies on the same footing, whether they have or have not applied during the present Session of Parliament for Confirmation of Provisional Orders?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I have no power to grant licences for the experimental use of steam or other mechanical power on tramways; and after what has passed on the subject in the House to-day, I think the hon. and gallant Gentleman will agree with me that, supposing we considered general legislation desirable, it would be almost impossible for me to pass a Bill at this period of the Session.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—YEOMANRY SERGEANT MAJORS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MILNE-HOME asked the Secretary of State for War, What scale of pensions or compensation will be given to those Sergeant Majors in regiments of Yeomanry Cavalry who have acted as Adjutants, Quartermasters, and Paymasters, and who must shortly be superseded by officers on full pay from the Army?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that no scale of pensions was laid down for the rank and file; but, inasmuch as it had been brought to his knowledge that some of those non-commissioned officers had been performing duties which ought to be discharged by officers of a higher rank, they would be superseded, and it was his intention to apply for special allowances for them. Otherwise they would receive only 3s. 3d. a-day.

THE CHARITY COMMISSION—NORTH SUNDERLAND HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Vice President of the Council as representing the Charity Commissioners, Whether any application has been made by the trustees of the Crewe Estate to sanction the appropriation of surplus funds of that trust for the improvement of the "North Sunderland Harbour;" and, if so, what reply has been given, and, if favourable, what amount is authorized to be spent on the improvement?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that there had been some correspondence, but it was not yet concluded, between the Charity Commissioners and the trustees of the Charity to which he believed the Question had reference. The Charity Commissioners had informed the trustees that they were prepared to advise the appropriation of the surplus funds in question for the improvement of North Sunderland Harbour, as soon as they had been furnished by the trustees with professional opinion upon the expenditure involved, the means of meeting it, and the benefits which were likely to be derived from their application in that way.

NAVY—RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE DOCKYARDS—THE CLERKS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, When the re-organization of the clerical staff of the dockyards is likely to be proceeded with; and, whether, pending such re-organisation, the Admiralty will follow the precedent established by them in the case of the Admiralty clerks who in February last received an increase of pay as a preliminary to their re-organization?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the re-organization of the clerical staff of the Dockyards will be proceeded with as soon as the re-organization of the clerical staff in London is completed. The increase of salary given to the clerks in the Departments in London was given on special grounds, and not as a preliminary to the re-organization of the departments. I cannot hold out any prospect of a preliminary increase of the salaries of the clerks employed in the Dockyards, as the circumstances of the case are wholly dissimilar from that of the clerks of the Admiralty.

LOCAL COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. J. P. CORRY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he can name the day on which he will proceed with the Local Courts of Bankruptcy (Ireland) Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON): In the present state of the Public Business, Sir, I cannot name a day for proceeding with the Bill in question; but I shall take the earliest opportunity that may be afforded me of doing so.

MERCHANT SEAMEN BILL — THE SELECT COMMITTEE.—QUESTIONS.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he would state why the Petition of the British Seamen's Society referred to the Select Committee on the Merchant Shipping Bill by this House has not been printed with the Minutes of Evidence taken before that Committee, and why the evidence of one seaman only representing the interests of that class has been taken before that Committee?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I was not a Member of the Select Committee on the Merchant Seamen Bill, and the arrangements respecting the evidence, I believe, were made by the Chairman of the Committee, my noble Friend the former President of the Board of Trade, and in conjunction with the Members of the Committee. I regret, therefore, that I am unable to give him the information he desires.

MR. GOURLEY asked, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to proceed this Session with the Amended Merchant Seamen Bill?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I have read carefully the volume of evidence taken by the Select Committee on the Merchant Seamen Bill, of which I was not a Member, and which was just concluding taking evidence when I became responsible for the Board of Trade. The evidence is of a very important character, both in its bearing upon the Bill, and also as raising very large questions connected with the Mercantile Marine Service; and it was, I find, only circulated on Saturday. It is obvious that, before we proceed further to legislate on the subject, those who are connected with the Mercantile Marine, both in Parliament and in the country, should have an opportunity of fully considering not only the Bill as it has left the Committee, but also the important evidence. And, as regards myself, I must frankly say that I am not prepared either to reject or to adopt many of the important suggestions made in it, without having had ample time to confer with others of large knowledge and experience respecting these matters, and to form my own independent judgment on the questions at issue. For these reasons alone, I think the House will agree with me that it is desirable to postpone the Bill to another Session. But, be this as it may, the Public Business on which Parliament is already engaged, and the short time left for the transaction of it, would make it impossible for me to hope to pass a measure of this importance at this late period of the Session.

ARMY—THE TYRONE FUSILIERS— RATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether an officer of the Royal Tyrone Fusiliers in barracks at Omagh, who is also a grazier and dealer in live stock, having failed to sell in open market as fit for food a huge old sow no longer suitable for breeding purposes, succeeded in disposing of it to the meat contractor of his regiment; whether the meat contractor was permitted to supply the flesh of the animal as pork to the men of the Tyrone Fusiliers at the full contract price for good meat; whether some of the men did refuse to receive this pork at all, and whether the remainder did not throw it away as unfit for human use; whether it is not the case that the same officer has been already subject of complaint for his action towards the sergeants of the staff of the regiment in requiring them to supply themselves with meat from butchers designated by him; whether the officer in question is not a near relative of the colonel commanding the regiment; and, whether Government will institute a full inquiry into all the circumstances?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the Question of the hon. Member was amusingly put; but, nevertheless, it conveyed a somewhat serious imputation. The hon. Member had asked him a Question in reference to the matter at two hours' Notice on the last morning before the Whitsuntide Recess. He (Colonel Stanley) telegraphed to Ireland, and though the answer was not received before the hon. Member put his Question, it was received before the House adjourned, and the substance of it was immediately communicated to him. The allegation was distinctly denied. It was stated that there was no complaint whatever, and no appearance of discontent. Before the House adjourned, he asked the hon. Member to give his authority for the statement he had made, in order that he might follow the matter up. The hon. Gentleman had not, however, thought fit to comply with that request up to the present time. After waiting some days, he desired a letter to the same effect to be addressed to him, but to that letter he had received no reply. He would have no objection to institute inquiry into the case, when there was prima facie evidence sufficient to justify him in doing so; but until then, he would not, of course, take any notice of the matter.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that to put himself in Order he would conclude by moving the adjournment of the House. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had, in his résumé of the conversation which had occurred between them, forgotten to mention one essential point—that he had told him that among his informants were soldiers of the Militia regiment in question. He had since, he might add, made further inquiries, and had received more letters, not only from soldiers, but from inhabitants of the town, and he should be happy to place these in the hands of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, if he would satisfy him that the persons who had thus written to him as a Member of Parliament would not suffer—[“Oh, oh!”]—from any disciplinary measure in consequence. This was not a mere condition of his own. The persons who had written to him requested their names should be kept secret; but they asked for an investigation, and they stated that, if the Government chose, they could find plenty of evidence on the spot.

MR. MACARTNEY hoped the House would allow him to state what were the real facts of the case.

MR. SPEAKER: I beg to remind the hon. Member that he is not in Order, as there is no Motion before the House. The hon. Member for Dungarvan has not concluded with any Motion.

MR. MACARTNEY: The hon. Member for Dungarvan said he would conclude with a Motion; but he did not do so.

MR. O'DONNELL: I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House do now adjourn.”—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

MR. MACARTNEY again rose. He said, he would not have intruded on the House with this question, but he had received a letter from his son, who was the officer of the regiment who examined the rations on the day in question.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is proceeding to the discussion of a Question; but there is no Question before the House.

Colonel Stanley

MR. MACARTNEY understood that the hon. Member for Dungarvan had moved the adjournment of the House. If he was not in Order, he would sit down; if he was, he would go on.

MR. SPEAKER repeated that there was no Question before the House.

MR. MACARTNEY said, in that case, he would beg to second the Motion. He had received a letter from his son, in which he stated that the contractor was entitled to issue pork rations twice a week, but that the men were not compelled to take them, and could obtain beef rations instead. On the day in question four pork rations were refused, and beef rations were issued in their place. One man refused the ration of beef because it was too bony, and another ration was given to him, about which he made no complaint whatever. He believed this was the origin of the complaint brought forward by the hon. Member.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

QUEEN'S COLLEGES (IRELAND) — THE ESTIMATES.—QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Queen's College Estimates will be proposed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am not able at this moment to name a day for taking the Queen's College Estimates. I think it will be convenient that the Bill relating to Intermediate Education in Ireland should be introduced in the other House first; and that, I hope, may be done soon—possibly, in the present week. After that proceeding, I shall probably be in a position to state when the Estimates in question can be taken.

TURKEY—THE MURDER OF MR. OGLE. QUESTION.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What is the result of Mr. Consul General Fawcett's inquiry into the murder of the late Mr. Charles Ogle in Thessaly; and, whether the Government intend to institute a fresh inquiry?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it would be more convenient time possible for carrying on a discussion of this kind, in which very large in questions affecting both our foreign and our Indian policy will be raised. Even since I gave Notice of my Motion I may remind the House that an Amendment has been put down on the Paper by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), which shows the very wide, and it may be even the mischievous, issues that may be raised. Sorry as I am to withdraw a Motion of this kind—because I feel the act is liable to misrepresentation, and feeling that it is no light thing to bring such a complaint against such a speaker, at the same time I do not think I should be justified, in the face of the feeling against this Motion which has been growing, and which has certainly grown largely since it was received with cheers by this House. I should not be justified in proceeding with a Motion of this description, which might not only exaggerate differences at home, but would do that which I earnestly wish to avoid—namely, the spreading in India of a knowledge of the very language to which the Motion refers, and which I am anxious to condemn. Even, with all these reasons, I should not feel justified in withdrawing a Motion of this kind, involving a very grave complaint against a very important Member of this House; but I would ask the House to remember, that in the very terms of my Notice of that complaint, I have produced the evidence on which I rest the charge. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER intimated to the hon. Member that he must keep within the limits of an answer to the Question which had been put to him. He was not entitled to enter on a discussion as to the merits of the Motion.

MR. HANBURY: I do not wish to go beyond the fair limits of debate, and will only further say that, with the permission of the House, I will be glad to withdraw my Motion.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish, Sir, to take my stand on an appeal to the indulgence of the House, and to avoid making one of those Motions for the adjournment of the House, which are certainly inconvenient on account of their interfering with the course of Public Business. But the circumstances of this case are peculiar. A transaction, entirely unknown to me until I heard it a few minutes ago in common with other hon. Gentlemen in this House, has passed between the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) and the hon. Member who has just sat down, and I think that the House may feel that they are entitled to know from me whether I challenge the resolution of the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Motion of which he gave Notice; or, if I acquiesce in that resolution, why I acquiesce in it, seeing that the hon. Gentleman has made an appeal to the House for their permission to do that which, so far as I am aware, he was entitled to do without any permission whatever. I believe that as he was master enough to give this Notice, and to use what I presume he would call his discretion in giving it, so he is likewise master enough to withdraw it. But it is difficult for me to listen in silence to the statement of the hon. and gallant Baronet that he thinks I myself must feel that the Motion ought to be withdrawn, because the Congress is sitting, and to the statement of the hon. Gentleman, who says that he feels it would be inconvenient and injurious that this Motion should be discussed, and that he likewise finds that it is opposed to the general sense of the House. No doubt, Sir, there are strong reasons why the hon. Gentleman should not proceed with the Motion, which I think the hon. Gentleman might have taken into his view at an earlier period. The hon. Gentleman gave his Notice deliberately, and, as I am informed—for I was absent, and I was not made aware by him that any Notice was about to be given—as I am informed, and as he states, it was given amid cheers, which he calls the cheers of the House, and which I am told certainly were the rather animated cheers of a portion of this House, who appeared to have sympathized with, and to have joined their counsels with those of the hon. Gentleman, and from their collective wisdom to have produced this Notice. Now, it appears to me that no such Notice ought to be given unless in circumstances in which it can be persevered with. As long as it is a mere Notice, it is not within the jurisdiction of anyone except the person who gives it. I except, of course, those peculiar circumstances in which you, Sir, as the organ of the House, see ground for objecting to the retention of a Notice on the

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTIONS.

In answer to Mr. CHAPLIN,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that on Tuesday he would be able to fix the day for the discussion of the Cattle Plague Bill, and that on Thursday further Estimates would be taken in connection with the Army.

MR. W. HOLMS: I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question, of which I have given him private Notice—Whether, looking to the importance of the Motion of which I have given Notice for to-morrow night, and which asks for the appointment of a Select Committee in regard to the Established Church in Scotland, whether he will allow the discussion on that subject to be taken at the early Sitting to-morrow? It may be in the recollection of the right hon. Baronet that I gave way, and did not bring forward my Resolution on a previous occasion, in order to allow the debate to proceed on the moving of the Indian troops to Malta. I balloted for another day, and, having got the first place for to-morrow night, I think I have some claim on the Government. In the event of the Chancellor of the Exchequer not seeing his way to give me the Morning Sitting, I would ask him to use his endeavours to make a House in the evening.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Government are well aware of the importance of the question the hon. Gentleman is about to raise, and they are also aware that he kindly gave way to allow an adjourned debate to proceed. Therefore, he can rest assured the Government will do all in their power to obtain for him a good audience; and, as the Morning Sitting will be devoted to an important Scotch matter, no doubt a good number of Members will be present.

MR. ONSLOW asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government intended to stop the ordinary Business of the House before 12.30, in order to give facilities for the progress of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is not in our power to stop the progress of the ordinary Business.

MR. MAC IVER gave Notice that in consequence of the answer of the President of the Board of Trade to the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley), he would take an early opportunity of bringing forward his Motion on the subject of Merchant Seamen. He was afraid there would not be time this Session, but he would take the first opportunity next Session.

THE "NINETEENTH CENTURY"—THE ARTICLE ON LIBERTY IN THE EAST AND WEST—(MR. GLADSTONE)— MR. HANBURY'S MOTION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT: I wish, Sir, to put a Question to the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Hanbury), of which I have given him private Notice. I am sure that it must be his own opinion, and I am sure it must also be the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, that, at a time when the Congress is sitting, the Motion of which the hon. Member has given Notice would be very inopportune. I, therefore ask him, Whether it is not his intention to withdraw it?

MR. HANBURY: Sir, I am glad that my hon. and gallant Friend has asked me this Question, because I wish to state frankly to the House the course I intend to take. It is quite clear that a Motion of this kind is one that ought to be pressed forward for discussion at the earliest opportunity; and, at the same time, it is one that ought not only to be discussed, but ought also to be put to the fair test of a division and a vote. But, even now, this Notice stands only ninth on the Paper, and I have had no opportunity of bringing it forward; and I, as yet, fear that to-night, and even on Thursday, I may be again prevented. I am as anxious as I ever was to discuss the issue which I have chosen to raise by it. ["Oh, oh!"] It is usual in this House to believe the word of an hon. Member. I repeat, that I am still as anxious as I ever was to raise that question; but, at the same time, I cannot be blind to the fact that my wish is not supported by the Government, and that a large number of hon. Members are opposed to it on this side of the House. It is felt—and felt, I must admit, with some justice—that a time like this, when an European Congress has just commenced its sittings, is, perhaps, the worst time possible for carrying on a discussion of this kind, in which very large in questions affecting both our foreign and our Indian policy will be raised. Even since I gave Notice of my Motion I may remind the House that an Amendment has been put down on the Paper by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), which shows the very wide, and it may be even the mischievous, issues that may be raised. Sorry as I am to withdraw a Motion of this kind—because I feel the act is liable to misrepresentation, and feeling that it is no light thing to bring such a complaint against such a speaker, at the same time I do not think I should be justified, in the face of the feeling against this Motion which has been growing, and which has certainly grown largely since it was received with cheers by this House. I should not be justified in proceeding with a Motion of this description, which might not only exaggerate differences at home, but would do that which I earnestly wish to avoid—namely, the spreading in India of a knowledge of the very language to which the Motion refers, and which I am anxious to condemn. Even, with all these reasons, I should not feel justified in withdrawing a Motion of this kind, involving a very grave complaint against a very important Member of this House; but I would ask the House to remember, that in the very terms of my Notice of that complaint, I have produced the evidence on which I rest the charge. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER intimated to the hon. Member that he must keep within the limits of an answer to the Question which had been put to him. He was not entitled to enter on a discussion as to the merits of the Motion.

MR. HANBURY: I do not wish to go beyond the fair limits of debate, and will only further say that, with the permission of the House, I will be glad to withdraw my Motion.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish, Sir, to take my stand on an appeal to the indulgence of the House, and to avoid making one of those Motions for the adjournment of the House, which are certainly inconvenient on account of their interfering with the course of Public Business. But the circumstances of this case are peculiar. A transaction, entirely unknown to me until I heard it a few minutes ago in common with other hon. Gentlemen in this House, has passed between the hon. and gallant Baronet opposite (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) and the hon. Member who has just sat down, and I think that the House may feel that they are entitled to know from me whether I challenge the resolution of the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Motion of which he gave Notice; or, if I acquiesce in that resolution, why I acquiesce in it, seeing that the hon. Gentleman has made an appeal to the House for their permission to do that which, so far as I am aware, he was entitled to do without any permission whatever. I believe that as he was master enough to give this Notice, and to use what I presume he would call his discretion in giving it, so he is likewise master enough to withdraw it. But it is difficult for me to listen in silence to the statement of the hon. and gallant Baronet that he thinks I myself must feel that the Motion ought to be withdrawn, because the Congress is sitting, and to the statement of the hon. Gentleman, who says that he feels it would be inconvenient and injurious that this Motion should be discussed, and that he likewise finds that it is opposed to the general sense of the House. No doubt, Sir, there are strong reasons why the hon. Gentleman should not proceed with the Motion, which I think the hon. Gentleman might have taken into his view at an earlier period. The hon. Gentleman gave his Notice deliberately, and, as I am informed—for I was absent, and I was not made aware by him that any Notice was about to be given—as I am informed, and as he states, it was given amid cheers, which he calls the cheers of the House, and which I am told certainly were the rather animated cheers of a portion of this House, who appeared to have sympathized with, and to have joined their counsels with those of the hon. Gentleman, and from their collective wisdom to have produced this Notice. Now, it appears to me that no such Notice ought to be given unless in circumstances in which it can be persevered with. As long as it is a mere Notice, it is not within the jurisdiction of anyone except the person who gives it. I except, of course, those peculiar circumstances in which you, Sir, as the organ of the House, see ground for objecting to the retention of a Notice on the Notice Paper; and I cannot too strongly state that I feel how wisely, Sir, you have acted in taking no such objection in the present case. The Notice, then, stood on the Notice Paper; and, in my opinion, such a Notice, which is virtually a Notice for the expulsion of a Member of this House, not in form but virtually—and which can have no other possible result—such a Notice, I say, ought not to be given except with the firmest intention to persevere with it. The argument that it is difficult to find a night, and that it cannot come on on Monday, and probably cannot come on on Thursday, is an argument which, if it has any force at all, must have been fully in the view of the hon. Member at the time when he gave his Notice. Sir, I do not consider myself to be very greatly concerned in the Notice. It appears to me to be very much more, indeed, a matter between the hon. Member and the House than it is between him and me. If the hon. Member had made his Motion, the House would then have had jurisdiction over it, and the House would have had the power of considering whether, in respect to this proceeding of the hon. Member, it should take a course similar to that which was taken almost with unanimity on a very similar proceeding 40 years ago. But, Sir, he does not make that Motion, and I do not intend to challenge him to make that Motion. It is for the House to consider whether he should be challenged to do so. I, for my part, do not intend to challenge him to make it, and on this ground alone—that I think the general arguments in favour of going forward with a Motion of this kind are of a strength which cannot be overstated. But I own that after the description which it has pleased the hon. Gentleman to give of the article in which I have striven to do my duty as a loyal subject of the Crown—after that description has been attached to that article—I am by no means assured that a discussion upon the question would be for the public interest, I do not mean with reference to the Congress or anything that is going on in Europe. But I so far concur with the feeling which has, perhaps, prompted others, that, on the whole, I believe it might be best for the public interests connected with the topics to which the article was addressed, that if, in the circumstances of the case, the hon. Gentleman chooses not to persevere with his Notice, I should not assume the responsibility of challenging him to go on. In the circumstances, I do not intend to exercise any such right of challenge. I am in the hands of the House to move the adjournment or not. I do not mean to say more. I would have said less, but for what fell from the hon. Member, and the hon. and gallant Baronet who put this Question. I have no desire myself to prolong the discussion on the matter, and unless a wish be expressed for the adjournment of the House, I shall not move it.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EPPING FOREST BILL—[Bill 188.]

(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbelton, Mr. Noel.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the scheme proposed under this Bill would, on the whole, give great satisfaction to those persons who were interested in the preservation of Epping Forest. The arbitrator, to be appointed under the Bill, would have to determine what compensation should be given in respect of that part of the Forest which was some time ago wrongfully inclosed, and which would now be restored to the public. As many other questions would have to be decided by the arbitrator, it was hoped that the Government would state to the House who the arbitrator nominated by the Government would be. There were some objections to the Bill in points of detail. With regard to the constitution of the Board of Management, the Government were wise in confiding the preservation of the Forest mainly to the Corporation of the City of London, as they had shown a great interest, and taken an active part, in asserting the rights of the commoners. There were to be 12 members of the Corporation on the Committee of Management. He suggested the addition of two or three representatives of the East of London and other parts of the Metropolis that were specially interested in the preservation of the Forest. He held that the popular element should be represented on the Committee. It had been suggested that this might be done by the nomination of the hon. Members for the time being for Hackney and the Tower Hamlets, who might serve as ex-officio Members of the Committee. He also thought it not undesirable that some nominees of the Crown should be members of the Committee of Management. In saying that he did not wish to throw any doubt on the management of the Corporation of the City of London of the Forest. His only fear was, that they might do too much by attempting to convert the Forest into an ornamental park instead of simply preserving its natural beauty. He hoped the latter course would be adopted by the Committee. He objected to the method in which the Bill dealt with the rights of the inhabitants of Loughton. Many hon. Members of the House, he durst say, were aware that the inhabitants of Loughton had from time immemorial enjoyed the right of lopping trees of the Forest for firewood during the winter months. They believed they enjoyed that right through a grant of one of the Tudor Kings. They believed the grant was given on the condition that at midnight on every 11th of November they should perambulate the Forest and strike an axe into a particular tree. It certainly appeared that from time immemorial the inhabitants of Loughton had lopped trees upon a part of the Forest consisting of about 1,200 acres. The Bill proposed that the question of the validity of the right claimed by the inhabitants of Loughton should come before the arbitrator. The Epping Forest Commissioners had distinctly announced that this right existed, and, therefore, there could be no reason for putting the inhabitants to the great expense and possible risk of having their right decided upon by the arbitrator. Suppose the arbitrator decided that the custom or right existed, then the Bill provided that it should cease, and that compensation should be given to the inhabitants by means of an annual payment of money or by doles of fuel. That solution appeared to him to be a very unwise and unsatisfactory one. He ventured to suggest that the Bill should recognize the custom as it had existed from time immemorial, and that it should be left to the arbitrator to decide in what way that right should be exercised for the future; or if it were thought desirable that the custom or right should cease to exist, then that some compensation should be awarded by the arbitrator in a manner which might be clearly beneficial to the inhabitants of Loughton. He had to thank his hon. Friend opposite for bringing forward the Bill in this shape. He believed that, on the whole, it would give satisfaction to the people of London, and he ventured to hope that under this Bill the Forest of Epping would be restored to its original position as a forest containing something like 6,000 acres, instead of being curtailed to, say, about 3,000 acres—that, for generations to come, it would be left in its wild condition; that it would not be improved and ornamented, but be left as a forest in the widest sense.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that, after the way in which the Bill had been received by the hon. Gentleman opposite, he did not think it was necessary for him to trespass long on the time of the House. He agreed that the settlement of this long-vexed question would confer benefit, not only on the inhabitants of the district itself, but upon the dense population of London. With regard to the arbitrator, the appointment would be one which would, no doubt, command the complete confidence of the House. The arbitrator had been chosen; but the Government could not, at present, name him, as he had not really consented to serve. However, he hoped to be able to give the name of the gentleman before the Bill passed through Committee. The hon. Member for Reading had expressed an anxiety that the Conservators would not attempt to turn the Forest into an ornamental park, and he entirely agreed with him upon the point; because, if the Conservators would content themselves with improving the drainage of the land and effecting certain similar improvements, the Forest would remain one of the most enjoyable bits of wild scenery in the neighbourhood of London. The hon. Member had referred to one or two points on which he differed from the framers of the Bill. In the first place, he did not altogether approve the constitution of the authority who were to be intrusted with the management of the Forest. The hon. Member had, however, acknowledged fairly enough that, after the efforts the Corporation of the City of London had made for the preservation of the Forest, they were entitled to be intrusted with a large share in the management of the property, especially as the Corporation would have to provide funds for the payment of those claims which might be established before the arbitrator. Another body of people, who were deeply interested in the maintenance of the Forest as a recreation ground, consisted of the inhabitants of the localities abutting on the land so devoted to the benefit of the public; and, in the opinion of the Government, they were entitled to be represented on the Board of Conservators by those whom they might elect. It was therefore provided that the Verderers would be eventually elected by the commoners generally. Difficulties would arise in making any Members of that House ex-officio members of that Board, and, in his opinion, the Corporation of London would take sufficient care of the interests of the population of the East of London. He thought, on the whole, that the Government had selected those to act as Conservators who would fairly represent the people interested in the proper management of the Forest. The interests and feelings of the Crown would be sufficiently represented by the Ranger. He trusted that the Bill would now be read a second time, in order that it might be referred to a Select Committee, and that the result of its coming into operation would be to preserve the Forest for the recreation of the public, and to add one more to the air-breathing spaces of London.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE said, he was glad to be able to give his cordial support to the Bill. It embodied the main purposes of the agitation which had been raised on the question, and, at the same time, treated with indulgence those persons who had acted illegally. He thought that the Corporation ought not to have so predominant a share in the management of the Forest; but that some persons representing the feeling of those portions of the Metropolis which were contiguous to the Forest should be added to the Verderer and the executive committee, in order to secure more of a balance of power and a fuller consideration of various tastes and interests. He hoped that that matter would be dealt with in Committee.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee. Three to be nominated by the House, and two by the Committee of Selection.

VALUATION OF PROPERTY BILL.

[BILL 94.]

(Mr. Selater-Booth, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Salt.)

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [14th June], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on the Valuation of Property Bill).

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no re-adjustment of the system of assessment will be complete or satisfactory to ratepayers until a representative county board is established, with power of hearing appeals on questions of value, and for securing uniformity of assessment,"—(Mr. Clare Read),

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the House, that when the debate on this Bill stood adjourned on Friday last by lapse of time, the Question before the House was that the hon. Member for South Norfolk be permitted to withdraw his Amendment. The Question, therefore, that he had now to put, was—"Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn." ["No, no!"]

MR. J. R. YORKE said, that he could not allow this Bill to pass with silent acquiescence. Its direct effects would not be altogether satisfactory, but its indirect effects would be positively mischievous. The objects of the Bill were incontestably right; for it certainly was much better that there should be only one mode of making the assessment, and that it should be made by one authority, instead of three different authorities upon three different principles. It was equally incontestable that it would be beneficial to have an equality of contribution between one Union and another in a county. But it was upon the means of obtaining these objects that difficulties arose. The introduction of the surveyor of taxes would lead to an undue amount of centralization, and cause the Government to be unpopular in the country. Under the Bill, rents would be taken as the basis of assessment, the result of which would be most unfair and unsatisfactory. The Bill also was defective with regard to the subject of appeals, it giving an appeal from the better-informed to the worse-informed authority. The right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the measure alternated between two opinions. He wished to bring about a permanent assessment, and yet he seemed to have a desire to postpone arrangements for bringing about a lasting settlement until the County Boards Bill had been passed. It seemed to him to be a point open to considerable question whether, if the opportunity were lost this year of establishing County Boards, it would occur again for a very long time. The late Government proposed to deal with this question in a particular way, but they failed—either from want of time or opportunity. When Her Majesty's present Advisers took Office they also proposed to deal with the question, and to commence the process by reforming the existing system of county government. When he saw the County Boards Bill at the front of the Government measures relating to this question, he hoped that the Bill would be passed—with the elimination, perhaps, of the clumsy highway clauses—and thus the way would be cleared for further reforms in the same direction; but now the Government seemed to have shrunk back from the kernel of the business, and to be inclined to content themselves with its shell. If it were necessary that one of this series of Bills should be passed this Session, the County Boards Bill ought to be the first. But the Cattle Plague Bill was a measure of far greater urgency and importance to the agricultural interest, and ought to be dealt with before all the others. The strategy of the Government, in postponing the most important and putting forward the less important Bills, seemed to invite opposition; and the disposition of the Irish Members must have greatly changed within the last few days, if they were not disposed to make the most of the unwieldy bulk of this Bill. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman not to press this Bill further forward this Session, but to allow the House to devote its time to getting through the Cattle Plague Bill, and, if possible, the County Government Bill.

MR. RYLANDS: I am quite prepared to give every credit to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board for his desire to reform the local administration of the country, and I appreciate very highly the ability with which the right hon. Gentleman fulfils the duties of his important Office. Still, it is impossible to shut our eyes to the fact, that the group of measures that are now before the House having reference to his Department have by some means or other got into something very like a muddle. I think it is not very difficult to find out how it is that, notwithstanding the great ability of the right hon. Gentleman, these Bills have got into a state which is not fully satisfactory to either side of the House. I think it is simply because Her Majesty's Government have adopted in these measures a timid and feeble policy. They seem to me to have been influenced by several currents of opinion which have been moving in contrary directions. There is no doubt that there is a very powerful current of opinion at the head Office of the Local Government Board, which always moves in favour of centralization and increased authority on the part of the Government Department. There has also been another current which has been brought to bear upon the right hon. Gentleman from the counties and the agricultural societies, who have pressed upon the Government that the Local Government Board should provide greater facilities for the representation of opinion in the localities and greater power for the management of their own affairs by the ratepayers in those counties. This local current which is in favour of local government has been divided into two other subordinate currents. One current has been to obtain representation for the farmers and other ratepaying occupants of property in the counties, and who naturally say—"Let us manage our own affairs either by our own judgment, or, at all events, let us have a voice in the appointment of those who have to manage our various local affairs." The other local current is from the magistrates in the counties, who say—"We have a certain authority which we do not like to part with; we do not like the Government to bring forward any measure which would lessen our authority in the counties, or take it from us and give it to the ratepayers." The Bills before the House are a compromise between these three powerful opinions. The right hon. Gentleman has, no doubt, tried as far as possible to please these different classes of opinion, and the result has been that he has satisfied nobody. The great point in the compromise was, that the County Government Board Bill should be the first to be brought in and passed, and the Valuation and Highway Bills should hang upon the County Government Bill. We find that the circumstances have entirely altered. This compromise has disappeared, and we are told that the County Government Bill is not to be brought on. What lessons are we to learn from the present state of things? Simply, that where you have three powerful currents brought to bear upon the Government, the current which is least powerful will be pushed aside. The farmers have the least power, and, consequently, they have gone to the wall. The other currents of opinion remain to a very large extent embodied in the Bills now before the House. I know the right hon. Gentleman says he is not in favour of centralization, and I am quite prepared to believe it; but he is surrounded by public officials who are all in favour of centralization. [Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but I know very well how these public officials say—"You must take care to keep the power of the Government over the local administration;" and so it is that the surveyor of taxes occupies a very important position in the Bill, for that satisfies the current of opinion among the permanent officials of the Department; and then, on the other hand, the whole question of valuation in reference to appeals is left in the hands of the county justices, and the farmers and ratepaying occupants of the counties are refused any additional voice in the determination of the ultimate decision with regard to valuation. I should like, if it were possible, that the right hon. Gentleman would place himself in this position for a short time, and get rid of official ideas. If he would go down to his county, and look at the question from a point of view of a ratepayer or farmer, he would form a very different judgment. The fact is, it is no use telling the people in counties that you can manage their business for them better than they can do it for themselves. I dare say you can; but they want to have a voice in the management of their own affairs; they do not want to be controlled by any Government officials, or the entire power to be left in the hands of the, no doubt, highly respected body of magistrates who are yet in no sense possessed of a representative character. I believe that the assessment committees have acted remarkably well; and I am strongly of opinion that additional experience would enable them still further to improve the system of valuation over which they preside. But the assessment committees are not trusted by the right hon. Gentleman, and he, therefore, brings in the surveyor of taxes. I observed that the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) seemed to be astonished at more not being said on this side of the House on that subject. I stand here with the view of protesting against the position the surveyor of taxes occupies under this Bill. I am sorry to say that, in consequence of the change that has taken place in the structure of the Bill, an impression has been produced in the country that a great concession has been made in reference to the position of the surveyor of taxes. Now, I recollect very well, when the Bill was before the House on a former occasion last year, that the surveyor of taxes occupied a very powerful position in that Bill, so powerful that it was clear that if he continued to occupy it, the assessment committees would practically feel themselves placed in the position of nonentities. There is an alteration in the position of the surveyor, certainly; but what is the position now? The assessment committee will, according to the best of their judgment, decide upon the value of property in their locality. That judgment will be differed from by the surveyor of taxes, who will have the power not only of appealing against the assessment committee to the petty sessions and the quarter sessions, but of having a special case taken up to the High Court of Justice. The right hon. Gentleman said that it was necessary to have this power of appeal in order that justice might be done to the poor ratepayer. But the surveyor of taxes would appeal against the assessment committee with the whole power of the Government at his back; and, therefore, he would have appeal after appeal, so as to make the assessment committees hesitate before taking up a position in opposition to him. I am sorry that the surveyor of taxes, although under a different form, is maintained in a position of such power and authority. I do not object to the assessment committee taking advantage of the experience of the surveyor of taxes. I think the committee will necessarily go to the surveyor of taxes and get from him very valuable information. But at present he is only an assistant of theirs; he is not in a position in which he can harass and control the committee. I will oppose any plan for putting the finger of the Government into local administration in such a form as will prevent additional power being given to the local administrators. With regard to the assessment committees, I know something about them. I have never sat upon them; but I know very well the kind of work which is done by them in the district with which I am connected. I say you have upon them magistrates who, from their knowledge, their experience, and their ability, are eminently suited for the position in which they are placed, and you have associated with them members of Boards of Guardians who also are men of great practical knowledge of the property in the neighbourhood. These assessment committees form a board which, I believe, is really unequalled for the purpose. They have generally great knowledge of the circumstances of the locality, and great knowledge of the value of property, and as they have every reason to deal with the matter in such a way as is likely to be satisfactory to the ratepayers, whom they represent, I think that instead of taking away from the weight and authority of the assessment committees, you should increase it and improve them in every possible way; and, to do this, you should not discourage efficient men sitting upon them. But my fear is that the course Government are taking—not only in this Bill, but in other measures—will have the effect of driving capable men away from Public Business by always thrusting in the control of the Government. I think that there should be no appeal to petty sessions from the decision of the assessment committee. In my opinion, it is altogether absurd that decisions of an assessment committee should be reviewed by magistrates who were not to be compared to the committee for their knowledge of the subject in hand. Therefore, I think the right hon. Gentleman should, without any hesitation, strike out the appeal to the petty sessions. If the Unions only were concerned, I suppose everybody would agree that it mattered comparatively little whether property within the Union was assessed upon a low level, or upon a high level, provided the whole of the property was equally assessed. But we are not dealing with the Unions alone; we have to consider that the property assessed in the Union will have to pay towards the common funds of the county. Therefore, it is of great consequence that the basis of assessment in one Union should be upon the same lines as the basis of assessment in the other Unions. I think that there should be a County Board with power to consider whether the valuations of the Unions in a county were on a basis which would render them fair as between Union and Union. It is, in my opinion, quite right that if there were a valuation list in one Union that was much lower than that of another, or based on a principle that was not fair as regarded the other Unions, there should be some county authority who should have the power of deciding how the respective Unions should deal with the valuation list. This was, in point of fact, the crucial question of the Bill; the real point being how to get a county authority to step in between Union and Union to settle what the basis should be. The hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Olare Read), who has done a good deal of service by the part he has taken in the consideration of these matters, has put upon the Paper a Notice of Amendment, by which he challenges the opinion of the House on this crucial point of the Bill. It appears, however, that the hon. Member, having delivered his fire, now wishes to run away from his guns. In my opinion, the hon. Gentleman ought not to do anything of the sort. On the contrary, he ought to stand by his principle, which appears to be a sound one. The Amendment of the hon. Member is—

“That no re-adjustment of the system of assessment will be complete or satisfactory to the ratepayers until a representative county board is established with the power of hearing appeals on questions of valuation and for securing uniformity of assessment."

I will not say that I go with the hon. Member in every word of that; but with regard to the declaration that there should be a County Representative Board for securing uniformity of assessment, that, in my judgment, is the vital principle of the Bill, and the House ought to have an opportunity of voting on the Amendment, in order that those who feel with the hon. Member may have the opportunity of expressing their opinion that the Bill will not be satisfactory unless it contains some clause asserting such a principle. It may be that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will say it will be somewhat inconsistent on my part to vote for the Amendment I have just read, because it is well known that I do not wish the County Board Bill that has been brought in by the Government to pass this year. But, if that were said, my reply would be that I do not want the County Board Bill to pass, because I consider it unsatisfactory, inasmuch as it has been drawn up on lines of compromise to which I object. But I will say that, if the right hon. Gentleman will bring in a Bill that will give to the country a system of County Boards, whose members shall be elected by and fairly represent the ratepayers under certain reasonable and necessary regulations—Boards who will have a due sense of the responsibility of the duties imposed on them, and who, to a large extent, will represent the true principle of local self-government—I will withdraw my objection to the measure. But there does not appear to be any hope of such a measure being brought forward this Session, and, therefore, I feel bound to say I do not want the Government County Board Bill already before the House passed this year; and even if the Government were still proceeding with that measure, the fact that they were taking such a course would not prevent my voting for an Amendment which sets forth that the system of assessment now proposed cannot be satisfactory, unless it is accompanied by the establishment of Representative County Boards for securing uniformity of assessment. Last Friday, on the occasion of the last discussion on the present Bill, I observed that suggestions were made to the effect that the County Committee might be strengthened by the addition of gentlemen having a representative character. And the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has himself said he should be very willing to associate with that committee of magistrates the chairman of each of the assessment committees. He has added, however, that he did not put any Notice of such a plan on the Paper, because he had felt that by so doing he might have prejudged the question of the future establishment of County Boards. I do not see that this ought to prevent the right hon. Gentleman from making the suggested change in the Bill. But I am bound to say that I think the proposal would, at the present moment, be inconvenient on the ground that it would merely be the establishment of an ad interim arrangement in the counties, whereas I think it would be far better to have the system settled on a durable basis. Some hon. Gentlemen, on the last occasion when this subject was debated, spoke of the proposed committee as a sort of "stop-gap," which could never get fairly into work, because it would have the feeling that it was simply appointed for a time, and that its position would soon be occupied by another body. If I had the choice, I should be inclined to say to Her Majesty's Government, in reference to the several Bills connected with county interests that were now before the House—"Take all these Bills back again, at any rate, as far as the present Session is concerned." I trust the right hon. Gentleman will adopt this course, in order that he may thereby have the advantage to be derived from the further discussion of these measures throughout the country, as well as of the arguments that have been used in this House, and that the result will be a considerable modification in regard to the Valuation Bill. There can be no doubt that this discussion will suggest to him and to Her Majesty's Government various points on which the provisions of the Bill may be improved, and I think that the Government, by postponing the Bill, and determining to deal with the question on a broad and popular basis, will be enabled to propound a system which will not only give a thoroughly efficient local administration with regard to highways and other local matters in counties, but which will give the Government the opportunity of establishing the County Boards which they propose to create on a wide and intelligible basis, of conferring on them an enlarged authority, and of opening a new avenue for the exercise of public spirit in the fulfilment of important public duties. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk is pressed to a division, I shall certainly give it my support.

COLONEL RUGGLES-BRISE said, that in the country there was a lack of interest in this Bill, and there were other Bills which would be far more acceptable. There had been no opportunity of discussing this Bill at the Chambers of Agriculture this year; but it was discussed last year, when the opinion unanimously expressed was that if they were to have a Valuation Bill, the appeal court must be a County Board. As far as his own county was concerned, there was no real necessity for a Valuation Bill, for there was a county rate committee, the local rates were assessed on the same basis, and there was no unfairness. It was said that the main object of this Bill was to attain uniformity; but uniformity was a bugbear, and even this Bill would not attain it; for, unless the Amendment of the right hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) were adopted, there would be no more uniformity than before. He quite agreed with the objection which had been raised against the appeal to petty sessions; and, so far as his experience went, there was more information and practical knowledge among members of the assessment committee than among those who sat at petty sessions. If the right hon. Gentleman infused a little representative element into the county appeal court under this Bill, a great many of the objections that he had raised would give way; but as the Bill stood, the bases of the valuation were most unsatisfactory. He hoped the Government would accept the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read). The Bill ought, in fact, to be called a Rent Bill, and not a Valuation Bill, for it would increase not only taxation, but rent. Next to having his rent raised, there was nothing a farmer disliked so much as a re-assessment of his occupation; and it was not surprising, therefore, that the Bill was not acceptable to the general body of the tenant-farmers throughout the county. He regretted the course the Government had taken, and if his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk divided the House, he should vote against the Bill.

MR. WHITWELL said, he would support the Bill. He thought it most desirable first of all to proceed with the Valuation Bill. That was evidently a proper course; for, without a proper Valuation Bill, how could they have a proper basis for the adjustment of county affairs. He thought the hon. and gallant Member who spoke last was mistaken in his estimate of the effect of the Bill when he said it would increase the rents. The object was to equalize, and so to reduce rates. He thought it wiser, having a practical measure before them, to pass the Valuation Bill, and make it the basis of future action.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD expressed a hope that the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw the Bill for the present Session, and re-introduce it with the larger measure for county government next Session. The Bill was based on the supposition that the County Government Bill had already passed. Most important duties were cast upon this mythical County Board, which was not to be established till next Session, and might possibly never be established at all.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, the Notice Paper would show that he had proposed Amendments dealing with these portions of the Bill.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he was dealing with the Bill as it stood, and he had a perfect right to do so. The provisions to which he referred were the vital portions of the Bill, and it was the duty of the Government, before asking the House to go into Committee on the Bill, to have thoroughly settled in their own minds what to do with regard to it. The proposed appeal to petty sessions he must characterize as an absurdity. It was said it would act in favour of the poor man; but he was of opinion that it would operate the other way. The right to appeal was given to the parish authorities as well as to the ratepayer, and a poor man succeeding in his appeal to the petty sessions would be appealed against to the quarter sessions. A man never knew what liability for costs he might incur, nor where it might end. It was further objectionable from the fact that it would be an appeal from a strong to a weak body. Formerly an appeal to the petty sessions was not unreasonable, as it was simply an appeal from the overseer to two or more magistrates. It was therefore an appeal from an inferior to a superior; an appeal from one person to several persons. Now, all this was reversed. The assessment committee was a stronger tribunal than could be found at petty sessions, yet it was to continue the intermediate appeal as if no change had taken place. The machinery of the Bill was so complicated that he trusted the Government would withdraw it. What he would suggest to them was—to leave the assessment committee just as it stood, and to have a County Board such as the House might agree to. There was great difficulty in deciding what the County Board should be; but, until that point was determined, it was useless to pass a Valuation Bill. An appeal, if given, should be from the assessment committee to the County Board. Assuming that no County Board Bill should pass, he did not know of a better court of appeal than the quarter sessions, and an appeal to the High Court on points of law. The question before the House was not a Party question, but one of such importance that it ought to be fairly decided upon its merits before the present Bill was further proceeded with.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, that as he had been alluded to in this debate, and had always taken a lively interest in all matters connected with local government reform, he wished to reply to a few observations that had been made. No one had been a stronger advocate of representative County Boards than himself, nor had anyone more deeply regretted the withdrawal of the County Government Bill, which was introduced for that purpose. No one rejoiced more than he did when the principle of the Bill was adopted last Session; but the objects of the Government had been opposed somewhat unexpectedly by both sides of the House. Besides, the time of the House had been much taken up by the Eastern Question, and there had been obstruction of an unusual kind on the Estimates; but the Government fully intended to reproduce the Bill in the course of another Session, when he hoped it might be more fortunate. No one could blame the Government; they had done their best to redeem the pledge given to the House last Session; they had not only introduced a County Boards Bill, but intended it to be the first step in the ladder towards the completion of local government reform. He sympathized with the view that it was neither a Party nor a political question, for unless both Parties could agree in the principles of county government, it would be a long time before improvements were made; but he saw no necessary connection between the Valuation Bill and the County Government Bill, for the former was per se necessary, and not subsidiary, to the latter, and its passing would not be inconsistent with the introduction of a County Government Bill another Session. He would remind all his old taxation Friends that they had agitated for a measure of this sort long before they ever thought of County Boards, and for the very best of reasons—namely, that an equitable basis of rating must be the foundation of all local government reform. This Bill, therefore, might be regarded as the keystone and corner-stone of any improvement. That the present system of rating was faulty and needed reform was the evident opinion of everybody, or else how came it that they had had already six Valuation Bills? One was brought in by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Goschen), one by his lamented Friend Mr. Hunt, a third by the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), and three by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Sclater-Booth). That looked as if the Government were anxious to do something. The subject of the Bill was of great importance and universal interest, and affected everyone. The principles of those Bills had all been discussed, he might say, ad nauseam. They had been thoroughly ventilated, and, therefore, there was no excuse for saying there had been no sufficient discussion of the principles of this Bill. What were they? First, to secure uniformity of assessment among various local bodies contributing to local purposes; and, secondly, to provide one basis for rates and Imperial taxes, to centralize the machinery of assessment by appointing one authority instead of three for the valuation property; and, if those objects were achieved, this Bill would effect a great reform. No doubt, the former Bills were very different from the one before the House. In them the surveyor of taxes had had far too much power. That power would have been arbitrary and obnoxious. He was absolute, his decision was final, and any conclusion he came to could hardly be disturbed; but the present Bill all but eliminated his authority, or, at least, vastly modified it, and if the House were to adopt actual bond fide rent as the basis of valuation, they need not fear the introduction of the surveyor of taxes. The right hon. Gentleman the other night admitted that rent was the best criterion of value, and that he would not object to rent being taken as the general basis. ["Oh!"] Yes, general; because there must always be exceptions in a country like this. Supposing, for instance, a portion of the rent of a property was covered by a fine or other consideration, nobody would say that the rent, taken without reference to the fine or consideration, was a fair basis. Rent had been truly said to be in the great majority of cases, though there must always be some exceptions, the best criterion of value; and he believed it to be the fairest measure and basis of value, as rent was a fact, while valuation was a matter of opinion. It had been said that the Bill allowed too many appeals, and that its machinery was too complex and cumbrous. That, in his opinion, was a question for the Committee to decide. He would venture to suggest, with reference to appeals, that no alteration should be made in the present Bill—that the work should be done by the old machinery. This would be very feasible; it would be an additional security for the introduction of a County Boards Bill early next Session. If altered, it might possibly tend to postpone that measure. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had criticized the Bill, and had said that whatever the faults of the late Government were, in dealing with local government reform, the measure they brought forward proposed relief with one hand and reform with the other. He (Sir Massey Lopes) quite recognized the great ability and earnestness which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) displayed with reference to this question; but, without making invidious comparisons between one Government and another with reference to this question, he must remind the House that the relief proposed by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, the transference of the house-tax to the local authorities, would only have relieved householders in the towns. The cardinal distinction between the policy advocated by the two Governments was briefly this. The late Government advocated reform prior to relief; such a policy would have indefinitely postponed any relief. The present Government, though equally recognizing the necessity of improving local government, had been of opinion that the two objects might advance simultaneously pari passu. The present Government had acted on the deliberate decision which the House, by an overwhelming majority, had come to in 1872, and had given material relief to the ratepayers. The Government, might, he thought, take credit for having religiously carried out everything to which they then pledged themselves. All must admit that the reform of local government, whoever might undertake it, was a most difficult problem, and that the President of the Local Government Board had shown great ability and great earnestness in what he had attempted in regard to it. They had had six different Valuation Bills, and when that was the case, it was pretty evident they could not expect to rouse much enthusiasm on that subject. Moreover, the question was encumbered with a great mass of details, and everybody was a critic upon it, and held his own particular views. Again, the subject was not only not a very attractive one, but it suggested the not very pleasant operation of putting one's hand into both pockets—into the one pocket for rates, and into the other for taxes. He asked, therefore, whether it would not be wise for the House to consider whether half a loaf in that case was not better than no bread, more especially when they had a promise of the big loaf in the shape of the County Boards Bill next Session? The present measure would be a good foundation for the reform of local government, and the proper time for criticizing its details would be when it was in Committee. The reconstruction of local administration must be a gradual process, and it would be hopeless to attempt by any one Bill, or any one scheme, to deal comprehensively and exhaustively with that most difficult and complicated task.

It could only be accomplished by a series of well-considered measures, and one of those well-considered measures was the Valuation Bill then before them. He believed that Bill would tend very much to simplify and to facilitate the reform of their system of local government, and on that ground he trusted that it would be passed by the House.

SIR ANDREW LUSK confessed that he was at a loss to know where they were in that discussion. He had seen many Valuation Bills brought into that House and found fault with by everybody, the result being that they never got any one of them passed, although such a measure was urgently required. It was humiliating to think that 655 Gentlemen sitting in that House could not agree upon a fair and just system of assessment. That was the more to be regretted, as the subject of valuation was not a Party question; and it ought, therefore, to be dealt with in a practical and business-like spirit. The present system of assessment was most unjust; and what was wanted was a fair basis of valuation under which all might be equally taxed. This was a subject of the greatest importance to the Metropolis. ["Oh, oh!"] He could tell those Members who said "oh!" that the Metropolis was as big as all Scotland, and paid more taxes than all Ireland. Some streets in the Metropolis now paid almost double the amount which others paid in proportion; and when objection was taken by some county Members to the interference of Government surveyors in those matters, he would remind them that commercial men were a good deal looked after in reference to taxation. In the Metropolis large premiums were very frequently paid to obtain the tenancy of desirable premises; and the rent in such cases, therefore, by no means represented the value. For his part, he thought it much better to have an independent man employed by the Government to say what was the fair value of a thing, and then to let people appeal, if they chose, from his decision, than to leave interested persons to assess themselves, and to be, as it were, judges in their own cause.

MR. KNIGHT approved of the principle of the Valuation Bill. It was most desirable that every hereditament in England and Wales should be valued for all purposes at the actual rent it was let for. He did not think the Bill he held in his hand was necessary for this purpose. The existing valuation for Schedule A of the income tax was all that was wanted. It was a Bill of 110 clauses, 26 schedules, to do that which might be as completely done in a Bill of one clause and two schedules. The one clause would enact that assessment committees should take the present valuation for Schedule A for their gross assessment, and all deductions should be made according to the provisions of Schedules 3 and 4 of this Bill. The manner of assessing for the income tax now was that the authorities in Somerset House sent a number of forms to the different surveyors of taxes, who distributed them among the assessors of the various parishes, according to the number of the hereditaments in them. The only practical variation in this Bill was that the surveyors of taxes were to send the form to the parish overseers, instead of the parish assessors—a distinction almost without a difference. The great change proposed in the Bill was that, instead of the simple mode of appeal now in force, a complicated system was proposed that it would take the country at least five years to understand; and which was, he (Mr. Knight) thought, costly, and no improvement. The present system of valuation for Schedule A of the income tax had worked well for 25 years, during the old French War up to 1815, and again from 1842 up to the present time—in all more than 60 years—without complaint. There had been much complaint of the mode of assessing for Schedule B and for Schedule D; but he (Mr. Knight) had never heard of a complaint against Schedule A. The mode of appeal was very simple. A body of Income Tax Commissioners, with a certain property qualification—much resembling the Commissioners of Supply in Scotland—was formed. The surveyor of taxes might surcharge anyone he thought to be assessed at too small a sum. Certain days were fixed for hearing appeals, at which the Commissioners and the surveyor of taxes attended. The surveyor was not the master, but the servant of the Commissioners. He had to show why he had made his surcharge, and the Commissioners were the judges. He (Mr. Knight) had, in the course of a long life, attended twice before the Commissioners on appeal. He had found himself in the presence of eight or ten or a dozen men—two or three of them being magistrates, the others being taken from among the most respectable of the upper middle class inhabitants of the district. On one occasion the Commissioners allowed that he (Mr. Knight) was right; and on the other they very soon convinced him that they were right, and that he was wrong. There was no expense or costs, and he had never heard that mode of appeal complained of in any way. Now the 109 useless clauses of this Bill—for he would not allow that more than one clause was wanted—had apparently been drawn up for the Local Government Board by someone who thought costs no great evil. Of all classes of legislation, nearly the worst, in his opinion, was that which aimed at making new crimes and misdemeanours by Act of Parliament, and then affixing punishments to them; and a very large number of the clauses were of this description. Fines and costs and other money payments appeared continually in the clauses of this Bill. The surveyor of taxes was named 42 times, and the Local Government Board came in 35 times with orders and decisions where nothing wanted to be ordered or decided if the present assessment of Schedule A were acted upon. If the Bill were to be gone on with, he hoped Government would allow a Select Committee to inquire whether any available reason could be shown for altering the present mode of assessing for Schedule A; and, if not, that they would authorize the use of that assessment, which was based on actual rental, as a gross assessment for all purposes. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk, which was now before the House, it was nearly identical with that which the same hon. Gentleman had moved to the Valuation Bill of last year. That Amendment—or rather Resolution—passed under peculiar circumstances. He (Mr. Knight) was one of those who had worked heartily for the reduction of local taxation, in conjunction with the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Norfolk—he (Mr. Knight) in the Worcestershire, and his hon. Friend in the Norfolk and Central Chambers. He would now say a few words on the County Board movement, and on the antecedents of the hon. Member for South Norfolk on that subject. It was commenced by the late Mr. Hume, who brought in Bills for County Financial Boards in 1836, 1849, and 1850. In the first Bill all the members were to be elected; in the second, to be one-third justices and two-thirds elected; in the third, to be half justices and half elected. In 1852 Mr. Milner-Gibson brought in a Bill for a Board with all the members elected. All those Bills died a natural death. In 1868 Mr. Wylde brought in a Bill for County Boards composed of half justices and half elected members. This was referred to a Select Committee, of which Colonel Wilson-Patten was Chairman, and upon which the hon. Member for South Norfolk sat. The very point they were now debating was brought forward four times in discussing the report of that Committee. The Report recommended that courts of quarter sessions should be formed into County Boards by the addition of elected members. Mr. Clare Read, now Member for South Norfolk, voted on at least three different occasions on that Committee, that “elected representatives should be associated with the magistrates in the expenditure of the rates,” and against the proposal of Mr. Wylde for separate County Boards, composed partly of justices and partly of elected members. He voted against the formation of Boards almost similar to those the hon. Member now wished Parliament to adopt. In the ensuing Session a Bill carrying out the Report of the Committee was brought in by the right hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen). It was the subject of a long debate, and met the approval of every Member who spoke upon it on both sides of the House. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Colonel Wilson-Patten, Mr. Assheton Cross (now Home Secretary), the late Mr. Hunt, Mr. Bruce (now Lord Aberdare), and others spoke in favour of it. The Bill fell at the “massacre of the innocents,” but its principle was a living one, and would, he (Mr. Knight) hoped, eventually become law. This Bill was brought in by a Liberal Cabinet, and on the back of it were the names of Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. Secretary Bruce, and Mr. Arthur Peel. Last year, when the hon. Member for South Norfolk brought forward a Resolution nearly similar to that which they were now discussing, some one of the Gentlemen who managed the Government Business in the House asked him, among other Members, his opinion with regard to that Resolution. Recollecting how the hon. Member had voted on Colonel Wilson-Patten's Committee, and recollecting how strenuously he had fought the battle of the farmers for the decrease of the rates and taxes which pressed on land, he (Mr. Knight) said that he should support the Resolution; and he believed that many other Conservative county Members made the same answer, as the hon. Member for South Norfolk had hitherto always taken the economical side in all questions of rating. The Resolution passed nem. con. He (Mr. Knight) did not hear the hon. Member's speech on that occasion, which he had read in Hansard this year, on being told that the County Bill of this Session was founded upon it, and that it was supposed, from their acquiescence in the Resolution of last year, that it had the concurrence of the county Members. It was not until he read that speech that he discovered that the hon. Member for South Norfolk had utterly deserted the principles of economy in county expenditure that he had formerly so strongly supported. If he (Mr. Knight) had heard that speech, he should certainly have voted against the Resolution. On reading that speech he found, to his surprise, that the hon. Member had changed his colours, and turned his coat, and that his speech of last year was the entire reverse of what might have been expected from his antecedents. He had, in 1869, in seconding or supporting the great Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) for the reduction of local taxation, deplored the increase of local rates, and asked for "further contribution from the Consolidated Fund." "The farm he occupied," he said, "paid 25 per cent more rates than it did a short time before, and if the poor rates went on increasing they would soon become intolerable; but if Government would take upon themselves the cost of the police, the Militia, the gaols, coroners, and weights and measures, there would be no need of County Financial Boards." He (Mr. Knight) was never more surprised than when he found that the hon. Member had gone over to the enemy, and that instead of advocating economy in the rates, he had proposed the very same Boards he had voted against on Colonel Wilson-Patten's Committee; and had done so, not with a view of economy, but with the full knowledge that the rates to be paid by the farmers and other ratepayers would be largely and indefinitely increased by the formation of such Boards. The hon. Member began his speech last year by fulsome compliments to the magistrates for the admirable manner in which they had managed county affairs; and he then proposed to take all future management of these affairs away from them. A ratepayer's Board was to be formed, not to decrease, but to increase, the rates that pressed on the farmer. The new Boards were to take from the magistrates the supervision of lunatics, bridges, cattle disease, valuation, registration of voters, and the making and levying of county rates. "New duties," the hon. Member for South Norfolk said, "would be sure to crop up. Once get your county authority, and you will soon find plenty of work for it to do. I will mention one or two things." He then said that they ought to be a Main Highway Board; sanitary matters should be referred to them, they should appoint medical officers of health for the county, questions of engineering science and questions of sanitary science should be referred to them, they should appoint county surveyors to advise and supervise the work done under the County Board, they should consider questions as to the extension of the Poor Law from unions to counties, they should convert unnecessary workhouses into reformatories, idiot asylums, industrial schools, refuges for permanent sick and infirm, or into infirmaries; the new County Board was to take up large questions, such as arterial drainage and storage of water, to undertake the supervision of educational endowments; they were to be empowered to raise and spend, in addition to the county rates, a portion of the Imperial taxes, a portion of the assessed taxes, and, finally, a local income tax, for the relief of the poor. All the hon. Member's old ideas of economy had vanished. He did not pretend that all these new and unnecessary heads of expenditure—in addition to those which, he said, would be sure to crop up—could be undertaken without largely increasing county expenditure and county rates—indeed, this certain increase of expenditure was frequently referred to throughout his speech. The hon. Member finally allowed that the movement for County Boards was not popular with a large and highly respectable class of rate-payers, who did not like a scheme for raising the rates. If he should carry his point, he (Mr. Knight) warned him that he would find at least 95 per cent of his own constituents belonging to those who would strongly deprecate the increase of their local rates by 2s., 3s., or 4s. in the pound, which the provisions of this Bill would necessitate.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had long come to the conclusion that it was of little use to hope that any Irish Bill would be discussed when the present Government had a parallel English Bill before the House. He found that the most important questions that could affect Ireland were inextricably mixed up by the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read)—Valuation and County Boards. The Government last year brought in a Bill which would have raised the valuation of Ireland 50 to 60 per cent. This would have been looked upon as an inducement to raise rents, and therefore he gave the measure his hearty opposition. If this Bill passed for England, he was afraid that a modified Bill would be passed for Ireland. With regard to County Boards, they had been told that the English Bill had been abandoned; and, notwithstanding what the Chief Secretary for Ireland had said, that practically meant the abandonment of the Irish Bill. It was a most important question for Ireland whether the Valuation Bill or the County Boards Bill passed first. He did not think this would be a good Bill for England, and he was certain it would be a bad Bill for Ireland. He should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Norfolk.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he did not see what this Bill had to do with the subject of county government, except with reference to the question how far the present court of quarter sessions was a sufficient court of appeal. The object of this Bill was simply to bring about a uniformity of assessment in the gross; but the hon. Member for South Norfolk objected to any new system of assessment unless there were first established a county board to hear appeals. During the whole time he had sat in Parliament, a period extending over some 14 years, Select Committees had been appointed year by year to consider this question; and they had all, in more or less modified forms, recommended that steps should be taken to simplify assessments and to reduce the expense of collecting the rates. That principle was embodied in the present Bill; and, therefore, he supported it as a step in the direction of legislation, which he thought would prove highly advantageous. There were a number of points in detail contained in the Bill which could not be easily disposed of in a Committee of the Whole House; and he, therefore, hoped that the principle of the Bill having been affirmed, it would after being committed pro forma, be referred to a Select Committee.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA was also of opinion that it would be advisable to refer the Bill, which was full of intricate details, to a Select Committee. It proposed to repeal no fewer than 28 Acts of Parliament in whole or in part, and evidence ought to be taken by a Select Committee as to why these Acts ought to be repealed. Without such evidence, the House would be acting wholly in the dark in passing this Bill.

MR. STORER recommended the hon. Member for South Norfolk not to press his Amendment to a division, as the country would not be satisfied to have the advantages of a Valuation Bill taken away by a side-wind. There were many changes in this Bill which would be hailed with satisfaction by the country at large. The Bill would tend very much to curtail the powers of the surveyors of taxes, which were not always exercised in a just manner. He should like to see eliminated from it the appeal to petty sessions, as most of the magistrates before whom the appeal would come would have been ex-officio members of the assessment committee. He hoped, too, that the appeal to quarter sessions, of which he fully approved for the present, would in time be exchanged for appeal to the County Board which they were promised. Rent fluctuated very much from various causes, and the Bill probably furnished the best machinery for securing uniformity of valuation.

Question put.

The House divided : — Ayes 131 ;
Noes 107 : Majority 24.—(Div. List,
No. 174.)

MR. J. G. HUBBARD: You, Sir, and the House, I trust, will exonerate me from the charge which my right hon. Friend brought against me on Friday last. On that occasion, my right hon. Friend, in the course of his remarks, used these words. He said, speaking of the Resolution which I was about to move, that—

“He thought it unfair that a measure, which had for its object the uniform valuation of the country, should be hampered with a proposal relating to the incidence of the income tax with which prima facie it had nothing to do.”

Now, Sir, I am not in the habit of doing anything unfair, and I think that, if I read the title of the Bill and one of its clauses, I shall convince the House that there is nothing unfair in my proposition. In the 9th section, the object of the Bill is declared to be the settlement of the valuation list; and, subsequently, in the 31st section, it is stated that—

“For the purpose of every rate made during the year, for the purpose of every tax—namely, the house tax or the income tax—and for the purpose of determining the qualification of jurors, the valuation list shall be conclusive evidence.”

And it is further declared, by a part of the same section, that “the said house tax and income tax shall be charged upon the gross value.” Now, if I have, in making this Motion, connected the question of the house tax and the income tax with the Valuation Bill, I find my justification in the very terms of the Bill itself; and I think, therefore, that the House will exonerate me from the charge of having done anything unfair in constructing a Resolution such as that which I am about to place before it. But I forgive my right hon. Friend, because I am satisfied he is with me in the matter which I have at heart myself. Indeed, I am satisfied that if he followed out his own instincts, he would accept the proposition which I am now about to make to the House; and I believe that, as I agree with my right hon. Friend heartily in 99 points out of every 100 in the Bill which I hold in my hand, so he cannot greatly differ from me in regard to the one point, when that point is in direct contradiction to the other 99. Looking at the construction of the Bill, I may say that the charge brought against it of being unpopular is, in my estimation, no libel upon the Bill itself. Why is this Bill unpopular? Because it is meant to remedy abuses. All laws are meant to remedy and to restrain abuses; and the Valuation Bill is intended to prevent abuses which have for a long time existed in the assessment of the property of the country. It was not yesterday that measures relating to this subject were first laid upon the Table of the House. Fifteen years ago I had the honour of acting on a Committee on a Valuation Bill, the scheme of which was very nearly the same as that which is now before us; and in the subsequent measures which were submitted from time to time, I find that we were progressing towards an arrangement which, if it be honestly and fairly carried out now, will, I venture to say, effect an enormous improvement in the general assessment of the country for the purposes of taxation. There is, however, one very important consideration which ought to be kept in mind. It is, that the principle which is enunciated in this Bill should be consistently carried out; and here it is that I am, unfortunately, bound to differ most materially from my right hon. Friend. Excellent as the Bill is in every other respect, there is just one passage in it which is execrable, because it is at variance with all those principles which ought to command the respect and allegiance of this House. I refer to the 31st clause; and, if hon. Members will have the kindness to turn to it, they will see the point which I wish to bring under their notice. By that clause the Bill proposes to stereotype what must be considered as an administrative abuse, and, in doing so, it acts independently of the law of Scotland, and in direct contradiction with the law of Ireland. Moreover, it puts itself in conflict with the principles which, in the Home Department, regulate the action of the Secretary of State with regard to the qualification for office. Lastly, it puts itself in conflict with the whole substance of the Bill which I hold in my hand. This is, I think, an impeachment which, if it be proved, does establish either that that clause ought to be removed, or that the Bill ought not to pass. Anxious as I have been to see this Bill pass, I hold that this one attempted enactment is so mischievous in principle and practice, that I would rather the Bill should be postponed than see it passed with this 31st clause unamended. May I be allowed to call the attention of the House very briefly to its wording? Its object is to determine that the valuation list shall be conclusive for certain purposes. Those purposes are—the determination of the amount of the assessment for rates—of the amount of the assessment for Queen's taxes—and the determination of the qualification for office. When you come to observe how these three purposes are carried out, you find that every rate which is to be levied upon the valuation list constructed under this Bill shall be made in respect of the "rateable," that is, the net, value. Again, the clause provides that the qualification of jurors, or of any other office, shall be determined by the "rateable" value. But, then, we come to a provision that the house tax and the income tax—the Queen's taxes—are, under this clause, to be levied upon the "gross." Now, I want to know why that word "gross" comes in there, in conflict and contrast with the word "rateable," which is used in reference to the other taxes? I am quite aware that there is a precedent to be found in the Bill relating to the valuation of property in the Metropolis; but I venture to draw attention to the circumstance that the Metropolis Valuation Bill was passed in the year 1869, when it was considered exceedingly probable that the income tax would vanish very shortly altogether, and when it was also felt that as the Metropolis was only a portion of the whole country, it would be hardly possible to introduce a provision for the levying of the Queen's taxes in the Metropolis different from that which was in force throughout the rest of the country. Upon these considerations, the Metropolis Valuation Bill of 1869 allowed the Queen's taxes to be levied on the gross rental. But we have now arrived at a very different state of things. The Bill before us now is not a temporary measure. It is not a Bill applicable to a portion only of the country; but it will extend to the whole of England and Wales, and it is meant to be a permanent measure, which for future years and ages is to regulate the levying of the Imperial taxation of this country. Consequently, the responsibility of the Government in reference to this Bill is wholly different from that which existed with regard to the Metropolis Valuation Bill of 1869; and this House, if it desires to affirm the sound principle of assessment deliberately adopted for local taxation, will not hesitate to apply it also to Imperial taxation. I have already said that the 31st clause of the Bill as it stands conflicts with the law in Ireland. That law is laid down in the Valuation (Ireland) Act of 1852, and the principle on which it is based is very clearly expounded in the Bill brought in, but not passed, by the Government last year, and of which the 4th clause provided that the valuation list, accepted as the measure of value for all purposes of assessment, whether local or Imperial, shall be the net annual rent or value—"all rates, taxes, and costs of repairs being paid by the tenants." Obviously, under this system, the income tax is charged under Schedule A only upon the rent, which accrues to the landlord; and I, therefore, appeal to hon. Irish Gentlemen in this House, who are always most chivalrous, to help us in our efforts to get rid of this oppressive inequality. I will venture upon an illustration of my argument. Turning to the Department of Customs, I ask—What is the practice there? Instructions are given to the officers to levy customs duties. What upon? Not upon the whole package, cask, or bag. They ascertain the contents of the package, and charge duty upon the net or real quantity of the article taxed. Let us act on the same principle in regard to the taxes on houses, and charge only the portion of the rent which constitutes the net article taxable. Then, with regard to the Home Department; in the very Bill we have before us, it is provided that if a question arises as to the value for the qualification for office, or for the grant of a licence, it is to be determined by reference to the rateable value in the list. Not upon the "gross," bear that in mind, but upon the "rateable." We have, then, this remarkable fact, that while the Board of Customs regard only the net quantities for duty, while the Home Department regard only the net value for its own guidance, and while the Local Government Board constitutes the net or rateable value as the measure for all rating purposes, the Inland Revenue Department would distinguish itself by continuing to levy the income tax and the house duty upon the "gross" value. Now, Sir, no other argument ought to be required in support of my contention than this one which I have advanced. If that principle is right for local taxation, how can it be wrong for Imperial taxation? If this principle is just, if it is scientific for local purposes, it cannot be unjust and unscientific for Imperial purposes. Sir, I hold it to be most unfair and unjust to take the gross value for Imperial purposes, and I think I have shown that there is a glaring and intolerable anomaly between the general principles which pervade this Act, and the exceptional and vicious provision foisted into the 31st section. I have exposed the anomaly, and I will now endeavour to point out the extent to which it operates. In the schedule of the Bill now before the House, we find that deductions have been provided for in the following degrees for various descriptions of property:—For land, 5 per cent; for farms, 10 per cent; for houses,  $16\frac{2}{3}$  per cent; for cottages, 25 per cent; for works of various kinds,  $33\frac{1}{3}$  per cent; the consequence being that, while local rates are levied on different properties in these several ratios, 90 per cent on farms,  $83\frac{1}{3}$  per cent on houses, 75 per cent on cottages, and  $66\frac{2}{3}$  per cent on perishable works, 100 per cent is taken as the measure of the charge on all by the Queen's tax collector. Where is the justice, equality, or uniformity of such a system as that? I have said that this mode of dealing with taxation is equivalent to using false weights and measures, and the Government have no right to deal with the Queen's subjects with false measures, a practice neither better nor worse than the issuing of false coin. I hope the House will bear this in mind—that, for every 20s. raised under the authority of the Local Government Board, upon the different kinds of property which I have mentioned, at a given ratio, the Inland Revenue Office would—under the system of charging on the gross value—raise, at the same ratio, 22s. upon farms, 27s. upon cottages, and 30s. upon perishable works. I think the Government ought to explain and justify, if it be possible, this contradictory policy, or have the courage to admit its defects, so that a remedy may be applied. Before I pass to the remedy, let me illustrate the intensity of the grievance. I have said that land would, under this proposed system, pay 10 per cent more than it ought, and that 10 per cent is just equal to a  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in a 5d. tax—that is to say, an income tax of 5d. in the pound, levied on the gross value, is practically a tax of  $5\frac{1}{4}$ d. on the net rent or actual profits of the land. That is the measure of the injury done to land. Landowners, as a class, would be paying 10 per cent more than they ought if their properties were free from burthens; but this is far from being the case. The land of England is heavily burthened. If it is burthened to the extent of half its rent, the tax on the outgoings would add one quarter to the nominal imposts, and the charge on the landlord's share of the rent would be 5d., when the tax was nominally 4d. But, assume the not unfrequent occurrence of an estate of £2,000 gross, and £1,800 rateable value, on which the mortgage interest absorbs £1,600. In that event, the owner, taxed upon £2,000, and, recouping himself to the extent of £1,600, remains liable for the balance of tax upon £400, though he receives only £200. The tax upon his residue of rent is double that which is charged upon the interest paid to the mortgagee. That is a tolerably clear exposition of the way in which this nefarious principle acts. It defrauds the owner of an encumbered property more cruelly than the owner of unencumbered estates. The unencumbered owner is injured only in proportion and in common with everyone else, but the embarrassed owner is surtaxed in proportion to his inability to pay the tax. Well, Sir, there is one simple remedy for all these evils. Erase the word "gross," insert "rateable," and levy Imperial taxes on the same principle as local rates. To that proposition what are the objections? It has been said, if the proposed relief were granted to real property, the grievance of those taxed under Schedules D and E would be aggravated. Sir, I am satisfied that traders and professional men would feel no jealousy or envy at seeing justice done to any class in the community, even if they were excluded from sharing in the remission of the taxation that I ask for. But, Sir, such would not be the consequence of my success. The remission I ask for applies mainly to houses. The house tax is 9*d.* in the pound, and the income tax 5*d.* in the pound, and to levy them both on the rateable instead of on the gross value would effect a relief sensible to and shared in by the whole community. Every householder would be benefited sooner or later by the adjustment of taxation through a measure intended to be permanent. Therefore, Sir, I am satisfied that no ignorant or ungenerous feeling of jealousy would be manifested, and no one would take exception to the relief which the Government are asked to give. In asking for this remission, I am influenced by no arrière pensée, nor have I any intention to use success in this reform as a lever for any other attack on the Exchequer. Industrial incomes have their wrongs, but they are quite independent of this proposal, which is made with the view of establishing what I believe to be a right and just principle of taxation with regard to the very important interest of which I am speaking. But now, Sir, let me tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his comfort another fact which is not unimportant. It is really very much during the same period in which this movement for the reduction of local taxation has been going on that the officials engaged in collecting taxation have been vigorously at work screwing up the assessments on houses and land; and, to such an extent has that taken place, that, within the last 10 years, the amount of value to the inhabited house duty has been increased from £1,000,000 to £1,500,000. It may be said—"Oh, the population has increased." But to what extent has the population increased? The population has increased at the rate of 1 per cent per annum, or 10 per cent in 10 years; so that, while the increase of the assessment of the tax is 50 per cent, 40 represents the official distension of the assessment—the successful assessment. I say, then, to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—"The amount which you will raise in 1878 by the rateable value will be equal to what you received five years earlier upon the gross." Surely that consideration should dispose my right hon. Friend to a cheerful acceptance of my demand? I do not desire any re-adjustment of taxation that could create new wrongs; but it is inevitable that, in a re-adjustment which removes inequalities, some additional weight must fall on those who have been previously favoured. This is always the case, and there is no reason why it should not be the case in all fiscal reforms. The President of the Local Government Board said, if the Government accepted my proposition, it would deprive the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the assessment upon £10,000,000. Whether the amount rescued from assessment be £10,000,000 or £20,000,000 I care not, for I contend that that amount represents the extent of the area over which fiscal robbery has been carried out. The money raised as taxes over that area is money to which you have no right whatever. It is levied on principles which outrage the first elements of political economy, and are utterly abhorrent to the principles laid down by Adam Smith, that people are to be taxed according to their ability. It is a tax levied on capital while professing to be levied on profits. It is perfectly true that if we do justice to the taxpayer, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will forego a portion of his receipts. But that is no argument against my proposal. The man who uses false weights is not allowed to excuse himself by pleading that his gains will be diminished if he is restricted to the use of the legal standards. If a tradesman has for some years charged me more than he ought and I claim restitution, the law will not uphold him in refusing upon the plea that if he compensates me he will be the poorer. That, however, is the Chancellor's argument; but I must say that is an argument which does not weigh with me at all. This country ought to raise its Revenue only by fair and legitimate means, and what it cannot raise honestly it should not spend, but it should reduce its expenditure; or, if the same amount of Revenue be indispensable, increase the ratio of the tax and levy it equally. Well, Sir, I have now only one other point to refer to, and that is with regard to the inhabited house duty and the point of exemption. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that if the house tax is disturbed it would disarrange the exemption of £20 a-year or under. Not at all. The limit of exemption may remain just as it is—namely, £20 gross, or £15 net. There it was, and there it remains. It can occasion no possible inconvenience to the Government that my Amendment should be accepted, and for this reason—this Bill does not come into effect until two years hence. Within those two years there is plenty of time to make any subsidiary arrangements that may be required to maintain a Revenue adequate to the Public Expenditure. In the meantime, I have the satisfaction of believing that in urging this measure upon the Government I am urging upon them the acceptance of a Resolution which will save this House from the extreme discredit of passing a law which is at variance with science, truth, and justice. If it is accepted in the way in which I propose it, it will require the alteration of one word only in the Bill. It conflicts with nothing else, and if it is adopted the country will have the satisfaction of believing that when they pay the Queen's taxes they are not more hardly treated, or more unequally treated, than when paying a poor rate, a borough rate, or a highway rate. I began by saying that I trusted the House would exonerate me from having, in the Motion I have made, introduced considerations unfair to the Government, because it is connected with the matter which they have in hand. I think I have shown that the question of which I have treated is intimately connected with this matter, and that it will not conflict with anything essential to the Bill. I have had no alternative but to bring the matter before the House as a corrective to the unprecedented provision which the Government has thought proper to introduce in the 31st clause. I am afraid, Sir, I cannot put the Motion to a vote as a division has already been taken; but, if so, I must defer until the House is in Committee to taking a vote upon the proposal which I offer, and which will give effect to the principle I have laid down; and I trust the House will concur in that principle.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that the House had decided by a majority to go into Committee on this Bill, and it was not in his right hon. Friend's power to move an Amendment on the Motion now before the House. His right hon. Friend told them that when they were in Committee he would move an Amendment on a certain clause in the Bill; and, no doubt, when they arrived at that clause, his right hon. Friend would move his Amendment and support it by the arguments which he had used to-night. The House would then be able to pronounce on the proposition; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) did not think that at present they were in a position to discuss the matter with advantage. He knew that no arguments which he could use would have the smallest effect on the mind of his right hon. Friend. His right hon. Friend had presented the House with a line of argument which he had on several previous occasions placed before it, and which he, no doubt, held with great diligence; but the House must not be led away by the exceedingly strong language which he used about what he called "the injustice," "the robbery," and the other sins of the Finance Minister in this matter. His right hon. Friend put the matter in a very pleasant way, when he said that if his proposal were adopted, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would only be a little poorer. "But," said his right hon. Friend, "I do not care for that. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is a robber, and the sooner he is made to disgorge his ill-gotten gains the better." He would point out to his right hon. Friend that the poor Chancellor of the Exchequer did not individually profit by these gains which he was supposed to make; but that it was the taxpayer of the country who had to provide certain sums which must be made up in some form or other; and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer were unable to raise the same Revenue that he was in the habit of raising by the income tax or the house tax, it would be necessary to find some other means of raising the amount required. He would, in that case, be obliged to come down to the House and say—"As he was obliged to make an alteration in the manner in which the income tax and the house tax were assessed, he was £1,000,000 or £1,500,000 short, and he must propose some other tax to make up that amount." That tax would fall either on the same persons or upon other persons, and then they came to a matter which involved questions of some nicety and delicacy, and it did not do to get rid of them by saying simply—"The Chancellor of the Exchequer is a robber." They must consider what the effect of the alteration of their system of taxation would be. This, however, was not the proper stage at which to enter upon these discussions—first, because the point before them was not this matter of how to raise taxes, but the question was, that they go into Committee on this Bill; and, second, because they must have this discussion at a future period. He earnestly hoped, therefore, that the House would not allow itself to be drawn into a long discussion at that stage of the Bill.

SIR. GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that the present system was to be defended only as a rough approximation to justice in the assessment of income tax as regarded permanent and temporary incomes, and he hoped it would be retained until a more comprehensive measure was introduced. He would much rather see a more complete distinction between the two kinds of incomes, but till that was done it was well that there should be a difference between the most permanent kind of incomes—namely, those from real property and other incomes, the former being practically charged at a higher rate, being assessed in full receipts. While the income tax was 5*d.* on other incomes it was probably really almost 6*d.* on incomes from rent, and that, he thought, so far fair. He trusted that if the right hon. Member for the City of London moved his Amendment, it would not be carried.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee; Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

INCLOSURE PROVISIONAL ORDER (ORFORD) BILL—[BILL 189.]

(Sir Matthew Ridley, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE observed, that the scheme which was sought to be sanctioned by the Bill was promoted by the unreformed Corporation of Orford. The land intended to be inclosed was Corporate land in the strict sense of the term, held in trust for the benefit of the inhabitants; and he thought it a serious question whether the Mayor and Corporation should be allowed to enter into the arrangement proposed, although he admitted that Sir Richard Wallace had acted in this matter in the most generous manner. It would be in the recollection of the House that on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), a Commission had been issued to inquire into subjects relating to the unreformed Corporations; and though he believed there was nothing to say against the present scheme, he hoped he would receive an assurance that the passing of the Bill would not be made a precedent, and that the promotion of future schemes would be delayed till the Commission had reported.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that as President of the Commission to which the noble Lord had referred, as well as Chairman of the Committee, he had been placed in a somewhat difficult position. In his former capacity he had received information with reference to Orford, which might possibly affect the decision of the Committee; and yet, as the evidence taken before Committees and Commissions was considered confidential till the Reports were made, he could not well make use of it. He thought it his duty, however, to elicit the information required by putting questions to the witnesses from Orford who appeared before the Committee. It would appear, from the evidence now in the hands of hon. Members, that though the Corporation of Orford, like many other unreformed Corporations, consisted partly of non-residents, who could hardly be said fairly to represent the opinions of the inhabitants, yet that these took no part in promoting the scheme, and their names were not given among those of assenting parties; therefore, he thought there was no objection on that score. Sir Richard Wallace had acted liberally; he had given more land for public purposes than he was obliged to do, and readily fell in with certain suggestions made by the Committee. Whatever might be the fate of the Corporation of Orford, any body or authority which might take their place would take it subject to the conditions imposed by this Bill. Therefore, as the scheme was itself unobjectionable, as the noble Lord himself admitted, he hoped it would be allowed to pass without alteration.

MR. PARNELL objected to affording an unreformed Corporation facilities for inclosing common land—a serious question, seeing how little of it now remained in the country. In order that they might hear the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) on the subject, he would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Debate be now adjourned.”
—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE hoped that the Motion would not be persisted in, as the question of inclosure was really not involved. He believed that the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) would have been satisfied with the explanations given by his right hon. Friend had he been present. His objections did not refer to the inclosure, but to the question raised by his noble Friend as to whether an unreformed Corporation should be permitted to make an agreement for an exchange of land. For his own part, he was satisfied that the exchange was a good one, and that Sir Richard Wallace had behaved generously to the public in the matter.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That this House will, upon Wednesday next, resolve itself into the said Committee.”

THE IRISH ESTIMATES.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. PARNELL said, he was sorry to make a complaint, but he considered the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had treated his (Mr. Parnell's) Friends and himself very badly with regard to the Irish Estimates. At the commencement of the Session, the right hon. Gentleman intimated his intention of taking the Estimates as continuously as possible until he got through them, doing, if possible without Votes on account; and, with regard to those for English and Imperial purposes, he had certainly kept his word. He had endeavoured, with the utmost persistence, night after night to obtain money for those purposes; and, while not finding fault with him for that, he (Mr. Parnell) must say the Irish Estimates had been unfairly kept back. Before Whitsuntide, the Chancellor of the Exchequer postponed the Queen's Colleges Votes until that day—Monday—and the House had now been informed that those Votes had been further postponed until the mythological time arrived for the introduction of an Intermediate Education Bill in the House of Lords. Although not favoured with his reasons for this step, he was sure the Chancellor of the Exchequer had good and valid ones for it, and that he would not have adopted a course, which appeared like a breach of promise to the Irish Members, if he had not a good reason in his own mind for so acting. He (Mr. Parnell) did not so much find fault with the postponement of the Queen's Colleges Votes as he did with the postponement of the Estimates for general purposes in Ireland. In times past, it had always been a matter of complaint with the Irish Members that the Irish Estimates were not taken until so late in the Session as to make it almost impossible to allow of any discussion on them. He and many others had hoped that this Session they would have been brought forward at such a period that it would have been practical to have discussed them fully and fairly, and as they had never yet been discussed. The Irish Members desired on such Estimates to have an opportunity of bringing forward many important questions of principle and detail, and to try and remedy several grievances of which they complained. But now, it seemed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having begun under such good auspices, having got the English and Imperial Estimates before the House, was going to throw the Irish Estimates over to the end of the Session. He was quite sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not willingly or knowingly do the Irish Members an injury in that respect; but, as days went by, and they got near the end of July, it became increasingly hard to discuss, with any effect or any satisfaction, Estimates, or to remedy grievances. Irish Estimates had never been fairly discussed since he had had the honour of a seat in that House, and it was a matter of great disappointment to him, just as it appeared likely that they would have the full opportunity which they had never yet had of discussing them, that they should again be postponed. That was not the first time they had been postponed during the present Session. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had gone here, there, and everywhere; he had gone backward and forward in order to avoid the Irish Estimates. He (Mr. Parnell) did not lay any particular stress upon the postponement of the Queen's Colleges Votes; he alluded to the other Irish Estimates, concerning which there were many important questions to bring before the House; and he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to allow the Irish Estimates, apart from those relating to the Queen's Colleges, to come forward sooner than he now intended. He did not wish to criticize at all severely the conduct of the Government in the management of Business. He knew they managed their matters with the best intentions; and although good intentions were invariably successful, he must say this Session their intentions regarding the Estimates did not deserve to be successful. Look at their conduct that night, for instance——

MR. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that the Question before the House is, that this House will, upon Wednesday next, resolve itself into Committee of Supply, and he must confine himself to that Motion. The general conduct of the Government in the management of Business is not before the House.

MR. PARNELL did not quite understand when he could discuss the conduct of the Government in fixing Wednesday next for a particular class of Estimates.

MR. SPEAKER: By the Standing Orders of the House it must be so fixed.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not wish to do anything which was out of Order; but he wanted to thoroughly understand his position in reference to these Estimates. That night Supply was the fourth Order, and the evening had been spent on the three previous Orders. Consequently, they had not got into Supply at such a reasonable time as they had hoped; and the Government, in, the exercise of their discretion—and, he admitted, a very proper exercise of their discretion—had not attempted to get into Supply at such a late hour. But with reference to the question of the time at which they proposed to take Supply, he thought he was entitled to criticize their conduct on the matter of the Irish Estimates. The Army Estimates, which had been down for that night, were to be fixed for the next day, and he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what necessity there was for putting the Army Estimates before the Irish Estimates, which were of a much more pressing character? He knew the fixing of any class of Estimates for Tuesday would be more or less a matter of form; but, at the same time, he urged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring forward the Irish Estimates, and not follow the precedent of keeping them back to a time when they could not be properly discussed or decided upon. There were questions of the greatest importance involved in those Estimates, and he desired to abolish the custom of treating them as matters of form only. He had ventured, perhaps, at too great length, to direct the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House to the matter. He knew the difficulty of discussing Estimates towards the end of July, as, in Sessions which were past, he had felt a sort of weariness when that period arrived. As it seemed likely that the same course would be pursued this Session, he urged upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the propriety of at once bringing on the Irish Estimates, instead of taking the remaining five or six Votes of the Army Estimates, which were not of a pressing character. He wished to explain that in what he had said he did not mean to criticize the conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in postponing the Queen's College Estimates.

MR. SPEAKER: I have to remind the hon. Member that he has repeated the same argument over and over again, and that he is thus trying very severely the forbearance of the House.

MR. PARNELL said, he had no wish to do that; but it was almost impossible for him to say anything without trying the forbearance of the House. He would move that Supply be taken on Tuesday, instead of on Wednesday.

MR. SPEAKER: That is a Motion which cannot be put. It is contrary to the Standing Orders of the House that Supplies should be proposed, unless recommended by Ministers of the Crown.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, when the hon. Gentleman spoke of the Government having repeatedly postponed the Irish Estimates, he forgot that the practice had been, when the Irish Votes were reached, that the Irish Members objected to proceed with them. The Government would be most anxious to go on as soon as they could with the Irish Votes, but it would be inconvenient to take them before the Army Estimates. At the moment, he thought it best to conclude an irregular discussion by explaining that when the Order of the Day for Supply was reached at too late an hour on Monday, it was a Standing Order to postpone it to Wednesday.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he could not too strongly impress upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer the necessity of giving time for a full discussion of the Irish Estimates. There were many questions relating to them to be considered, and he believed a full discussion on one occasion would obviate a repetition of the arguments at any future time. Irish Members only objected to proceed with Votes when the hour was too late for full and fair discussion.

MR. O'DONNELL said, all must feel that the Chancellor of the Exchequer meant to be courteous, and was courteous; but he very seldom gave the Irish Members any real satisfaction. To place himself in Order, he would move the adjournment of the House. The Irish Members felt that the course which the Government adopted towards them provoked them to a certain extent to assume a retaliatory attitude. ["Oh, oh!"] He meant exactly what he said. If hon. Gentlemen opposite would enter into the feelings of Irish Members, who desired to deal carefully and fully with the Estimates relating to their own country, and would give them the opportunity of so doing, it would save a great deal of the spirit of hostility which often arose. This year the Irish Estimates were to be put off just as in previous years, and they were not to have an opportunity of fairly discussing matters of the highest possible moment to the Irish people. It unfortunately happened that Ireland was a distinct country, and hon. Gentlemen, by their treatment, tended to make it more distinct every day. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he was addressed by way of appeal, whether it was attempted to press matters on his attention by a course of conduct which tried the forbearance of his Party, or whatever was done, answered with courteous words, and nothing else. He confessed that he considered the courtesy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer an aggravation of the injury, for the bland manner of the right hon. Gentleman only deprived them of the poor luxury of picking a quarrel. He protested against the way in which the Irish Members had been treated, and he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring forward the Irish Estimates at such a time as would enable Irish Members to discuss them fully.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion of the hon. Member for Dungarvan for the adjournment of the House. In doing so, he was bound to make a few remarks on the observations which the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair had addressed to his hon. Friend the Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell). From his (Mr. Biggar's) experience of the House, he believed it would be impossible for anyone to speak without repetitions. He had known cases in which eminent Members of the House and practised speakers had repeated themselves in exactly the same words. The first case which occurred to him was that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), who was First Lord of the Admiralty in the late Administration. In speaking last Session, the right hon. Gentleman had, on one occasion, as pointed out to him (Mr. Biggar), by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the County of Cork, used the same expression four times in one speech. He (Mr. Biggar) remembered on another occasion noticing the utterances of the hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for England, and he found that the hon. and learned Gentleman repeated himself at least 10 times in a speech of 15 minutes. He also remembered that on one occasion the late Attorney General for Ireland repeated himself 20 times in a 10 minutes' speech. In saying this, he did not mean to infer that he had forgotten the position in which a speaker was placed by the action of those who preceded him; but he wished to show that his hon. Friend the Member for Meath was not guilty of a thing which did not fall to the share of other hon. Members in the House. Having said so much, he would proceed to give shortly his reasons for seconding the Motion for the adjournment of the House.

MR. DALRYMPLE rose to Order. He wished to ask, whether it was competent for any hon. Member, at that stage, to move the adjournment of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The original Question was, that on Wednesday this House resolve itself into Committee of Supply. No doubt it is competent for any hon. Member to move the adjournment of the House on the debate upon that Question.

MR. BIGGAR said, he supported the Motion for adjournment, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not replied to the questions of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Meath. Irish Members believed that a great many things relating to these Estimates required to be discussed and re-modelled; and in the interests not of the Irish Members but of the public service he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give every possible opportunity for that discussion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. O'Donnell.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan would not persevere in his Motion for the adjournment of the House. While agreeing as to the importance of the Irish Estimates, he regretted that hon. Members should have wasted many minutes in the discussion. The Motion for adjournment had better be withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL thought he might be allowed to enter somewhat freely into the matter, because he had been called to Order for repeating himself. He admitted that if he had repeated himself he was in a position which rendered him much more likely so to commit himself than was occupied by many hon. Members. Of course, he was more likely to fall into the error of repetition than the older Members of the House, and who were more experienced and more practised speakers. But he tried to repeat himself as little as possible. It was a thing he as much objected to do as he regretted to hear. He wished to point out to the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not answered the question he had put to him—namely, as to whether he intended to postpone all the Irish Estimates until the Intermediate Education Bill was introduced into the House of Lords? That really meant—Did the Chancellor of the Exchequer intend to make the whole of the Irish Estimates wait upon the Queen's Colleges Estimates? He thought he had drawn a strong distinction between the Queen's Colleges and other Estimates; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not seem to notice that one part of his inquiry at all, although, as the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair had properly said, he had dwelt upon it and repeated it several times. Therefore, he thought that part of his inquiry might have pressed itself more upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer than it had done; and he might have told the House what he intended to do with regard to the other Irish Estimates. He could not help seeing, after what had dropped from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that these Queen's Colleges Estimates might be further postponed. He hoped the Estimates would not be left until a time when they would be obliged to take everything for granted, and he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to tell the House when he would take them?

MR. NEWDEGATE protested against the time of the House being wasted in these unseemly discussions, and pointed out that the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), and the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), by the course they were taking, were arrogating to themselves the right to regulate the Public Business of the House. The Estimates, being a part of the Business of the House, were, both by ancient custom and the Standing Orders, committed to Her Majesty's Ministers for regulation. The hon. Member for Meath had proposed to violate another Rule of the House by proposing that the Estimates should be taken on Tuesday, a day unusual for such a purpose, and upon which the Estimates could not be taken, without a suspension of the Standing Orders. He merely wished to call attention to what had happened during the last half-hour, which had been deliberately wasted by hon. Members opposite, because it tended to strengthen his impression that it was absolutely necessary that the House should frame for itself some Rules to prevent what he must consider a gross abuse of its Privileges.

MR. DILLWYN rose because, he said, he was desirous that they should conform to the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, and to the Rules of the House. His hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had referred to an attempt to violate the Rules of the House by taking the Estimates that day—Tuesday—instead of on Wednesday. He should like to know, whether there was any Rule to prevent Supply being taken on Tuesday; and whether it was out of Order to move the adjournment of the House on the Motion for going into Supply on Wednesday?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, his hon. Friend had misunderstood him. He did not say it was irregular to move the adjournment of the House; but that the manner in which the time of the House had been wasted for half-an-hour was an abuse.

MR. DILLWYN did not refer to the Motion for adjournment; but he understood the ruling was that Supply was to be taken by Standing Order only on Wednesday. He fancied he must have been mistaken with regard to that; and he wanted to know whether there was any Rule which would prevent the hon. Member for Meath, or anybody else, from moving an Amendment that Supply be taken on Tuesday, instead of Wednesday? He was quite aware that the Standing Order provided that Supply should be taken on Wednesday; but he was not aware that such Standing Order or Rule would prevent Supply being taken before Wednesday. He merely wished for information, because he was always desirous of obeying the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair.

MAJOR NOLAN remarked, that that was the sixth time the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had urged the House to take stringent measures against hon. Members from Ireland, so that in this respect his conduct had been perfectly consistent. The object of the hon. Member was to incite the House to take strong measures; but he (Major Nolan) hoped the House would not be actuated by any such feeling of hostility towards any section of hon. Members. He could fancy that the conduct of the hon. Member would be quite consistent if he were sitting in the French Convention of 1793, where if a man was in a minority he ran a chance of getting his head cut off.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had made two points. The first was, that it was out of Order, and a breach of the Rules, to set up Supply for Tuesday night; and the next, that it was contrary to the traditions of the House, and an interference with the functions of the Government, to attempt to suggest anything with regard to dealing with the Estimates. He begged to protest most strongly against such a doctrine. Surely, if any hon. Member considered that any arrangement made by the Government for taking the Estimates concerning any particular branch of the public service was such as to preclude a proper discussion upon them, he had the Constitutional right to stand up and ask for some other arrangement to be made, in order that a full and proper discussion might take place. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had made an indirect appeal to the House to take strong measures against the hon. Member for Meath, in order to repress what was, undoubtedly, their Constitutional right. He had to say, in answer to that suggestion, that any strong measures which were taken against the four or five Irish Members who had insisted upon opportunities for discussing these Estimates would bring to the front not five but 50 Irish Members who would insist on their rights.

MR. GRAY said, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had characterized an attempt to elicit from the Government an intimation as to when they would bring on certain Irish Estimates as an abuse, and had endeavoured to incite the House to use strong measures to repress the right which was now enjoyed of free speech in that House. It was a fair question, whether the hon. Member was himself in Order in making such a suggestion, seeing that he was one of the Members of the Select Committee which was then sitting to consider whether any amendment in the Rules for regulating the mode of procedure in that House should be adopted or not. He (Mr. Gray) should not follow the hon. Member's example, and attempt to prejudice the House as to what changes in the Rules they should adopt; but he thought that if the House were in a position to consider this matter dispassionately, it would be much more important to discuss the conduct of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire in attempting to prejudice the House against certain hon. Members, he being a Member of the Select Committee now having the Business of the House under their consideration.

MR. SPEAKER: I have to observe, with reference to the question raised by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), that the Committee of Supply can only be fixed by a Minister of the Crown; and that, according to the Standing Order, the Committee of Supply must be fixed for Monday, Wednesday, or Friday. I apprehend, however, that it might be open to any hon. Member to move, as an Amendment, that some other day should be substituted, when the Government has given Notice of their intention to take Supply on a particular day. The Question is, that this House do now adjourn.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Committee deferred till Wednesday.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Supply [6th June].—Further Proceeding on Report [7th June] resumed.

Twenty-third Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £580,045, be granted for the Post Office Packet Service."

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, that there was included in the Vote a sum of £260 for conveying the mails betwixt Dunvegan and Lochmaddy, and he regretted to state that the postal service altogether in the Outer Hebrides was most ineffective. The Postmaster General must be aware that the counties of Inverness and Ross, and the town of Inverness, assembled in public meetings, had passed resolutions condemnatory of the service, and remonstrances from other quarters had often been made, as yet without effect. The passage was generally stormy, no sailing packet could make it regularly, and nothing short of a steam service to Lochmaddy would suffice. It was the case that letters were sometimes received in Inverness from America within a shorter period than from parts of the Long Island. There were two banks in the district, which was a populous one, and at certain periods of the year a large business connected with the fisheries was carried on. The answer hitherto given by the Post Office was, that the revenue being so small, no further accommodation could be given. This view of the Post Office, that it was a source of revenue, was only a modern one; and, while he should be glad to see a surplus, it ought to be after the requirements of the public were fully satisfied. The people in the district in question paid taxes like others of the Queen's subjects; and he thought their case, so remote, and in many respects hard, was one peculiarly calling for the consideration of Government. Here he might rest, having stated the grievance, leaving it for the postal authorities to remedy it. But he would suggest that, as the Highland Railway and its connections carried the Northern Scottish mails, and had lately contracted for the mails to the Orkney Isles, performing all the services to the satisfaction of the Post Office, the Postmaster General should put himself in communication with the Railway Company, so as to have steam service betwixt Strome Ferry and Lochmaddy. To put himself in Order, he would now move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £260.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£580,845," in order to insert "£579,085."—(Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh.)

Question proposed, "That £580,045 stand part of the Resolution."

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was not aware that the hon. Member was going to bring forward this subject, or he would have refreshed his memory upon it. But he was quite aware of the importance of the subject; and he ventured to point out to the hon. Member that if he omitted from the Vote the small sum he proposed, there would be no postal service at all with these Islands—a result that the hon. Member would be the first to deprecate. He would be glad to confer with him, and see if some arrangement could be made to meet his views.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Subsequent Resolution agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL.—[BILL 178.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Assheton Cross.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD trusted his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would not persist in pressing forward the second reading of the Bill at that period of the night. Although he (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) was in favour of the measure, yet it contemplated making such great changes in the law, that he thought they ought not to give it a second reading without an opportunity of having its principle fully discussed.

MR. HERSCHELL hoped his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) would not oppose the second reading, by agreeing to which they would be committing themselves to nothing. They were all agreed as to the principle of the Bill, which was merely a consolidation and simplification of the law. The alterations proposed were so very important, and would lead to so much discussion, that he thought the several points could be better considered in Committee on the clauses than by a general discussion on the second reading.

MR. BIGGAR also hoped the second reading would not be opposed, believing that in the case of a Bill of such magnitude and importance it would be impossible to discuss the details before they were in Committee. The Bill proposed to do away with a great many acknowledged abuses, and there should be no obstacle thrown in the way of making progress with it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, he sincerely hoped that the Bill would be passed that Session, and he did not see why there should be any difficulty in the accomplishment of that object. As the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) had said, the main object of the Bill was to consolidate and simplify the law; and no doubt, in addition to that object, it proposed certain alterations and great amendments in the law, which would have to be discussed. It would not be reasonable to suppose that alterations of the importance of those introduced by the Government in this measure could be allowed to pass into law without full and adequate discussion; but there would be abundant opportunities of discussing those seriatim when the Bill came before the Committee. He, therefore, earnestly hoped that his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) would not oppose the second reading of this Bill.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked the hon. and learned Attorney General whether, if he (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) consented to withdraw his opposition now, the hon. and learned Gentleman would give them an opportunity of discussing the Bill on going into Committee? It seemed to him that there was great inconvenience in having a measure of that sort go into Committee without an opportunity being afforded of discussing some of the important principles which it contained. If that opportunity was to be afforded, he should be perfectly prepared to withdraw his opposition at the present moment.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would not give any such assurance. It was not at all convenient to the House that such an undertaking should be given in matters of this kind. It would be much better to take the sense of the House on the second reading; because the almost universal opinion of the House was in favour of the principles of this Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE thought the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Anglesea, that an opportunity should be afforded of discussing the Bill on going into Committee, was a very reasonable one; and he hoped the Government would put down the Bill as the first Order of the Day on going into Committee, so that an opportunity might be given to Members of expressing their opinions on the Code as a whole. Subject to this, he had no objection to now reading the Bill a second time.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had, in conjunction with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, taken some trouble in this matter, and he hoped the advice of the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) would be followed. There could be no advantage in discussing the Bill on general principles; but if they were going to discuss it at all let them discuss it now, and not on going into Committee.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (re-committed)
BILL.—[BILL 143.]

(Mr. Edward Stanhope, Sir Charles Adderley, Mr. Attorney General.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Moved, "That the Committee upon the Bill be fixed for Friday afternoon next, at Two of the clock."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not think that a Morning Sitting should be taken on Friday without more Notice than this. Surely the House ought to have some due, timely, and formal intimation of the intention of the Government in regard to the matter. It was an unusual thing to have Morning Sittings on Fridays at the present period of the year; and, under these circumstances, he must oppose the Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped that the Motion would be agreed to. A period of the Session had now been reached when it had been usual, for many years, that Morning Sittings should commence. [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: But not on Fridays.] He believed that what he had just stated held good both in regard to Tuesdays and Fridays; and he had no doubt it would be for the general convenience of the great majority of the House that there should, for the remainder of the Session, be Morning Sittings on those days. Of course, he was aware that such Sittings entailed upon the Government a corresponding obligation to do the best they could in order to keep a House in the evenings; and that they were most anxious to do. He hoped hon. Members would feel that it was really for the general advantage that they should get on with Business as well and as rapidly as they could; and the Morning Sittings constituted a favourable opportunity for proceeding with Bills which were already in Committee.

MR. DILLWYN said, that to the best of his recollection, it was early in the Session to take two days a-week for Morning Sittings. They were now only in the middle of June, and a considerable time must yet elapse before their labours were brought to a close. Never, within his recollection, had it been proposed to take Morning Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays at so early a period. But there was another consideration which ought not to be left out of sight in connection with such Sittings; and that was, that they precluded from attendance in the House, to a greater or less extent, of hon. Members who were engaged on Select Committees. That was an element which did not appear to him to have been sufficiently considered in suggesting the proposed arrangement.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would name Thursday for the Bill instead of Friday; and, meantime, he would look into the records of the House as to Morning Sittings.

MR. BIGGAR observed, that the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) had an important Motion on the Paper for Friday with reference to the miners of the country, and he hoped an opportunity would be afforded to the hon. Gentleman of bringing that Motion forward.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Committee deferred till Thursday.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£580,845," in order to insert "£579,085."—(Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh.)

Question proposed, "That £580,045 stand part of the Resolution."

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was not aware that the hon. Member was going to bring forward this subject, or he would have refreshed his memory upon it. But he was quite aware of the importance of the subject; and he ventured to point out to the hon. Member that if he omitted from the Vote the small sum he proposed, there would be no postal service at all with these Islands—a result that the hon. Member would be the first to deprecate. He would be glad to confer with him, and see if some arrangement could be made to meet his views.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Subsequent Resolution agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL.—[BILL 178.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Ascheton Cross.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD trusted his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would not persist in pressing forward the second reading of the Bill at that period of the night. Although he (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) was in favour of the measure, yet it contemplated making such great changes in the law, that he thought they ought not to give it a second reading without an opportunity of having its principle fully discussed.

MR. HERSCHELL hoped his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) would not oppose the second reading, by agreeing to which they would be committing themselves to nothing. They were all agreed as to the principle of the Bill, which was merely a consolidation and simplification of the law. The alterations proposed were so very important, and would lead to so much discussion, that he thought the several points could be better considered in Committee on the clauses than by a general discussion on the second reading.

MR. BIGGAR also hoped the second reading would not be opposed, believing that in the case of a Bill of such magnitude and importance it would be impossible to discuss the details before they were in Committee. The Bill proposed to do away with a great many acknowledged abuses, and there should be no obstacle thrown in the way of making progress with it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, he sincerely hoped that the Bill would be passed that Session, and he did not see why there should be any difficulty in the accomplishment of that object. As the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) had said, the main object of the Bill was to consolidate and simplify the law; and no doubt, in addition to that object, it proposed certain alterations and great amendments in the law, which would have to be discussed. It would not be reasonable to suppose that alterations of the importance of those introduced by the Government in this measure could be allowed to pass into law without full and adequate discussion; but there would be abundant opportunities of discussing those amendments when the Bill came before the Committee. He, therefore, earnestly hoped that his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) would not oppose the second reading of this Bill.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked the hon. and learned Attorney General whether, if he (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) consented to withdraw his opposition now, the hon. and learned Gentleman would give them an opportunity of discussing the Bill on going into Committee? It seemed to him that there was great inconvenience in having a measure of that sort go into Committee without an opportunity being afforded of discussing some of the important principles which it contained. [BILLS 44-215.] CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. ONSLOW said, he did not know who had charge of the measure that evening; but if the Bill was to be put down evening after evening, and morning after morning, it was the duty of someone either to move that the Order for its Consideration should be discharged, or that it should be fixed for some day when hon. Members might know that it would be definitely disposed of. The Bill had been put down night after night before Easter, and night after night before the Whitsuntide holidays, and now it seemed likely that it would be put down night after night again. He moved, as an Amendment, that Consideration of the Bill be definitely fixed for Monday, July 1st.

MR. SPEAKER pointed out to the hon. Member that, according to the usual course followed in the House, the Member in charge of a Bill named the time for its Consideration as amended. To move that the Order for that Consideration should be discharged, in the absence of an hon. Member in charge of a Bill, might cause the greatest inconvenience; and was a proceeding which was never taken without due Notice.

MR. ONSLOW said, he should be the last person in the House to do anything irregular; but he begged to give Notice, that when anyone who appeared to have charge of the Bill stated to the Clerk at the Table that he desired it to be considered on such and such a day, he would move that the Order be discharged.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till Thursday.

COLLECTION OF RATES (DUBLIN) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill 'to amend the Law relating to the Collection of Rates in the city of Dublin; and to the office of the Collector General of Rates; and for other purposes.'"

MR. M. BROOKS said, that before the Question was put, it would be convenient if the House received some statement on the subject of the Bill. He hoped that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was unable to make a statement in the House, they would hear that the Report of the Commission, and the evidence relating to the subject, would be laid on the Table immediately.

MR. GRAY said, the matter was in a very anomalous condition. About a week ago he addressed a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He had asked the right hon. Gentleman when the Report would be placed on the Table, when it would be in the hands of hon. Members; and, whether a copy of it had been supplied to an individual Member before it had been supplied to Members generally? and the reply which he received from the Chief Secretary was to the effect that his own copy had been shown to one hon. Member of the House, and that the delay which had taken place in connection with the Report had been occasioned by the printers in Dublin. From his (Mr. Gray's) knowledge of the printing office in that city, he should be inclined to think that the Chief Secretary had been under a mistake in thinking the delay arose from that cause. But if it was intended to delay the production of the Report for a long period, so far as the House generally was concerned, he still thought that a copy of it might be placed on the Table of the House, in order that Members might have an opportunity of perusing it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, the Report and the Evidence would be laid upon the Table in a few days. The Chief Secretary was, he believed, quite accurate, at the time he spoke, as to the cause of the delay in printing the Report. The Minutes of the Evidence were not then printed, and he himself had only read the Report which had been given to the Chief Secretary.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to the Collection of Rates in the city of Dublin; and to the office of the Collector General of Rates; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JAMES LOWTHER and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 220.]

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER nominated the Select Committee on Parliamentary Reporting as follows:—

MR. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, MR. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Viscount CRICHTON, MR. LYON PLAYFAIR, SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, MR. WALTER, LORD FRANCIS HERVEY, MR. DUNBAR, MR. HALL, MR. MITCHELL HENRY, SIR HENRY WOLFF, MR. BARCLAY, and MR. MILLS:—
Power to send for persons, papers, and records;
Five to be the quorum.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had reason to know that there were not a few hon. Members who were dissatisfied with the constitution of the proposed Committee. There appeared to be some hon. Gentlemen on the Committee who were without any special knowledge of the facts connected with the present system of reporting in the House; but there were also others who while acquainted with, and capable of giving information upon, the subject, had been picked from one class only. If the London Press was to be represented in any way upon the Committee, it was equally desirable that the country Press should be represented. There were several hon. Gentlemen in the House, connected with country journals, whom it would be of advantage to have upon the Committee. As to the first two names—those of the right hon. Member for Westminster and the right hon. Member for Bradford—he could not conceive that there would be any objection on the part of any hon. Member of the House; but on the third name—that of the noble Viscount (Viscount Crichton)—he thought it desirable to raise the whole question of the constitution of the Committee, which he did not think was, as it had been proposed, fairly representative of the desire and feeling of the House in so delicate and important a matter as that of Parliamentary reporting.

MR. WHITWELL said, his feeling was that no hon. Gentleman who was connected with reporting in the Gallery ought to be upon the Committee. The proceedings of the Committee, and its ultimate decision, would be much less likely to be called in question, if it were composed of hon. Gentlemen who were entirely independent on this particular matter.

MAJOR NOLAN must say that, so far as this Committee went, he thought the Irish Members had been extremely fairly treated. Two Irish Representatives had been proposed to have seats upon it—the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who had first drawn attention to the whole question, and the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Dunbar), who had been formerly in the Reporters' Gallery, but who was now totally unconnected with the Press in any shape or form. There were other two hon. Members of the Irish Party who had had considerable experience in connection with the Irish Press; but one did not wish to serve, and the second waived his claims in favour of the two hon. Gentlemen whom he had mentioned.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA was not aware that any complaint had been made as to the Irish Members having been unfairly treated in the constitution of the Committee. He hoped that the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), who possessed special knowledge on the subject, would be placed upon the Committee.

MR. GRAY said, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had suggested to him to have his name added to the Committee; but he had declined, because he was connected with the Press, and desired, therefore, not to be upon a Committee, when it might be supposed that he was actuated by personal interest or predilection one way or another. He was surprised, however, to see amongst the list of those who were to constitute the proposed Committee the names of two hon. Gentlemen, both of whom were connected with the London Press. One complaint which had often been made on this subject was that the reports of the proceedings of the House were managed altogether by London journals, to the exclusion of Provincial newspapers. That being so, the constitution of the Committee was evidently faulty. Gentlemen who might be interested in a continuance of the present monopoly, or in changes which might be supposed to result to their own advantage, directly or indirectly, should not be upon the Committee at all. If they were to be put on, then there should also be Representatives of the Provincial Press.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE desired to point out to hon. Members that at present the proposed Committee consisted of only 13 names; and that it would be quite possible to add four names to those 13, without exceeding the limits and dimensions of a Committee on a matter of this importance. Of such additional names, he hoped that that of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) would be one.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, 13 names had been taken to begin with, in the expectation that others would be added. At the same time, the constitution of a Committee of this description was a matter of some difficulty. On the one hand, it was desirable to have a sufficient number of hon. Gentlemen upon it who had practical knowledge on the subject, and who would put questions which would bring out important information; but, on the other hand, it was also desirable that a considerable proportion of the Committee should consist of hon. Gentlemen who had not altogether that technical knowledge and experience, but who could bring common sense and sound judgment to bear on the matters they were called upon to consider. He thought it would be desirable that there should be placed upon the Committee some hon. Gentlemen who would be able to represent the London Press and also the Provincial Press—not for the sake of getting their views upon questions on which the interests of the one or the other might seem to come into collision, but for the purpose of extracting solid and substantial information. Of course, the position of those who were beyond reach of the London morning papers was different from that of men in Scotland or in the North of England; and it was especially important that the interests of the former class should be attended to. He hoped that the Committee, as proposed, would be agreed to; but he would be perfectly prepared, at a later date, to add four other names.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that after what had just been stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would not offer any opposition to the Committee as originally proposed. He hoped, however, that the names which were to be added to it would include those of some two out of the hon. Members for Tipperary, Glasgow, and Newcastle.

Motion agreed to.

And, on June 20, Sir HENRY HOLLAND, Mr. HUTCHINSON, Mr. COWEN, and Major ARBUTHNOT added.

PUBLIC PETITIONS.

PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC PETITIONS—THE INDIAN PRESS LAW — POINT OF ORDER.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, I have to present a Petition from a public meeting of the inhabitants of Poonah, on the line of railway from Bombay, and from certain members of a religious society there, called the "Reformed Hindoos," on the subject of the recent law relating to the vernacular Press. The Petition contains an elaborate and able argument against that law, and it closes with a prayer, which runs as follows:—

"Your Memorialists pray that your honourable House, as the only authority to whom Her Majesty's subjects can appeal for redress and protection against the arbitrary acts of the authorities in India, will not only condemn the measure which forms the subject of the present appeal, but will also make the further continuance of the present policy impossible, and ensure the progressive freedom of Her Majesty's Indian subjects by enlarging the representative element in the Legislative Council of India, and by the adoption of such other measures as to your honourable House may seem fit. And your Memorialists will ever pray," &c.

The House will see, Sir, that in substance this is a real and a regular Petition, concluding with a prayer to the House; but I am desirous to call the attention of the House and your attention to two points in which it is deficient in regularity. In the first place, it is not called a Petition at all, but a Memorial, and in the words I have just read the Petitioners describe themselves as Memorialists. Over and above that, between the Petition and the first signature occur these words—"We beg to remain, honourable Sir, your most humble Memorialists." It is quite evident to me, Sir, that this is a clerical error, because the substance of the Petition, as the House will see from what I have read, is addressed to the House—[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: How is it headed?] It is headed—"Memorial to the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom in Parliament assembled." I propose, therefore, upon my own responsibility, being quite convinced that these words constitute a clerical error, to strike out the intruded words; and if you, Sir, are of opinion that that proceeding is proper, to present the Petition in the usual manner.

MR. SPEAKER: I have examined the document in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, and, although termed a Memorial, it is substantially a Petition properly worded, and concluding with a prayer. I apprehend that, under the circumstances, although the document is termed a Memorial, it may be received if the House should think proper.

Petition brought up; and ordered to lie upon the Table.

QUESTIONS.

THE TREATMENT OF PRISONERS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is true that Mr. G. H. Clarke, of Ironville, Derbyshire, who was sent to prison on May 20th for refusing to vaccinate his child, has not been allowed to receive a letter from his family; and, if so, whether all prisoners are treated with equal rigour?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that debtors were allowed considerable privileges in regard to the receiving of letters; but that, as far as ordinary prisoners were concerned, no distinction was made between one class and another in their treatment whilst in prison. Of the particular case referred to he knew nothing; but he might say that prisoners were warned before trial that visits and letters would be limited, so that they might arrange their affairs if convicted; and, after their conviction, they had always an opportunity of sending to their friends to complete those arrangements. If the fact in this particular case was as stated in the Question, there must have been some mistake.

MR. PARNELL asked, Whether prisoners confined for breaches of the Vaccination Laws were compelled to sleep on a plank bedstead like other prisoners?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that no distinction was made between any prisoners confined for non-payment of fines.

ARMY — CAVALRY FORCE AT LONGFORD.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office, Whether, if the accommodation at Longford Barracks is found to be insufficient for the head-quarters of a regiment, he will, out of consideration to a town so long an important military station, quarter there at all events more than one troop, or consider the expediency of sending therein addition an infantry detachment?

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY, in reply, said, that it was not proposed at present to increase the Cavalry Force at Longford; but, that in course of time, an addition might possibly be made to it.

THE CURRENCY—SMALL SILVER COINAGE.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to the great inconvenience now arising from the scarcity of small silver coin, especially of shillings and sixpences, and to the undue proportion of two shilling pieces now in circulation; and, whether he will direct inquiry into the subject with a view to a remedy?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had heard complaints, and he believed they were not infrequent, as to the supposed dearth of small silver coins, especially sixpences. From inquiries he had made, however, he had ascertained that the dearth, if such there were, did not arise from any failure on the part of the Mint to provide a proper stock of coin. He was informed that at the present moment the stock in the Mint ready for issue was as follows:—Shillings, to the amount of £13,000; sixpences, £19,000; and threepences, £3,000. A much larger amount of shillings and sixpences, he believed, was in stock at the Bank of England, through which all silver coins except threepences were issued to the public, the latter coins being issued by the Mint. The demand for silver coin at the Bank was very small at present owing to the depression of trade, and no difficulty was experienced by the authorities in meeting it. The explanation of the scarcity referred to no doubt was that small coins gave considerable trouble to bankers, and that bankers consequently were apt to give their customers an undue proportion of heavy coins, though they could always obtain any quantities of silver coin they required at the Bank. Perhaps if the hon. and learned Member put a little pressure on his bankers, the inconvenience he complained of would disappear.

PARLIAMENT—MORNING SITTINGS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought it well to take that opportunity of explaining the intentions of the Government in reference to Morning Sittings. He had referred to the time at which Morning Sittings had begun of late years, and found that last year Morning Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays occurred pretty regularly from the 12th June, and in the year before from the 13th and 23rd June, whilst in the year before that they also began about the same time. Under these circumstances, he thought it not unreasonable that the Government should take Morning Sittings, as a general rule, on Tuesdays and Fridays till the end of the Session. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) had an important Motion down for Friday evening next; but he could promise him a good probability of an Evening Sitting.

MR. MACDONALD said, he was quite ready to agree to the arrangement, and, under the circumstances, would not object to the Morning Sitting.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND)

BILL—[BILL 4.]

*(The Lord Advocate, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)*COMMITTEE. [Progress June 4th.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 24 (Regulations as to meetings and proceedings of trustees, board, and district committees).

DR. CAMERON proposed to omit the following words, after the word "meeting," in the 7th sub-section:—

"But this provision shall not prevent a person whose name is entered on the list of commissioners of supply as factor for more than one proprietor from voting on behalf of each such proprietor, in his absence, at a meeting of the trustees."

The hon. Member said, the rule was that no trustee had a second vote, with the exception of the chairman, who had a casting vote when the votes were equal. But this clause made an important exception, by allowing factors to have as many votes as might be given by the proprietors whom they represented if those proprietors happened to be present. He thought this was a very objectionable arrangement. The commissioners of supply were proprietors, or factors who represented proprietors, having a rental of more than £800 a-year; but a proprietor who possessed property worth £4,000 a-year had—not five votes—but a single vote. He therefore thought it was evident that the commissioners of supply, and the trustees constituted out of them, voted as commissioners of supply, and not in respect of any property qualification except that which was absolutely necessary for a commissioner of supply. He could not see why a factor who represented five proprietors having a rental of £800 a-year each should be entitled to five votes, whereas a proprietor whose aggregate rental was £4,000 a-year was entitled to only one vote. He did not think it was desirable to perpetuate under this Bill a system of proxy-voting, which had been done away with in all representative assemblies.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that at a recent meeting of the Commissioners of Supply in Kincardine, it had been stated by one of the ablest advocates of Edinburgh—the Sheriff of the counties of Kincardine, Aberdeen, and Banff—that it was not within the competence of a factor, however many proprietors he might represent, to give more than one vote, and he wished to ask the Lord Advocate if this were not the law on the subject? He could not see any reason why there should be a different law under this Bill from what was the case in regard to other county assemblies. If the Lord Advocate would tell them what was the law, they would be able to understand why this new requirement was proposed for Scotland.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he could not say what the law might be; but he could assure the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken (Sir George Balfour), that the practice was quite the contrary of what he had stated to be the law. It was the common practice for a factor to give two or three votes, according to the number of proprietors whom he represented. There was often a difficulty of getting a quorum at meetings of commissioners of supply; and therefore he thought it was very desirable to keep up voting by commission.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he was perfectly aware that bad habits were practised at certain meetings in Scotland; but he would appeal to the Lord Advocate to state what the law of Scotland really was on this subject. He felt perfectly sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not agree with the hon. Baronet in his interpretation of the law.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was not competent to tell the hon. and gallant Member what the general practice was in county meetings in Scotland, as such practice had not come under his personal observation, and he had not sought for information on the subject. But he could unhesitatingly say, with respect to the Act which established the qualification of commissioners, that it was his opinion and belief that, according to law, a factor, although representing several proprietors whose rental was above the value of £800 a-year, was entitled to only one vote. The Statute simply declared that such factor should have the qualification of a commissioner; and a commissioner who might have half-a-dozen qualifications in the same county was only entitled to act as one commissioner.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron). It was well known that the multiplication of votes in Scotland, by placing several mandates in the hands of one person, was an undoubted grievance. It was especially so in the case of parochial boards. With regard to what the Lord Advocate had just said, he could confirm the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman from the experience of his own county, where one person, if he was a commissioner in his own right, or as representing others, was entitled to only one vote. If cumulative voting were permitted, one man might control the whole of a meeting. Six individuals at a meeting really represented a diversified opinion; whereas one person holding six mandates could only represent one opinion.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he had never heard of anything unfair being done under the system of plural voting. It frequently happened that a proprietor had property in more than two parishes, and it was a great consideration to proprietors to be able to delegate their powers to factors who were well acquainted with the land, and were experienced in the details of county management. Again, factors very often represented proprietors at important meetings, when those proprietors were not able to be present themselves. This would be the case with Scottish Members of Parliament, who could not always attend the meetings of the commissioners of supply, but who took a deep interest in the questions which were brought before the meetings. He thought it would be extremely hard on proprietors that they should be left out altogether because they could not attend the meetings; but they would be shut out if what was taken to be law by the hon. and gallant Member (Sir George Balfour) were to be acted on. It would, in his opinion, be unfair to many proprietors to adopt the Amendment, as they placed their power of voting in the hands of the best persons they could find to represent them; and no reason had been given by the Government for departing from the present practice. He therefore hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the point was, whether there was any reason for departing from the present law as to voting? Whatever the practice in Scotland was, they had been told by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate that the law was opposed to that which the Bill itself now suggested. If there was any special reason for the alteration proposed in the Bill he should be perfectly ready to listen to it; but he had not at present heard from the Lord Advocate why the alteration was made, and they were therefore discussing the question in the absence of that information. He thought the Government would do well not to insist on the acceptance of the clause as it stood. The hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Mark Stewart) had said that the Amendment would be very hard on absentee proprietors, who could not, if it were agreed to, be represented. But he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) supposed that factors who represented proprietors could express the opinions of those proprietors, and could defend their interests by words as much as they liked, although they might not be allowed to vote for as many masters as they served.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he hoped that the Lord Advocate would agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow. If a proprietor were present at a meeting, it was very possible that he might change his opinion in the course of discussion, and give a different vote from that which his factor would have given for him. It was very annoying to proprietors who were present to find themselves outvoted by one man having several votes.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he supported the Amendment, both in the interest of the public and in the interest of proprietors themselves. He thought that the more proprietors were called upon to look after their different districts, and the more they took an interest in their respective estates, the better it would be both for themselves and for others; but if they committed their affairs to the keeping of other men, and were never to be consulted as to the business to be brought forward at the county meetings, they would become mere cyphers in the hands of factors and agents. He also, as he had indicated, supported the Amendment very much in the interests of proprietors themselves. A factor might represent not one proprietor, but several proprietors; and if a discussion took place at a meeting with regard to a particular road, an agent might vote in favour of the road being made or repaired, when this might be contrary to the interests of all but one of the proprietors whom he represented. An agent would thus be called upon to use the votes of absent proprietors in favour of a scheme which was prejudicial to their own interests.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could see the difficulty which had been pointed out, and he had no objection, so far as he and the Government were concerned, to effect being given to the Amendment, on the understanding that this part of the Bill should be brought into harmony with what was the existing law.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, as an Amendment, in page 15, to add at the end of the clause the following sub-section:—

"(8.) The board or any district committee may appoint a committee or committees of their own number for the better execution of the powers hereby granted to them, and such committee shall report their proceedings to the board or district committee appointing them, and every act, order, or thing which shall be done, ordered, or performed by such committees, on being approved of by the board or district committee, shall be equally valid and sufficient as if ordered, done, or performed by the board or district committee."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he believed the committees would have under the Bill the powers which the proposed sub-section would give them; but he had no objection to those powers being expressed.

Amendment agreed to; sub-section added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 25 (Chairman to be elected, in absence of ordinary chairman); Clause 26 (District committees and board to make reports); and Clause 27 (Appeal from decision of district committee), severally agreed to.

Appointment of Officers.

Clause 28 (Appointment of county officers), agreed to.

Clause 29 (Appointment of district officers.)

MR. MARK STEWART proposed, as an Amendment, in page 16, line 19, to leave out the word "may," and to insert the word "shall." He said that it often happened that when things were going smoothly the committees actually forgot to call meetings, and did not make these appointments. It would be more convenient for the district committees to make all the appointments, subject, no doubt, to the consent of the board, instead of only some of them.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he must oppose the Amendment. The district committees must necessarily have a clerk and a treasurer, because they held meetings, and conducted their own administration; but, on the other hand, he thought it was a proper question for the general body of trustees to determine whether each district should be burdened with the expense of a separate surveyor and a separate collector. It might, in some cases, be convenient, and a great saving, to have one general collector for the various districts of a county; and there should, therefore, only be power to nominate the officers in each district when it was judged right by the general body of trustees. For that reason he thought the word "may" must stand.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he proposed afterwards to insert the words "with the consent of the board," to meet the point.

MR. RAMSAY said, he hoped the Lord Advocate did not infer that the word "may" in the clause meant "shall."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not infer that. If the word "shall" were used, it would make it the duty of the board to give their consent to the appointment of fit persons, and would make imperative the appointment of all the officers in each district.

Amendment negatived.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he hoped the principle laid down by the Lord Advocate, of diminishing the number of officers employed in connection with the roads would be fully carried out. The greatest precaution should be taken to prevent the multiplication of offices. The direction in which economy was practicable under the abolished trusts was in placing large areas of roads under one officer, with subordinates for the executive duties.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that while agreeing with everything which the Lord Advocate had said as to the powers to be possessed by the district committees of appointing officers, he thought such appointments should be made with the consent of the general body of trustees. These were very important questions, and he considered that the general body of trustees should decide them. He would, therefore, move that before the word "board," in page 16, line 21, the words "trustees or" be inserted.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought it was settled that the business to be transacted in a district, and requiring a clerk for its performance, was to be performed wholly by the district committee, and if they would turn to Section 26 they would see that this was so. He thought that any body of gentlemen selected as the committee of the district, and intrusted with the management of the district under this measure, would surely be fit to be intrusted with the selection of their clerk and treasurer, to write the minutes and keep their money. He should be happy to leave the other appointments to the district committees, if it were not for the consideration that it might be against the pecuniary interest of the county that they should make such appointments.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he thought the Lord Advocate had misapprehended the effect of what he proposed. The question was not whether the board should have the power to appoint its own officers, but whether the district committees should have the power of not only appointing clerks but surveyors. The Bill, as it stood, gave the board power to say whether the district committees should have a clerk and a surveyor; but he proposed that that power should be in the hands of the trustees, and not in the hands of the board. He also thought it would be more courteous to the district committees themselves, if the general body of the trustees settled this matter instead of the board.

MR. M'LAREN said, it seemed to him that the clause was of more importance than the Lord Advocate considered it to be. He remembered—and he had refreshed his memory by looking up their proceedings—that the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the state of the roads in Scotland found that there was a disposition to appoint a great number of clerks of separate trusts, and of separate divisions of trusts; and he thought he could point out where there were 81 offices in one county of clerks and surveyors. It was stated by one of the witnesses respecting Lanarkshire, for example, that those parties got £2,000 a-year among them. Independently altogether of the expense of maintaining the roads, the number of tolls and also of sub-tolls came to such a large proportion, that the different witnesses—among the rest Lord Belhaven, convener of the county of Lanark—gave it as their deliberate opinion, that under the system advocated by the promoters of this Bill, a saving of 25 or 30 per cent, as compared with the other system, would be effected. For these reasons, it was obvious that the Government could have no possible interest in the matter except to promote economy; and he thought that they should do all they could to place an embargo on the multiplication of little offices. In his opinion, the Government ought to accept the Amendment, as being calculated to effect that object.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. M'Laren) had anticipated him in the remarks which he had made. An examination of the printed statements of outlay on the roads of Scotland would show a very large portion of the charges caused by salaries to officers of various descriptions. Assuming the roads of all kinds in Scotland to be between 22,000 and 24,000 miles in length, and the expenditure at £250,000, then the saving in salaries alone ought to be nearly £50,000. Consolidation would not only allow of saving in salaries, but in the details of work.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he considered the Amendment was a ridiculous one. It would take away the responsibility from the board; and the fears of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) were much more likely to be realized with a large body of trustees than with a small body; for he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) had always found that a large body was more inclined to appoint a great number of officers than a small one.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was disposed, not to follow his hon. Friend (Mr. Orr-Ewing), but to accept the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay); and the more so, as he found that under Section 28 the trustees were intrusted with the appointment of the general surveyor of the county, and therefore the matter in question would rightly fall under Clause 29.

Amendment (Mr. J. W. Barclay) agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. J. W. BARCLAY, the words "trustees or" were inserted in page 16, line 24, before the word "board."

MR. MARK STEWART proposed, as an Amendment, the insertion, after the word "officer," in page 16, line 28, the words "with the consent of the board." He objected to the exclusive power being in the hands of the district committee in the appointment of officers. It was well known that there was considerable jealousy evinced in the exercise of such power, and that not unfrequently party spirit ran high, much feeling was shown, both political and religious; therefore, in his opinion, no appointments should be made without the consent of the board.

THE LORD ADVOCATE feared he could not accept the Amendment proposed, for the reason stated. The appointment of some of the officers lay with the district committee; and, as regarded the others, it was for the trustees to determine whether such appointments should be made. He thought, under the circumstances, it would be a very unfortunate thing to take away from them a power of that kind. They were the proper persons to judge of the requirements of the case.

MR. RAMSAY thought the hon. Gentleman who had proposed the Amendment (Mr. Mark Stewart) had not rightly considered the position in which he would be placed if he were a member of a district committee, or had to act for that committee in the capacity of their chairman. He thought the Amendment should not be adopted.

Amendment negatived.

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed a consequential Amendment in page 16, line 31, to leave out the word "board," and insert "trustees." As the clause stood, with reference to the appointment of officers, the boards were to give leave, subject to certain conditions. The trustees were also to give that leave, and therefore the clause, as it stood, was ambiguous.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wanted to know if the trustees would have the power to appoint the officers for life? That would be a dangerous power to give them, inasmuch as influences might be brought to bear upon any one case. They might have district clerks, or officers of that kind, appointed for life, or for so long a term of years that, practically, they could not dismiss them, although they might not act in accord with the wishes of the Board.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the best answer he could give was to refer the hon. Gentleman to the words of the clause—"and every such officer shall be subject to removal at any time."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Yes, if the right of removal were not modified by special written agreement. Was it competent for the trustees to make an agreement for an appointment for life?

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought not. The clause referred to the condition of the appointment, and set forth all that was necessary.

MR. RAMSAY asked, if it would not be better to leave out the words—"Unless the power of removal be modified?" It was possible for the power to be abused, and he would suggest the omission of those words.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 30 (Salaries of county road officials. Allocation of general expenditure).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY proposed an Amendment, giving the trustees the power of fixing salaries in accordance with the words adopted in the last clause. He proposed to leave out in page 16, line 37, the words "subject to the approval of."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not consent to the Amendment proposed. The board was a body that was constantly available, and the salary might require adjustment, from time to time, whenever a new officer was appointed.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR suggested that such a revision should take place year by year as would bring the whole of the officers' salaries and duties under the control, and, if necessary, the revision, of the Board.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked, if the trustees had power over the board in fixing the salaries of the officers?

THE LORD ADVOCATE replied, that it was subject to their approval.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 31 (Former officers to continue till removed), agreed to.

General Management in Counties and Burghs.

Clause 32 (Consolidation of trusts).

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendment was made:—In page 17, line 38, the word "hereinafter" was struck out, and "hereinbefore" substituted.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, as an Amendment, in page 18, line 5, after "expressed," to insert the words "and allocation hereinafter provided." As the clause stood, it seemed to him it might place in one county the debts of a turnpike which really belonged to an adjacent county.

THE LORD ADVOCATE asked the hon. Gentleman to delay his Amendment until he had time to look into it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 33 (Abolition of tolls, statute labour, causeway mail, &c.).

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that he had to move an Amendment which was rendered necessary by the alteration of the date in Section 6. In page 18, line 14, he proposed, after "Scotland," to insert—

Mr. J. W. Barclay

"Where such commencement shall happen before the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, and otherwise from and after the first day of June one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three."

MR. ORR-EWING said, that as the Amendment he had on the Paper depended upon the clause as it would be amended, he ought not perhaps to move it.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendments were made:—In page 18, line 23, after "exactions," insert "except as hereinafter provided;" and in the same page, line 24, after "Act," insert—

"Provided always, That all the provisions of 'The Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,' with respect to turnpike roads shall continue applicable to all highways which are turnpike roads at the passing of this Act."

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER proposed, as an Amendment, in line 26, to leave out the words "not less than five years." It was only imposing causeway toll in another form; and he was at a loss to see why, if causeway or other tolls were abolished in the rural districts, they should be kept up in the boroughs.

MR. MARK STEWART could not support the Amendment.

MR. RAMSAY thought the words proposed to be left out had been inserted in consequence of the proposals made by a deputation who had waited upon the Government. An arrangement was made with certain boroughs that the dues should continue for five years.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the terms of the clause were arranged with reference to the date when the Bill was to come into operation. He would explain that the dues in question were levied in respect of passage through the boroughs, and that not merely for the passage, but for the general purposes of the community. And the reason for continuing them a certain time was this—that whilst the boroughs consented to their general abolition they were exceedingly desirous to continue these exactions for a few years, to enable them to accumulate a fund with the view of providing for their general purposes. It would be only reasonable to allow the burghs a period of years for that purpose.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the matter had been the subject of a great deal of consideration and arrangement. In the case of one of the burghs which he represented, he might point out that the total income from this source was £1,450—a very considerable sum—and it had nothing to do with the maintenance of roads. Out of that sum the burgh had to pay ministers' stipends and other matters of that kind; and no part of it was specially connected with the repair of the roads. At the same time, his constituents fully acknowledged that when the system of tolls was abolished, all other similar forms of exaction must go as well; but, as the Lord Advocate had said, it was only fair that a certain time should be allowed for the burghs to prepare for the additional expenditure that would be involved in consequence of the loss of revenue that would have to be sustained; and, therefore, he hoped that the proposition of the hon. Baronet (Sir Windham Anstruther) would not be accepted.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL felt inclined to support the Amendment. A great deal might be said against causeway-mail. It was a kind of ancient transit duty levied on the community, similar to that levied by the robber chief in olden times. It seemed to him that the general public ought not to be called upon to pay such exactions for a long term of years to come. Even when the proceeds were applied to payment of ministers' stipends, they ought to be put an end to as soon as possible.

MR. YEAMAN objected to the omission of the words from the clause. He understood that the words had been inserted in the clause by arrangement, after the deputation from the burghs of Scotland had seen the Lord Advocate on the subject. Many of those burghs depended upon revenue of that class of mail, and to cut off those exactions without previous notice would be unjust, and might be the means of causing great dissatisfaction in many of the burghs of Scotland.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed, as an Amendment, in page 18, line 26, to leave out the word "five," and insert "four."

MR. RAMSAY said, that the word mail in Scotland was equivalent in its meaning to rent. Causeway-mail was "rent" in other words. He objected to the Amendment proposed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there was no definite arrangement made as to the time. The arrangement came to had reference to the length of time that should elapse before the Act came into operation. He had already intimated that this mail—he would not call it black-mail—must come to an early termination. In the first Amendment he had placed on the Paper on this subject, he had substituted "three" in the place of "five," in deference to the opinion of one or two of the burgh Members.

MR. RAMSAY said, that the deputation from the burghs left under the impression that "five" would be the minimum number of years during which the causeway-mail was to be continued.

Amendment agreed to; word substituted accordingly.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendment made:—In page 18, line 28, to leave out all the words after the word "situated," down to the words "eighty-three," in line 30, inclusive.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, the following proviso was added at the end of the clause:—

"Notwithstanding that the other provisions of this Act shall not be in force in any county (including the burgh wholly or partly situated therein), all causeway-mail within such burghs shall be abolished from and after the fifteenth day of May one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL would like the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to explain why the tolls should be continued in this way, more than five years from this time.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY wished to know the precise meaning of the clause. As he understood it, whether the other tolls were abolished or not, the causeway-mail must come to an end in 1884.

THE LORD ADVOCATE explained, that in the case of certain burghs four years were given from the adoption of the Act, when causeway-mail would cease in all of them; and that it was proposed to extend the same rule to burghs within counties remaining under their Local Acts.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY did not in that case quite see the occasion for the Amendment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the hon. Member would understand that the first part of Clause 33 dealt with counties and burghs in counties where the provisions of this Act had either been adopted or might become compulsory in 1883; but there were other counties where the provisions of this Act might never come to apply—counties having Acts in which tolls were not abolished—and the object of the proviso was to abolish tolls in those counties four years after the date at which, in other counties, this measure became compulsory.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 34 (Application of tolls and statute labour money at present leviable).

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, as an Amendment, in line 35, after "May," to insert "or first day of June." He might explain that this Amendment was consequent upon the time of the adoption of the Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 35 (Trustees to purchase pontages, &c.)

MR. RAMSAY said, that the clause gave power to trustees to settle what compensation should be paid to a person or corporation in respect of his or their patrimonial interest in pontages. He had to move that the word "patrimonial," in page 19, line 6, should be struck out, and "pecuniary" inserted. His reason for asking that this change should be made was that in reading the clause over, he did not well understand how the word "patrimonial" could apply to the case of a corporation.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he really could not assent to the Amendment. The word "patrimonial" had the same meaning in the case of a corporation as in the case of an individual, and it had a very distinct and well-known meaning. The word "pecuniary" would include everything. It would include the very causeway-mail abolished under the previous section. The distinction was quite an appreciable one. It was the difference between, for instance, a grant to levy a toll upon a public road or bridge, the property of the public originally, and erected with public funds, and the case of a private bridge. The right of levying tolls for the use of a private ferry given to corporations was a patrimonial interest, and the other was not.

Amendment negatived.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY apprehended that, under the clause as it stood, the owner or owners of the bridge would be entitled to compensation in respect of the pontages without the cost of maintenance of the bridge being taken into consideration. He begged, therefore, to move, as an Amendment, at page 19, in line 12, after "debts," to insert "but in valuing such pontages the cost of maintaining the bridge must be deducted therefrom."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that there could not be much doubt upon that point. Their patrimonial interest was the net sum which they derived from the bridge year by year. He should have no objection whatever to insert words to carry out the object of the hon. Member; but he did not think the words at present proposed were very happy in expression.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 36 (Roads formerly turnpike not wholly situated in one county or burgh).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, in page 20, line 9, to leave out from and including sub-section (d) to end of clause, the following words of sub-section 1:—

"Where this Act shall have been adopted, or shall be in force in one or more of the counties or burghs in which such road is situated . . . (e), the portion of such road within such county or any burgh therein shall be vested in, and managed and maintained by, the trustees, board, and district committees of the county, or the local authority of the burgh, as the case may be, in which such portion is situated."

He had also put down a clause in substitution for the part struck out, which involved a very complicated question, not only between counties which had adopted the Act, but between counties which had adopted the Act and those which had not. He did not think the clause, as it stood in the Bill, would be workable; and he was not quite sure that the clause which he had put upon the Paper in substitution for it would meet all the circumstances of the case. What, therefore, he would suggest to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was, that he should postpone this clause, and consider whether another might not be framed which would more fully meet the case. If the Lord Advocate was not willing to take that course, he (Mr. Barclay) was quite prepared to discuss the points which arose upon the clause.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not propose to postpone the clause; but he had no objection to postpone the consideration of the Amendments and have them fairly considered, if that would meet the view of the hon. Member.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY remarked that if they were to understand that the clause was to pass now, he should like to indicate one or two points in which the clause was objectionable.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out, that if the hon. Member did not propose to move the Amendment which stood in his name, he would not be in Order in discussing the clause generally until the other Amendments standing on the Paper had been disposed of.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he did not desire to move his Amendment if he were to understand that the clause was to be postponed; but if they were to be asked to pass it as a whole, he should like to do so.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was very unusual to postpone a clause until a new clause was arrived at; and, therefore, he hoped the discussion might take place, either at a future stage, or on some clause to be brought up afterwards, and then, if necessary, this clause might be altered.

DR. CAMERON wished to point out that if the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) insisted upon the postponement of the clause, it would prevent other points which hon. Members had to raise in connection with it from being now disposed of. Moreover, he (Dr. Cameron) had no doubt that by deferring to the wish of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, an agreement might be arrived at which would obviate the necessity for any further discussion. If, however, any points remained upon which an agreement could not be arrived at, they might be settled upon the Report.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the hon. Member would adopt that course.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he should defer to the opinion of the Committee, and not move his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. CAMERON said, he had to move an Amendment in sub-section (d) of the clause of very considerable practical importance. It was proposed, under that sub-section, to deal with bridges which happened to be partly in one burgh or county and partly in another, in precisely the same manner as if they were roads—that was to say, that, failing agreement as to cost of maintenance, the Debt Commissioners “Shall proceed forthwith to ascertain and determine the proportions in which, according to equity, and taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, the expense of maintaining the same ought to be, and shall be, allocated, and be a charge against such trustees and such local authority or authorities respectively, and the decision of such Debt Commissioners shall be final.”

These words were to be found in Clause 64, and they were applicable to roads. Now, it seemed to him that the case of a bridge was very different from that of a road. In the case of a road they had to consider how much lay in one district and how much in another; but a bridge was altogether in a different position, each half standing as a natural terminus to the part of the road in the county or burgh on one side of the river and the other. For instance, in the case of Glasgow, there was a bridge connecting it with Hillhead, and, under the Bill, an absolute discretion was given to the Commissioner, without any appeal from his decision, to fix the proportions of the cost of maintenance to be paid by Glasgow and Hillhead respectively. What he maintained was, that in such a case, the cost of maintenance should be divided equally between Glasgow and Hillhead; because, although a very much smaller place than Glasgow, yet Hillhead obtained quite as much advantage from the bridge as Glasgow did. Besides, Glasgow had to maintain a great number of other bridges connecting it with other districts, both burgh and county; and he maintained that there was no necessity for giving this discretion to the Commissioner at all, and that in the case of a bridge the principle should be adopted which had, he believed, been adopted in many Private Acts—in the Aberdeenshire Local Act, for example—of dividing the cost of maintenance equally between the burghs and counties in which the bridge happened to be. He moved, after “charge,” to insert “equally.”

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, it seemed to him that it would be only fair that, in any allocation of the charge between two districts, the circumstances of which differed, some difference ought to be maintained. He thought the arrangement in the sub-section, to leave it in the hands of the Commissioners finally to decide what was the proper course to be pursued between the districts, was a perfectly fair one.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR would suggest to the Committee that they should allow the whole question to be settled on the Report. There was one bridge connecting the county he represented with Aberdeenshire and another with Forfar; and he should like to have an opportunity of conferring with his constituents, in order to ascertain the bearings of the change which the hon. Member for Glasgow proposed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not believe that the proposed Amendment was at all directed against the interest of any particular locality in Scotland, and it humbly appeared to him to be a very reasonable one. It was quite true that they might have a small area abutting upon a larger one, and a bridge partly in each; but, on the other hand, they must recollect that where they had a large area, whether city or county, there would be a great number of those bridges thrown upon that larger area. They had bridges at various points, and it was quite fair to make each area bear half the expense of those bridges of which half was within its limits. He thought that was reasonable, and he was quite prepared to accede to the Amendment.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE pointed out that there were cases in which the Amendment, if adopted, would inflict a considerable injustice. There was no doubt that the people in the immediate neighbourhood of the bridge connecting Glasgow with Hillhead benefited thereby; but if benefit was desired by a much larger number of persons beyond than those living on the banks, and if those who passed over to Hillhead were not connected with that burgh, but with the county of Dumbarton, it would be hard on the people of the former place to be called upon to pay the full half of the expense. There were exceptional cases, and it would be better to leave it to the discretion of the Commissioners.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the matter could not be left in the position in which it stood in the clause. Let them take the case of a turnpike road extending one mile on one side of the bridge and 50 miles on the other. The debt upon that road must be allocated more or less in proportion to its length; and if the clause were to stand in its present shape, the expense of maintaining the bridge for all time coming would be apportioned in the same manner as the debt was allocated. Such an arrangement would be manifestly unfair. He therefore thought that, whatever arrangement might be adopted, the present provision made in the clause would not be satisfactory, and could not be allowed to stand. Upon the whole he was inclined to think that the burden of maintaining a bridge should be equally divided between the two parties.

MR. M'LAREN entirely approved of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron); and, after the clear explanation of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate on the subject, he did not see how it could be resisted. Suppose a new bridge was to be built to-morrow, how would they propose that it should be undertaken? Would any reasonable party propose that Hillhead should pay £100 towards building it, and Glasgow £3,000? Such a proposal, it seemed to him, would be altogether out of the question, because it was the people outside a great city who wanted to get into it, and it was not the people within it who wanted to get out in that particular direction. For the reasons that had been stated, he thought the Amendment ought to be adopted.

MR. MARK STEWART regretted very much the decision to which the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had come, and thought that more time should be taken to consider the question, and hoped it would be further considered by the Government on the Report.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL entertained pretty much the same opinion as the hon. Member who had last spoken (Mr. Mark Stewart). He had no doubt that, as an ordinary rule, the simple plan was the right one—namely, that the cost of the bridge should be equally divided between the two parties. But he also felt that there might be very exceptional cases. There might be a case in which a very large and expensive bridge had been built, connecting a great city with a burgh little more than a village, and it was hardly reasonable to expect that that small place should undertake half the great cost of the bridge. What he hoped was, that the Amendment would now be accepted; and that before the Report the matter would be considered, and a new clause brought up, which would provide for such exceptional cases as that he had referred to.

MR. VANS AGNEW remarked, that he could not agree that the Amendment should be adopted, and that the cost of the maintenance of the bridges under two separate jurisdictions should for all time be equally divided, because the circumstances must vary very much. At the same time, he did not like the clause as it stood. He did not think the expense of maintaining a bridge should necessarily be apportioned in all time coming in the same way as the debt on the turnpike roads leading to it was allocated between the two parties. If the matter were postponed, and fully considered, and a clause brought up on the Report to meet the general views of the Committee, it would be an advantage. He was sorry to say that he did not agree either with the clause or with the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron); but he thought a fair arrangement might be arrived at if more time were taken for consideration. He would, therefore, ask the Lord Advocate to postpone the clause.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not consent to postpone the clause, in which there was an attempt made—he did not say a successful one—to deal with bridges of an exceptional character.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN pointed out that, as a matter of fact, the clause could not be postponed, because an Amendment upon it had already been moved.

Amendment agreed to.

DR. CAMERON moved, as an Amendment, in page 20, line 15, to leave out after "as" to "respectively," in line 20, inclusive. As the charge was to be an equal one, the words in the clause should be left out which provided that the charge should be allocated as nearly as might be in the same manner as was therein provided in relation to the allocation of road debts between the trustees of a county or counties and the local authorities of a burgh or burghs respectively.

Amendment agreed to.

DR. CAMERON moved, as an Amendment, that the word "equally" should be inserted in page 20, line 21, after "vested" in the following section—

"The management of the bridge shall, failing agreement, be vested in the trustees or local authority, as the case may be, upon whom the largest portion of the cost of maintenance is allocated."

MR. J. W. BARCLAY thought this was hardly a satisfactory arrangement. He would be glad if the Lord Advocate would explain how this Amendment would be practically worked.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was prepared, if the Amendment was postponed, to consider the matter.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that where the cost of the bridges was equally divided between two authorities, as was now agreed, it would be nonsense to say, as the clause stood—"The management of the bridge shall be vested in the trustees or local authority upon whom the largest portion of the cost of maintenance is allocated."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there were consequential Amendments necessary, and he agreed that the words "upon whom the largest portion of the cost of maintenance is allocated" should be deleted. He would consider as to some scheme for the future management by some joint committee of the two bodies.

Amendment agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there was another very obvious consequential Amendment that would have to be made if the words ran—"trustees or local authority." The management should be vested in the trustees and the local authority.

MR. RAMSAY asked if it should not be "or local authorities;" because, in the case of two adjacent burghs, the bridge would be managed between the two.

THE LORD ADVOCATE replied, that it would be better to put it in the plural, and he would accordingly move that the words should be "in the trustees and local authorities chargeable with the cost of maintenance."

MR. RAMSAY thought the word "or" should stand.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendments were made:— In page 20, line 22, the word "authorities" was substituted for authority; and in lines 23 and 24, the words "upon whom the largest portion of the cost of maintenance is allocated" were struck out, and the words "chargeable with the cost" inserted instead.

DR. CAMERON pointed out a similar Amendment which would be necessary on the sub-section (i).

THE LORD ADVOCATE agreed to the Amendment as it was merely consequential.

Amendment made.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he proposed to add to the clause the following paragraph:—

"One-half of the tolls under deduction of the expense of collection collected on any such bridge, or within one mile thereof, shall belong to the county which has abolished tolls, or to the burgh therein (as the case may be) within which such bridge is partly situated."

Unless some provision of the kind were made, the county that had abolished tolls might have to pay half the cost of maintenance, while the county that had not abolished tolls might appropriate all the tolls on the bridge by keeping and maintaining the tolls upon the bridge as heretofore in connection therewith. He might refer to an Amendment on Clause 7. It was very obvious that Clause 7 of the Bill contemplated that tolls might continue to be levied on such partly-situated bridges in a county that had not abolished tolls. He thought the county that had abolished tolls ought either to have the half of those tolls collected on the bridge which it had to help in maintaining, or the tolls should be altogether abolished.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "One-half of the tolls under deduction of the expense of collection collected on any such bridge, or within one mile thereof, shall belong to the county which has abolished tolls, or to the burgh therein (as the case may be) within which such bridge is partly situated."—(Mr. James Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the Amendment appeared to him to introduce an entirely new element. The counties that had already abolished tolls had done so on conditions satisfactory to themselves, and when a county outside had also abolished tolls the two would be precisely in the same case; but why make exceptional legislation in favour of the county that had abolished tolls, when they would be on the same footing as soon as the county outside had adopted the Act?

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, it was the case of a bridge between two counties that he contemplated. The county that had abolished tolls was to pay half the cost of the bridge, and the county which had not might continue the tolls upon the bridge under the Act, and appropriate the whole amount collected. That was manifestly an unfair arrangement. One county abolished tolls two or three years sooner than another, and if it paid half the debt upon a bridge, and half the expense of maintenance, it ought to have some benefit for that.

MR. M'LAREN begged to suggest to the consideration of the Lord Advocate, whether he might not bring up a clause on Report to the effect, that in the case supposed, the county on the one side of the river having tolls, in place of dividing tolls—which would be a clumsy expedient—with the county on the other side which had none, should bear the whole expense of keeping up the bridge as long as tolls were collected, and that when they were abolished the cost of the bridge should then be divided?

MR. RAMSAY did not regard this question as of much importance, considering the short period during which tolls could still be collected. If it had been proposed that it should be permissible for counties to continue tolls, the question raised by the hon. Member for Forfarshire would have had importance, and the Amendment might have been passed. But, considering that there were so few years during which tolls could be maintained, and that the county which had abolished them had done so in the knowledge of the circumstances, he thought it was not a question on which they need waste much time.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE was also of opinion that, considering the shortness of the time, the question was not one of importance.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that before the Committee divided upon this question—because he intended to take a division upon it—he wished to say that in the county which he represented there were two bridges, one under a bridge trust, and the other a part of the turnpike. The tolls upon those bridges amounted to a considerable sum, and under the Bill, as it at present stood, the whole of the tolls might be collected on those bridges for five years after the Bill passed. The whole of those tolls would be paid to the Commissioners of Supply of the adjoining counties, unless the adjoining county adopted the Bill. He did not know what the Lord Advocate considered a considerable sum; but he was sure the tolls on those bridges would in five years amount to several thousand pounds. The arrangement was so manifestly unjust, and offered so strong an inducement to the adjoining county not to abolish tolls as long as they could benefit by them, that he felt bound to divide upon the question.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, the county to which the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) referred was the one he (Sir George Balfour) had the honour to represent, and the other case was that of the Montrose bridge, which connected that important sea town with its county, Forfar; and the apportionment of charges between the area contained in the roads over these bridges ought to be adjusted on well-considered grounds, affecting the localities, and the settlement of their claims ought to rest with an arbitrator appointed by the Secretary of State. He wished to say that, whenever counties had abolished tolls, they had done so for their own advantage; and, whatever changes might take place in the future, the counties that abolished tolls would do it upon their own conditions and terms. He desired to see tolls abolished, and he wished to see the bridges cleared from Forfarshire to Kincardineshire, and also the bridges that led to Aberdeen; but in Aberdeen they had abolished tolls, and if Aberdeen was to get half the tolls of the bridges as well as Forfarshire, it was a complicated business. They ought not to be hurried into legislation of a difficult and dangerous character.

MR. ANDERSON felt some sympathy with the county that had abolished tolls, but found itself shut in by pontages and tolls round its boundaries. That was a hard state of matters, and the Amendment proposed to deal with it as regarded pontages; but the same objection applied to roads, and yet it was not proposed to force counties maintaining tolls to remove them a mile within their borders; therefore, he did not see the use in pressing this matter as regarded bridges.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 69; Noes 125: Majority 56. — (Div. List, No. 175.)

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 37 (Bridge (not formerly turnpike) not wholly situated in one county or burgh).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, under existing circumstances, he considered the clause was now unnecessary.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 38 (Detached parts of counties to form part of the county by which they are surrounded).

MR. ORR-EWING moved, in page 22, line 14, to insert, after the word "county," the words "or counties."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the effect of an Amendment he meant to propose on the clause was that the assessor should send a detailed valuation of any detached part of a county which was within another county to the clerk of the trustees of the county in which such detached part was included, in order that he might assess in respect of the roads. There was already a provision which was only to the effect that the clerk of supply of the county should report who were qualified as Commissioners in the detached part. This proposal went a step further, and directed the clerk of supply, or the assessor, to send a list of the valuation of such detached part of a county to the clerk of supply of the county which was going to assess for the roads. Either this provision, or some other means, would have to be adopted whereby the trustees of a county having control of such detached part should levy the assessment. He moved, in page 22, line 25, to leave out the following words:—

“With a view to ascertain the persons, being Commissioners of Supply, entitled under the provision of this Act to act as trustees in those counties in which are included, as herein-before provided, one or more detached parts of any other county or counties, the clerk of supply of each such other county or counties,” and to substitute, “the clerk of supply of any county from which a part or parts are detached,” should transmit the list of qualified persons, and so on.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought the Amendment would, if agreed to, have the effect of causing to be done something for which there was no necessity. There was no difficulty in the way of the assessing body obtaining a copy of the valuation roll for any county or part of a county. But, as these detached parts of counties remained integral parts of the original counties, it was necessary to have communication with the clerk of the Commissioners; because those who were on the valuation roll as qualified were not necessarily Commissioners, but must qualify as such and take their seats, and it was only after they had so qualified that they were entitled to act as road trustees. He proposed to enact that the clerk of the Commissioners of Supply should give that information, he being the only person that was officially possessed of it. As far as the valuation roll was concerned, it was not kept by him, but by the assessor of the district, and it could be had from him.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked, if there were not a difficulty in obtaining a copy of the valuation roll between the months of August and December? He thought there was, though after that a copy could easily be got for a small charge. These Valuation Bills of counties and burghs should be printed and available for purchase at the lowest rate of charge. This kind of publicity would affect much good in keeping the valuations at their proper sum.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, it was a simple enough thing to get the valuation roll after it was published. He had moved this Amendment mainly at the instance of one of the gentlemen, who would, under the provisions of the Bill, be one of the clerks to a body of road trustees; and who was of opinion that, under existing arrangements, he would not be able to get a copy of the valuation roll in time to make the assessment.

Amendment negatived.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in page 22, line 30, to substitute the word “January” for “December.” The valuation roll was not completed until the 30th of November, and it was necessary thereafter for the Commissioners of Supply to meet and admit those Commissioners having qualification according to the new roll.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 39 (Lists of highways to be made up. Alteration of list), agreed to.

Clause 40 (Highways may cease to be such, and other roads may become highways).

SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS moved, as an Amendment, in page 23, line 21, to leave out the words “church-door of,” in order to insert the words “principal door of each church in.” The hon. Baronet said, his desire was to secure greater publicity for any proposal to shut up roads than would be given by the Bill as it stood, which would be read as meaning that notices should only be affixed to the doors of parish churches, whilst his Amendment would insure their being placed on the principal door of each church in every parish.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 41 (A highway ceasing to be a highway may be shut up).

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, as an Amendment, in page 23, line 29, to leave out all the words from the word "in" to the word "shall," in line 30. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said, he saw no reason why, when a road had been once shut up, it should again be acquired by the road trustees as a highway. His view was that the property in the road should revert to the owners from whom it had been taken in order to the making of the road.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

COLONEL ALEXANDER next moved, in page 23, line 31, to insert after the word "thereto," the words—

"And from whom, or his or their predecessor or predecessors, the ground occupied by such road was acquired for such road."

MR. WILLIAM HOLMS said, he had an Amendment on this clause, and his object was, that where a road was no longer required, the adjoining proprietor, on taking possession, should pay for it; and the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member being in effect similar, he proposed to accept it. He would, however, propose to amend it, by inserting after the word "acquired," the words "with payment."

MR. ORR-EWING said, supposing the property should be sold after the road ceased to be used, and the road and the land were to be transferred, they would give possession to the party who had sold the property.

MR. M'LAREN supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms), on the ground that the measure, as drawn, was very much of a landowners' Bill; and added, that he wished to know whether it was intended to continue the system under which a six months' notice was required before a road could be shut up?

LORD ELCHO protested against the suggestion that the Bill was a landowners' Bill. It had been carefully drawn by the Government, and would, he believed, prove equally advantageous to the property-owners and dwellers in the towns, and to the landowners and those residing in the rural districts. He did not think it would ever be proposed to close roads until they had become practically useless; and when shut up, the land would be of little value to anybody except the owners from whose property the land had been taken, and to whom it should revert. Of course, the question of the terms on which it should so revert was a fair one for consideration.

MR. RAMSAY thought it would be only fair that the right of pre-emption of land no longer required for roads should be given to the owners of the adjoining land. At the same time, great care should be taken in protecting the right of the people to the use of the roads. It might be that a particular road had fallen into comparative disuse; but it might also be that it was the nearest way to the parish school or the parish mill, and, in that case, it would be a great hardship upon the inhabitants of the neighbourhood to shut it up altogether.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, provision was made in a later clause for the right of pre-emption of lands no longer required for road purposes. He saw no reason why the proprietor of land taken for the making of roads should be called upon to pay for it when it reverted to him after having served the purposes for which it was taken. The road trustees had simply granted to them a temporary way-leave over the surface of the land, and he saw no just ground to call upon the proprietor, after the reason for the way-leave had ceased, to pay again for his own property.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought care should be taken not to arm the trustees with power to close roads which, though, perhaps, not much used, had existed from time immemorial, and had been found useful by those who lived in their immediate neighbourhood.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, the observations just made had a special bearing on the question of roads which formerly traversed moors and commons, before these were laid hold of by the adjoining proprietors, and which ought to have been preserved to the people. Care should also be taken to prevent the making of roads at the public cost for the mere purpose of rendering valuable property which, but for the existence of such roads, would be comparatively worthless. The great power still vested in the proprietors of lands, in respect to being the most influential portion of the Road Board, might be exercised in respect to communications over or to their lands.

MR. ORR-EWING did not think the Bill would interfere with any existing right of way; it only proposed to deal with public roads, and when old roads were shut up, new ones would be made.

MR. WILLIAM HOLMS explained, that the object of his Amendment was to secure that, after a highway had ceased to be one, and had been shut up, the ground not required for the purposes of a highway should not fall into the hands of the adjoining proprietor without any payment on his part. That was the simple object he had in view, and he understood that the Lord Advocate was prepared to insert a clause giving effect to it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the wording of the clause appeared to him to bear the construction that a right of way, which had existed from time immemorial, might be stopped by a vote of these trustees. He did not know the English language if the clause were not open to that meaning. He admitted that, in cases where a more eligible line of road was substituted for a less eligible one, there would be a reason for shutting up a highway; but, as Clause 40 stood, a highway might cease to be a highway, without any other being substituted. When he said he agreed with the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), he meant that the clause, not the Bill, was in the interests of the county proprietors; for it enabled the trustees to shut up a road, and almost bribed the proprietors to get it shut up. He, therefore, hoped that the Lord Advocate would frankly tell the Committee whether the Bill did or did not provide that a right of way, existing from time immemorial, was to be put a stop to?

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, no doubt there was a strong objection against arbitrary power being given to trustees; but he pointed out to hon. Members who had raised that objection, that such was not the object of the Bill. The trustees would be held responsible for their actions. If a highway were stopped without an alternative road being laid down, proprietors would be discouraged in giving land for these highways, and the trustees also would be discouraged in their efforts to carry out improvements. If the Committee laid down that principle, they would strike a serious blow at any improvements in roads. With regard to the clause having the effect of stopping the right of a footpath, which passengers had used from time immemorial, that was a question which rested upon different considerations. Perhaps the Lord Advocate would inform the Committee what the real effect of the clause would be?

MR. RAMSAY, before the Lord Advocate rose to answer the question of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), wished to be allowed to say that a way by which passengers had a servitude right to pass was never regarded as a highway in the ordinary acceptation of the term. A right of way, commonly so called, was entirely different from a right of highway; and the trustees had no more to do with the former than they had with a private estate. When hon. Members spoke of this Bill having been framed in the interest of proprietors, with a view to transfer to them the solum of the road, they appeared to forget that the common law of Scotland was in accordance with the provisions of the Bill. This measure would merely carry out the common law—namely, that the solum belonged to the proprietor from whose land the highway was taken. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had so clearly explained such to be the law, that it was merely wasting time to continue the discussion.

THE LORD ADVOCATE explained that there were, undoubtedly, a great number of public roads in Scotland that were not highways, and would not be highways, within the meaning of this Act; and it was quite settled that these could not be shut up by any body of trustees, because statutory authority was required to close a public road. Accordingly, there were instances, which were very well known, where the public were held entitled to defend their own. But, at the same time, supposing that an existing public road were placed by Statute under a turnpike trust, no doubt that statutory power would enable the trustees entirely to extinguish the right of the public over that road, if shut up, in terms of the General Turnpike Act. It would be quite another thing if they had adopted a road over which private servitude rights existed. Then, it would not be competent for them to shut that road against the owners of servitudes. That question had been decided, a year or two ago, in a case where a road was assumed by statute labour trustees, and along the line of the road there had existed, for centuries, a right of way to a mill. The trustees closed the road; but it was held, notwithstanding, that the immediately adjacent proprietors were not affected by the action of the trustees. The action entirely extinguished the public right, but it did not extinguish the private servitude rights. That was the state of the law, as he understood it.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY thought the Committee had materially prejudiced the public interest by passing the Amendment which had been made on the clause; because, as he understood the matter, the clause, as it originally stood, provided that, after a road had ceased to be a highway, there might still be a right of way; but, as the clause now stood, a road might be shut up by a body of trustees, who would have the power of depriving the public of their right of way; but he did not think the Committee intended that the right should be taken from the public to a road which might have been used by the public for centuries, and had subsequently become a statute labour road. This had not been done by previous legislation, and he certainly thought the whole clause ought to be rejected.

MR. M'LAREN said, if the Lord Advocate was prepared to assure him that the Bill substantially embodied the provisions of the general Turnpike Act of Scotland, including the provision which required six months' notice to be given of an intention to close a road, then he would be satisfied with that assurance. He was not suggesting any new law; but what he objected to was, that any attempt should be made to take from the existing securities possessed by the public. If the six months' notice were not incorporated, he should move an Amendment to the effect that, in all cases of intention to shut up a road, due notice of that intention should be given by advertisement.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER called the attention of hon. Members opposite to the power given in the clause with regard to shutting up highways, and to the definition of highways. He also pointed out that the clause gave power to the ratepayers to appeal to the Sheriff against the shutting up of highways.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY had read the clause most carefully, and was of opinion that no trustees could shut up what was called a right of way in Scotland.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL considered the question of so much importance that it was necessary to remove all doubt as to the legal effect of the clause. The Lord Advocate had stated the existing law of Scotland with regard to roads and servitude, but not the effect of the present Bill, if passed into law. Let that be made clear. If the clause were passed with the words "importing that trustees, if they think fit, may direct that roads shall be shut up," would the effect of such a statutory provision not be to enable the trustees to close a road in a literal and ordinary sense; would it still be subject to such rights as existed before it became a statute labour road, or highway, as the case might be?

MR. M'LAGAN did not think that the trustees, who were the guardians of the public rights, would do anything as against the public. Although the ratepayers would have a right of appeal, how would they know when a road was to be shut up? He suggested that notice should be given to the ratepayers, and to the public generally, that a road was going to be closed, so that an opportunity might be afforded of appealing against the decision of the trustees.

COLONEL ALEXANDER, referring to the remark which had fallen from the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. M'Lagan), directed his attention to his (Colonel Alexander's) own Amendment on the Paper, which would have the effect desired by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, who expressed a hope that the discussion would now be brought to a conclusion, as the subject had been considered at some length, and there was other Business pressing, said, he quite agreed that notice should be given of the intention to shut up useless roads. In England, the practice was to place a notice at each end of the road that was to be closed; and the same plan might be adopted for Scotland. He agreed that the notice ought to be ample, and given on the spot.

Amendment agreed to.

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, that at page 23, line 32, the following words be omitted:—"such ground as required for the purposes of any highway, or as to;" and expressed a hope that the Amendment would satisfy the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren).

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly.

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, in page 23, line 35, after "final," to insert—

"But no such road shall be shut up as aforesaid until after the expiration of six months from the date of the resolution directing the same to be shut up as aforesaid, and 30 days' notice of the intention to propose a resolution to that effect shall be given by advertisement in any newspaper usually circulating in the county in which such road proposed to be shut up is situated."

MR. M'LAREN suggested to the hon. and gallant Member that he should delete the word "thirty" from his Amendment, in order to insert "sixty."

DR. CAMERON was of opinion that it would be much better to leave the matter on the footing on which it was placed by the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, which was that notice should be given on the spot itself. After that suggestion, it was hoped this Amendment would not be pressed.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL did not think the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Assheton Cross) was at all inconsistent with the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Alexander). The hon. and gallant Gentleman's suggestion was that six months' notice should be given—a very reasonable Amendment, which might be added to this one.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that the notice stated in his Amendment was the same as that which was contained in the present Turnpike Act.

MR. M'LAREN observed, that the six months' notice was not really six months' notice of intention to shut up a road; but six months' postponement of the act of shutting it up. There was no notice of the intention to close the road, other than the 30 days.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL expressed an inclination to move the omission of the latter section of the clause. If that section remained as it then stood, the whole intention expressed by the Committee up to that moment would be stultified. It was perfectly true that, so far as it went, the first section of the clause provided that the trustees might order that the road should be shut up; and then the Amendment proposed, in effect, that six months' notice should be given of the closing of the road. But, supposing that people should object to its being shut up, he saw no remedy provided for them in that regard. On the contrary, the matter was to be determined in a most summary way, for this was the wording of the latter section of the clause—

"Any determination of the trustees under this and the preceding section shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to review in any court or by any proceedings whatsoever, unless any three ratepayers who shall be dissatisfied with such determination shall at any time within 14 days after the date thereof appeal to the Sheriff, who shall hear and determine the appeal in a summary way, and the decision of the Sheriff shall be final."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that, as the clause stood, it certainly was out of shape; and he would undertake to re-model it on this footing—that 30 days' notice be given to the public before the question was considered; after the consideration of the question, and the determination to shut up the road, such determination should not take effect until six months afterwards; that, during the six months there should be a sufficient publication, so that any person, within that period of six months, might appeal to the Sheriff.

MR. M'LAREN expressed himself satisfied with that re-modelling of the clause.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 42 (Toll-houses to be first offered to adjoining proprietors).

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER moved to add, in page 24, the following proviso:—

"Provided always, That in fixing such price the valuator shall take into consideration the terms and conditions upon which such site was originally acquired."

Amendment agreed to; words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 43 (Provision for footpaths).

MR. MARK STEWART moved, in page 24, line 12, after "highway," to insert—

"And to make bye-laws, subject to such approval as aforesaid, for the avoidance of all unnecessary obstruction to ordinary traffic on such highways."

The hon. Member explained, that the effect of his Amendment was that any obstruction found in the highway should be got rid of with the assent and assistance of the trustees. The object he had in view was to prevent any undue hindrances being found in the road, such as fairs, booths, or races. It had come to his knowledge that, on one occasion, when horse-races were going on in the public road, and the police were called in to put a stop to what the public generally regarded as a nuisance, they said they had no power whatever to clear the road. Therefore, he hoped the Government would accept the remedy which was provided by his Amendment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE had no objection whatever to the principle of the Amendment; but he did object to its introduction at this part of the Bill, which was the wrong place. If it were inserted here, it would have no application to the road, but would simply apply to the footpath. There were Amendments on the Paper for introducing a general provision applicable to all highways.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 44 (Boundaries of burghs).

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in page 24, line 16, after "Parliament," to insert—

"Or when no police assessment is levied, as the same are or may be ascertained, fixed, or determined for municipal purposes."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. RAMSAY moved, in page 24, line 17, to leave out from "where" to "burgh," in line 19, both inclusive. The simple object of the Amendment was to provide that, where the public turnpike road skirted the burgh, and the centre of the road was the present boundary of the burgh, that should continue to be the boundary; and that it should be a matter of arrangement between the county road trustees and the burgh authorities to maintain the road equally. This would be in accordance with the proviso immediately following the words he moved to leave out. The proviso was—

"That in the case of contiguous burghs or police burghs, or a contiguous burgh and police burgh, the centre of the highway shall be held to be the boundary."

In one of the burghs (Falkirk Burghs) which he had the honour to represent, there was a line of road skirting the boundary of the burgh; and the centre of the roadway was defined by the Reform Act of 1835 to be the boundary of the burgh. Why this should now be altered he could not conceive; because, later on in the Bill, the burgh authorities were to be left to arrange with those in the county for the maintenance of the roads within the burghs. Therefore, he moved that the following words be struck out.

"Where the boundaries of any burgh run along a highway, the whole breadth of such highway shall, for the purposes of this Act, be held to be within the boundary of the burgh."

Amendment agreed to; words struck out.

On Question, That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill?

MR. M'LAREN said, he understood that as three lines had been left out, the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name was not now available.

THE LORD ADVOCATE remarked, that the Amendment last carried left the clause just as it was before. He should put the clause in such a shape as to make it fit.

MR. M'LAREN was much obliged to the Lord Advocate for not taking advantage of his technical neglect. He would, therefore, move his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: I put the Question in such a form as to enable the hon. Member for Edinburgh to move his Amendment. The hon. Member did not avail himself of that opportunity, and he is not able to move it now.

MR. M'LAREN: I am satisfied.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 45 (Local authority to have management of roads within burghs).

MR. C. S. PARKER moved, as an Amendment, in page 24, lines 23 and 24, to leave out from "local authority," to "situated within," in line 26, and insert—

"Highways and bridges situated within any burgh shall be by virtue of this Act transferred to, and vested in, the local authority of such burgh, and such local authority shall have the entire management and control of."

The hon. Member said, that the Amendment he had to propose was one of form and not of substance. The question had been raised whether the words were sufficient to vest the highways in local authorities where they were not already so vested? His object was to make it more clear that the highways should be vested in the local authority, and he hoped the Lord Advocate had no objection.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Certainly; I approve of it.

Amendment agreed to.

Consequential verbal Amendments agreed to.

MR. M'LAREN moved, as an Amendment, in page 25, line 2, to leave out after "situated" to end of clause, and insert—

"And the owners and occupiers of lands and houses within such burghs shall be chargeable with the same rates of assessment as the owners and occupiers of lands within other parts of the country."

He considered the present Amendment a very important one, and unless the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had made up his mind to give way, he must take up a few minutes of the time of the Committee, which he was always unwilling to do. Of the 196 Amendments on the Paper, only six stood in his name. The Committee, therefore, would excuse him, if he attempted to convince them of the necessity for this Amendment. As the clause now stood, every little burgh must make a bargain with the county under this Act. He wished to give the little burghs the option of merging themselves in the county. The effect of his Amendment was, that such burghs should have the same right to merge themselves in the county, as regarded keeping up the turnpike roads running through the main streets of the burgh, as they had to merge themselves in the counties for police purposes. The question was very carefully considered by the Royal Commission on Roads. He held in his hand their Report, and if the Committee would allow him, he would read a paragraph of about eight lines, stating what the Commissioners, after careful consideration, said on the subject. At page 197 of their Report, they said they considered it should be optional for burghs, and more especially burghs of small size, to have all roads and streets maintained in future out of the county roads' funds, and that each burgh should have the option of placing itself under the operation of the county assessment, and the roads in question under the County Roads Board. They were of opinion that this arrangement in the case of the smaller burghs would be equally for the interest of the burghs and for the public advantage. Under these conditions, the Commissioners, in the next paragraph, said they were further of opinion that, in case of the general abolition of tolls, the levying of causeway-mail on roads passing through burghs should be entirely abolished and power of removal obtained. Now, his complaint was, that of the two recommendations which were intended to be adopted, this Bill adopted the last one but rejected the first. He thought it very important that the House should thoroughly understand this. In many parts of Scotland there were small burghs, consisting, practically, of two rows of houses, a row on the one side of the road and a row on the other side, and in some cases these were about a mile long. That was part of the turnpike road, and the county at each end had the same interest in maintaining that mile of road as in maintaining any other mile in the county. The Commissioners took evidence on the subject, and arrived at the conclusion that each burgh should have the option of merging itself in the county. Another reason was, that at the present day, in all these burghs, this mile of road, as he should call it, was now kept up by the county, and was, in every respect, part of the county. The effect of this Bill would be not to leave things as they were, but to cut out those burgh roads and to make them separate. His Amendment was to let the matter stand as it was just now. As far as the roads were concerned, they were liable to all the county tolls, and they wanted the option to remain liable to county assessments. It might be doubted by some hon. Members who had not looked into the subject whether these roads were kept up by the counties through the burghs. He might state that in the case of the county of Lanark a great deal of evidence was taken, and the whole question was thoroughly considered. The clerk of the county stated that such was the custom in all parts of Lanarkshire; and the Commissioners got evidence of what was actually expended by the County Trusts in keeping up the roads in the burghs of Lanarkshire. It appeared from the Report that £192 was spent in Airdrie, and that in all £672 was spent by the county on the small burghs of Lanarkshire, and £8,848 on Glasgow; and, of course, he could easily show that the same rule existed in other counties. He was not going into the case of Glasgow just now, because that was so important that no doubt it would be brought forward by an hon. Member for Glasgow, and discussed at considerable length. He would confine his attention to the small burghs. He represented no small constituency; but, having the opportunity of thoroughly investigating the facts of the case, he thought he understood them as well as anyone did, and in the interest of the small burghs who had few protectors, he begged to move this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 25, line 2, to leave out from the word "situated," to the end of the Clause, in order to add the words "and the owners and occupiers of lands and houses within such burghs shall be chargeable with the same rates of assessment as the owners and occupiers of lands within other parts of the county."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'on payment to such trustees' stand part of the Clause."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was necessary to keep in mind that the burghs which were entitled to have the management of their own roads under this Act were the Royal and Parliamentary burghs and populous places with 5,000 inhabitants and upwards. The proposal here was that burghs with less than that population should have the option. The question was, whether those burghs generally desired to manage their own roads? He could only say that, so far as regarded these populous places, those through customs were unknown. It was only in some of the old Royal burghs made. The proposal in the Bill was that where a burgh took the "upkeep" of its roads which ran through the burgh, it should take part with the county. The only question between the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) and himself was on what terms were they to come in. His hon. Friend said on the same terms as the counties. He said that was hardly fair. It would be fair if they would throw in their lot in every case, and not only when they could get in at a cheap rate. They enjoyed their autonomous jurisdiction when it could be done at a cheap rate; but when it was more expensive, they wished to come in the county. Were it a good thing, they would remain out of the county; but when they had a bad thing, they wished to come in the county. It was left to the Sheriff to say what was a fair and reasonable payment to be made.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to call the attention of the Committee to what he might call his point of view, as he happened to represent a burgh which was affected by this question. To begin with, he must say that the strong argument in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) was this—that when the Bill was brought in last year, it was in the shape the hon. Member for Edinburgh now wished to put it. One inconvenience this year was that they had no explanation of the reasons why changes were made. This was one of the most important changes made in the present Bill. He brought it under notice the first day the Bill was introduced. The Lord Advocate said the object of the hon. Member for Edinburgh was to give to burghs under 10,000 inhabitants the option of joining in counties. For his part, his (Sir George Campbell's) object was to provide not for burghs under 10,000 inhabitants or under 5,000, but for the particular cases of Royal and Parliamentary burghs under the latter size. Many of these burghs had populations far less than 5,000. There was one such place which he represented—namely, Kinghorn—with a population of only 1,200 or 1,300. It so happened it was in the position his hon. Friend had described. It was a poor village, with a small population lying along a great road, where there was great traffic. Not only one road, but two others passed through the burgh. The consequence was that this burgh, which had hitherto never maintained the roads at all, would have to maintain three turnpike roads, with large traffic, which passed through the burgh. The case was still harder, because this burgh a few years ago extended their municipal boundary to the Parliamentary boundary. He thought this was a typical case, and he believed it would be entirely ruinous to this small burgh of 1,500 inhabitants to maintain three roads. It was a poor village; no carriage was kept, and but very few carts. They made no use of the road, and yet this Bill would impose upon them that heavy expense. What he had to submit was that these poor villagers should not be called upon to pay for the benefits which some of the larger burghs might derive from the autonomy which it was proposed to impose upon them. Then the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate said there was an appeal to the Sheriff, but no standard was laid down by which the Sheriff was to determine. Probably the Sheriff would think it his duty to see what the roads would cost, and to assign certain proportions commensurate with the cost of maintaining the roads. That would not be releasing the villages from this heavy burden. He did venture to hope that the Government would consider this matter, and that this clause would not be passed in a shape which would impose irreparable injury on the inhabitants of small burghs.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, his hon. Friend was under a mistake as to the Bill of last year. He had that Bill in his hand, and the terms of the 45th section were precisely the same, word for word, as in the present Bill.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY believed that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would find the definition of the word "burghs" was different from the present one. He wished to point out that the small Royal burghs would be in a very hard position under this clause. There were a good many small burghs in the county of Fife, of small size and small population, which, by the conditions of this Act, would be separated from the counties altogether. Now, it would seem to be a great hardship for these small burghs to maintain a staff of officials, a surveyor, &c., for themselves on the small rental which they had. He thought that the rates ought to be made the same on Royal burghs of 3,000 or 4,000 inhabitants, as on the counties in which they were situated. He did not see why any difference should be made between Royal burghs and police burghs of the same number of inhabitants. When it came down to a small number, it seemed to him that it would be more convenient that for the purpose of the roads the burgh should be joined with the county. That would be the most easy solution of the question. Burghs of 5,000 or 10,000 population had the power to be independent if they thought proper; and, having this power, could protect themselves. The Sheriff would scarcely know how to act, and it seemed to him that it might be more conveniently arranged to the satisfaction of all parties by a re-arrangement of the clauses referring to Royal burghs.

MR. GRANT pointed out that the burgh of Musselburgh would be unfortunately situated with regard to this clause. Instead of having to maintain three or four miles, they would have to keep up nearly eight miles of highways. That arose from the boundary of the burgh running along a public road. This road was not bounded by houses on either side. It was, really, a part of the great highway between Scotland and England. It would be very hard indeed to prevent this burgh from throwing itself into the county at the county rate. The Lord Advocate had spoken of the indisposition of the counties to make bad bargains; but what made the bargains bad for the counties but the fact that under this Bill some of these burghs had been hardly used and overburdened in taking their share of the highways? It followed from that, as a matter of course, that the counties were under-burdened; and it was, therefore, not unfair that the burghs should ask to be entitled to be assessed at the county rate. It had been justly observed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, that—

"If the burgh title to be assessed at the same rate as the counties were not granted, no boon would be conferred upon the burghs at all by this Bill."

Then, with regard to the appeal which lay to the Sheriff, to which the Lord Advocate had referred. This would not do away with the hardship complained of, because the Sheriff would not be entitled to say—"You shall be assessed at the county rate." He would be obliged to treat the matter as a question of law, and would say—"If Parliament had intended you to be assessed at the county rate under this Act, it would have said so; but it does not say so." Therefore, he thought that it was not demanding a very great boon, to ask for these small burghs, from which, as in the case of Musselburgh, their present right to petty customs was sought to be taken away, that they should be allowed to throw themselves into the county and claim to be assessed at the county rate.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he was sure there was no intention on the part of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to deal hardly with the small burghs. If the intention were to prevent the Sheriff's dealing in a general way with any appeal made to him, he thought the clause might be so modified as to effect a compromise.

THE LORD ADVOCATE had not the least objection to modify the clause to the extent of investing the Sheriff with a discretionary power to make such an arrangement as he might deem equitable.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had failed to catch the extent of the concession suggested by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the effect of the alteration he intended could not give a very wide discretion to the Sheriff; but it would be wider than that which was conferred by the clause as it stood.

MR. RAMSAY thought it right to ask the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to agree to a provision that the rate imposed on the burgh should not exceed that levied on places immediately surrounding the burghs. He thought an arrangement of that kind would be satisfactory, and ought to be effected. It was a hardship that the burghs, through which the county roads passed, should not be allowed to merge their jurisdiction into that of the county, and throw themselves into the county rate.

MR. M'LAREN remarked, that he had just referred to the Report of the Commission with regard to the case of Musselburgh, to which the hon. Member for Leith (Mr. Grant) had called the attention of the Committee, and found that the county trustees paid £400 a-year. The road in question went far beyond what a stranger would consider to be the town of Musselburgh, and embraced a considerable part of a purely county road. This was now kept up by the county. Why should it not continue so to be kept up in future? Musselburgh claimed no exclusive right. It said—"We are now part and parcel of the county as regards roads—leave us so as regards county rates."

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would find it possible to make a suggestion that would enable the Lord Advocate to effect a compromise, so that further time might not be wasted.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the Sheriff might be bound to treat a question which should arise under the Act as one of law. He thought the proposition of his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate was extremely fair, and that it ought to be readily accepted, as it gave the Sheriff considerable latitude in considering all the circumstances of the case.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thought the Home Secretary might add a few more words with advantage in view to reconciling the conflict between county and burgh.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Government could do nothing further than they had done. He hoped the Committee would come to a decision at once.

MR. RAMSAY hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would still consider the expediency of providing that the rate levied on the burgh should not exceed that which was imposed on the surrounding districts.

LORD ELCHO thought the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate should consider whether it would not be possible to legislate generally on the subject, and whether any special legislation should not be rendered unnecessary. The question would arise in the county with which he was connected. All hon. Members wished that justice should be done to the small burghs, and he believed that this would be effected better by a general clause than by a special clause referring to Acts that would expire in a certain time. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would consider the suggestion before the matter came on again.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he admitted that the remedy proposed was better than no remedy at all; but it appeared to him that it would be advisable to go further, for the Sheriffs would find themselves placed in a very difficult position. He hoped that the Government would concede so much for the benefit of the small burghs, that they should not be placed in a worse position than they now occupied. It would be hard if the Bill, which was intended to confer a benefit on the people of Scotland, should have that bad effect; and unless some assurance were afforded that the small burghs would not be placed in a worse position than they then were, he thought the contest must be continued to the bitter end.

MR. M'LAREN said, he was sorry to detain the Committee; but was obliged, from a sense of duty, to challenge a division.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he represented several Royal burghs which would be affected by the Bill; but he believed that the words proposed by the Government would have the desired effect. If he thought otherwise, he would be compelled to vote against the Government. He hoped the hon. Member for Edinburgh would wait for the Report to see whether he ought to divide on the question. If he should then think fit, he could do so.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 131; Noes 65: Majority 66.—(Div. List, No. 176.)

Maintenance and Repair of Highways, and Assessments therefor.

Clause 46 (Report on condition of highways, and estimate of cost of maintenance); Clause 47 (Board to meet and consider reports); and Clause 48 (Roads or highways may be shut up for repairs); severally agreed to.

Clause 49 (Assessments in counties for management, maintenance, and repair).

MR. MARK STEWART said, he would move to omit the word "five" in page 26, line 25 of the Bill, in order to insert the word "four." His object in so doing was, as £4 was the usual basis of assessment in other matters, to simplify the assessment in counties for the management, maintenance, and repair of roads. He hoped the Government would concede this point.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he had an Amendment to propose which should precede that of the hon. Member for the Wigton Burghs (Mr. Mark Stewart). He would move to omit that part of the clause, between the word "respectively" in line 14, to the word "district" in line 16, so as to make the first portion of the clause read thus—

"The amount required for the management, maintenance, and repair of the highways within each district respectively, along with a proportion of the general expenses of executing this act, as allocated by the trustees in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, shall be levied by the trustees by an assessment to be imposed at a uniform rate on all lands and heritages within such district."

The effect of this clause was to revive the old system, a consequence of which had been that the rate in one parish was sometimes 1*d.* in the pound, and that of the parish immediately adjoining it, 6*d.* He thought it would be very dangerous to give to the trustees the power which would be vested in them if the clause were adopted as it stood; and, therefore, hoped that the words would be omitted.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there were possibly parishes in which the difference was not only warranted, but justifiable. The first part of the clause, as proposed by the Government, read as follows:—

"The amount required for the management, maintenance, and repair of highways within each district respectively, or in the option of the trustees, within the several parishes constituting such district," &c.;

and it was the latter part of the sentence that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Barclay) desired to see omitted. He thought it would be useful, however, to retain the clause in its original form, as the words proposed to be omitted were essential to the object contemplated by Government.

Amendment negatived.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he thought it was absolutely necessary to fix some limit of assessment. The whole assessment of the county which he represented was 3*d.* in the pound; and he, therefore, believed that the rate of 4*d.* in the pound was sufficient. He begged to move that after the word "assessment" in page 26, line 18, the words "not exceeding fourpence in the pound" be inserted.

THE LORD ADVOCATE was glad to hear that the rates in Ayrshire were so satisfactory; but he could not consent to the Amendment, because, in many counties where Local Acts were retained, the rates were higher than 4*d.* in the pound.

LORD ELOHO said, that in his county, 6*d.* in the pound was not found more than sufficient.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON observed, that was the case in his county also.

MR. RAMSAY believed it would be well to limit the assessment to 4*d.* in the pound on occupiers, provided the Bill was so modified as to enable an assessment to be levied upon the proprietors under special circumstances for any excess of the expenditure for road management.

MR. VANSAGNEW stated, that in his county the rate had never exceeded 4½*d.* in the pound. The Local Act had been in operation there during the last 12 years, and the rate had been 4*d.* in the pound in one part of the county and 4½*d.* in the other.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER said, the second part of the same clause ran thus—

"And such assessment shall be paid, one-half by the proprietor, and the other half by the tenant, or occupier of the lands and heritages on which the same is imposed, except in the case of lands and heritages entered in the Valuation Roll as of the annual value of five pounds or under, in which case the whole of the assessment on such lands and heritages may, in the option of the trustees, be levied from and paid by the proprietor, who shall be entitled to recover the half thereof from the tenant or occupier."

He proposed, by way of Amendment, to leave out from "district" in line 20, to "and" in line 21, with the view of making the clause read as follows:—

"And such assessment shall be paid by the proprietor, who shall, &c." In rural districts the proprietors would have to pay the whole of the taxes, and they might as well make a beginning at once. It must be borne in mind that the majority of the people on whom such a rate would be levied were poor, and they would pay very unwillingly. It was quite clear that in the end the proprietor would have to pay the whole charge, and he might as well do it directly as indirectly.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY supported the Amendment. They had heard over and over again that the proprietor, and not the tenant, paid this taxation; and it would be a much simpler process, independent of its economic results, to collect the money direct from one person. For that reason, he was in favour of the Amendment.

MR. RAMSAY said, it was to be regretted that they should waste time in discussing Amendments which were contrary to the whole spirit and tone of the Bill. It was surprising that such obstruction should come from the other side of the House.

Amendment negatived.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME said, he had an Amendment on the Paper substituting for the provision that "One-half of the assessment shall be paid by the proprietor, and the other half by the tenant or occupier of the lands and heritages on which the same is imposed,"

a provision that, during the continuance of leases existing at the commencement of Act, three-fourths should be paid by the tenant, and one-fourth by the proprietor; while, on the expiration of the leases, three-fourths should be paid by the proprietor, and one-fourth by the tenant.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out, that by negating the previous Amendment, the Committee had affirmed the principle that one-half should be paid by each. Therefore, the Amendment could not be put. It ought to have been proposed earlier.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME regretted, that through his ignorance of the Forms of the House, he had made a mistake. He would propose the Amendment on the Report.

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, in page 26, line 25, to leave out "five" and insert "four." In the Bill it was provided that assessments on lands and heritages of £5 and under might, at the option of the trustees, be levied entirely from the proprietor, leaving him to recover one-half from the tenant or occupier.

Amendment agreed to; word substituted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 50 (Maintenance of bridges in two districts).

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH moved, in page 26, line 42, after "districts," to insert the following words:—

"And with respect to the suspension bridge across the river Ness, erected with public money under the Act of the fourteenth and fifteenth years Victoria, chapter sixty-six, for the accommodation of the Northern counties, by the Parliamentary Commissioners, the burden of maintaining the said bridge shall in future rest on the county and burgh of Inverness, in proportion to their respective real rents, as established by the Valuation Rolls thereof."

His Amendment aimed to remedy a statutory injustice under which the burgh of Inverness suffered. In the year 1849 there was a bridge across the Ness which had been free from tolls for a very long period. In that year, as was alleged, from the alterations upon the Caledonian Canal, the bridge was swept away. After some years another bridge was erected over the river by Parliament. The money was administered under a special Act of Parliament—namely, the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 66—and by the Parliamentary Roads and Bridges Commission; and under it, and the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 113, the maintenance of the bridge fell upon the whole of the Northern counties, including Inverness, Ross, Sutherland, and Caithness. Some years after Parliament resolved that they would no longer grant money in support of Highland roads and bridges, and passed the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 105, by which the Northern counties, other than Inverness, were expressly relieved of the maintenance of this suspension bridge; and the bridge was transferred to, and vested in, the Commissioners of Supply for the county of Inverness, and at the present moment was their property. Previous to the passing of the Bill, the burgh only paid its fair proportion of maintenance. By Section 14, it was declared that the burgh must pay for maintaining the roads within the burgh boundaries, which was fair enough. Nothing was directly said as to the maintenance of bridges within the burgh bounds. Now, the suspension bridge lay entirely within the burgh boundaries.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the hon. Member would, he was sure, excuse an interruption. He would call his attention to the fact that the clause applied to bridges not wholly within a burgh or a county, but partly situated in one and partly in another. Clause 85 applied to bridges wholly within a county; and, as the bridge was wholly within the county, he thought upon consideration the hon. Member would see that his Amendment would come better later on.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Chairman of Committees if that were his ruling on the point?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was not in the least objecting to his hon. Friend moving his Amendment then; but he was merely pointing out that his Amendment would come better on Clause 85, which applied to bridges that were entirely within the boundaries of a county as that was.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, that being the case, he would withdraw the Amendment for the present.

Clause 51 (Assessment in burghs for maintenance and repair); Clause 52 (Former modes of assessment may be retained in certain burghs); severally amended verbally, and agreed to.

Contracts by Road Authorities.

Clause 53 (Power for road authority to make contracts in respect of repair of roads, highways, or bridges), verbally amended, and agreed to.

Extraordinary Traffic.

Clause 54 (Power of road authority to recover expenses of extraordinary traffic).

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, they would postpone the clause.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE: Will it be taken at the end?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Yes.

Clause postponed.

Construction of New Roads and Bridges.

Clause 55 (New roads and bridges may be constructed by the board, and assessed for upon proprietors).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, to insert in the sentence, in line 4, "the board, subject to the approval of the trustees, may resolve to construct any new bridge," &c., the words "trustees or" before the word "board." He thought that Amendment would make the clause a little more explicit.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would not oppose the Amendment for a moment, if he thought it would make the clause more explicit; but he did not think it would at all have that effect. He wanted the board, as constituted, to act in this matter as bridge trustees.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he would withdraw the Amendment, but he really thought his next was necessary. He wished to insert in the same line, after the word "trustees" the sentence "other than elected trustees." The clause required to be more explicit. It provided that the terms of the contract were to be subject to the approval of the trustees, which surely meant the whole of the trustees; but the elected trustees had no vote in such questions. It would, therefore, be far more convenient to have it explained that it referred to trustees other than elected trustees.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he objected to this Amendment even more than to the last; because, when the word "trustees" was used, it was implied that it meant the word according to the interpretation previously given. If they admitted the Amendment, it would imply that the matter was not sufficient, as it was previously left, whereby it was provided that when there were any new roads or bridges to be provided, certain trustees should not act.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, on the assurance of the Lord Advocate, that there was no risk of a misunderstanding, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, as an Amendment, in page 29, line 17, after "assessment," insert "not exceeding one penny in the pound." His reason for doing so was, that in the existing county Act the assessment was limited to a halfpenny in the pound; and if that amount were found sufficient, double that amount ought to be more than necessary here.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Valuation and Allocation of Debt.

Clause 56 (Appointment of Debt Commissioners).

On the Motion of Mr. J. W. BARCLAY, the following Amendment was made in page 30, line 14:—After "provided," insert "where the parties fail to agree."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 57 (Clerks of trusts to make out list of debts).

On the Motion of Mr. J. W. BARCLAY, the following Amendment was made:—In page 30, line 31, after "labour" insert "and bridge."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, they would now report Progress, and take the Bill again the first thing on Thursday.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he should have been glad if the Government could have arranged to have gone on with the Bill again that evening; but, as his hon. Friend the Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms) who had secured the evening for his Motion as to the Church Establishment, was absent, he feared that was impossible.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

MOTIONS.

RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS (SCOTLAND).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. W. HOLMS: Sir, in accordance with the Notice which I gave some time ago, I now rise to call the attention of the House to the relative position of the various Religious Denominations in Scotland; and to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Patronage Act of 1874, and its effect on the reciprocal relations of the various Religious Denominations in Scotland, and to ascertain how far the people of Scotland are in favour of maintaining the connection between Church and State in that Country."

I have to ask the indulgence of the House while speaking on a question of so much importance to the people of Scotland, and which I am sure cannot be regarded with indifference by the people of England or Ireland. The fact that my hon. Friends the Members for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) and Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker) gave Notice that they also would move for inquiry with reference to the state of religious parties in Scotland, is an evidence that this question is exciting wide and general interest in Scottish constituencies. I should have preferred that this question had been brought forward by Her Majesty's Government, as I believe the time has come when, in the interests of religion and in justice to the various religious denominations in Scotland, it is desirable that we should ascertain whether or not the people of Scotland are in favour of maintaining an Established Church in that country. I have asked for a Select Committee, as I believe it is more likely to come to an early decision than a Royal Commission. I assure hon. Members that, in moving this Resolution, I do so with a sense of the grave responsibility which attaches to a private Member who takes up a question which, directly or indirectly, affects a great and time-honoured national institution. I can further assure them that I shall approach this subject in no spirit of partizanship, or from any hostile feeling to the Church; but I shall endeavour to do so in a fair and, as far as possible, in a judicial spirit. I would remind hon. Members that ecclesiastical questions, whether of faith or Church government, have at all times excited the most intense interest among the people of Scotland. It is true that for many years the bitter feelings which were called forth by the Disruption have to a large extent died away. Those feelings, however, have again been aroused, and fresh interest has been given to this question by two recent events—namely, the abolition of patronage by the Act of 1874, and the declaration of the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition. When on a visit to Scotland last autumn, he said that if the people of Scotland desired the disestablishment of the National Church, he and the Liberal Party would be in favour of giving effect to their wishes. After such a declaration, it was impossible that this question could be put aside; and so long as it continues unsettled, so long shall we have that irritation and that waste of religious power arising from a state of things which Scotchmen of all Parties must deplore. In considering the Resolution which I have proposed, I would ask hon. Members to do so not from an English or Irish, but, if possible, from a Scottish point of view, and with reference to the history, the feelings, and the wants of the people of Scotland. The position and circumstances of the Church of Scotland are entirely different from those of the Anglican Church, or the Church of Ireland before it was disestablished. What, therefore, may be suitable in one country may not be suitable in another. In Ireland you had a State Church enjoying great revenues, ministering to a mere fraction of the people, and having little or no sympathy with the history, the feelings, and the religion of the great mass of the people. That Church has been disestablished. In England you have an Established Church which has still a strong hold on the people and a close connection with the State. Side by side with that Church you have a powerful and energetic Body of Nonconformists, whose system of Church government, whose forms of Church worship, and, in some respects, whose Articles of Faith are different from those of the Church of England; and whose ministers are, as a rule, drawn from a less aristocratic class than those of the State Church. The consequence is, that socially as well as ecclesiastically, the laity and clergy of the Church of England on the one hand, and of the Nonconformists on the other, to a large extent keep themselves apart from each other. In Scotland we know of no such distinctions between Churchmen and Nonconformists. There, the connection between Church and State has always been slender; and now, by the passing of the Patronage Act, has become attenuated to such a degree that, practically, it is independent of the State. Happily, nearly all Scotchmen have a common interest in the history of the Church of Scotland, for they either belong to it or have sprung from it.

They can unite in admiring the far-seeing and statesmanlike sagacity of John Knox and his able coadjutors in planting a church and a school in every parish; and, although from time to time, one Body after another have felt it to be their duty from conscientious motives to leave that Church, the highest tribute that can be paid to the memory of the great Reformer is to be found in the fact that the three great Presbyterian Bodies in Scotland are the same in doctrine, discipline, and form of Church worship. The union of Churches, having so much real agreement and so much in common, would appear to be natural and easy, and as I think, with my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire, it certainly would be most desirable; but, unfortunately, this has not been found to be the case. To understand this, we must look to the past history of the Church of Scotland. After the Reformation, with the exception of a comparatively small number of Episcopalians and Roman Catholics, all Scotland was Presbyterian, and all Presbyterians, with an insignificant exception, were united in their adherence to the National Church. From that time down to the present day, the cause of every secession from her pale has directly or indirectly been the question of patronage. During the last 300 years patronage has been thrice established and thrice abolished, and during that long period it has never ceased to agitate the people of Scotland. In 1560, the "First Book of Discipline," which, although not formally ratified by Parliament, was subscribed by a majority of the Privy Council and by the General Assembly, lays down the principle on which the appointment of ministers should proceed in the following words:—

"It appertaineth to the people and to every several congregation to elect their ministers," and adds—

"For altogether this is to be avoided, that any man be violently intruded or thrust in upon any congregation, for this liberty with all care must be reserved to every several church to have their votes and suffrages."

The Book of Discipline, which received the sanction of the General Assembly in 1578, and became the authorized standard of the Church of Scotland in regard to government and discipline, again affirmed that—

"None are to be intruded into any ecclesiastical office contrary to the will of the congregation to which they are appointed."

Notwithstanding that such was the constitution of the Church of Scotland for more than 30 years after the Reformation, an Act was passed in 1592, which provided that the Presbytery

"be bound to receive and admit qualified ministers presented by the Crown or other lay patrons."

This Act remained in force till 1649, when patronage was abolished as being "unlawful and unwarrantable by God's Word, and contrary to the doctrine and liberties of the Kirk."

This Act was annulled by Charles II. in 1660, and patronage once more was restored. In 1690, by what was known as the Revolution Settlement, patronage was again abolished. Previous to the Union of Scotland and England, so anxious were the people of Scotland to preserve all their national privileges, that what is known as the Act of Security was passed by the Scottish Parliament. In that Act, which was afterwards ratified by the Act of Union, it was expressly stipulated—

"That the true Protestant religion, as presently professed within this Kingdom, with the worship, discipline, and government of this Church, shall be effectually and unalterably secured;"

and adds—

"to continue without any alteration to the people of this land in all succeeding generations."

It would be difficult for language to convey more clearly the idea that, in forming a Union with England, all the existing rights and privileges of the Church of Scotland were to remain unimpaired and intact. Notwithstanding this solemn agreement, in 1712 an Act was passed—too well known afterwards as the Act of Queen Anne—with such indecent haste, that the people of Scotland and the General Assembly had no time to oppose legislation which was in direct violation of the Treaty of Union, and most distasteful to the whole country. That proceeding was immediately protested against by the General Assembly. In the following year they attempted to have the Act repealed, but were unsuccessful. From that time down till 1783, the General Assembly year after year gave instruction to their

Commission to take every opportunity to have the law altered, but without avail. Sir, I have been thus particular in referring to the history of patronage, in order to show that the people of Scotland have always been averse to patronage, that it was not in accordance with the principles of the Church of Scotland at the Reformation, and was in direct violation of the Act of Union. I shall now, with the permission of the House, endeavour to show that at all times the people of Scotland have been warmly attached to the principles of the Church of Scotland as they were at the Union, and that all secessions from her have been made, not by way of dissent from these principles, but in opposition to the forced departure in the Church itself from one of her fundamental principles—"That it appertaineth to the people to elect their minister." In 1733, the forcing of a minister on the parish of Kinross, in opposition to the wishes of an overwhelming majority of the people, led to the secession of the Rev. Ebenezer Erskine and other protesting clergymen, who formed themselves into what became known as the "Associate Presbytery." But, Sir, those men, in leaving the Church, did so avowing their unaltered adherence to the doctrine, discipline, and government of the Church. In 1752, repeated acts of forcing ministers on objecting parishes led, in 1761, to the second secession, known as the "Presbytery of Relief," because the seceders took this method of obtaining relief from intolerable tyranny of patronage. They had no desire to be regarded as schismatics, and earnestly declared that they withdrew from the Church of Scotland because her principles had been violated. Such was the determination to have freedom from patronage, that by 1773 there were no less than 190 congregations of seceders, and in 1834 they numbered upwards of 600, nearly all of whom had by that time adopted what was known as the Voluntary principle—that is, that there should be no connection between Church and State. In that year, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in order to remedy the evils of patronage, passed the "Veto Act," by which a presentee might be set aside, if objected to by a majority of the male heads of families being communicants. Disputes arose as to the legality of this Act, culminating in the Disruption of 1843. One of the last acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland previous to that event was to carry, by a majority of 241 to 110, what was known as the "Claim of Rights," in which they claimed a spiritual independence of the civil magistrate, and complained that the Court of Session, by compelling the Church to carry out its decisions with reference to disputed settlements of ministers "had invaded the jurisdiction and encroached upon the spiritual privileges of the Courts of the Church."

They further declared that they could not intrude ministers on reclaiming congregations, and that at the risk and hazard of suffering the loss of the secular benefits conferred by the State and the public advantages of an Establishment. On the same day they adopted a Petition to the Crown, praying to be delivered from the "grievance of patronage," as being "opposed to the discipline of the Church as set forth in her earliest constitutional Standards,"

And also—

"as a breach of the Revolution Settlement and an infringement of the Treaty of Union."

They add—

"The exercise of patronage has been attended with great injury to the interests of religion, and has been the chief source of the Dissent that exists in Scotland."

And they further stated—

"It is the main cause of the difficulties in which the Church is at present involved ;"

and concluded by a prayer for such a measure as would secure "the rights of congregations in the appointment of their ministers."

This Petition was presented to the House of Commons by the Right Hon. Fox Maule, who moved that the House should go into Committee to take into consideration the claims of the Church of Scotland. The result of two days' discussion was, that his Motion was defeated by 211 to 76; but it is a significant fact that, of the Scottish Members who voted, 25 were in favour of the Motion, while only 12 were against it. That decision was, I think, a great political blunder on the part of the statesmen of the day. The result was, that upwards of 470 ministers left the National Church, and claiming in their freedom to be the true custodiers of the principles of that Church, and supported by a large number of the people, formed themselves in the Free Church of Scotland. Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the wisdom of the course which they took, I venture to say that history cannot furnish a nobler example of self-denial, and of determination, at all hazards, to act in obedience to the dictates of conscience than that of those men leaving the Church of their fathers, and throwing themselves on the liberality of the people for support. It is an event of which not only Scotland but the Empire may be proud, and from which undoubtedly religion and education received an impetus which has had an important and beneficial effect on the people of Scotland for the future—while it almost rendered the power of lay patrons inoperative. Sir, those men, clergy and laity, left the Church of Scotland, not because they disapproved of an Established Church, but because they could not comply with the conditions attached to that Church. In the famous Protest which they made on leaving, they used these remarkable words—

“While firmly asserting the right and duty of the civil magistrate to maintain and support an Establishment of religion in accordance with God’s Word, we do not hold ourselves at liberty to retain the benefits of the Establishment while we cannot comply with the conditions now desired to be thereto attached.”

I think I have said sufficient to prove that the main cause of all Dissent in Scotland has been the question of patronage; but, Sir, I shall fortify myself still further by quoting the words of Lord Macaulay, a statesman who gave great attention to this subject. He said—

“The British Legislature violated the Act of Union and made a change in the constitution of the Church of Scotland. From that change has followed almost all the Dissent now existing in Scotland; for the Act of 1712 undoubtedly gave rise to every secession and schism that has taken place in the Church of Scotland.”

When patronage was abolished in 1874, the Church of Scotland was simply restored to its original constitution and put in accord with the universal practice of all the Presbyterian Churches of Scotland, while the main cause of all Dissent was removed. I, in common with many others, voted for that Act, believing that it would be a healing measure, and that some way might be devised by which those Churches which had seceded on account of patronage might again be united and form a strong National Presbyterian Church. That expectation has not been fulfilled. It is true that eight ordained ministers from the Free Church, and about 15 or 16 from other Bodies, and three or four congregations have joined the Church of Scotland; but such isolated action has naturally rather been productive of irritation than of union; and two great Dissenting Bodies—namely, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterian Church, naturally ask why they, who protested against patronage, and gave up so much for principles which they held dear, now that patronage has been abolished, should be placed in a different position from the Church of Scotland? What, then, is now the ecclesiastical position of Scotland? It is a very remarkable one. If by a Church is meant a body of men bound together by community of beliefs and similarity of Church forms, then all Presbyterians in Scotland are, in reality, one Church; but, unfortunately, in the actual relations to each other, they are divided into three distinct Churches. First of all we have an ancient Church established by law, enjoying all the revenues set apart for religious purposes, a Church whose history is closely interwoven with all that is great and glorious in the history of Scotland. Those who are within her pale and those who have left it will, I think, equally acknowledge the accuracy of the opinion expressed by the Royal Commission appointed in 1834 on Religious Worship in Scotland, when they reported—

“We believe that no institution has ever existed which, at so little cost, has accomplished so much good. The eminent place which Scotland holds in the scale of nations is mainly owing to the purity of the Standards and the zeal of ministers of its Church, as well as to the wisdom with which its internal institutions have been adapted to the habits and the interests of the people.”

The Church of Scotland has moulded all the other Churches which from time to time have left her; but time and circumstances have, in one respect, changed those Churches. The Free Church, which comes next in importance, when it left the Church of Scotland did so, as I have pointed out, protesting that it still adhered to the principle of having a Church in connection with the State. Long disconnection with the State, and no doubt a natural feeling of jealousy towards the Established Church has, to some extent, brought about a change, so that there is a division of opinion in the Free Church as to whether or not there should be a State Church. The United Presbyterian Church, which is third in importance, and combines within itself nearly all the earlier seceding Churches, has, from longer separation from the State, as a rule become opposed to all connection between Church and State. Those three great Presbyterian Bodies—namely, the Established, Free, and United Presbyterian Churches—embrace 85 per cent of the church-going people of Scotland; while the various smaller denominations, such as the Independents, Roman Catholics, and Episcopalians, include about 15 per cent. I shall now call the attention of hon. Members to the hold which those three Churches have respectively on the people of Scotland. This is somewhat difficult, as we have no reliable statistical information on the subject till we go back to 1851, when a religious census was taken in connection with the usual Census. At that time, I find that the total number of places of worship in Scotland was 3,395, and the attendance on the morning of the 30th March was roundly 944,000, apportioned as follows:—The Church of Scotland had 1,183 places of worship, and 351,500 present at worship; the Free Church had 889 places of worship, 292,300 present at worship; the United Presbyterian Church had 465 places of worship, and 159,200 present at worship. All other Churches had 858 places of worship, and 141,000 present at worship. From this, it is evident that at that time the Church of Scotland supplied little more than a third of the places of worship, and had only 37½ per cent of the church-going population attending her services. It is interesting to note how far each of the three Churches has since that date supplied the religious wants of Scotland. The Church of Scotland, notwithstanding the shock which she received at the Disruption, entered on a career of church extension with so much vigour that, in 1877, her places of worship had increased from 1,183 to 1,406, or an increase of 19 per cent, exclusive of 126 preaching and mission stations. The Free Church had increased from 889 to 1,032, or 16 per cent; and the United Presbyterian Church from 465 to 525, or 13 per cent. From this, it would appear that the Church of Scotland had, relatively, made greater progress in providing accommodation than either of the other two Bodies. Whether the number of adherents has increased in the same proportion, we have no reliable information to guide us; but I think we may fairly assume that it has been in similar proportions. Allow me now to call the attention of hon. Members to the annual revenue of the respective Churches. From a Return made to this House in 1874, I find that the Church of Scotland had from teinds, £235,759; Exchequer grants, £16,300; local sources—chiefly rates in towns—£23,502; total, £275,561. That constituted the amount of her State or national endowment. I may here note that of her 1,406 churches, only 988 are endowed by the State—the remaining 418 being endowed or supported by voluntary contributions. If, however, we are to form an estimate of the energy of the respective Churches, as shown by their contributions for Church and other religious purposes of all kinds, we must look to their official returns. From those, I find that in 1876, 1,286 churches connected with the Church of Scotland contributed £374,715. If we take the same proportions for the churches which made no returns, the amount would be £408,600, or nearly £291 per congregation—a sum greatly in excess of all she received from the State. The Free Church, during the same year, raised £575,719, or £558 per congregation; while the United Presbyterian Church gave £378,079, or the enormous average of £710 per congregation. From this statement, it would appear that the total amount of free-will contributions of the three great Presbyterian Bodies, which form 85 per cent of the population of Scotland, amounted in 1877 to £1,363,400. If we take the Independents, Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, and other smaller denominations, as contributing in a similar proportion, as they form 15 per cent of the population, we must add, say £204,500, or a total of free-will offerings amounting to £1,567,900; while, as I have already stated, the total amount of State endowment amounts only to £275,500, or, in other words, the maintenance of religion in Scotland costs roundly £1,843,400 a-year, of which the State endowments amount to rather less than 15 per cent. From this, it is evident that the maintenance of religion in Scotland does not mainly, or even to any considerable extent, depend on State endowments. And now, as to the present position of the Church of Scotland. It is impossible to deny that, owing to the causes to which I have referred, a great change has taken place, especially since the Disruption. Formerly, the Church was extensive with the country. Now, of rather more than 4,000 places of worship, she has only 1,406, or about 35 per cent. Then, the parish minister gave the benefit of his ministrations to, and they were accepted by, the whole parish. Now, he is the minister of a particular congregation in a parish, while in some districts in the Highlands he has almost no congregation. I find, for instance, that in 1851, and I believe the proportion is much the same now, in four Northern counties—Caithness, Sutherland, Ross, and Cromarty—only 2,100 out of 36,250, or six out of every 100, of the church-going people of those counties attended the parish church. In those districts, the anomalous position of the Established Church, whose ministers, it has been well said, gather the wool while others tend the flock, is a continual source of irritation, a waste of ecclesiastical power, and a scandal which is injurious to religion. If we, on the other hand, turn to two of the great centres of population—namely, Edinburgh and Glasgow—we find, from the same source, that the number of church-going people attending the Established Church in those cities was rather under 24 per cent, a proportion which, in both cases, was slightly exceeded by the Free Church. Having thus endeavoured to put before the House, as clearly as I can, the relative positions of the Established, Free, and United Presbyterian Churches, the question arises—Are the people of Scotland satisfied with the present state of things? There are many, myself among the number, who would hail with pleasure any scheme which would unite all Scottish Presbyterians into one strong National Church, retaining those endowments which have hitherto belonged exclusively to the Established Church, but sharing them in common. There are, however, difficulties in the way, which appear to be all but insuperable. It would be rash to deny that, had patronage been abolished in 1834, instead of 1874, it would in all probability have prevented the Disruption of 1843, and there would have been no occasion for the assertion on the part of that Church of that spiritual independence which she has always claimed; but which, as formulated by the Free Church in their celebrated Claim of Rights at the Disruption, the State is not likely to acknowledge. The difficulties in connection with the United Presbyterian Church are even greater, as they are opposed on principle to all religious State endowment. There are others who would be glad to see the Church disestablished, and the funds which are now used for the endowment of religion applied to some other purpose of a national character, such as education—as thereby all classes, Churchmen and Dissenters, would alike share in the benefits of reduced school rates. I have already pointed out that less than 40 per cent of the church-going population attend her places of worship, while her endowments and free-will offerings put together amount to less than 40 per cent of the money expended in connection with religion in Scotland. I venture to think that hon. Members will agree with me, that a Church can only be regarded as a National Church so long as its continuance is in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the people. The real question, therefore, is—Do the people of Scotland wish that the Established Church, notwithstanding the anomalous position in which it is placed, should be continued as a National Church, or that it should be disestablished and disendowed? I believe that I am warranted in saying that, beyond her own pale, there are many who would not wish to see the Church disestablished. There are many members of the Free Church who still adhere to the principles which were so emphatically stated at the Disruption that, although they had to leave the Church because they held the principles of the Church to be violated, they still held that there should be a Church in connection with the State. As an example of this feeling, let me quote from a letter written recently by Lord Moncreiff, one of the most distinguished leaders of the Free Church—

“As an adherent of the Free Church, I see no more reason for taking any part in an agitation against the Established Church now than the leaders of the great body of the General Assembly did in 1843."

Then, again, there are some even among the United Presbyterians, although I believe the number to be small, who adhere to the principle that there should be an Established Church; while some of the smaller bodies of Dissenters, such as the Original Secession Synod, counting, I understand, about 50 congregations, hold the same view. It is, therefore, impossible, with the information which we now possess, to arrive at anything like a definite opinion as to what are the views of the people of Scotland on this question. Sir, we have had no inquiry of a general character into the ecclesiastical state of Scotland since 1834, and I trust that I have said enough to show that since that time events of great importance have occurred, which render it necessary that there should be one now, in order to ascertain whether the people of Scotland have such a respect for an ancient Institution which has done good service in the past, and is still doing good work, as would lead them to desire its maintenance as a State Church in the future, or whether they believe that the time has come when that Institution, having fulfilled the great religious and educational purposes for which it was established, and having been the parent of other Churches which, in all essentials, are precisely the same as herself, no reason exists for continuing to her privileges which, from being exclusive, are a source of irritation to other Presbyterian Bodies. You may ask me how this is to be done? It is scarcely for me to answer, as part of the work of a Select Committee would naturally be to determine the best mode of getting such information. For myself, I should be satisfied if each elector should be allowed to put in the ballot box a voting paper "for" or "against" the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland; and if the result should prove that the majority are in favour of Disestablishment, I have no hesitation in saying that, on Constitutional grounds, no Church can be called National to which a majority of the people are opposed; and, whatever may be my own feelings towards the Church of Scotland, I am bound to say that it ought to be disestablished, and the funds to which it has at present an exclusive right, should be devoted to some other National purpose. I sincerely trust that the Government will agree to my Resolution, and grant an Inquiry by a Select Committee; as I rest assured that till this question is settled, it will continue in the future, as it has done in the past, to create an amount of irritation and bitter feeling, which cannot but prove prejudicial to the highest interests of the people of Scotland. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. JAMES STEWART said, that he rose with great diffidence to second the Motion; and, in doing so, had need to ask hon. Members for that indulgence which usually extended to those who, for the first time, ventured to address the House. He hoped that the Government would be disposed to acquiesce in granting a Select Committee. All who were acquainted with ecclesiastical affairs in Scotland must be aware, and must, he thought, admit that they were in a high degree unsatisfactory. He need not remind the House that the Presbyterian form of worship and of Church government was in a literal sense national in Scotland. He supposed he was quite within bounds in saying that not less than 80 per cent of the entire population adhered to that form of worship and of Church government; but, unfortunately, circumstances had arisen which had broken up the Presbyterians of Scotland into three powerful Denominations. Thoughtful men in each of those Denominations, feeling how much they held, both in faith and in practice, in common, deplored the differences which kept them apart; and there had consequently arisen a widespread and deeply-rooted desire that some means might be devised by which the Presbyterians of Scotland might be united in one National Church. The Motion before the House, and the Amendment which had been placed after it, were evidences of that desire. He trusted that the House would give its assent to the inquiry, which would, no doubt, be conducted in an impartial spirit, and the evidence adduced would help to guide them to a right solution. He confessed that he shared in the very prevalent feeling of dislike to raise a discussion as to the relative position of the Churches in Scotland on account of the heat which such discussions were too apt to engender; but there could not be a doubt that for some years past that question had been assuming an increased importance in Scotland. He believed it would not admit of further postponement, and therefore he thought that before men's minds became inflamed with controversy as to what were, and what were not, facts, it was in a high degree desirable that some authoritative inquiry should take place to establish the facts, so that they might be able to form a right judgment on the whole matter. There was no doubt, he thought, that such an inquiry would necessarily embrace in its scope the question of Disestablishment; but he hoped that Churchmen on both sides of the House would not be deterred from granting an inquiry on that account. The answer to that question would have to depend upon three things—firstly, whether it could be shown that the large majority of the people of Scotland were outside the communion of the Established Church; secondly, supposing that to be shown, did the maintenance of the Established Church constitute an injustice to the majority; and, thirdly, did that majority desire to have the Church disestablished? Should it turn out that those questions must be answered in the affirmative, he thought that even Churchmen themselves would admit that the time would seem to have come for its Disestablishment. He did not think the liberal-minded portion of the Established Churchmen would consider Disestablishment an unmixed calamity, provided it brought about a prospect of a re-union of Presbyterians in one National Church. He could not but think that they would consider the advantages of union outweighed largely the disadvantages of Disestablishment. As a Scotchman, and knowing the loss which religion and morality suffered from the present condition of things, and from the weakness which was inseparable from disunion, he earnestly desired to see some means taken which would open the door for a union of Presbyterians. The Patronage Act of 1874 had that object, no doubt, in view; but, as his hon. Friend the Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holmes) had pointed out, it had utterly failed in accomplishing it. For himself, he was bound to say that, while he had not arrived at the opinion that the Established Church was in all cases and circumstances indefensible or unscriptural, yet he was convinced that the first step towards the desired end—namely, the union of Presbyterians, would be found to lie in the separation of Church and State in Scotland; for, so long as the union of Church and State was maintained, a barrier existed which must prevent union, except of the most fragmentary character—and for this reason, that the United Presbyterian Church was opposed to the principle of endowment of religion by the State, whilst the Free Church, though originally holding the Establishment theory, had discovered by her own experience that a Church could flourish independently of the State; and, accordingly, the vast majority of her people had now departed from that principle. He knew there were so-called Constitutionalists, who feared that if they touched the Church they touched the State; but no opinion, in his mind, could be more absurd. He believed there were no more loyal subjects than the Nonconformists of Scotland. There were strong distinctions in the connection which existed between the Church and State in England as compared with that in Scotland. He was not going to enter into these; but he would remind the House of one—namely, that whereas in England the Church recognized the Queen as its head, the Scotch Church did not do so, and never had done so; and, therefore, it was clear that by its constitution the Scotch Church was not by any means so intimately connected with the State as the Church of England. Some of the friends of the Established Church thought that she numbered amongst her adherents the majority of the people of Scotland. If that were so, he admitted that her position would be stronger than he took it to be; but it seemed to him that there was considerable evidence against that assertion. He did not suppose that people pretended that the congregations of the Established Church were larger as a rule than those of other Denominations. Well, then, he found there were 1,517 churches attached to the Free and United Presbyterian Churches, against 1,390 attached to the Established Church. And these last comprised about 800 Highland charges, most of them very meagrely attended. In regard to the money raised for religious purposes during the past year—which was not an unfair test of the vitality and power of Church organization—£965,000 had been contributed by Free and United Presbyterians, against £385,000 by the Established Church. If these were facts, then it seemed to him that the Established Church had not that hold upon the church-going population of Scotland which was asserted; and that there was, at all events, good ground for inquiry into the facts. If it be said that the present condition of things formed no injustice to those outside the Established Church, he could only reply that he could not understand how those who had given the question full consideration could hold that opinion. Here they had national funds set apart for the maintenance of religion, of a form which still continued to be the National form which by the action of the State—admitted now to have been blundering action—lay persons of the population were unable, unless by the sacrifice of what they held to be principle, to participate in the advantages to be derived from those funds. Was there no injustice in that? Then, again, it might be said that the union of the Presbyterians was a Utopian idea; but he had sufficient faith in the practical common sense of his countrymen to believe that if they removed this barrier, a re-union sooner or later must become inevitable. It was also objected that if they disendowed the Church, they would not know what to do with the funds; but in educational and other matters those funds, he maintained, could be applied in such a way that the whole population, and not one section of the community only, would benefit. He entertained no feeling of hostility towards the Established Church of Scotland. He acknowledged the important share she bore in carrying on the religious work of Scotland, and he did not wish to see her means of usefulness crippled or impaired. He believed the withdrawal of State funds would have no such effect. He believed, on the contrary, that it would have an opposite effect, and that it would develop within her bounds those potent resources which lay in the free-will offerings of her people, and upon which her sister Churches had with such conspicuous success relied. From this source, he found that during the space of the last 35 years, the Free Church had received for religious purposes no less a sum than £12,000,000, which was upwards of £340,000 per annum; and, as his hon. Friend the Member for Paisley had shown, the income had last year amounted to £565,000. They who belonged to that Church might be pardoned if they pointed to those results with some degree of pride. In his opinion, the withdrawal of all State funds, and the placing of the Established Church and of the Presbyterian Churches on one and the same footing, as regarded recognition by the State, was the only way in which they could hope to see the idea of a National Church in Scotland attained. No Church had a practical title to be styled national unless she comprised within her bounds the great majority of the people of the country. There was a time when there was a National Church of Scotland; but that National Church was now represented, not by one section, but by the three sections into which the Presbyterians were divided. He would not detain the House by entering in detail into the advantages which would accrue to Scotland by the removal of the obstacles which kept Presbyterians apart. He would only say, that if the Government assented to that inquiry, and were able to deal with that important question in such a way as to heal the unhappy divisions that existed, they would earn for themselves, and he was sure they would receive, the respect and gratitude of the people of Scotland.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Patronage Act of 1874, and its effect upon the reciprocal relations of the various religious denominations in Scotland, and to ascertain how far the people of Scotland are in favour of maintaining the connection between Church and State in that Country."—(Mr. William Holmes.)

MR. C. S. PARKER moved the following Amendment:—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present relations of the Established Church with the other Churches in Scotland, and with the people at large, and in particular to inquire how far the Church Patronage Act of 1874 has tended to remove the causes of disunion and dissatisfaction among the Presbyterians of Scotland, and what further legislation would most conduce to that end?"

He was sure that the House generally would respond to the wish expressed that the Government might be able, if not to accept any of the Motions before the House, at least to find some mode of dealing with the question which should promote the cause of Christian Union in Scotland. The House must have been favourably impressed by the tone and temper of the speeches to which they had listened—the one from a member of the Established Church in Scotland, the other from a member of one of the non-Established Churches. Those speeches represented fairly the prevailing tone of feeling in the country. It was true that the sense of injustice had caused a bitterness of language on the part of some agitators; but at the more solemn meetings of the Churches and in their formal resolutions would be found a presiding spirit of Christian mutual goodwill. Even those Churches which might seem to be pursuing an aggressive policy did so in the firm belief that they were promoting not only the Christian welfare of the nation, but the higher interests of the Church to which, for the time, they were opposed. His Amendment was in no way hostile to the Motion. With his hon. Friends (Mr. W. Holms and Mr. J. Stewart), he believed that there was a strong case for inquiry, and that it had been rendered more urgent by recent legislation. He further agreed in asking for a Select Committee. It was only when he came to the question, what should be the Instruction to the Committee? that he found a difficulty in accepting the Motion. But, before he proceeded to explain wherein his Instruction to the Committee would differ from that already proposed, he wished to speak in general support of the Motion for inquiry. The facts and statistics of the case had been so amply set forth by his hon. Friends, that it was unnecessary to weary the House by referring to them any further. But he was sure the House would feel that such magnificent displays of Christian liberality, life, and vigour throughout Scotland as were indicated by these figures were a matter of congratulation. The chief appeal that he would make to hon. Members who represented English and Irish constituencies was, that they would endeavour not to look at this question too much in the light of any supposed analogy with the case of their own country. He did not disguise from himself the fact that whatever general principles were involved in the Motion were applicable to the Church of England as well as to that of Scotland; but he believed there were few hon. Members who held those general principles in so abstract a form, that they were prepared to apply them in the same way irrespective of the very different circumstances of each country. There were, no doubt, some who felt so strongly in favour of the principle of Establishment that they would be indisposed to admit almost any case in which it would be right for Parliament to put an end to an existing National Establishment; while, on the other side, there were, perhaps, a greater number who took the exactly opposite view, and held that all State Churches were contrary to Scripture and to justice. But the majority of hon. Members on both sides would concede that they must look at the particular case presented by each country. What was broadly the state of things in Scotland as compared with the other parts of the United Kingdom? In Ireland, the Church till lately established by law was that of a small minority. The great bulk of the people were taught to regard it as teaching deadly heresy. They also associated it with foreign invasion, and regarded it as imposed by conquest and maintained by force. In England, the Established Religion being, in its origin, the religion of the Reformation, was at first accepted by all the country, and still might be regarded as in the main the religion of the large majority. But, even in doctrine, at the present day a considerable difference existed between the Church of England and Dissenters—a difference, perhaps, best manifested in the fact that the House, in its wisdom, thought it well to prohibit the Catechism either of the Church of England or of any other Denomination from being taught in the Board Schools. And, besides the difference in doctrine, there was a difference which struck the imagination more in the outward forms of worship; and, further, there was an important difference in the mode of government. In Scotland there were no such distinctions. Almost the whole population had one creed—the Westminster Confession. For the instruction of the young they had one Catechism, which, instead of dividing, united the Churches. The forms of worship were so much the same, that very few would be able to guess whether they were in one of the Established or non-Established Presbyterian Churches. The forms of government were also alike, and each Church took an equal pride in the glorious obstinacy of their common ancestors in the faith, in rejecting English Prelacy, and securing the government of the Church by Kirk Sessions, Presbyteries, Provincial Synods, and General Assemblies. Thus it would not be going too far to say that they had one National Church in Scotland, not to be confounded with the State Church. The State Church held the endowments, and was in special relation with the State. But the National Church in Scotland, as was well known in Europe, America, and the Colonies, was not the Established Church, nor the Free Church, nor the United Presbyterian, but all put together formed the true National Church of Scotland. The broad fact with which they had to deal was, that they must distinguish between the State Church and the National Church. But then came the question—what was the cause of divisions in the National Church, and how far did those divisions create bodies so separate from each other that it was necessary to regard them no longer as one, but as several? There was a good deal of confusion on this subject in the minds of some hon. Gentlemen who were not familiar with Scotland. It was often said that the causes of difference were microscopical and speculative. He must deny that such a statement was correct. As regarded doctrine, or government, or worship, there was no difference at all; but when they came to the question of the relation of the Church to the State, the difference was by no means microscopical. As to its being speculative, he did not know what question could well be more practical than the question, how much independence or self-government, or autonomy, as it was now called, the Church was to enjoy? The doctrine of Hooker and Arnold, that Church and State were one, was held, he should think, by very few indeed in Scotland. Nor did the theory find more favour than the State was to rule over the Church—a doctrine most associated in their minds with the name of a certain German doctor, and in their own days with the much respected Dean of Westminster, who had the courage, speaking in the Presbyterian capital, to declare himself an Erastian of the Erastians. But he would also venture to affirm that the extreme opposite view—as taught by Hildebrand and Cardinal Manning, the Ultramontane theory—that the Church should rule over the State in such things as the Church was pleased to regard as spiritual, was not largely represented. It was often said that such was the theory of the Free Church of Scotland; but anyone looking at the documents of that Church would find it strongly repudiated. What they did hold was a very different tenet—namely, that the jurisdictions of State and Church were co-ordinate, the State dealing with things temporal, the Church with things spiritual, and each deciding for itself what things were spiritual. This, indeed, was the doctrine of the Confession of Faith, held in common by all Presbyterians. But the two largest non-Established Churches held distinctive opinions. He would mention first the United Presbyterians, not as the more numerous body, but because they perhaps had the clearest and most defined doctrine as to the relations of Church and State. They held that State aid, as well as State control over the Church, was to be rejected as unsound and as unjust. Union between the Free Church and the United Presbyterians had as yet been found impracticable, even with an agreement in the following terms about the relation of the Church and State:—

“That the civil magistrate, acting in his public capacity as a magistrate, ought to further the interests of the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ in every way consistent with its spirit and enactments.”

These last words were a saving clause to the United Presbyterians, because they were prepared to say that an Established Church was not consistent with its spirit and enactments. But they agreed that the civil magistrate should be ruled by the Christian religion in the making of laws, the administration of justice, and other matters. As to the Free Church, they had, last month, declared afresh their adherence to the Claim of Right, which was a claim to be considered the true Church of Christ in Scotland; and, as such, to be entitled, under the old Constitution, to all the rights and privileges of an Established Church. These they resigned only when they found they could not be held consistently with maintaining their spiritual independence. One of the few points on which he must differ from the hon. Member who proposed the Motion (Mr. W. Holms) was as to the cause of the Disruption. No doubt, the hon. Member was right in saying that patronage was the occasion of the Disruption, and that had these questions not arisen, or had the Government and Parliament, when they did arise, dealt with them wisely, there would have been no Disruption. But the Free Church, he was convinced, would not think they were properly represented, if the cause of the Disruption were admitted to be patronage. When that was asserted, they always contradicted it. Patronage was the chief occasion; but, in the conflict between the Civil Courts and the Church Courts, another class of questions arose—namely, as to the right to constitute parishes, and to give to the new parish ministers votes in the Presbyteries and Assembly. And, in the collision between the Civil and Ecclesiastical Courts, came out the deeper question of spiritual independence. He did not agree with the opinion of some hon. Members, that spiritual independence was unintelligible. What it meant was this—that while the then Church of Scotland were willing that all questions concerning their endowments, and all civil consequences should be regulated by the Civil Courts, they protested against interference by the Civil Courts in such questions as ordination or deposition of ministers. He now came to the question, whether it was true that the case for inquiry had been made more urgent by recent legislation? He should not use any of the language, so often heard, about the Patronage Act as being of an aggressive nature, or as having been meant to steal a march in any way upon the Free Church, or to filch its members from it one by one. At the same time, he did consider that a mistake was made in the mode of bringing forward that Act. When Dr. Norman Macleod, as Moderator of the Established Church, first came to ask for the abolition of patronage, he (Mr. Parker) was one of those who went with him to the right hon. Member for Greenwich, then Prime Minister, who replied to this effect—

“What seems to be most important is, that if you are to make a change of this kind, you must reckon with the Free Church of Scotland. You must remember that Patronage was the occasion of driving the Free Church out.”

This being so, it was an unfortunate mistake that, when the Patronage Act was brought forward, there was no attempt made to negotiate with the Free Church. A right thing was done in the wrong way. He laid some of the blame upon the Free Church, for he did not think their attitude at the time, or since, was very encouraging. The Established Church, however, was making approaches to the Free Church now, and had received a courteous answer, and he did not see why proposals for re-union should not have been made then. It was unhappily forgotten that the State Church, was only one section of the greater National Church, and the matter was argued, by some of the ministers who assisted in passing the Act, as if it were a question affecting the Established Church alone. He was glad to say that the Lord Advocate of the day, (Lord Gordon), took a different line. He said—

“I believe it to be essential to get Patronage out of the way in order to effect a union with the other Churches. I believe this Bill will afford a basis of union between parties who are so much at one in doctrine and government, and I think it would be of the utmost advantage to the entire Church of Scotland;”

meaning thereby, not the State Church, but the National Church. But, in order to effect any such union, it was necessary to negotiate, not with individual members, but with the Governing Bodies of other Churches. His right hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) at that time proposed a Committee of Inquiry. Unfortunately, that was regarded by the House merely as a counter-move against the Bill, and, in consequence, it was not entertained. The other Churches were refused a hearing, and the opportunity of consideration was lost. The question now was, whether an inquiry by a Select Committee was not still the best mode of proceeding? What were the alternatives? There was one which his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) would probably bring before the House—namely, a Royal Commission, which might have some advantages. But he feared that in Scotland, where Liberalism was still somewhat rampant, there would be much distrust of a Commission appointed by a Conservative Government, and that distrust would counterbalance all the advantages. There was another alternative—an admirable one at times—that of letting things alone. That might have two issues. The Gentlemen most anxious for Disestablishment were also most desirous of having the matter let alone just now, because they believed that the pear was ripening fast. An inquiry, which might issue in a Report favourable to the Established Church, would interfere, they thought, with the wholesome development of opinion going on in Scotland; whereas, if things were let alone, the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church would employ their influence at the Elections, and return Members to vote for Disestablishment. But, whether that would effect Disestablishment or not depended upon what the English majority would do. A third more hopeful alternative was offered, by the fact that the Churches were approaching each other in a friendly manner. This might lead to some good result; but Churches could hardly solve the question without the aid of Parliament, because the point upon which all must turn was, whether Parliament at the present time was disposed to grant that amount of spiritual independence with which the Free Church would consent to become an Established Church again? It was only fair to say that not many Free Churchmen now regarded this as practicable; the majority of the last General Assembly had committed themselves to the contrary opinion. It therefore appeared to him that there was most advantage in referring this question to a Select Committee, partly as a means of opening communication with Parliament; but also because it would bring together the leaders of these Churches before an impartial and friendly tribunal. In a few words he would explain his reasons for moving the Amendment. He thought that the Instruction proposed by the hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms) would be found inconvenient by a Committee. The inquiry into the general effects of the Patronage Act was wider than need be; while, on the other hand, to inquire into the reciprocal relations of the various religious Denominations in Scotland only so far as affected by that Act, was too narrow; and, thirdly, as to the direction to ascertain how far the people of Scotland were in favour of maintaining the connection between Church and State in that country—that was a matter upon which information might be gained without the assistance of a Committee upstairs. Therefore, he moved that a more general inquiry should be made into the present relations between the Established Church and the other Churches and the people at large. He objected to the proposal of his hon. Friend to send round ballot-boxes, and wished rather that light should be thrown upon questions of principle. He wished, in fact, that the Committee should try to ascertain what form of national recognition of religion would be most suitable at the present day for Scotland. In conclusion, while thanking the House for their kind attention, he would remind them that the opportunity, neglected now, might not return. Private Members had done their humble part in bringing the question forward, and now, among the Leaders on one side or the other, he hoped there might be found more than one to earn the poet's praise, as statesmen—

“Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet.”

[The Amendment, not being seconded, could not be put.]

MR. DALRYMPLE joined with his hon. Friend who had just sat down in commending the tone of moderation in the speeches with which the debate began. But he confessed that he was somewhat at a loss to understand the position of hon. Gentlemen opposite in regard to this question. They had had three speeches already. The hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms) spoke as a member of the Established Church, and as one who was friendly to it; but he procured a Secunder to the Motion in the person of the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. J. Stewart), who had avowed himself an out-and-out promoter of Disestablishment. The hon. Member for Paisley had spoken of the keen interest with which the people of Scotland regarded the question; but what had taken place? The hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) at 7 o'clock suggested that the House at its Evening Sitting, instead of dealing with this question, on which the hearts of the people of Scotland were set, should proceed with the discussion of the great Imperial topic—the abolition of causeway-mail. More than that, he noticed that the Previous Question was to be moved from the other side of the House. That was not a bad idea, he owned, though he did not like the quarter from which it came. With regard to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker), it pointed to what the hon. Gentleman had himself called the admirable alternative of leaving things alone. The speech was characterized by much learning; but it was a question whether that had been the proper time for introducing many of the topics which had been raised. He really did not know the course which the debate would take; but he considered that the House should decide whether or not a prima facie case had been made out for inquiry. If such a case had not been made out, then it was a serious matter to demand an inquiry. He was of opinion that no Committee should be granted unless a case had been shown to exist. His contention was, that the promoters of the Motion had not got a case; but, on the other hand, wanted the Committee to get one up, and it would not be according to the customs of the House to appoint a Committee, unless a clear case had been made out. They were indebted to several of the Motions upon the Paper in reference to Church Disestablishment to the visit to Scotland of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington). The other day, he (Mr. Dalrymple) was much amused at a speech made at a meeting of the Liberation Society by a Mr. Carvell Williams in reference to that visit. He remarked that the visit of the noble Lord had developed a remarkable amount of latent sympathy with the movement; that the noble Lord had probably been cautioned as to the subject of Disestablishment, but he had said as much as could have been expected from a gentleman in his position, whatever that might mean. The noble Lord had spoken of the abolition of patronage as a step towards Disestablishment, because it weakened the connection of the State with the Church. He had no doubt that that sentiment would be very popular in certain quarters, among those who grudged the Church her liberty, and with some landlords who had lost their patronage. He wanted to know why, when the noble Lord spoke in Scotland, he was not told a little more of the truth about patronage? Why was he not told that patronage was no essential part of the Established Church. He wanted to know whether its abolition was not the no plus ultra of what was asked in 1842? Patronage might not have been the sole cause of Disruption; but if it had been abolished formerly, would it not have prevented Disruption? The noble Lord, in Scotland, said he was not going to say anything about Disestablishment in England; but, as the Secretary of State for India said in Edinburgh in December, when there was a burning in Scotland there would be a vast amount of scorching in England. The noble Lord had said that he hoped that this would not be made a test question; and, further, that he would not be a party to stimulating agitation, though he would not repress discussion. That sort of declaration was most cruel to one set of persons—namely, wire-pullers. To them it meant positive starvation. As to repressing agitation, to many who heard the noble Lord it must have been like proposing to forbid them to draw breath, it being as natural to them to do the one thing as the other. It would appear that the subject had already been made a test at Elections, and some hon. Members had fallen into trouble over it. The hon. Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms) was perplexed at the questions put to him by his constituents, and he (Mr. Dalrymple) suspected that his Motion to-night was made to escape from his troublesome constituents. He did not blame hon. Members for bringing the matter before the House, as he believed the more the Church was attacked the firmer hold it would have in the hearts of the people. But he wanted to know who desired the inquiry asked for? They had heard that the hon. Member for Paisley and the hon. Member for Greenock wanted it. The latter Gentleman was prepared for Disestablishment, and had seen his way to the apportionment of the funds of the Church, though he did not say whether they were to be devoted to religious or secular education. Did the Free Church of Scotland want the inquiry? They knew that the Free Church had petitioned the House in the matter, and repudiated the notion of overturning the Establishment. Did the United Presbyterian Church ask for an inquiry? By resolutions which they had passed, he thought not, as those resolutions expressed the opinion that the Motions brought forward to-night were unworthy of earnest legislation. And what did Dr. Hutton say? The House did not know Dr. Hutton. But the hon. Member for Paisley did, as he was one of his constituents. Dr. Hutton said the Dissenters would be more simple than usual if they surrendered their right to have the question settled by the usual constitutional methods, or if they were willing to accept the result of any tentative inquiry before such tribunals as were proposed, or the evasive confusion and delay of preparing Blue Books, which altered nothing and could add nothing to their knowledge either of the principle or facts of the case. Dr. Hutton said the Free Church was ready armed for war, and by hand and voice was prepared to do battle against the Erastianism of the Establishment. One more authority he would quote, and for a particular reason—Dr. Adam, who had particular knowledge of what were called the “Constitutionalists.” The “Constitutionalists” were a small minority in the Free Church who maintained the principles of 1843, and who were against Disestablishment. Dr. Adam was very severe upon them because they had had an interview with the very source and centre of all Erastian evil—he meant the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. That was an unpardonable offence. He wanted to know what other course they could have followed than having an interview with the Lord Advocate, if something like an approach was to be made towards the Established Church? But there was one other Body that had not been mentioned—namely, the Established Church herself. The position of the Established Church in reference to inquiry was simply this. It was not afraid of inquiry in any way. It in no way asked for it, or refused it. It only wished to watch the proceedings. It occupied the dignified position of making no complaint, or in any way deprecating the inquiry which was asked for. He might, however, say one word on the kind of matter shadowed forth as the subject of these inquiries. The hon. Member for Perth wished to inquire into the working of the Patronage Act, and wanted to know whether it had had an effect which those who had anything to do with the passing of the Act never supposed it would have—namely, the settlement of religious differences in Scotland? That was not the motive with which it was passed. It was hoped that would be one result. There were those who said the desire was to draw off adherents from other bodies, though he had never been able to ascertain how that was to be done. If that were the object, it had succeeded in a very small degree; but, not being conscious of any such motive, he felt no disappointment. The main object of passing the Act was to free the Church of Scotland from something which was not natural to it, and from which it had long wished to be free. He maintained that the time had not come for inquiry into the working of the Patronage Act. Inquiry only took place when the incumbents died, and the mortality among incumbents had not been greater since the Act passed. Occasionally there had been scandals in connection with the election of a minister, since the Act passed; but there were scandals in connection with the elections of ministers elsewhere than in Scotland. It could not, therefore, be said that these were due to the Patronage Act. That Act had created great satisfaction among the people of Scotland, and they were thankful to the Government that had courage to deal with the question. As to the proposal of the hon. Member for Paisley, that the opinion of the people of Scotland for or against an Established Church should be taken by ballot, he was sure no such project would be sanctioned by the House. Notwithstanding the remarks of the Seconder of the Resolution, he could not admit that the question of Disestablishment was before the House. It had not yet come to that, although there were some in the House who desired it as a consummation to be arrived at. He was content to leave the defence of the Established Church to some future time, and he believed there would be many defenders in the House, and those not confined to one side of it. The position of the Church of Scotland at present was deserving of admiration. The address of Principal Tulloch at the close of the recent General Assembly was not only high in its tone and characteristically liberal, but it was essentially unlike the address of an ordinary ecclesiastic. Principal Tulloch was not only content to claim sympathy and support for his own Church, but he used expressions of kindness and charity for other bodies, and admiration for their work and their vitality. A time might come when the political exigencies of Party might hasten on the question of Disestablishment. It was possible that the position of other Denominations was becoming more and more untenable on account of the very liberty which the Church of Scotland enjoyed, and that might lead them to desire her overthrow. It was possible that the very vigour and life which were in the Established Church might make others feel that it was now or never if she was to be overthrown. But he felt assured that they would not be able to procure Disestablishment on any reasonable grounds with regard to the state of the Church, because it was engaged in quiet yet active and faithful work, was in no sense aggressive, and was holding out the right hand of friendship to the other religious Bodies in Scotland who were separated from it. It might be said of the Church of Scotland as it had been said of the Church of England—

“Yea, she hath mighty witnesses, and though
Her deeds of good have had their ebb and flow;
She yet awaits in calm and faith sublime
The righteous judgment of all after time.”

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in rising to move, as an Amendment to Mr. Holms's Motion—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to appoint a Commission to inquire into the causes which keep asunder the Presbyterians of Scotland, with a view to the removal of any impediments which may exist to their re-union in a National Church as established at the Reformation, and ratified by the Resolution Settlement and the Act of Union,” said, his object in moving it was because he thought a Royal Commission would be a far better mode of inquiry into the state of Ecclesiastical matters in Scotland than a Select Committee of that House. What he wanted to gain by such an inquiry was that an end might be obtained, by the best means available, of the unfortunate differences existing in Scotland among the three Presbyterian Bodies, all professing to have the same object in view—the upholding of the Protestant religion as adopted at the Reformation, and agreeing upon all those difficult questions which had their origin in an unknown world—differing only in the more trivial subjects, those of the government of the Church, payment of ministers, and things of that character. The observations which he wished to address to the House were intended to impress the House with the trivial nature of the differences which existed in the Churches of Scotland, and with the conviction that those differences might be removed if the question were gone into with a sincere desire to promote that object. In support of that view, he would refer to the testimony of Dr. Welsh, and others, who had treated upon the question. From these he derived the impression that Disestablishment was not wanted for its own sake, but as leverage for the Disestablishment of the Church of England. The case of America, he might add, was often alluded to as affording an illustration of the way in which religion might exist in a State in which there was no Established Church. The word “religion” it was true, was ignored in the American Constitution; but he found that in Congress at Washington they always had a chaplain to read prayers, and he was curious to know, as they had no national religion, how it was they arranged the question of having a chaplain? The Secretary of Congress had told him that they asked every minister of religion in turn to come and open Congress; and when he asked him if there were no limit to that, the reply was that there was no limit, and that on one occasion the Senate had been opened by a Jewish Rabbi. Neither in this country, nor in Scotland, would they be prepared for that. The truth was, that with them the Disestablishment of the Church meant the ignoring of all religion; and the question that ultimately would be asked when this matter came up, was—Should Great Britain be Protestant or not? Should Great Britain have a Protestant Sovereign or not? If they disestablished religion, they had no standard by which they could judge whether the Sovereign were Protestant or not. He should like to quote the remarks of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), who did Scotland the honour to go there last year, and, he was bound to say, had created a good deal of the excitement which now existed on this subject. The noble Marquess said that what struck him, a stranger in the matter, was that, where there was so much agreement, and so much co-operation, there should be so much real rivalry, and where the exertions of one Church had only been equalled or surpassed by the self-sacrifice of the others, there should be so much rivalry existing; and he claimed for the Liberal Party sympathy with all the Presbyterian Churches. He thanked the noble Marquess for those words. The well-wishers of the country agreed with the noble Marquess, that there ought to be, and might be, some way of remedying that state of things; and he hoped the House would give its assistance in the inquiry which they wished to have. It was, however, impossible to deny that the speeches of the noble Marquess at Edinburgh and Glasgow had given great encouragement to the Liberation Societies of Scotland; but the noble Marquess probably had not known that their real designs were against the Church of England. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) could not but regret that, when the noble Marquess went to Scotland, he had not consulted two distinguished Members, who could have given him good advice on the subject—namely, Lord Moncreiff, who was Lord Advocate some time ago in the late Government, and the present Moderator of the Church of Scotland, Principal Tulloch, who entertained very strong views against the Disestablishment, or rather, the disendowment, of the Church of Scotland. If he had done so, he would have found that the Free Church always spoke of the necessity of Establishment, and only said that the Church, as now established, was what they wished to be rid of. They asked for the Disestablishment of the existing Church, in order that another might be established in the future. It was clear, from the statement of Dr. Welsh, that the exercise of patronage had been attended with great injury to religion, and was the chief source of Dissent in Scotland, and the main cause of the difficulties in which the Church was involved. Petitions had been presented that day from the Free Church of Scotland to the effect that, whilst desirous of preserving the ancient securities of the Church, the petitioners did not regard the maintenance of ecclesiastical establishments as the appropriate means of fulfilling those ob-tions, and prayed the House to consider the matter and adopt measures for bringing the differences which existed to as early a termination as possible. That was precisely what he wished. He wished the House to take the subject into their consideration, either by a Select Committee or by a Royal Commission. He would prefer a Royal Commission, because he thought a Royal Commission would be better qualified to consider the matter. The hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple) had not put, in as strong language as he might, that patronage was the cause of the Dissent which existed in Scotland, and was the main cause of the difficulty in which the Church was at present involved. The Free Church now came complaining that the Government had removed patronage, and that proved how little they had to build a grievance upon. The fact was, there was a conflicting interest between the urban and the rural districts upon this question. It was well known to those who had gone into the question, that the United Presbyterian Church had its strength in the large cities and the populous towns, and not in the country places, and the chief opposition to the Established Church came from that Body. In their Report for 1877, the United Presbyterians said that an increase of Church membership could be looked for only in the great centres of population, and that the work of the Church should be prosecuted there. Surely, it was hard that they who said they could not extend their operations to the rural districts, should be so keen to take away from those districts that which they now had? That was what the people of the rural and the highland districts deeply felt. It was quite natural that the United Presbyterians should flourish more than the Established Church in a financial point of view, because they only took those who were able to pay. One of the questions put to applicants for admission to their Churches was—"Do you promise to contribute, according to your ability, for the support and extension of the Gospel?" That was the fact, and no doubt it was a good and right thing so to contribute; but was that to be made a condition to admission to a Church? The Established Church invited the people to go to it and contribute for their money. Highlanders in many cases did not use the Established Church; but they were, nevertheless, unwilling to give up the principle of an Establishment. They were proud, and did not desire to depend on Glasgow and Edinburgh for their religious ordinances. At the present time more than half the funds for the support of the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church came from Edinburgh and Glasgow, and the Highlanders saw that if the endowments of the Church were taken away, they would be left at the mercy of the people of those large cities. Both the United Presbyterian Church and the Free Church petitioned Parliament for the Disestablishment of the Church of England also; but they objected to any inquiry, and said that the repeal of one Act—the Act of Union of England and Scotland—would be quite sufficient to disestablish those Churches. He thought, however, that Parliament would not repeal that Act without inquiry. The only point of difference between the Free Church and the Established Churches in Scotland was the question of spiritual independence, and that question simply amounted to this—that the Ecclesiastical Law should be superior to the Civil Law, and that the Courts of the Church should decide what was and what was not an ecclesiastical subject. ["No, no!"] Perhaps the hon. Member who said "No," would tell the House what spiritual independence really was. The leading men of the Free Church said—"Our position here in Scotland is absolutely ridiculous. We are standing looking at one another and wondering how in the world we got into this position, and wondering how in the world we can get out of it." That was his own description of his own Church. The result of their deliberations appeared to be a desire to pull down the Established Church to their own level, and, when it was down, to try to build up another. He would not detain the House much longer; but he wished to correct one error. The leading journal had said that a large number of ministers had left the Established Church rather than admit the claim of a lay patron. But the fact was, that the law only required the Presbytery to receive and examine a nominee as to his fitness. But the law left the Presbytery at perfect liberty to reject a nominee, if, after examination, they found him unfit. There never was a claim on the part of the law to force a minister on a congregation without regard to his fitness. He trusted that, under the whole circumstances of the case, Her Majesty's Government would feel it to be their duty to institute an inquiry by Royal Commission, with the view of ascertaining clearly what were the points of difference which kept asunder the Presbyterians of Scotland. He held it to be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to look after the interests of Her Majesty's subjects; and as that was a subject which the Scotch people had very much at heart, he thought it was the duty of the Government to take up the matter and institute an inquiry. The hon. and gallant Member concluded by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. ORR-EWING seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to appoint a Commission to inquire into the causes which keep asunder the Presbyterians of Scotland, with a view to the removal of any impediments which may exist to their re-union in a National Church, as established at the Reformation, and ratified by the Revolution Settlement and the Act of Union,"—(Sir Alexander Gordon,)

—instead thereof.

MR. BAXTER: Sir, it is not my intention at this late hour—a quarter to 12—to inflict a long speech upon the House, and certainly I will not follow the example of those who have preceded me, by expatiating upon the ecclesiastical history of Scotland, or dilating upon the doctrine of spiritual independence. My object is in a few, plain, practical sentences, to lay before the House my views of the ecclesiastical situation in Scotland. From what has taken place, both in this House and out of it, it must be evident to everyone that the ecclesiastical relations of the State in Scotland are not in a satisfactory condition, and must sooner or later be revised by the Imperial Parliament. Every Session we have Bills brought in to remedy minor grievances more or less pressing, at every Election candidates are questioned in regard to their views on the subject; and now we are asked to institute a general inquiry respecting the facts of the case and the wishes of the people. The last time the matter was discussed in this House was in July, 1874, when the Government brought forward a Bill for the abolition of patronage, in the vain hope that it would bring about union and strengthen the Established Church. Believing that this expectation would prove a mere delusion, I met it by an Amendment on the second reading, recommending inquiry; because I was convinced that any fair tribunal must come to the conclusion that such a measure would prove utterly futile, and certainly not effect the purpose in view. The hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple) has stated that it was no part of the object of the promoters of the Bill of 1874 to bring back other Bodies into the Establishment. I am amazed at his forgetfulness of the debate which took place on the second reading of that Bill. It is very curious and instructive to read the speeches which were delivered on that occasion. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate lauded the Bill as a basis of reconciliation between the Churches, and seemed to have no doubt that it would bring about union and harmony. Everyone who spoke on the same side indulged in this pleasing hallucination, excepting the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander), who was not so easily taken in, and expressed more than doubts as to the efficacy of the healing measure. In moving the Amendment, I stated my firm belief that the Bill, if passed, would throw the great body of the Free Church into the arms of the Liberation Society, and I quoted the remark of a Conservative statesman, to the effect that he could not comprehend why the Dissenters did not hail with joy a proposal which, in his opinion, was a long step towards Disestablishment. Now, who that is conversant with what has taken place since can hesitate for a moment in deciding who were the true prophets. Confessedly, the measure has been a great failure. The people that in consequence of it have gone over to the Established Church are so few in number, and their history is so peculiar, that they are not worth mentioning. The great leading unendowed Denominations, with singular emphasis and unanimity, have repudiated the idea of returning to the Establishment, and the advocates of separation between Church and State have received such an accession of numbers and strength as to render the adoption of their views an ultimate certainty. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow said, in the debate of 1874, "that a Bill undertaken for the purpose of discharging the Dissenters would land the country in Disestablishment." He was right; that is now a mere question of time. Those whose fond hopes have been crushed by the consequences of the Act of that year, should not have forgotten the wise saying of Sir Robert Peel—"Whatever you do regarding an Established Church, don't legislate." Now, Sir, I am not one of those who think that the Establishment of the Church of Scotland is a crying evil, or that its Disestablishment ought to be made a test question at Elections. A man may be a very good Liberal, and yet fail to see that such a measure is called for, at all events, for the present. It must be kept in mind that there is no social grievance in Scotland as in England to redress; the landed proprietors and the gentry belong not to the Church established by law, but to a body of Episcopalian Dissenters, and adherence to the Church confers no social superiority of any kind; in fact, a large number of the upper classes belong to the Free Church. Then the revenues of the Establishment are small; there are no rich livings and no sinecures. The great body of the clergy do their duty faithfully and well, and a new school has arisen amongst them, and, I believe, is rapidly increasing, distinguished by a breadth of thought and a liberality of sentiment which are worthy of the grand history and traditions of their ancient Church. It gives me sincere pleasure to bear this testimony; but I can go farther, and point to better evidence than mere words. Most of the noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen who, in both Houses of Parliament, laud the Church of Scotland and oppose its Disestablishment, never enter the doors of its Churches. Many of them regard it as no Church at all, and they would advocate its separation from the State to-morrow, did they not imagine that in some way or other it served as a buttress to the Church to England. I entertain no such feeling. I have the highest respect for the Church of Scotland, its services, and its ministers. I attend my parish church when at home; and, in my opinion, it is a great misfortune, if not a danger, that the bulk of the proprietors in Scotland do not worship with the people. With these feelings and sentiments, I utterly repudiate any desire to injure the Established Church, and I regard the ecclesiastical situation in Scotland from an absolutely impartial position; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the Church is now in a minority, and that there is not the slightest chance of any of the other Denominations rejoining it. It may have two-fifths of the community, or it may have one-third, but it has not a majority; and when I consider that the unendowed sects have more than 2,000 congregations, that they are raising vast and increasing sums for religious purposes, and that between the three great Presbyterian Churches in Scotland there is little or no difference either in creed or practice, I cannot defend the endowment of one of them alone. The necessity for such endowment can only be defended on the assumption that the voluntary principle could not be trusted to supply adequately the religious wants of the community in large, increasing towns, or in poor and sparsely-peopled country districts. Now, it is no disparagement to the Church to say that the other Denominations have been even more active in building places of worship to meet the wants of great towns; and sceptical indeed must be the mind of anyone who, after the experience of the last 30 years, could for a moment doubt that State assistance is not required to provide an ample number of churches in the great centres of commercial and manufacturing industries. The case of the purely country parishes is still more conclusive against the maintenance of State endowment. Not only is the Established Church in a minority in Scotland as a whole, but there are entire districts in the Highlands where the people en masse have left her communion and entire counties where her adherents are so few as to make State provision ridiculous. In these very poor parts of the country where you, from a theoretical point of view, profess it to be necessary, the people are of a very different opinion. They have provided and they sustain their own churches; the Act of 1874 has utterly failed to bribe them back into the Establishment fold, and if they can do without your aid, much more can the wealthier and more thickly-populated parts of Scotland dispense with it. I will not trouble the House with statistics; but, perhaps, in order to show the absurd state of things prevailing in the Highlands, I may be permitted to give the attendance on Sunday, 8th April, 1877, in two Presbyteries and in two counties at the Established and Free Churches; leaving out of view United Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Roman Catholics, and other Bodies. In the Presbytery of Tain, 429 people attended the Established Church, 6,115 the Free Church. In the Presbytery of Loch Carron, 261 people attended the former, 3,210 the latter. In the county of Caithness, 1,477 attended the Established Church, and 9,306 the Free Church; in the county of Sutherland the numbers were 517 to 6,480. What I want to impress upon the House is, that no change whatever in the sense intended by the promoters of the Patronage Act of 1874 has taken place in the ecclesiastical situation in Scotland. On the contrary, the Free Church, by overwhelming and increasing majorities, has pronounced in favour of Disestablishment; the United Presbyterian Synod has issued an emphatic protest against all State Churches; and recent Elections in Scotland have rendered it evident that the time for inquiry has passed, and that that for action is close at hand. Let English and Irish Members keep in mind that £22,000 a-year is paid out of the Consolidated Fund for parishes in the Highlands; that 42 clergymen in these districts have their salaries entirely paid out of that Fund; that, in the great majority of the 42 parishes, there are very few adherents of the Established Church, and in some of them not a single soul. Great stress has been laid in certain quarters upon the necessity of an actual union of all the Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, which are really united both in doctrine and in form of government. To expect the Free Church and United Presbyterians to go back to the Establishment is a mere chimera—

a vain and foolish delusion which the Legislature had better set aside at once. That union has already been effected in England, in the United States, in Canada, in South Africa, in Australia, and in New Zealand, and it can only be effected in Scotland after the same fashion—that is, on the basis of freedom and disconnection with the State. I do not profess to be very keen in the matter, because the evil is not a crying one, and the injustice is small in comparison with that in England; but I have no doubt that in a few years the national endowment at present bestowed upon one of the sects in Scotland must be withdrawn. [Laughter from the Ministerial Benches.] Oh, yes, hon. Gentlemen may laugh; they laughed a few years ago when it was proposed to disestablish the Church in Ireland, and I have been long enough in this House to remember many, many proposals which they at one time laughed at, but which are now embodied in the Statute Book. The question will then be what is to be done with the money? It does not belong to the landed proprietors who succeeded to or bought their estates with this burden upon them, and probably Scotland would grumble if it were simply paid into the Exchequer as belonging to the nation, which, undoubtedly, it does. Possibly, the best arrangement would be to let it go in aid of the school rate, which, although very useful, is in some cases very heavy, and which is levied upon all, and benefits all classes of the community. Some such change as this I look upon as inevitable, and I have reason to know that some of the most thoughtful and far-seeing minds in the Church of Scotland are coming gradually to that conclusion. I am not anxious to hurry on the consummation, and do not despair of seeing it brought about by-and-by without bitterness or bad feeling, and in such a manner as will prove once more what an example Scotland can set to the world in the matter of religious vitality and power.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it would be vain to disguise the fact, that upon ecclesiastical questions there was great variety of opinion among Ecclesiastical Bodies in Scotland, and even among individual members of those Bodies. At the same time, it was a matter upon which he could congratulate his country and the House, that upon all essentials of faith and doctrine, upon all questions of form and ceremonial, the Churches were substantially at one. They were better still. They were as brethren in this, that they all mingled one with another and recognized that they stood upon the same common religious ground. He quite admitted, when they turned from that position, that there were great differences between them; and he could only hope that in any further discussion of these important matters, there might be shown the same fairness and moderation as that observed by hon. Gentlemen that evening on both sides of the House. From the very earliest period of the history of the Church of Scotland there had been a great deal of uneasiness, a great deal of distrust, a great deal of jealousy of the interference of the State. The complaint of the Church from the outset had been that her position and constitution had been invaded and encroached upon by the Legislature and the Courts of the country, and that she had been deprived of her right of electing her ministers, and also of other constitutional rights, such as those of appointing clergymen, of ordaining ministers, and of instituting cures. It was not only patronage that led to the Disruption in 1843; but much deeper issues were involved than those arising out of the Act of 1711—such, for instance, as the independence of the Church. He did not wish to refer to controversial matter; but it was right to keep in view that the Free Church made it the very head and front of her protest that she was the Church established by law upon the basis of the Revolution Settlement; and that, as a consequence, she was entitled to exercise all the rights and privileges which the Church possessed in virtue of that Settlement, but of which she had been wrongfully deprived in the interval. Accordingly, when the Free Church claimed the position of the original Church of Scotland, she claimed among the rights and privileges given to that Church by law, the privilege to choose her own ministers, to institute her own cures. Although the Courts of Law held that these claims were not according to the Constitution, as by them interpreted, they had never been abandoned by the Free Church; or, at least, by many within her pale. He did not wish to enter into the merits of this question, or to refer to the question of Disestablishment, because that would be quite beyond the limits he had set himself; but he might say, that beyond the pale of the Church of Scotland there were those who maintained the principle of an Establishment. There were certainly differences among those outside upon these questions. While many maintained the purely voluntary principle, and contended that there should be no relations between Church and State, there were also many, who, though they did not belong to the Established Church, still held as a fundamental principle of their faith that the State ought—though, perhaps, not in the form of the present Establishment—directly to recognize religion; and who also were of opinion, rightly or wrongly, that the emoluments, and the scanty funds of the Church should not be diverted from the purpose to which they were at present applied, but should be used for no other purpose than the teaching of religion. As to the observations that fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Montrose Burghs (Mr. Baxter), although a great proportion of those who lived in the Highlands did not attend the Established Church, he ventured to challenge the right hon. Gentleman with this fact—that those were the very parts of Scotland, and those were the very persons who most strongly maintained the principle of an Established Church, and were most thoroughly averse from a single penny of these funds being diverted to any other purpose. These could not be referred to, therefore, as instances of a desire for Disestablishment. They wished to have the benefits of the funds for the religious teaching of themselves and their families; but they would not take them unless certain restrictions interfering with their religious convictions were removed. If they could have them as they were originally established, they would have no objection to derive any benefit from them. They would infinitely prefer that to any application of the fund to the augmentation of the school rate, which they objected to as an attempt to relieve the laird at the expense of the poorer population. As to the position of the Government, he frankly confessed that the arguments and views of the hon. Members who had supported the Motion either went a great deal beyond or failed to support the proposals for inquiry they had made. The Motion was limited to two points—it asked for a Select Committee to inquire into the Act of 1874, and also to ascertain the feeling of the people of Scotland. He was not very well versed in the Business of the House; but he was surprised to have a Committee asked for to conduct an inquiry in order to ascertain the public opinion of Scotland. It was an unconstitutional, and not an expedient mode of ascertaining that opinion. On the other hand, he thought it was premature and unnecessary to inquire into the Act of 1874. He contended that the Act was working satisfactorily, and had removed the sore of patronage which existed before; but, of course, the change did not get rid of all sources of unpleasantness, just as there were no circumstances in which there would never be disputes in Dissenting congregations. It would require a very strong optimist to believe that popular election succeeding patronage would sweep away all sources of trouble. He would, however, venture to say it had given far greater satisfaction than the other system, and that when the strife was over, there was far greater and heartier unanimity of sentiment among the congregation, than when a minister was forced upon them by patronage. Then, it was asked that there should be a special inquiry into the Church Patronage Act, its results, and the points on which further legislation might be desirable. In all the Motions which had been discussed grave questions were involved, which could not be usefully determined by any of the proposed inquiries. These were questions upon which the Government must make up their own minds when action was necessary. He did not think they would be much aided by any such inquiry. It might be necessary to inquire into certain facts; but, if so, the reference would have to be different in form from any then before the House. There were questions involved on which he felt deeply, and should like to express his views; but he thought it would be better to confine himself to simply indicating that the Government could not accept any of the three Motions proposed.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this debate has divided itself into two branches, one as to the expediency of an inquiry in the form proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley (Mr. W. Holms), and the other as to the general condition of the Established Church in Scotland. I will offer one or two remarks upon the first question which is before us—namely, whether we ought to have an inquiry into this subject? Now, Sir, when I take the Motion of my hon. Friend on the particular question before the House, I fully admit that the Patronage Act of 1874—omitting from the present question whether it is consistent with the time during which it has been in operation to make it expedient that there should be an inquiry—is a perfectly legitimate subject for Parliamentary inquiry according to the precedents which former years afford. The subject of patronage was carefully investigated by a Committee of the House, and there could be no reason in the nature of the case why the same thing could not be done again. But when my hon. Friend proceeds to propose that a Committee should be appointed to ascertain how far the people of Scotland are in favour of maintaining the connection between Church and State in that country, I do not know of any adequate answer to the objection taken by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate and by other Gentlemen, that a Select Committee is no competent or suitable instrument for conducting an inquiry of the kind. If it is to be instituted at all, it ought to be conducted before another tribunal, and the proposal to break the connection ought to be made on higher and more solid responsibility than the recommendation of a Select Committee of this House. Well, Sir, when my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) proposed to proceed by a Commission, instead of a Committee, it does not appear to me to mend the matter at all. A Committee is a body appointed by this House and responsible to it, and the Government would be placed in a position of considerable difficulty were they called upon to appoint a Commission. They could not be blamed if they chose the Members of that Commission, or a majority of them, from amongst those who shared their own views. I think, also, in a case like this, where there is a great difference of opinion actually existing in Scotland, it would be extremely difficult to secure the confidence of what I may call both parties in the Report of any Commission the Crown might appoint. It would be far better if there were to be a public inquiry into so much of the subject as might be legitimate—that the inquiry should have a popular source, and originate in this House—rather than that it should spring from the Prerogative of the Crown. As regards the main question of Church and State, I do not see that it is a proper subject for inquiry at all—or, more properly speaking, a subject upon which we need have any preliminary inquiry. The people of Scotland are the persons who are mainly to be considered in the discussions upon this matter. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple) has made an appeal to English feeling, on the ground that a conflagration in Scotland might produce a very disagreeable increase of temperature in England. Those, I may say, are the old arts—perfectly legitimate, but still the old arts—by which it was formerly attempted to maintain the Established Church in Ireland. What I certainly must say is this, that the case of these Church Establishments must be considered distinct from one another, and that each must be dealt with upon its own merits, with a careful regard to the principles that it presents, and to the feeling in each case of the people of the three countries. In this particular instance, the feeling of the people of Scotland must have a very large, and probably dominant, influence in the determination of the question; and the House would be placed in a totally false position if it were to say—supposing it to be true—that the deliberate national sentiment of Scotland is opposed to the maintenance of an Establishment; that notwithstanding that fact—“We will invoke the force of English opinion, and the sentiment in favour of keeping up an Establishment in England, to rule the case of Scotland.” As respects the inquiry, though with the most sincere desire to ascertain the feeling of the people of Scotland upon the working of the Act and other ecclesiastical questions, in the country, yet I confess my belief that the organs with which the Constitution provides them are sufficient to enable them to convey in an intelligible form to the House what their desires are. They have the power of meeting, the power of petitioning, and the power of the franchise; and, when I look at the course of the elections in Scotland from time to time, I doubt whether hon. Gentlemen opposite might not have acted more wisely, and fulfilled their character as interpreters of the opinions of the Scottish people better, if they had spoken with a little more reservation this evening. Therefore, although I, for one, would not object to institute the precedent laid down for us, and inquire into the working of the Patronage Act, if it were shown to be the earnest desire of the Scottish public in general that such an inquiry should take place, yet I find an entire absence of any evidence of such desire. The two great Presbyterian Nonconformist Churches are against this inquiry, and the Presbyterian Established Church of Scotland has not expressed any desire that such an inquiry should take place; and I should rather presume from the course taken by the Government, who must be taken to be in sympathy with the Church as an Establishment, that they are opposed to it. Therefore, I think, that after the three or four hours we have spent in the discussion of this question, we have attained to this point—that those who have proposed this inquiry in different forms to the House must have arrived at the conclusion, in their own minds, that there is no desire either in the House or in the community out-of-doors, which would warrant them in pressing their proposals. But the debate has taken a wider range. At the time that the Scottish Patronage Act was introduced in 1874, the House was warned that it would go directly to break the ground upon a subject which had previously remained tranquilly in the back-ground, and would raise the whole question of Church Establishment in Scotland. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate has just stated, and I pay great deference to his opinion and do not question its accuracy, that the working of the Patronage Act within the precincts of the Established Church of Scotland, has, in his judgment, been satisfactory, and has diminished the range and intensity of those divisions in parishes which are connected with the choice and election of ministers. That may be so, and the union of a Church within itself is a matter which we all greatly rejoice to see, and every well-wisher to religion must contemplate it with satisfaction. But the union of a Church within itself does not go very far to determine the question whether or not that Church should be established as the national religion of the country, and should enjoy the ecclesiastical property of the country, in which the mass of the people are supposed to have a common interest. The Irish Established Church was one remarkably united within itself, one colour of theological opinion spread almost entirely over the whole Institution, and the cries of party were almost unknown within its pale. But the allegation of the union of that Church within its borders would not have availed as a plea for its maintenance; indeed, I do not think that the experiment of urging such an argument was ever tried by a solitary Member of the House during the discussions on the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, however interesting and material for its own purposes such a statement may be. It borders but little upon the wider question which has been contemplated but timidly and indecisively by nearly all the speakers in this debate. My right hon. Friend, indeed, has spoken out with great decision his opinion upon the question of the Establishment in Scotland. But I observe that the opinions of hon. Gentlemen on the other side, who differ from him, were far from being spoken out with force and breadth, and have only been indicated as matters that may hereafter be developed; and it is very difficult to collect, either from the speech of the right hon. and learned Lord, or from that of the hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple), or even from that of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), what are the precise grounds on which they are prepared to contend that it is necessary to maintain a Church Establishment in Scotland. I do not think that the subject has been sufficiently developed in the course of this debate for one to give any opinion with regard to it; but I observe, undoubtedly, an absence of disposition on the part of the supporters of the Establishment to bring forward positive arguments in favour of it. I have heard it said, and said with great truth, that the Established Church in Scotland is highly respectable. There is no question about it, it is highly and universally respected; and so I think I may say was the Established Church in Ireland—that is to say, it had all the titles to respect that it could possibly derive from the high character, conduct, zeal, and energy of its ministers. But that, after all, goes a very little way towards showing that, on that ground, it ought to be the Establishment of the country. The promoters of the Act of 1874 have, it is evident, opened this question effectually. Before 1874 what did we know? We knew that the Church Establishment of Scotland was the religion of a minority of the people—that we knew perfectly well; but we knew, also, that a great majority of the people acquiesced, and contentedly acquiesced, in the maintenance of the Establishment. We know even now, as has been stated in the course of the debate, that this is not a burning question; no arguments of great vehemence have been employed either upon one side or upon the other; we have not been told on either side of the House, as we were told when the question of the Irish Church Establishment was raised, that the consequence of destroying the Irish Established Church, as an Establishment, would be more grave and formidable than those of a foreign conquest in the country. No such dismal prospect has been held out on this occasion. This is a matter which lies within a narrow compass; and I am convinced that whatever happens in Scotland, the people of Scotland are a religious people, and are certain to make an adequate provision for their own religious wants—a provision certainly not less adequate than what now prevails. Before 1874 there was an acquiescence which, if not universal, was, at all events, that of the majority, in the existence of the Established Church; and those who protested against it constituted not only a minority, but a small minority, though perhaps not an unimportant one, of the country. In my opinion, it would have been wisdom in the Church of Scotland to have been contented with the state of things that existed. But others of more enlarged views pressed the passing of the Patronage Act, and the consequence of that Act has been that men now look at this as a national question. The other Presbyterian Churches, which jointly must out-number the Church of Scotland, and which may be said to constitute if not a majority, at least one moiety, of the people of Scotland, have accepted the Patronage Act as a distinct challenge on the subject of Establishment, and have answered that challenge by saying that it is their deliberate conviction that the Establishment that now exists in Scotland ought not to continue in possession of the national property. I understand the Free Church at present to say that they do not think the existence of an Establishment ought to be maintained, and that they believe that the maintenance of an Establishment is no longer necessary to the welfare of religion, whatever use it might have been in former times. Until 1874 the question slept dreamily; but now, the two Independent Presbyterian Churches are united in their demand for a cessation of the preference shown to the third Church. I admit that, in the abstract, it is very difficult to prove that a Church should be national which does not command the adhesion of the majority of the people. As a general rule, I hardly know how a Church can be national which is the Church of the minority. The Established Church of Scotland has every title which it could possibly derive from its respectability; from the energy, cultivation, zeal, and piety of its clergy; and it also derives much advantage from many recollections of former times; but still, nothing has been said to show upon what principle it is that an Establishment is to be maintained which is the Establishment of a minority only of the people. I can conceive a case where the minority consists almost entirely of the poorest classes. I will suppose that the Free Church and United Presbyterian Church of Scotland had a monopoly of the wealthy and middle classes, and that the Established Church had the poorest classes left to its special and almost exclusive care. Such a case I can conceive, and I can believe, also, that it would have a most important bearing upon the question of Establishment in Scotland. I apprehend that the contrary holds in the present instance, and that if you take the average of the wealthy members of the Established Church and of two great non-Established Presbyterian Churches in Scotland, you will find that the average temperance standard of the members of the Established Church is higher and not lower than that of the others. It was at one time contended—and I thought at the time with great force—that the maintenance of a Protestant Church in Ireland was necessary in order that it might continually uphold the testimony against the errors of the Church of Rome. But will any man rise in his place and say that the maintenance of the Established Church of Scotland is essential as a protest against the errors of the Free Church and United Presbyterian Church? Therefore, Sir, I do not see what arguments there are in favour of the Established Church, and I will reserve to myself any arguments that I may have to raise on the general question, until I hear on what grounds the Establishment is supported. It is the people of Scotland and their convictions which will have ultimately to settle this question; or, if Her Majesty's Government think that the will of England ought to settle the question for Scotland, then, by all means, let it state that proposition, and then we shall know what we are about. As I have already said, it is my strong conviction that it would have been wise of the Church of Scotland not to have forced this question to the front. As they have judged right to do so, it is fair to call upon them to produce their arguments, and not to say only that they are a respectable body, which no one contests—that their clergy are excellent, which I admit—or even that the Patronage Act has diminished the feuds in parishes, which is quite possible—they must also show that the exclusive enjoyment of the national property which has been set apart for ecclesiastical purposes in Scotland by our religious communion ought to be maintained. My intention is to hold myself free on this subject; but, first of all, I should like to be assured of the concurrence of right hon. Gentlemen opposite in what I have said. I should like to know whether they agree with me, that this is a matter which ought to be determined by the sentiment of Scotland and not of England? If they agree in that proposition, we shall have made some progress towards placing this question upon a sound and solid basis. If they do not agree with me on that point, the sooner the fact is made known for the information both of Scotland and England the better. In some sense there might be some self-gratulation upon the part of myself and my right hon. Friends, who saw the danger of the change in 1874 and warned the promoters of the Act of it. The change that has taken place in Scotland in the position of this question is one which any intelligent man who comes from Scotland will not for one moment deny. The position of this question now is totally different from what it was 10 or even five years ago. A controversy has been raised by those whose interest, and, perhaps, whose duty, it would seem to have been to have avoided raising such a controversy. Let them now set out clearly and intelligibly what they think to be the merits of the case, and I have no doubt that it will receive an impartial hearing. But it will not be got rid of by mere superficial or collateral criticism, such as that of the hon. Member for Bute upon the speech of my noble Friend the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington). I was glad to hear that speech, because the propositions of my noble Friend were excellent, and I was glad that they had received additional currency from being repeated from the mouth of the hon. Gentleman. The Established Church of Scotland must stand or fall according to the general convictions of the people of Scotland; but, whether it stands or falls, the House is pretty much united in the opinion that there can be no advantage at present in instituting either a Parliamentary or other inquiry.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS congratulated the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs on having found in the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich an apt pupil as regarded the speech he had delivered in the autumn. But he ventured in all humility to say to the right hon. Gentleman that no one who had held his high position, or who held the high position which he still occupied, had a right upon a matter touching the deepest interests of any part of the United Kingdom to make such a speech as he had done to-night—a speech exactly similar to that of the noble Lord on another occasion—and yet to say that he had not formed an opinion on the subject. The tenour of that speech was this—"If you will cry out loud enough, I will come and help you. I am not going to suggest that you should steal that article from the shop window; but, when you have taken it, you may come and ask my opinion of what you have done." Such attempts as the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord to get up a cry in Scotland were unjustifiable, wrong, and inconsistent with their high position in the House and the country; because they were Leaders of public opinion in a Party they all valued, however much they might differ from its opinions. It was not the part of those who had to lead to induce their followers to make a cry in order that their Leaders might take it up. The right hon. Gentleman said he had heard no defence of the Church of Scotland. Of course, there had been no such defence, because the Church of Scotland had not been attacked, except by the right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), on matters which had nothing to do with the Motions on the Paper. When it was attacked they would be quite ready to defend it. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman reminded him of the days of 1868, when they were dealing with the Church of Ireland, and it brought out two differences—in 1868, the right hon. Gentleman always endeavoured to distinguish between the Church of Scotland and the Church of Ireland, and now he wanted to make them look as like each other as possible; and, moreover, at that time, the right hon. Gentleman had a large majority behind him, which, at present, he (Mr. Assheton Cross) was thankful to say he did not possess. He would not now argue the question, when the only question was whether they should have a Committee or Commission of Inquiry into the Church of Scotland? But he would make this further remark. The right hon. Gentleman said, he wanted to know what was the opinion of the majority of the people of Scotland at that moment upon that particular question; but when he asked on what principle the question was to be argued, he appeared to have forgotten a principle at one time declared by him—namely, that every State ought to have an Established Church; and in the arguments relating to the Irish Church, he did not touch this principle, where the Church was in the different position it occupied in England and Scotland, and thus it was only owing to the peculiar circumstances of Ireland that he ventured to attack the Established Church of Ireland.

Mr. Assheton Cross

That evening he threw to the winds the idea that there was anything to be argued when the question of Disestablishment in Scotland came to be discussed. He did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman; he hoped the House did not. He knew the present House did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman, and he hoped it would be long before any other House did. He would now come to the actual question they were discussing, for he declined to be led into a long discussion on a matter which had nothing to do with the Motions before the House. Now, by the first of these Motions, inquiry was asked for in 1878 into the working of an Act which was passed only so recently as 1874, and also as to its effect on the reciprocal relations of the various religious denominations in Scotland. It was perfectly clear, however, that the result of the operation of the elective principle as established by the Act could not be fairly tested in four years, or even in 10. It must take almost a generation before the full working of that Act could be ascertained; and all inquiry into the matter, therefore, at the present moment, would be absolutely premature. Of course, there were only a certain number of ministers in Scotland; they did not all die every year or every other year; and, comparatively speaking, very few ministers had died in Scotland since the Act came into operation. The right hon. Gentleman had said a great deal about that Act; but it was scarcely necessary for him to inform the House that he entirely differed from almost every word which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman on the subject. He did not believe that Act was a step in the direction of Disestablishment. He never, he might add, could understand the argument that the removal of a grievance which was the result of its passing into law constituted a hardship on the Free Church. He had heard that argument over and over again, but he never could understand it. He should think, on the contrary, that the proper course to pursue in a case of the kind would be to remove abuses if any were shown to exist. A right hon. Gentleman opposite said—"I assure you, whatever you do in this country the Free Church will never go back to the Established Church." Now, he did not believe that would ever be the feeling in Scotland.

Mr. BAXTER said, he had quoted the declaration of that body itself.

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, that might be the declaration of certain persons for a particular purpose, but still he did not believe that it was the expression of the real feelings of the people of Scotland; and, as had been stated that night—and it could not be denied—it undoubtedly was not the feeling of the inhabitants of the Highland parishes, who, as his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate told them, would be the last people to allow a farthing of the Church's present endowments to be devoted to any secular purpose whatever. Certainly these were questions that might have to be inquired into. The Government were as anxious as anybody to remove proved abuses; and if, on due consideration, they found that there was any abuse which they could possibly remove, they would take the best means in their power for that object. The next part of the Motion was that there should be an inquiry instituted by a Committee of this House to ascertain how far the people of Scotland were in favour of maintaining the connection between the Church and the State in that country. He could not imagine that any people would apply for a Royal Commission to inquire into such a matter. That was a matter which the Government must find out for themselves. He hoped as to that it would be a long time before the right hon. Gentleman came to a definite conclusion; he hoped, if he arrived at such a definite conclusion, it would be longer before he propounded it to the public; and he hoped that if he did propound it, it would be longer still before he found himself in a position to carry out his conclusion. He had the same objection to a Commission as he had to a Committee. Practically, the Commission as proposed would inquire not with regard to the Established Church itself, but with regard to the obstacles to union in the Voluntary Bodies who had separated from that Church. Such an inquiry would not be assented to by the Voluntary Bodies, and it would not be right. The Government had gone one important step towards the removal of abuses by the abolition of patronage, and the members of the Established Church of Scotland felt that a great grievance had thereby been done away, and they were much more satisfied with their present condition. That, he thought, would become the feeling of other religious bodies in that country; and the very reason why the right hon. Gentleman charged the Government with being unjust to the Scottish Dissenting Denominations was, because, by removing a grievance, it would draw these Denominations back to the Church which they had left in former years. He could not help stating the strong feeling he entertained regarding the observations of the right hon. Member for Greenwich. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would remember the great responsibility which would fall upon him in dealing with matters of that kind, when every word must have weight; but he ought not to state his views in that way, and then state that he had formed no opinion on the subject. Then, the same might be said of the noble Lord's speech, for no one holding the position he did had a right to say that the people of Scotland ought to form their own opinion while he formed none. That would be right enough in private dealings, but not for a man in the position of the noble Lord, because it was meant to have an effect without committing him to an opinion—and the intended effect was, to raise a cry at every Election for the purpose of promoting the question of Disestablishment, and to sow discord where there ought to be peace, and to introduce political contests when everything ought to be done to produce union between the three Churches, instead of dissension.

Mr. DILLWYN thought it was inexpedient to proceed with the discussion, as many other hon. Members wished to address the House. He moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON thought it was the opinion of the House that the debate should be adjourned. It was quite impossible that the whole subject raised could be adequately discussed at that hour of the morning—a quarter past 1—seeing that they had heard scarcely more than the speeches of the Members who moved the Resolution and the Amendment, and had not been able to hear the speeches of Members who had other Amendments on the Paper. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had spoken with considerable severity of the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, which was, he said, of the same character as that which had been made at Edinburgh, and was unjustifiable. He had also said that it was an attempt to raise a cry. The right hon. Gentleman could not deny that the question existed long before last autumn. The supporters of the Established Church themselves admitted that dissatisfaction with the Establishment existed in Scotland; and what he said at Edinburgh, and what he repeated now, was that some remedy for that evil must be found. He was prepared to discuss any remedy that might be suggested, and was not committed to the opinion that Disestablishment was the only way out of the difficulty in which the people of Scotland found themselves as far as this matter was concerned. But he believed the feeling in Scotland in favour of Disestablishment was real; and, if the majority of the people decided in that way, he, for one, should support them in the course they pursued. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that the question did not exist long before he (the Marquess of Hartington) went to Edinburgh, or that it would not have existed had he not gone there? There was undoubtedly a difficulty in the condition of the Established Church of Scotland, as was shown by the numerous Motions made on the point, to a great extent by members of the Established Church. The hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) knew that the difficulty existed, and he was endeavouring to find a solution for it. He adhered to every word he had said at Edinburgh, for he felt that in Scotland there existed a state of things which could not last, and for which some remedy must be found. They had heard a great deal about the opinion expressed in Edinburgh last year by the noble Lord the present Secretary of State for India (Viscount Cranbrook) that if the question of Disestablishment were made a burning question in Scotland, it would be a scorching question in England, and this seemed to be the only argument which could be used in certain quarters in reference to the subject. As he had already said, he did not assert that Disestablishment was the only remedy that could be adopted; but, if it were, he thought the question was one that ought to be decided from a Scotch point of view, and not on considerations which might remotely affect any other part of the United Kingdom.

MR. NEWDEGATE pointed out that the terms of the Union between England and Scotland were based upon the security the people had for the maintenance of tolerance in religion, and that the Sovereign of these Realms must be a Protestant, and in communion with the Churches both of England and of Scotland. That was the condition of the Union which lay at the foundation of the law on which Her Majesty and her heirs were entitled to the Throne. The right hon. Gentleman pursued a very dangerous course when, in respect of what had passed in Ireland, he endeavoured to merge a great constitutional question, which affected the whole of the United Kingdom, into one consideration affecting a small portion of the Kingdom, where there was some discontent. The right hon. Gentleman would give predominance to discontent, which might be temporary, against the securities for their liberties and their peace. He would ask him what had been the result of his experiment? Had they no murders in Ireland? Had they not in that House Representatives of Irish disorder? Had they not proposals for the further infraction of the Union? These were the peaceful fruits of the doctrine which the right hon. Gentleman had been at so much trouble again to enunciate for application to Scotland—Scotland, to which he looked with affection as the best security, in union with England, for the cause of freedom and of order.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, if this debate were adjourned he did not think it was very likely that it would come on again; and he, for one, was not anxious that it should. He had a Motion for the Previous Question that he had no opportunity of bringing on; but he would like to say one word to explain the course he had taken. He had arrived at the same conclusion as some hon. Gentlemen opposite, but he had done so by a totally different path. In putting on the Paper a Motion for the Previous Question, he did not wish to shirk the debate; ~~on the contrary, he~~ came early to assist in making a House, though, for his part, if the House had been counted out he did not know that the occurrence would have been much to be regretted; but he would say that there would have been one cause for regret. They would have lost the speech of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, which would be regarded in Scotland as an important landmark in this discussion. His great objection to the Motion was that in the present state of feeling in Scotland with respect to the Church, such an inquiry as was proposed would lead to excitement, and put the population of Scotland by the ears in a way that was not likely to lead to any peaceful result whatever. As to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir Alexander Gordon), his (Sir George Campbell's) own opinion was altogether adverse to the principle of an Established Church. Believing, as he did, that the Church of Scotland was the least intolerant of all State Churches, he was willing to leave it alone as long as it had in itself sufficient vitality to live in the will of the people of Scotland. But, on the other hand, he was wholly opposed to any attempt to prop it up by pressure from without. Therefore it was that he was opposed to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member opposite to prop it up, altogether it must die, and he wanted it to die peaceably.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I never used any expression having the slightest tendency that way.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Then the hon. and gallant Gentleman and myself are entirely in accord. He does not wish to prop up the Church.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: I did not say I did not wish to prop up the Church.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is very difficult to please. He objected to my saying that he wished to prop up the Church, and then he equally objects to my saying he did not wish to prop up the Church.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he wished to congratulate the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) on the fact that there were not more Irish Members present, as a speech like that which the hon. Member had made would be sufficient to set them all against the Established Church in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

MR. LAING said, he did not wish to detain the House at that late hour of the night — 20 minutes to 2 — but he wished to disabuse the House of the impression made by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate as to the feeling in some of the Northern counties of Scotland, where the adherents of the Established Church were in a minority. It was stated that the great majority who did not belong to the Establishment were Establishment men in principle, and that they would resent any proposal to appropriate the present revenues of the Established Church for the purposes of education. Now, as regarded the principal portion of the county he represented—namely, Orkney—he could say, most distinctly and emphatically, that that statement was not correct; but that the distinct opposite was the case. In the county to which he referred, the great majority did not belong to the Established Church; and if there were a county which might be abandoned as an untenable outwork of the Established Church, probably that county of Orkney was the one. Yet the feeling of the people was now that things ought to remain as they were until the question was ripe for settlement. Although they did not belong to the Church, the whole county of Orkney might be searched, and they would scarcely find one member of the Free or Limited Presbyterian Churches, who was not in favour of Disestablishment. This result had been arrived at, not in accordance with any theoretical idea. It had been the result of a great many years' experience in a part of the country where the people had seen the great advantage of the working of the Voluntary system. He believed the working of the Voluntary system in these counties had been a great agent in civilization. This was the result of that experience in the great body of the Free Church in Scotland, which was gradually converting the people to that principle. They would find some old men belonging to the Free Church still in favour of the principle of Establishments; but as new men were brought into the pale of the Church, they would find them advocating the Voluntary principle simply and solely as the result of experience, and the intelligence of the Scottish people would lead them to wish that system to be extended to Scotland generally. Therefore, he said, most distinctly and emphatically, that in one, at least, of the Northern counties of Scotland the great majority, as he believed, were entirely in favour of the Voluntary principle and Disestablishment.

WOMEN'S DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL—[BILL 12.]

(Mr. Courtney, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Jacob Bright.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COURTNEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Sir, When I first undertook the conduct of this Bill in the House, I felt that I accepted a very considerable responsibility—a responsibility which, I must confess, did not appear likely soon to pass away. Time, far from decreasing that sense of responsibility, has tended to increase it; and though I rise in the very well-assured belief that this Bill will most certainly become law sooner or later, that the change we propose to introduce will be accepted by Parliament in, I hope I may say, not merely the lifetime, but in the Parliamentary lifetime, of many of the older Members of this House, still I must admit that the circumstances of the present day are not favourable to anything which savours of novelty. And, Sir, I feel that my responsibility with respect to this measure is also heightened by the fact that I am conscious of having lost the support of some Members whose names and characters carried the most deserved weight both in this House and in the country. On the back of this Bill is the name of Mr. Russell Gurney, who has so recently passed from among us; and I should not be doing justice to my own feelings, nor, I think, to the subject itself, if I were to let this occasion pass without paying a tribute of respect, however feeble, to the memory of that distinguished man. This is not the time to rehearse his virtues; that task is reserved for those who knew him more intimately. But it would be ungrateful on the part of anyone who had charge of a Bill for removing the electoral disabilities of women, if in introducing that Bill to the House, and in asking the House to assent to the second reading, he let the name of Mr. Russell Gurney pass by without paying a tribute to his memory. Mr. Russell Gurney was a Judge; and we all feel, and we have a right to feel, that it is a perilous experiment to introduce into this House a judicial element. We have excluded one by one from our deliberations those who sit on the higher benches of justice; we have been afraid lest, if they mingled among us, they might carry to the judgment seat something of the partizanship which is inevitable in this Assembly. But, in doing so, I think we must all be conscious that it is not altogether a gain to exclude such persons from our debates; for if we save the judicial seat from imputation of Party feeling, we have also lost to this House some who would bring to our discussions the habit and the temper of the Bench. And I think it may be said of Mr. Russell Gurney, that when he was here he never forgot that he was often called to sit in the judgment seat, and that even among us he was a Judge rather than a Member of Parliament. And especially in respect to all questions affecting the position and the rights of women, he had that great attribute of a Judge, to recognize their claims even before they were pressed on his attention by any importunity. The unjust Judge of Scripture listened to the complaints of a woman only because he was wearied out by her pertinacity; the righteous Judge is foremost to admit any proper claim from whomsoever it may come, and Mr. Russell Gurney surely fulfilled that duty. We have also lost another Member of this House, a man of distinctive character from Mr. Russell Gurney; but exercising an influence which was certainly as great, and deeply deserved. Mr. Henley always voted, and not unfrequently spoke, in favour of this Bill. When I have reminded some persons out of this House of that fact, they have not unfrequently been struck with astonishment. "What! Mr. Henley voted for the Bill! How is that possible?" I think that astonishment indicates a somewhat feeble appreciation of Mr. Henley's character. Mr. Henley was endowed with that rarest of qualities, the courage of thinking for himself. If any man has that quality, although his thoughts may not go far, he at once becomes a person of distinct individuality. Mr. Henley thought for himself, and, so thinking, he had the courage of his convictions. He addressed himself to this question without prejudice, and without any apprehension beforehand as to the consequences of his own thought. He saw that the claims of women could not be denied, except upon grounds which would also compel the claims of men to be rejected. Mr. Henley, happily, has not left his neighbours and friends as he has this House; but, as he has left us, I may be allowed to express the hope that on the opposite Benches, and on these also, we may never want instances of a like individuality and sagacity, even though we may never see a more absolutely honest Member, one possessing greater independence of character, a more thorough simplicity of thought and directness of purpose, and a higher courage, than Mr. Henley. Now, in approaching this Bill, as, indeed, in approaching any question which is to be submitted to this House, the first feeling which I think any advocate must have is that of the necessity of arriving at some common ground—some base from which he and his opponents may depart on their separate ways. And I hope I shall not begin with a principle too elementary, if I assume that every Member of this House is of opinion that representative government is the best of all forms of government; and that it should be the aim of this House, in the interests of the country, the destinies of which are so largely committed to its charge, to make itself as representative as possible. I think that representative government will be admitted to be the best of all forms of government for various reasons. In the first place, you secure in your Assembly, to which is confided the legislation and the supervision of the administration of the government of the country, a large body of information respecting the subjects to which it has to address itself. Your House, Convention, or Assembly, or whatever it may be called, is informed on almost every matter that can come under its deliberation. You also secure due attention to the claims, rights, and interests of every section of the body for which you legislate, or whose interests you administer, since in a representative Assembly there are representatives of all interests—or there should be; and so you secure a hearing for the different classes whose interests you are dealing with. And, lastly, there is this great advantage in representative government—that you thereby interest every class of the community in the affairs of the community, that you develop among your citizens the sense of citizenship, that you educe from among the people a common feeling as of those possessing a common history, with common objects, and a common destiny. You may have different ways of arriving at the formation of the representative Assembly which you aspire to create; but, in some way or other, you follow these principles in endeavouring to bring into your representative Assembly representatives of different sections of feeling and of interest in the community itself. Of course, there will be differences of opinion—there are differences of opinion now—as to the adequacy or completeness of the machinery you have adopted. Some persons will say it errs in the excess, or undue proportion, of representation given to one class, or in a deficient representation in respect to another class; others will think it cannot be materially mended; but the object, the principle we all have, is to secure in some measure or other to each section, to each class, a certain representation—and for the purposes which I have stated—namely, to secure information to the House, to secure that justice which is attained when the House has before it the representation of all divisions, and to secure the welding together of the members of the community into a sense of common union. Well, Sir, if we realize these principles, and turn to the question before us, I think we must at once see that the question of sex, at all events, does not primarily arise in the topic now under consideration. All the principles I have laid down apply without distinction of person to men and to women. There may be reasons, to which I will refer presently, why women should be excluded from any share in the election of the members of a representative Assembly; but, at all events, this much, I think, must be admitted—that the burden lies on those who insist on their exclusion to justify their exclusion, and that, prima facie, distinction of sex does not appear as an element in the problem under consideration. I do not shrink from the necessity of positive proof of the claim I am advocating; but I must point out to the opponents of this Bill that logically and constitutionally the burden rests upon them to justify the exclusion which actually obtains. Now, Sir, I remember that some years ago, when a question of the extension of the suffrage was brought on a Wednesday afternoon before this House, a right hon. Gentleman, who then filled the Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, came down to the House and laid down this principle—that he thought all members of the community should be admitted to a share in the representation in this House against whom there could not be established personal unfitness or political danger in consequence of their inclusion. Prove they are personally unfit, and you then establish a good reason for not admitting them to the franchise. Prove that political danger would follow their admission, and you again establish a reason for excluding them; but, unless you prove one or the other, their case is established when they come claiming to be admitted, because you certainly gain something by their admission, and you must prove a loss in order to deny their claim to be admitted. That was thought at the time, Sir, to be rather a revolutionary sentiment; but, in truth, it is a commonplace of the Constitution, and the exceptions cover every case that may be rightly alleged against the exclusion of any class or any set of persons in the community. And, with regard to the problem in hand, the question arises, can you demonstrate with respect to women that they are personally unfit to exercise the franchise, or can you demonstrate that political danger would follow their inclusion? And, let it be remembered, Sir, what the problem is as expressed in this Bill. We are not dealing with a universal enfranchisement of women or a universal enfranchisement of men. We take the lines which have been adopted by Parliament as those which are best fitted to secure within this House a representation of the people in the country; and what you have got to do in going through any constituency, as it is at present formed, is to demonstrate in respect of the women in comparison with the men that there is personal unfitness, or that there would be political danger from their inclusion. Of course, with respect to this matter of personal unfitness, I might cite women who are most distinguished in arts, in literature, and in the science, and even in the practice, of government; but I confess that I think that is not a fair and a right method of argument. I might cite in the same way men who are distinguished in the science and practice of government. The real problem before us is that of comparing the average man with the average woman, and discovering whether, in a comparison between those, you can find any radical unfitness in the members of one sex to disqualify them from exercising the franchise under the conditions under which the franchise is now exercised by the other sex. Let any hon. Member in his imagination go down any street of the borough he represents and go from house to house. He finds in one house a maiden lady or a widow living alone, paying her rates and taxes, and fulfilling all her duties as a member of society; and in the next house a man, a father of a family. Taking them one by one, side by side, can you attribute to one as against the other any personal unfitness? It may be said that women are ignorant. It may be said that they are prejudiced; that they are led away by their sentiment; that they are uninformed; and that they are controlled by priests, or by some other persons exercising considerable influence over their feelings and opinions. Cannot every one of these things be said of men also? Who are the opponents of women who come and say they are ignorant? Who are the opponents of women who come and say they are prejudiced? You meet prejudice by prejudice, and then you proclaim your intellectual superiority by declaring that the other sex are affected with this disability of intellect. In respect of this, as it appears to me, ludicrous criticism, knowing how indissolubly connected men and women are, how little we can escape from the range of their intellect, how very feeble we are to cut ourselves adrift from the influence of their thoughts and feelings, I have often thought of a couplet of Mr. Pope, who was very severe upon women and said many harsh things of them; and whose relations, indeed, with the sex were not always happy. But he said one thing which I have always thought to be a conclusive reply to all these objections. Hon. Members will remember one of the Royal Princesses who had a dog, upon the collar of which was engraved the couplet Mr. Pope wrote—

“ I am Her Highness' dog at Kew, Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you ? ”

When men charge women with prejudice and ignorance, and with being controlled by priests, I am tempted to turn upon them and reply—“ Pray tell me, Sir, whose dog are you ? ” If women follow priests, what priest do you follow? Is it the editor of the daily paper? I am afraid we have in this House some experience of dependence on priests of that kind, who differ only from the more recognized order of the priesthood in this respect—that their principles are not quite so fixed, and that what they are ready to proclaim to-day they are equally ready to denounce to-morrow. Now, as to political danger, there is a notion that if you admitted women to the franchise this same objection to priests would arise. A notion is also sometimes advanced that you would find women voting together, and a most alarming picture is presented to our imagination of the women all going one way, and the men all going the other. I do not think that shows any great knowledge of women. As far as I have had any acquaintance with them, I have found them differ amongst themselves very much as men differ amongst themselves, and if some have one favourite priest others have another; some are re-actionary, while others are very much in favour of moving in advance; and if you have any regard to facts, you cannot allegethis rushing together of women in one direction and the men in another. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Hanbury), who has given Notice to move the rejection of this Bill, did, I believe, once vote for it, and I understand that he has explained the reason of his change to be this—that he thought there might be a political danger in the severance of political rights from the possession of the physical power; that, under certain contingencies, you would get women voting in a mass, and, perhaps, out-voting the men, which would cause a rebellion on the part of men, who, being endowed with greater physical power than women, would put down by brute force the people who would out-vote them. I think I do not misrepresent the hon. Member in saying that these were the reasons of his conversion. Now, as I have said, that is a picture of possible danger which is purely imaginary. There is no reason whatever to apprehend it. But more than that. I will venture to say that it is an imaginary picture, only to be entertained when one is in the first stage of reflection on the constitution of political society. It is perfectly true that in the very elementary stages of society physical force directs the order and relation of things in that society. In the very earliest stages women suffered from that fact in those very rudimentary forms of society—which may still be found in some remote corners of the world—where women-children, for instance, are habitually put to death, with certain rare exceptions, and where women-wives were taken by a process of capture and theft just as cattle are in partially advanced communities. But even amongst communities so unadvanced as those, you find the beginnings of law and the inception of reason and justice, without which, in fact, society could not exist; and as society goes on developing in its political organization, the notion of law, and of reason, and of justice gradually supplants, one by one, all these notions of force, until in the end the exercise of force is habitually directed as the resultant of reason and justice requires. And to apprehend any return to the elementary form of society from the advanced form of society is to invite a return to anarchy from civilization. The Constitution, and the rules of the Constitution, are conditions of thought which are the commonplaces of every civilized community, just as in this House the Rules and Orders of the House are things which are so much the standing objects of our thoughts, that we are almost incapable at times of conceiving of their alteration. And, in the same way, if you got society so far advanced as to have admitted women to the suffrage on the ground of justice, you might dismiss as an altogether imaginary fear the notion that there would arise again an insurrection of force formally setting aside the concession made by law. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire is very sensitive about appeals and suggestions that might interfere with the regularity and good government of any Empire. He has recently taken occasion to express his dissatisfaction with the language of a right hon. Gentleman, because that right hon. Gentleman chose to denounce with great energy and vehemence what he thought was the beginning of injustice; and the hon. Member for North Staffordshire appears to be of opinion that it is injudicious to denounce injustice, because you may lead those who suffer from injustice to be dissatisfied with their situation. Now, Sir, if that is injudicious, how much greater is the injudiciousness of those who would suggest to the members of a civilized community a return to brute force in order to overcome the conclusions which you have arrived at by considerations of reason and of justice? Before quitting this part of the subject, let me observe that, although I have been arguing the question very much on a priori considerations, it is not, after all, necessary to do so. We have got experience of the operation of woman suffrage. We have admitted women to the vote in the municipalities. We have admitted women to the vote in the election of school boards; and, more than that, we have admitted women to the eligibility of being chosen as members of the school boards. Well, now, have we discovered any personal unfitness or seen any trace of political danger from those experiments? I have made inquiries wherever I have gone as to the result of the experiments as to the admission of women to take a part in these municipal and educational matters; and, with one exception, to which I shall presently refer, the replies I have met with have all been favourable to the experiment. I am told that women take great interest in municipal matters; that they readily come to the poll in about as great proportion as men; that they are very careful in the choice of persons to represent them; that they are known for a strict regard to character; and that one thing they desire to secure is the presence of a respectable and responsible person on the board which is to administer the affairs of the town or the affairs of the school district. I have met with only one exception. One gentleman whom I asked told me that the experiment had not succeeded. I was alarmed. I asked him why—in what particular had it failed? He told me it had not succeeded; that it was not the function of women. Well, I endeavoured to draw him back, to tell me experimentally what had been the proved defects, what were the faults which he had discovered, what were the errors which had been committed. I could get nothing out of him, except this dictum—that it was not the function of women to take any part in public matters, and therefore the experiment has not succeeded. With that single exception, which was no exception at all, the answers I have met with from all parts have been favourable to the admission of women to political privileges. I am not indeed conscious of any political arguments that have been advanced against this question which are insisted upon gravely. But I am aware that that does not exhaust the matter. There are other reasons which are insisted upon against the admission of women to the franchise; reasons which have considerable influence with many persons, and to which, of course, I must address myself. It is said—"After all, the experiment is on a small scale. I do not suppose there will be any danger to Government or the Constitution. Things will go on much as they are at present. Perhaps a little more attention will be paid to the claims of women. Cases in which their interests are concerned will be more sharply inquired into, and so it will be an advantage to admit them to the franchise; but if you do admit them to the franchise you must consider also the effects upon the character and the position of women, and those effects are so alarming and so much to be deprecated, that it is impossible to concede the claim which is insisted upon." I must grapple with that argument, and I do so without any sort of hesitation, because, so far from the effects on the character and position of women by their admission to the franchise being alarming or such as to be deprecated, I believe, on the contrary, they will be such as are much to be desired; and that it will be productive altogether of beneficial effects both on women's character and to society. In the first place, it is undoubtedly true that if we admitted women to the franchise, we should secure to them a degree of independence which many people are now slow to concede to them. We should recognize them as being self-dependent, self-sustaining, and independent members of the community, not bound to rely upon other people, and not necessarily having their existence connected in a dependent way with that of some other member of society. What would be the first effect of that on what I may call the economic position of the question? Is it not perfectly clear that the more you develop in women the idea of self-dependence and self-sustainment, the more certain is the improvement you effect in their economic position? You would introduce into general society a new moral notion that it is the duty of the parents of a girl to train that girl in some measure for a self-sustained and self-dependent existence—to train her so, that under the circumstances of the future she might, if necessary, be able to maintain herself as a boy is now trained to maintain himself. If you get that notion of the self-dependence of women, I shall consider presently at what cost that may be realized; but if you get that notion developed in society, the inevitable result is that you make it an obligation, an element of duty, on the part of the parents, to qualify their children to sustain the part which they will be called upon to take. The immediate effect of that on the economic position of women would, in itself, be a revolution, but a revolution of the most desirable kind. Because, what is the economic position of women now? There are women who earn wages; but, in the majority of cases, the wages of women are wages not for the sustenance of existence, but in aid of existence. Women in relation to the economic world are very much in the same position as the agricultural labourer used to be under the old Poor Law, when it was not thought a necessary part of the organization of society that the agricultural labourer should sustain himself by his wages, but that his wages should be assisted by the poor rates, and the poor rates assisted by his wages. So now, women not having an independent existence, not having thrown upon them the duty and the privilege of maintaining themselves, are remitted to a sphere of work in which what they earn is simply an assistance to means obtained elsewhere, and not sufficient for the sustenance of themselves. Now, if that is a change to be apprehended, that, at all events, is a gain. It may be a gain purchased at considerable loss—that I will refer to presently—but that is a gain, and a gain to which I would ask the most careful attention of those who are opposed to this movement. But now, it may be asked, if you have women thus self-sustaining, and living by themselves, earning enough to live upon and ruling their own affairs, will you not cause an absolute revolution in society? The women and the men will come together then on comparatively equal terms, and you will not have that sweet relation of dependence and support which is the characteristic of the present state of existence. I admit that revolution would happen; but is it a revolution to be deplored? Has not every stage of advance that has been made by woman to the position which she now fills in English society been accompanied with the same fears which are expressed with respect to her future advance? Every stage of advance which has been made has been accompanied with these cries of alarm. When you, in the first instance, gave her any duty, any separate rights, you were met with the suggestion that you were raising a rebel in your household and rending the bonds of society. Take, for instance, the women of the harem. If you suggested to any person in the East to give to women that degree of enfranchisement which obtains in the West, you would be told at once that it would be impossible for society to go on under such a change; that you would no longer have the well-organized society which happens to exist, and that you might expect some revolution. Still, we have gone through that stage, and we find it is a gain. So even now in our social condition in the West. Generation after generation, we have been enlarging the sphere of woman's thoughts, the range of her study, the circle of her ideas, and every generation there have been some people to raise this cry of alarm, and every successive generation has seen it falsified. I am not disposed, Sir, to speak very harshly of these fears. They are exceedingly natural. We all know the conditions of society under which we have been born and reared. We look back with affection to the memories of our infancy and youth, and we feel a very natural anxiety lest anything should be done to change that youthful order of the household, and the social condition under which we ourselves have grown up. In the same way we may look back upon every stage of the development of society with the same affection, and experience the same alarm. But I venture to say, that if the change which we propose could be realized, instead of shrinking from it, we should invite its consummation. Sir, this is like a proposal that might be made in China to enfranchise women from the servitude under which they are supposed to labour from going about with small feet oased in cramped shoes. I have no doubt that if it were suggested to a Chinaman that women should be allowed free play, even in the function of walking, you would get conjured up to your imagination a very fearful picture as to the result of the dependence of the sex in that respect being changed. What can be prettier than the fancy of the woman tottering towards you on feeble feet, until you open your arms and she falls within them to receive the support of your strength? Would not the foundations of society be upset if she could stand alone? That analogy is absolutely perfect with respect to the enfranchisement of women. You have got women in a limited sphere of duty, and with a limited range of ideas. We propose to enlarge that sphere of duty and that range of ideas, and we say that thereby you will make women better instead of worse, and make men better instead of worse also. I ask those who dwell most strongly upon this beautiful picture of the past, to recognize frankly for themselves the cost of that picture. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), who, I believe, first discovered his considerable talents to the House in speaking on this question, dwelt at length upon the magic of home and the remembrances of childhood, which, as he said, might possibly have been cast with women not perfectly educated; and whose lessons, though given in ungrammatical language and with limited knowledge, were lessons which would endure to the end. Perfectly true. But was affection going to vanish if women became grammatical? Is the household god to be destroyed because women have a little larger range of duties? Will the remembrance of childhood and the relation of a mother to a child pass away because you have advanced women in the social and educational sphere? A lady, who has recently written on this subject, has conjured up the notion that if the change which she regards as inevitable is consummated, the result will be that woman will become a loveless creature, a being incapable of loving and of being loved. That must be a wonderful picture; but, in spite of the gravity with which this lady has reproduced it, we may afford to dismiss it as altogether illusory. "Love laughs at locksmiths;" and the notion that you are going to get rid of love because you give women a vote is one that cannot be seriously entertained by any person who has had, I will not say the experience, but even the capacity, of studying the stories of the human affections. The foam-born goddess, according to the old legend, laughed with the easy consciousness of victory, when she stood side by side with Pallas and Juno in the contest for the apple. And I am quite sure that we may altogether dismiss any such effect from this Bill, even if it should become law to-morrow. You will not dissolve society because you give to women the power to vote at Parliamentary Elections; and, as I have said, I ask hon. Members to consider the cost of the limitations we maintain. The narrowness of women's range of ideas is absolutely deleterious in its effect. Our earliest lessons are received from them. Are they not often lessons that we have afterwards to unlearn with great difficulty and pain, and do we not often find a difficulty in freeing ourselves from them, and in emancipating ourselves from the errors of our earliest education? Again, to those who enter into the marriage relations of life, how constantly does it happen that the man's freedom of intellect is a thing kept to himself, that he is incapable of imparting to the woman with whom so much of his life is spent any conception of the range of his thoughts? He does not find in her any companionship; but, on the contrary, he finds her a drag upon his aspirations, and a drawback upon his advance. You may, if you choose, contract the sphere of women's thought, but you may be sure that that contraction will re-act upon yourselves; and in enfranchising women you not only give them a benefit, but you confer a benefit upon yourselves. You may then realize the vision of the poet—

"To live, and see her learn, and learn by her,
Out of the low, obscure, and petty world."

The political reasons for granting the prayer of the Bill appear to me to be undeniable; but I confess they are not the reasons why I most stoutly support it. The reason why I urge it upon the acceptance of the House is, that I believe it will develop a fuller, freer, nobler woman, by admitting woman into the sphere of political thought and duty—that by advancing woman you advance man with her. Some of those who hear me may say—"But what is to be the end? We do not see the end to which you are advancing." That may possibly be. I do not know that we are always bound to see the ultimate goal towards which we are moving. If we are moving upon right principles, if we are actuated by a feeling of justice, if the hand that moves above us and leads us on is a hand in which we can place implicit faith and confidence, if the light that is leading us through the encircling gloom is not a snare from the abyss, but one which we can trust with absolute reliance—then, I say—"Trust to that light; follow the hand without fear of the future." Let any man—a husband, father, or brother—consider the case of a young woman or girl committed to his care. You have there a human being of infinite capabilities of mind, body, and soul. Can it by possibility be right to limit the range of the development of that human creature in any way whatever? Will not human society be improved by making the most of her faculties, whatever those faculties may be? She will be improved and you will be improved. The whole community will be advanced, and it is upon that account mainly and principally, that I propose the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. HANBURY: No one recognizes more heartily than I do the gracious and well-deserved tribute of respect which has been paid by the hon. Member for Liskeard to the memory of Mr. Russell Gurney. There can be no doubt that women had a great advocate in Mr. Russell Gurney, who was desirous of seeing some great and general progress of their welfare. But I do not believe that this Bill is in any way calculated to advance their cause. Before I proceed to discuss this Bill, I wish to make one or two remarks on the change of advocates which has taken place in regard to the advocates of the Bill. I congratulate the hon. Member for Liskeard on having supplanted two such able advocates as the hon. Members for Manchester and Marylebone (Mr. Jacob Bright and Mr. Forsyth). I can only express a hope that this constant change of advocates is not one of the first symptoms of that fickleness which some of us are inclined to associate with female politicians. Of course, I know that the ladies are under considerable obligations to the hon. Member, who was their champion on the last occasion under somewhat peculiar circumstances. I believe that he did them the greatest service he could do by talking out their own Bill. I hope his appearance here to-day as the proposer of the Bill is a proof that he is going to have the question fairly fought out—not merely talked upon, but put to the test of a division. But I do feel, even although I am freely disposed to discuss and vote upon the measure, that there is some objection to bringing it before the same House, the same Parliament, Session after Session, without any new arguments being adduced, and without any prospect of a change, except one, which would throw further and further back the cause which the hon. Gentleman advocates. It is impossible that anybody who takes an interest in the question can fail to see that, so far from making progress inside or outside of this House, the more it is discussed the further it goes back. Very few indeed approve of the principle as it is submitted to us either inside or outside of the House. Among the women themselves there is no widespread feeling at all. Among all my acquaintances I do not know a single woman who takes an interest in the matter, or wishes to have a vote. One of the things most likely to upset Parliamentary government is to make the vote too cheap. We have found that to a great extent in our system of local government. The great difficulty we have to deal with is that people when they have got a vote will not use it; and I am afraid that if we extend the same principle to Parliamentary government, the representative system of which I, together with the hon. Member, am so proud, will receive a severe blow. The feeling against this measure is increasing, not only outside the House, but inside the House itself. I venture to say there is no question which has ever been submitted to our consideration, upon which you find so many Members changing their minds. I have seen, that I know of, no woman outside who asks for a vote; but I know there are a great number of Members inside the House who will give their votes to-day who, like myself, have entirely changed their opinion on the matter. A few years ago, actuated by a kind of political gallantry, I thought there was no objection in giving women a vote. But, although gallantry originally prompted some of us to vote in favour of this measure, we now feel that the greatest kindness we can do to the women themselves is to refuse them this vote, and put them out of the turmoil and struggle of political life, and not place them in that false position in which they would have to choose between the rights of men and the privileges of women. I appeal to hon. Members who sit on this side of the House to say whether they are to any extent swayed by the idea that this demand made on the part of the ladies would add new recruits to the Conservative cause. Those ladies who would come forward prominently, and give their votes at Parliamentary Elections, are not the ladies who, if returned to Parliament themselves, would be likely to sit on this side. But, whether that be so or not, I am quite sure that in the immediate future this Bill, if passed, would be pregnant with very serious disaster. And, whether we are Conservatives, or Radicals, or Liberals, we must all see that it is not only a measure that would revolutionize society, but that it would do worse than that, for it would entirely decompose it. In dealing with the Bill, there is one very great difficulty I am under. That difficulty arises in this way. It is totally impossible to know what the hon. Member himself means by the Bill he has placed before the House. I would ask him one plain question. Does he, by this ambiguous Bill, mean to give the franchise to married women or not? [Mr. COURTNEY: No.] I am very glad to have that question fairly answered; but I wish it had been answered more clearly in the Bill itself. But, now that I have got an answer, clearly and distinctly from the hon. Member, I tell him that if that is the case, then this is a most disingenuous Bill, for the whole of the speech of the hon. Member was a speech addressed to the wrongs of women. There was a great deal of a priori argument in it; but nothing was said about the special wrongs of the women, whose cause he advocates in this measure. We have heard a great deal in this discussion to-day, and throughout the time the question has been fought, from the very first time when Mr. Mill brought it forward, the question seemed to be entirely fought out upon the wrongs of married women. We have heard it said that the Bill was to redress the wrongs of one-half of the human race, and the answer has been made that those women have not the responsibilities nor the duties which men have, and that they have not the same perils to undergo. Miss Lydia Becker, for instance, met this argument by saying, when it was alleged that women were not exposed to the same perils as men—"As a matter of fact, we understand that the percentage of women who lose their lives in the dangers incident to them in the profession of marriage exceeds the percentage of soldiers killed in battle." I do not see how this argument of the perils of battle or of maternity is to be at all affected if the Bill is not to apply to married women. In order to be consistent and logical, the hon. Member, in supporting the Bill, indulged in arguments which applied to the wrongs of women as a whole. But, when he has to put his thought into practice and place the Bill before the House, the hon. Gentleman does not try to redress the wrongs of women as a class or whole, and as exposed to special perils; but all he does is to bring in a Bill which simply gives a vote to a certain number of well-to-do females. That is all that the hon. Member does, and nothing else. I object to the Bill, therefore, on the ground that it is disingenuous, and also because it is a mere piece of class legislation. It is a Bill which only affects the well-to-do, and which fails to affect the poorer class of women. As a rule, the female voters on municipal matters are persons who belong to the middle and upper classes. [An hon. MEMBER: No, no.] I will read a letter written by a clerk of one of our Southern towns, and I think I may say from my own experience that it is a fair sample of what happens at municipal elections all over the country—

"We are blessed with about 500 women voters on the burgess roll. I think the preponderance is very large on the side of the middle and upper classes. This arises from the fact that many of the widows of the working class, when the head of the household is gone, content themselves with becoming lodgers, or are excused their rates, or procure the aid of the parish authorities."

The result is, that the only people who would be enfranchised by this Bill are maiden ladies with property, so placed that, in spite of having this charm of property, they have not yet been able to acquire that position which is called—not very gracefully—by Miss Becker "the profession of marriage." Then, again, I contend that a large amount of mischief would be done by giving this vote to female lodgers. Certainly, in our large towns, no one could deny that we should be giving a vote to a class of women who are, perhaps, the least deserving of it. I should like to know, for instance, what would be the position of any hon. Member who represented the district of Pimlico to which I have alluded within the borough of Chelsea? Would not any Member returned for that borough occupy a very extraordinary position in this House? I think the Bill in this respect would do very serious mischief. So far from giving a vote to the best class of women, you would only succeed in giving it to the very worst. When we are told that the wrongs we are to redress are the wrongs of the married women, we cannot fail to see that a vote given to women of this kind would work in a most mischievous way towards upsetting the present position of the franchise. Miss Lydia Becker herself says this. She does not mention specifically either married women or the other class to which I have referred; but she says this, and it seems to bear upon the question—

“Every extension of the franchise to classes hitherto excluded lowers and weakens the status of the classes which remain out of the pale.”

So much for the question of natural right, on which the hon. Member laid so much stress. [Mr. COURTNEY: No, no.] Then I have much misunderstood the argument. I should like to know where he gets his natural right, which denies and refuses to the best of women and the flower of womanhood a vote, and gives it to those who are the bane of society? I should like to know under what natural right he comes forward and says that women are to vote, but are not to sit as representatives? Where is the difference? How does natural right work there? From what strained source does the hon. Member derive this doctrine? If you go back to history and expediency, it would seem that women have much more right to sit in this House, apart from the turmoil of politics. If you look to their weakness and to their sensitiveness, you will see that they are much more fitted to sit in this House than to engage in the turmoil of public life outside. The very people who support this Bill are fond of appealing to history to show the great deeds women have done; but they must bear in mind that it has been in the position I have pointed out—from the serene dignity of the Throne—and when they have been shut out from the actual strife of life that they have shown their capacity for ruling. We are willing to admit that, because our case does not rest upon the intellectual inferiority of women. The whole of our case rests on three things—first, feminine weakness; secondly, the difference of sex; and lastly, the temptations to which women are exposed. It is a remarkable fact that in this Bill the women who are to be enfranchised should be women who are not married, and that the women alone who have wrongs should be the married women. Why, under these circumstances, is the vote denied to them in the Bill? It is the most inconsistent Bill I ever heard of. It is simply a Bill to give a vote to people who have no wrongs to redress, while it passes entirely over those whom you say have wrongs. The hon. Member said a great deal, no doubt, about representation. But the women are not unrepresented at this moment. Their interests are the interests of men. They do not stand on a different footing from men. If a husband punishes them, or a question arises as to the property of married women, they have brothers and other relations who will advocate their cause; and, further than that, when the hon. Member spoke of representation, it was not an English idea of representation which he had in his mind, but rather that which exists in America. It resolved itself into a question of delegates—of having every class a delegate. Every class, and trade, and interest is, I suppose, to have a separate representation. So far as interests are concerned, I cannot for the life of me see where, in the whole of the speech of the hon. Member, he succeeded in pointing out how the interests of women are opposed to those of men. He failed to make out any case either on the ground of natural right or natural wrong. When I speak of wrongs, I am reminded that, in the course of the present Session, there was a case in which a complaint was made. A Bill was brought forward early in the Session—I believe by the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell)—in which he wished to do away with actions for breach of promise of marriage, and I find that an interesting Petition against that Bill was presented by the ladies. Their Petition is really interesting, as showing the one grievance which, as far as I have been able to see, they have yet been able to prove. The Petition runs as follows, and it expresses peculiar notions about marriage itself:—

"The humble Petition of the undersigned sheweth—That marriage is the natural and honourable profession in which the majority of women maintain themselves by the discharge of the conjugal, social, and domestic duties which appertain to the position of a wife. That the entrance on this profession comes to a woman through an offer or promise of marriage. That the acceptance of such offer or promise debar the woman from forming other ties, and the breaking or non-performance of such promise hinders her from obtaining an establishment in life, inasmuch as a woman who has given her promise and affections to one man cannot transfer them to another without grievous loss. That the law guards the rights of contracting parties by annexing penalties to breaches of contract, or by providing compensation when one of the parties suffers through the default of the other. That it would be highly injurious and inexpedient to lessen the sense of the binding nature of a legal promise by permitting promises of marriage to be broken with impunity. That men do not usually marry for a maintenance, while marriage is regarded as the proper and usual means through which women obtain a maintenance; therefore, a breach of promise of marriage by a man to a woman causes a pecuniary loss which is not usually suffered through a breach of promise by a woman to a man. That the proposal to abolish actions for breach of promise of marriage would deprive that section of Her Majesty's subjects who are excluded from representation in your honourable House of protection against the wrongful acts of those who have a monopoly in making the laws."

Now, there is no grievance which this House, which has a monopoly of doing wrong, is not always anxious to redress. Women hold property, and therefore it is said that property should not be unrepresented. That is a good argument, no doubt. I do not think that property is sufficiently represented; but we must look at the facts as they are. How does the matter stand in regard to the representation of property? In all our local government—in the election of Guardians, for instance—and in all matters where property is most nearly touched, where it has to bear a number of burdens, and where taxation is really almost the whole duty of the body elected, property has its full influence. The owner of property may not only give one vote, but possibly may give 12, if he has a large property—six as occupier and six as owner, making 12 altogether. In a case like that, where property is actually represented, women have votes already; but in Parliamentary Elections, I am sorry to say, property has very little to do with it. The greatest Peer in the land, for instance, has not a vote at all. A man may have 50,000 acres of land, but he has only the same vote as a man who lives in a lodging. Therefore, the question of property has really nothing to do with the matter. What you do find is this, that property is a qualification, but it is only one out of several others. An appeal has been made by the hon. Member for Liskeard to the principle of taxation without representation. As a matter of history, the people who raise that cry are utterly mistaken. It was originally raised by Lord Chatham as a grievance of the American Colonists, and it had reference to people who were outside the country altogether, and who did not live in the same homes and with the families of those who were already represented. Such people were in a wholly different position from that occupied by these women who live in the same homes, and have so many interests in common with those who are already represented. Every man pays taxes, either directly or indirectly, and yet how many are there who have no direct voice in the representation? Therefore, I do not think that argument ought to have much weight. What are we taxed for? Is it not for the purpose of protecting our property and our persons; and are there any people in the world who derive more benefit from this taxation than the women? Then comes the further question raised by the hon. Gentleman with reference to the franchise. We are told that the vote has been already given to women in many local matters. Indeed, the concession, it is urged, has gone to the extent of conferring upon them the municipal franchise. For my own part, I do not place much faith in these arguments by analogy. Some people, if they have made two mistakes, wish to make a third in order to be consistent. I think we have gone too far in giving women the municipal franchise; but, even supposing we have not done wrong in granting it to them, there is a great difference between a local franchise and the general franchise which it is sought to give to women now. No doubt in the boroughs women who are largely interested where property is concerned have a vote, and I do not know that they use it badly; but there is nothing like the same excitement about those elections that there is about Imperial Elections. Women are not there thrown into the turmoil and bitterness of public life that prevail in General Elections. Again, at General Elections, there arises the great question of the defence of the country, to which women contribute in no sort of way; and it certainly seems to me that the responsibilities and the rights of citizenship ought to go together. Since the franchise has been so largely extended, we have introduced almost too much sentiment into our political life. The masses are now too likely to be swayed by a great orator and to be at the mercy of empirical statesmanship. We are placed to a great extent at the mercy of mobs, and that danger would be greatly increased if women were added to the number of our voters. I do not think that on either of these grounds the hon. Member for Liskeard has made out his case. This, however, is not a question of rights or wrongs, of property or taxation, or anything of that sort. It is simply a question of expediency. I think the fact cannot be denied that Government rests in the last resort upon force. I should like to know what has been the result even of recent additions to the franchise? Can the hon. Gentleman say that it does not rest the Government more and more upon force? Was not the franchise extended to these people partly, perhaps, because they were deemed fit for it, but chiefly because it was thought that the great force of the country should also be the governing force of the county? We cannot get over the fact that force is at the bottom of all government. The hon. Gentleman has represented modern civilization as a Utopia, which I do not believe it to be; but government rests in the last resort upon force, and the women whom the hon. Gentleman wishes to enfranchise do not contribute to that force by maintaining order at home, or by defeating the enemies of the country abroad. All the advantages women possess they obtain by reason of their weakness. If we are to carry out the principles of the hon. Gentleman to their logical conclusion, we should produce those results. In the first place, we should have women competing with men in every condition of life. They might compete, no doubt, but it would be impossible to get rid of the two differences I have mentioned—the difference of weakness and the difference of sex. I candidly believe that the mere fact of women competing with men would deprive the former of many of the privileges which at present gallantry, courtesy, and consideration always extend to them among all classes of the community. We all know from our own experience that the more women try to imitate men and to compete with them, the more does our respect for them gradually diminish. On the other point I will only touch very lightly; but I must say I do not think there would be any great gain to the morality of this country if we were to have this constant confusion of the sexes. The present measure owes its existence partly to the increasing rarity of marriage. That question has been very ably argued by the lady to whom the hon. Gentleman alluded, and she says that this very Bill, and the course of conduct pursued by the ladies who support it, will not merely stereotype the present evil, but will do much towards greatly magnifying and extending it. After all, this question is mainly one of expediency. I believe that in the interests of women themselves this Bill would be the most mischievous that could be passed. On behalf of 99 women out of every 100 in this country, I declare that the Bill is one of the most disadvantageous and most mischievous to them that could possibly be passed into law. A vote is a small thing in these days, when almost every man possesses one. Indeed, it is almost a mark of distinction now not to have a vote. But, although a vote is a small thing, the granting of it to women implies their mixing themselves up in public life, fighting in political struggles, and sacrificing the privileges of women, in the vain hope of gaining gradually the rights of men. Therefore, a vote, while a small thing in itself, does in reality represent great mischief. A great deal has been already done, and much remains to be done, for the advancement of women; but their cause would be best advanced if they made better use of the sphere now open to them; and in the medical world, in the matter of education, and in other respects, they might gain the day. But the granting of a vote of this kind has nothing whatever to do with the question. All the grand ideas which the hon. Member for Liskeard advocated throughout his speech had nothing whatever to do with the giving of a vote to women. The advantages which the hon. Gentlemen referred to might be gained equally well without it. If we did give this vote, we should open the door to all the mischiefs he has described; and, in the interests of 99 out of every 100 women in this country, I sincerely hope that this measure will be rejected. Sir, I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. G. PALMER: The sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire have excited in my mind the thought that I shall do right in taking part in this discussion. I understand the hon. Gentleman to say that the strength of women consists in their weakness, or something of that kind. That argument is contrary, I think, to the facts with which most hon. Members are acquainted. We have all found out that the weak are those who are oppressed, and that those who are able to help themselves are taken care of. This rule, I believe, applies to the interests of women. The hon. Gentleman opposite seems to be afraid of the further extension of the franchise, which, he says, is already too wide; and he appears to think that England would be better governed if we reverted to the days when the franchise lay in the hands of a few, a majority of those few belonging to one class of society. As arguments against the Bill are drawn from the possibility of women of a low type having votes and influencing elections, it is only fair to remind the House that at present there is no difficulty in finding men who have votes and whose moral qualifications are of an exceedingly low character. Therefore, it is unfair to bring forward against the advocates of this measure the charge that they would place on the electoral roll women lodgers whose moral character might be such as to unfit them entirely for that position. The men are already there. The Legislature has never allowed a moral qualification to enter into the question of the fitness of individuals to be placed on the electoral roll. As the hon. Member opposite represents a county perhaps he may not be very well acquainted with the operation of the law which puts women upon the municipal roll. I have never heard in the borough which I have the honour to represent that the least harm has resulted from women having votes. I do not know that the elections in the borough have been materially influenced by the women whose names appear on the municipal register. What I do know is that women go to the poll and vote without the least difficulty; and I never heard anyone suggest that women were injuriously influenced by voting. I consider that thus far we have lost sight in this debate of two or three reflections which were thrown out by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney). In my opinion those considerations ought to be kept in mind, as they have a very important bearing on the subject. The granting of votes to women would be mutually beneficial to all classes of the community. I remember perfectly well the case of a widow who was left to rear up a large family. She was the occupier of a considerable portion of an agricultural parish; she acted as overseer of the parish; and, probably, she was the most intelligent individual in the parish. Yet she was disqualified to vote simply because she happened to be a woman. The great object to be kept in view is good government. I do not think that when this question of women's disabilities is under discussion the House ought to run away into questions affecting female weakness, and their liability to be tempted by men. The question at issue is, what is the best thing to be done in the interests of the country? Women, I believe, would promote their own interests, and those of the community, if they had a legitimate voice at the Parliamentary elections, instead of having, as at present, only indirect influences. If they had votes, and if their names were placed on the register, their right to discuss political questions would be plainly acknowledged. At present they influence those questions as a matter of courtesy. I venture to believe, however, that women ought to be allowed to have a direct and legitimate voice in the election of Members of Parliament.

MR. SMOLLETT: Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words upon the Bill now before the House. Upon former occasions, when I have had an opportunity of speaking on this Bill, it has been observed that I treated a grave subject with great levity and coarseness. At all events, to-day I shall not repeat anything that will bear misconstruction, and I shall be perfectly serious. I deny explicitly, in the first place, that I have ever said, as some hon. Members will say, that women are unfit to have political privileges because the sex is to some extent emotional, impulsive, and sometimes hysterical. I have never made any observations of that nature, and I do not think it is a proper way of stating the question. I have never said, either, that ladies are unfit for the exercise of political rights because they are in many instances, through life, led by priests and parsons; but I have always assailed the Bill before the House as a mischievous Bill—as a Bill badly drawn, and as a Bill which purposely evades the real question at issue which it attempts to settle. Nevertheless, into whatever hands the cause is intrusted—whether it be confided to the tender mercies of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth), a nondescript politician, who sits on the Conservative side of the House, or whether it is by him handed over to the Radical Member, the Representative for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), who sits on the other side of the House, or whether the Bill falls by its own gravity into still more incompetent hands—the measure is presented to us with the same face and in the same guise, without the alteration of a single word or a single letter. Now, Sir, in my opinion, the Bill would be unintelligible to the uninitiated but for its title. The title seems to imply that the object of the promoters of the Bill is to remove all the disabilities under which women labour, to bring feminine assurance, or feminine influence, to bear directly upon that political life from which ladies have been debarred from the commencement of the world. Now, if that be the object of the promoters, it is done in a very imperfect manner. The promoters of the Bill tell us that it will place upon the electoral roll, as it is at the present moment, something like 350,000 or 400,000 fresh names, and this whilst the franchise is restricted; but if household suffrage is to be extended to the counties, then, I presume, a Bill of this nature will place upon the electoral list at least 1,000,000 fresh names. Now, assuming this to be the case, my contention is that this huge Reform Bill, this great Reform Bill—dealing, as it does, largely and widely with the franchise—is a measure which, in my opinion, ought to be placed in the hands of a responsible Minister of the Crown—a Minister having a good mechanical majority at his back. A measure of this nature, so great in its character, ought not to be managed by a coterie of ladies out-of-doors, or mismanaged in this House by Members of no political weight, Members sitting below the Gangway and acting independently of each other. What, then, ought to be done? In my judgment, the promoters of this Bill ought to drop it. And if they be so advised, they should bring it forward in some future Session by way of an abstract Resolution. That abstract Resolution should describe the principal grievances under which the sex labours, and should call upon the Government to relieve womankind of those grievances at the earliest moment, and in the fullest possible manner. The ladies tell us that their cause is a great one. They state that it is one that is not to be snuffed out by levity nor trampled out by opposition. They say that their great cause will be persevered in until right be done. The ladies tell us that they have champions of the highest intelligence in the country; that they have, for example, as an advocate in this House, a man to whose sober judgment the cause had commended itself—the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the Leader of the House, and great weight is attached to his opinions in this House. The ladies say, also, that they have a most redoubtable champion in the Upper House in the person of Lord Beaconsfield. Now, who is Lord Beaconsfield? The Earl of Beaconsfield is a gentleman whom his ignorant detractors out-of-doors declare to be the Mephistophiles of England—a person who, by his enchantments and fascinations, holds both Houses of Parliament enthralled, and who, by means of these devices, carries out at home and abroad a policy hateful in the eyes of Heaven. But that is not all. The ladies tell us they have a convert in that versatile and voluble statesman who sits on the Opposition benches—the “People’s William.” No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich is still a great power in this country. He wields at his will a portion of the Democracy, and all the Nonconformist Bodies worship at the feet of this Gamaliel. Well, how is it that this cause of the women is not making progress in this country? The cause of the women would be safe if these Gentlemen would act together, and if they were earnest and honest in their political life. But I see no appearance of honesty or earnestness in their political life. Certain it is that the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, who are supposed to be the great champions of the cause, never put in an appearance at these debates. They treat these Wednesday exertions as political impertinences. Certain it is that if one-tenth part of the energy which has been wasted in an insane crusade to obtain through Holy Russia civil and religious liberty for benighted tribes in Europe had been devoted to this cause of the ladies of England it would have been greatly to their advantage. But a great deal of apathy and indifference reigns throughout the House, and out-of-doors the cause is brought into ridicule in a manner that I need not stay to discuss. Now, what about the Bill? I have already stated that this Bill is a very mischievous one, and made perplexingly vague in order to evade the cause which it professes to sustain. The Bill has no Preamble. The Bill announces no principle, and yet there is a very great principle underlying this Bill. It has, as I say, no Preamble, and the reason why it has no Preamble is very clear. It was almost impossible to make a logical Preamble to such a foolish Bill. The Bill describes no grievance from which the sex suffers, and it endeavours to remove none. The only matter with which it deals is that of registration, and that it deals with in a very imperfect manner. The Bill runs to this effect—

“Be it enacted, that in all Acts relating to the qualification and registration of voters, or persons entitled to vote, or claiming to be registered to vote in the election of Members of Parliament, every word importing the masculine gender is to be taken as including females, for the purposes of registration, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Now, what is the meaning of those words? The Bill deals with registration; but what about the votes when the ladies are registered? I ask for information. Can a woman go before the returning officer and give the names, as candidates, of persons whom she thinks will best represent her interest at an election? And can those persons so nominated be females? If not, why not? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone (Sir Thomas Chambers), who, in 1875 and 1876, brought forward the Bill in this House, used to tell us distinctly what was his view, and what was the object of the Bill in his hands. He said the object of the Bill was to promote the interests of widows and of unmarried women—women living in a state of enforced celibacy, and that if he could obtain for them the privilege, once in three or four years, of putting, by way of solace and consolation, a paper into the ballot-box, there would be an end to the whole transaction. The hon. and learned Member used to say that the Bill was so simple and so insignificant that he thought we might pass it without hesitation. The hon. and learned Gentleman used to say that he was extremely opposed to any married woman being admitted to the franchise. A married woman, if honest, might be called through election by grace to a better life; but the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone contended that no married woman should ever have the right to interfere in a metropolitan election in this life. Now that is a very strange doctrine to hold. In my opinion, many married women would be put upon the register as the Bill now stands. If I remember rightly, five or six years ago, when a similar Bill was introduced in the last Parliament, there were some words which said that women must not be permitted on any account to vote, but those words have been deleted. I shall not pursue this part of the subject further, except to state that the Bill, in my judgment, has been made obscure for a set purpose. I contend, also, that any Bill which professes upon this point to bring within the pale of the Constitution unmarried females, and which is so worded as to exclude women and to disenfranchise them when they shall obtain the high and coveted position of a British matron, is a Bill mischievous in its conception, and is a measure which it is very discreditable that Members should every year bring forward in this House for serious discussion. Now, Sir, a word about the cause of the ladies, which is altogether thrust aside in this Bill. I have never heard, in this House, the rights of women as they are defined by themselves at public meetings under the agitation now going on in this country, discussed or debated except on one occasion, in 1876. The Gentleman in this House who spoke at large upon the claims of women, and their demands upon the Legislature, was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). We all know that he is a great supporter of the extension of the franchise; but the Member for Birmingham said he would not accept or look at this Bill, as a means for extending the franchise, because the measure had a higher aim, the aim being the exemption of woman from the tyranny of man. Now, the women, to do them justice, never conceal what their real aims and objects are. They tell us their demands explicitly at public meetings, and they recount them in the drawing-rooms—for that is a very favourite mode of agitation—where they drink tea and noyau—meetings at which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard so ably presides. They tell us what they want—they want a plain recognition of the complete equality of the sexes, male and female, in all matters political before the law. They declare it is a case of gross oppression to debar a woman, because she is a woman, from competing with men for the possession of every office of the State, in public, in professional, and in political life—for places, in fact, which men are at present supposed to be alone competent to fill. They point, in their harangues, to our Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, and they say that she, a woman, holds the highest offices in the State; and they ask for a response to their question why they are prohibited from holding any office in the State higher than that of a Maid of Honour, a Lady of the Bedchamber, or the like? These are very plain questions, and very plain statements, and anyone can understand them; and it is not easy to give an answer logically to these demands. Such demands, in my opinion, ought to be conceded if they be reasonable, and if the sex, as a rule, demands them; for judge what would be the position of this country, if the larger portion of the women were to revolt against the men? Why, the consequences would be too awful to discuss. Now, these demands are not made by ignorant women, or by women without education. They are deliberately and earnestly put before us for acceptance by ladies of the highest culture and position who take part in this agitation. For example, last year a lady of the highest social position gave the countenance of her illustrious name in aid of the cause—the Lady Anna Gore Langton. This distinguished lady, in many letters addressed to the public journals, declared that this was a great cause—a cause which she was satisfied must triumph, because she said she was old enough to remember the triumph of a measure similar and analogous in its nature, which, after a great deal of agitation, was brought to a successful close by a relief Bill in 1829. What was the cause that is stated to be analogous to this? It was the great Catholic Relief Bill. Now, what were the demands of the Roman Catholics in those days? for I fully admit that the claims made by the women are analogous to the claims made in the great Catholic agitation. The Roman Catholics did not ask for the franchise in 1829, because they had it; but the Catholics of that day felt themselves to be politically powerless, politically impotent, for, although they had the franchise, they had no possession of any of the loaves and fishes. They asked, and very properly, that such of their body as were Peers should have a right to seats in the House of Lords, and to take part in the discussions of that august Assembly. For the laity and gentry of the Roman Catholic community, it was demanded that such of their body as should be elected to represent constituencies should have the right to seats in the House of Commons, and to take part in the debates—it might be in all the wrangles—that have made this Assembly notorious. But they demanded a great deal more. The Catholics said they were excluded, by reason of their faith, from holding many of the highest positions in public and political life, and they demanded to be put on an equality with Protestants, because they conceived they had equal intellectual attainments, and because they were loyal subjects of Her Majesty. Well, those claims were conceded; but will a— me that those six lines of the Bill I have just read are on all-fours with the Roman Catholic Bill of 1829? The matter is too ridiculous to merit any refutation or argument. If, therefore, this cause of the women is to be taken from independent Members, and is to be treated in the future by a Minister of the Crown, it must be dealt with in a manner very different from the way in which it is being treated in this Bill. If it is considered to be analogous to the Roman Catholic Bill of 1829, then Peeresses, by creation and descent, must be declared competent to take their seats in the House of Lords, and married women, equally with single women, must be allowed to vote at elections for Members of this House of Parliament—nay, they must be made eligible to sit in the House, if elected. Women must be required to fulfil all the duties of private citizens. I do not say they should be required to take commands in the Army, Navy, or Marines, but they might fulfil all the duties of civil life. They must act as magistrates, and sit on juries, and the like. If this system is a reasonable system it ought to be conceded, and this House of Parliament is the proper tribunal to decide whether these things are reasonable or not. I do not say whether they are reasonable or not, because these claims are not before us in this Bill, which is a ridiculous Bill. When these claims are before us, I will give my vote on the matter. Now, in conclusion, I will say a few words on the way this cause is managed out-of-doors. There is, at Manchester, a newspaper published solely in promotion of the rights of ladies. It is called The Women's Suffrage Journal, published once a month, and edited by an accomplished and fascinating lady, Miss Lydia Becker. I have been told she is fascinating; I have not the pleasure of her acquaintance. On the first of every month there is put in a conspicuous page the names of a number of women who, during the preceding period of 30 days, were assaulted, sometimes brutally, by their husbands. These cases are enumerated first to show that under the Reform Bill of 1867—the “leap in the dark” Bill—some great ruffians have been put on the register by that Bill. But it is not proposed by the editor of that journal that that Act should be repealed. She says the women who are assaulted ought to have votes; but this Bill does not attempt to give them a vote. It does not deal with married women. Miss Becker has recently discovered that there is in England at this moment a modified slave trade. She says, in fact, that in the land we live in women are bought and sold, and the law takes little or no cognizance of these transactions. Now, I have heard from my earliest youth, and I believe it to be a known fact, that many young girls of tender but of marriageable age are sold by their mothers to wealthy suitors. I believe that arrangements of this nature are not unknown in the highest, in the lowest, and in middle life. Robert Burns, a poet of Scotland, whose poetry is much cherished by the people, because his poetry is true to nature and to life, makes one of his heroines in lowly life, who had been so disposed of in marriage, say of her mother—

“Bad luck to the penny
That tempted my Minnie
To sell her poor Jenny
For siller and gold.”

But it is not the sale of women at the matrimonial market that lacerates the heart of Miss Becker. She complains that women are sold by their husbands, and that the law does not interfere to punish them. A few instances are given of this in The Women's Suffrage Journal in the issue of February, 1877. The first case is that of a Mr. and Mrs. Henley, who lived at Leigh, in Lancashire, and who resided in Thomas Street. Mr. and Mrs. Henley were a young couple. The husband was 22 years of age, and the lady was very attractive. Henley complained one day in a public-house to a companion called Hayes that he had married too early in life. He was ambitious, and wanted to push his fortune in the world without any drawback. Mr. Hayes sympathized with him. The two went to Thomas Street, and had an interview with the lady. Terms were arranged and put in writing. Hayes undertook to protect Mrs. Henley in future, together with her infant child. He took also the lease of the house, and Henley, in devotion to his friend, made him a present of a pigeon cote and some doves, and clenched the bargain for 5s. Then follows the story of the sale outright of a woman named Sarah Tyrer for a small sum. She was the wife of a bargee. The man who purchased her was in the same line of life. His name was Carrington. He paid 18s. for Sarah. He paid for the woman in her presence, and took the article he had purchased home with him. They spent the night pleasantly together. Next day Mrs. Sarah Tyrer went out for her wardrobe, but never came back again. Then the purchaser found out that the roguish couple had cheated him out of 18s., and were carousing together upon the proceeds of the sale. He went to a magistrate, who ordered him out of Court. Now, why are these racy stories published in a journal? They are given ostensibly to show that if womankind were introduced to political life the sex would be elevated, and vice would disappear. But that is simply nonsense. Any cause is discredited by arguments like these. When we see, then, a measure of great public policy supported by literature like this out-of-doors, and when we see the cause of the redemption of women advanced in this House by a Bill, the main object of which is to declare that marriage is an absolute disqualification in women to the rights of citizenship, the whole question seems in the hands of its promoters to be treated as if it was an arrant sham.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK: Mr. Speaker—Sir, the position of this Bill has been noticed at considerable length by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Hanbury), and I think it is impossible to deny that the present state of the law in reference to the electoral franchise is inconsistent and contradictory, and I will say unjust. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire has told the House that, in his opinion, every man almost now has the franchise. The franchise was originally intended to represent the property of the country; but successive Governments thought it right to increase, and increase largely, the electoral franchise to men. We have it extended to household suffrage; we have it extended to the lodger vote. At first we had property and education represented. Now we have property without education represented; and possibly we have education without property represented. We have the household franchise, representing the minimum of property in England, except, perhaps, the lodger franchise. In the lodger franchise, so far as property is concerned, the lodger's property is represented by his portmanteau, and his education is represented by his newspaper. The hon. Member is right in saying that almost every man is entitled to the franchise. But whilst the franchise is thus extended to men, the female possessing £10,000 or £20,000 a-year is not entitled to have a vote. That appears to me a gross anomaly; and, without professing any chivalrous object, I would put it on the ground of common sense, if property is represented by men, is it not unjust to exclude that representation when a woman happens to be the owner of the property? She has for all other purposes to discharge the duties connected with the property. She is subject to taxation. She has the privilege of paying her taxes without having the right to impose them. She cannot propose any Representative in this House, nor can she legally support him by her vote. But where taxation is local, as in municipal institutions, and as in the Poor Law, and where the education question arises, the female is allowed to vote. And permit me to say these local questions frequently cause just as much local interest and excitement as the larger elections of Representatives where women are precluded from exercising these rights. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire justly said that he thought the law had probably gone too far in prohibiting women from the franchise; and that if they had the right to elect a Member of this House he did not anticipate any of those evils which were supposed to arise in these contests more than in any other. Reference has been made by the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) to the concession of Catholic emancipation. Anyone who looks back to that time will see how the prophets of evil predicted what would be the results of that measure. What have been the evils that have followed from it? The prophets who indulged in these lugubrious anticipations have been disappointed. While the exercise of these minor rights are denied to women, the Constitution of this country gives to Her Most Gracious Majesty the highest and most responsible position in this realm; and contrasting the reign of Her Majesty with that of many of Her predecessors, it is undeniable that the comparison is one most favourable to the prudence, wisdom, and energy of the female mind. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire has quoted various pamphlets and various newspapers. It is very easy to take a few extracts, either from pamphlets or from newspapers, and then to comment on these isolated passages; but how is it that for a year past the hon. Member for Cambridge, who appears to read this Manchester paper, has not been able to find a single passage from the 1st of February, 1877, until the present date, on which he can lay his finger? I have not perused that journal with the same assiduity as the hon. Member for Cambridge; but if I had known he was going to quote it, I should probably have found much that would have been an answer to the attack which he made, and that would have furnished admirable arguments in support of this Bill. It is conceded that by this Bill it is not intended to give the franchise to married women. I remember on a former debate, when many Members, including the noble Lord the Postmaster General, who is a supporter of this measure, stated that that was their view, and I may say that is my view also. It must be a matter of great satisfaction to see the interest taken in this matter, the Treasury Bench being now unoccupied. I venture to say no usual occupant will vote against the measure. The limiting of the Bill to widows and ladies who are not married is perfectly intelligible. It does not endanger the domestic arrangements and the harmony that ought to exist in a family. If one were to give to the wife a vote and to the husband a vote, it might tend in many cases—it might tend in all—to the interruption of that harmony that ought to exist between them. Therefore, the exclusion of married women is right and legitimate; but in the case of an independent lady, who exercises all the rights of a proprietor, why she should not be represented in Parliament, and why she should not select her own Representative, unless we can show that some evil results would come from it, is to me unintelligible. But then it is said if you follow this logically, you must give to women all the rights that men have; that they must sit here and in the House of Peers, because you have conceded to them the right to choose a Representative. Now is that so? Reference is made to priests and parsons. I am not going to say anything against that very respectable class. Yet they have the right to select a Representative, and cannot sit in this House. There is a line between the right to select a Representative and being a Representative. Clergymen are excluded from being Members of this House. Yet they exercise the right of electors, and do not claim the more important right of being themselves Representatives. Therefore, there is no anomaly in giving females the right to choose a Member to represent their interests without having the right of being themselves Representatives. As to female lodgers being an objectionable class, an hon. Member spoke of the female lodgers in Pimlico. I am not so well acquainted with them as he is, and I do not know what he means. There are objectionable persons in all classes. There are many whom we would not select as our companions; and when the franchise includes every man in the community, there will be a large number of persons included in that category who may be very objectionable. The hon. Member for Cambridge has again referred to this Bill as being a foolish Bill, and as being a disingenuous Bill. It has, at all events, the advantage of being a short Bill. If it had been drawn through the intervention of Members of my Profession it probably would have been, if not more lucid, a little longer. It has, at all events, the advantage of brevity. It is said that it has not in terms excluded the married women. If there be the slightest doubt on that subject two words in Committee will set that matter right. If there be any question about it, that may be urged in Committee. The principle for which we contend has been fully stated by the hon. Member who commenced this debate. I need only add that I think it is an anomalous and unjust position in which women are placed; and I cannot doubt that, whatever opposition is shown now, in some future day this measure, or one analogous to it, will be carried.

MR. BLENNERHASSETT: The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) has asked, "Who is Lord Beaconsfield?" Lord Beaconsfield is a person who once said that critics are those who have failed in literature and art. Critics do not usually place their works side by side with the works they criticize. The hon. Member for Cambridge has not observed this caution; but he has failed either to answer the arguments or to rival the eloquence of my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney). The hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Hanbury) complained that this Bill was brought forward Session after Session, and that the same arguments were used. The same arguments must be used on one side, because they have never been answered; but I venture to say that the repetition on the other side has been far more striking. Many arguments have been brought forward against this Bill that have only the faintest concern with it. The very few arguments which really apply have been pressed in this debate, as they have been pressed in debates every Session, with praiseworthy regularity. These arguments remind of nothing so much as the 10 men who represent the "Forty Thieves" on the stage by passing over and over again. In every discussion when the question of the franchise arises, we hear a great deal of various theories of representation. We have not been favoured with many of these theories; but we have had many theories of the home duties of women, of the difficulty of women becoming Members of Parliament, or of their going to fight in battle, and so on. I cannot help thinking that the reason of this is, that every one of those theories, if pursued to its logical conclusion, would supply an argument in favour of the Bill. There is, first, the theory, often advocated on the other side, that property should be represented. The only reference made in this debate to that theory was by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire. He said that, in fact, this Bill would mainly enfranchise a few rich women. A few minutes afterwards he said that property was insufficiently represented in this House. The hon. Member went on to refer to the principle that representation and taxation go together. He made little of that principle, and seemed to attach no importance to it. Is it not a fact, that the women who claim to be represented under this Bill pay a considerable proportion of this taxation? It has been said, in many debates on the franchise in this House, that intelligence and education should be represented. I want to know, are there no women whom that principle would admit? It is also said that this House should be the reflex and mirror of the nation. If that

be so, why should women be excluded? There can be no greater anomaly than the exclusion of women who possess every qualification the law demands. We are told by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire that this is a revolutionary proposal. Yet women belong to that section of the community who are most attached to old institutions and national associations, and would be the last people who would be disposed to work a revolution in the Constitution of the country. Then it is said if the enfranchisement of women does not work a revolution in the Constitution of the country, the granting of the franchise will work a revolution in the constitution of women; that the performance of the simplest duty of the franchise will transform women into political nomads; that their going to the polling-booth for a few minutes in every four or five years will entirely destroy the refinement of the women of England. These absurd fears remind me of nothing more than of the well-known story told of Sidney Smith, at a time when some change had taken place in Party politics. Sidney Smith wrote to a friend, and said he understood the event had excited such consternation that he began to be afraid that the laws of nature were suspended; and it was only when he had sown some mustard and cress in his garden, and it began to come up, that he saw things were going on pretty much as before. Then, it is said that women do not care for the franchise, and do not desire to possess it. I am sorry to say that a great many ladies, who have never given this subject a moment's attention, are ready to laugh at those who, after careful consideration, have felt themselves bound to support this movement. The women who speak lightly of this measure are not those who are likely to be affected by it. It is not the rich and idle who want the franchise. It is not those who have every luxury, and who have every wish gratified. Those are not the women who feel the want of the franchise. But we must remember that there are thousands—I may say millions—of women in this country who have to go out and fight the battle of life as best they can, and to earn their bread by the sweat of their brows. You speak of home duties! But what is the use of speaking of home and family to thousands of women to whom home and family are impossible? There are in this country thousands of women of that kind, and it is ridiculous to ignore their existence. Poets may talk of women as something delicate and tender, whom the winds of Heaven may not too roughly visit; but the lives of most women, as well as of most men, are not spent in a fool's paradise, but in a hard and cruel working world. What are the views of those women who are doing good work in the world, leading earnest and useful lives, and who are women of the highest intellectual attainments? One of the strongest and most convincing arguments in favour of a Bill of this kind is, that it has had the support of such women as Mrs. Somerville, Mrs. Mary Carpenter, Miss Cobbe, Mrs. W. Gray, and Miss Florence Nightingale. If opinions are to be weighed, and not counted, I wonder how many nonentities, who laugh at woman's rights, it would take to outweigh these names? These ladies have not been led to take an interest in the question by any theoretical or sentimental ideas on the subject. They have been led to devote themselves to the question by what they have seen of the unfairness of the present state of things on the lives and work of women. They know how women are affected by the unjust state of the law, and they know how hopeless a task it is for those who have no political power to get the law reformed. The first Session I had the honour of a seat in this House, an eminent lawyer (Lord Coleridge), who was then Attorney General, made a speech, in which he referred to the unfair state of the law as far as women are concerned. He said that if the House of Commons was as much aware as every lawyer was aware of the state of the law of England as regards the property of women, he did not think it would hesitate to say that the law was more worthy of a barbarian than of a civilized community. That is the opinion of a great and eminent lawyer, delivered many years after Lord Brougham had said there must be an entire re-construction of the law before women could obtain justice. Even in those countries where women are best treated, the law is generally unfavourable to them in respect to almost all the points on which they are most deeply interested. Women desire the franchise, not from any fancied equality with men, but because they heard that the possession of political influence is the only guarantee for legislative justice. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire said there was not a single case in which the interests of women were opposed to those of men, and he objected to women being looked upon as a class. Now, that seemed to me to be a most extraordinary statement. I confess that I do not yet understand what the hon. Member meant in making that assertion. It may be said that women, like men, belong to many classes—the rich and the poor, the industrious and the idle, the good and the bad, and so on; but there is nothing more absurd than to say women are not a class. In reference to legislation, they are a class as far as they have special interests concerned which are affected by legislation. Have women no special interest in the laws affecting marriage? Have they no interest in the laws affecting the property of women? Have they no special interest in the guardianship of children? Then, again, look at the great number of subjects on which we legislate with special reference to the industrial pursuits of women—the hours at which women are to be employed, and so on. In all of these cases they have a distinct and peculiar interest as great—and in some respects greater—than that of man. Then we are told that we are endeavouring to upset a state of things that has existed from the creation of the world; that we are going to destroy the relations between the sexes, which have endured for all time. The same thing has been said in regard to polygamy and of slavery over and over again. Slavery is almost co-eval with the creation of man. The Digest itself, which represents the wisdom of 13 centuries, says that slavery is a constitution of the law of nature. We must look forward in these things. We must advance as every civilized country advances. Our position is a high one, and we must maintain it. The most extraordinary statement yet made in the course of the debate was the statement made by the hon. Member for North Staffordshire, when he said that as civilization advances women grow weaker and weaker because government is more and more based on physical strength. That is a statement which contradicts all the facts of history, and all the experience of mankind. In an elementary condition of society government was nothing more than the expression of brute force; but as civilization goes on other influences begin to work. The intellectual and the moral forces came to the front, and it has begun to be recognized that there is something in government beyond mere brute strength. Law is the protection and the refuge of the weak. The man who says that woman is not to have a voice in the shaping of the law because she is physically weaker than man, uses an argument which shows that he never reached a fundamental conception of what the nature of law is. This demand for the suffrage is only part of the great movement which has been going on for years in this country, and which is opening out a wider range of thought and broader sympathies for the women of England. Let us look back to the state of things which existed in those distant states of society to which the hon. Member for North Staffordshire wishes to confine us. Once upon a time there was a grave question whether the spiritual and immortal nature of man was shared by woman, and whether the possession of a soul was not the exclusive attribute of the lords of creation. Chrysostom described woman as a necessary evil, a natural temptation, a desirable calamity, a domestic peril, a deadly fascination, a painted lie. Many arguments advanced to-day will in time to come seem quite as ridiculous as this. The time will come when men will no longer desire to exclude, upon such grounds, so large a portion of the industry and intelligence of the country from the enjoyment of the simple rights of citizenship and the discharge of the elementary duties of citizenship. There is no question of antagonism between the sexes. This movement is not based upon the assumption of such antagonism. We cannot raise women without raising men. Man has a direct interest in the progress of every movement which has for its object the elevation of woman. This movement will raise woman, widen her mental power, and elevate her ideas. The more you do this the more you fit woman for that high and true companionship with man to which nature, in making her a reasonable and intellectual being, has clearly intended her. The companionship we should secure for her is not companionship in the mere frivolities of life, but in those great aims and interests which occupy the highest thoughts of man. It is the absence of such companionship, and the want of objects of sufficient interest—the want of capacity on the part of woman to enter into the thoughts of man—that strikes the greatest blow at domestic happiness. I shall vote for the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard, because I think that while it will be an act of justice to admit those women to the franchise who possess the only qualification the law insists upon, it will also widen their ideas, enlarge their intellects, and lead them to take a rational interest in the affairs of the country in which they have so large a stake, and whose future to so great an extent depends upon them.

MR. GORST: Having never troubled the House with a speech on this subject before, I hope they will forgive me for troubling them on this occasion. My excuse for doing so is the conduct of the Party to which I have the honour to belong. Many Members of that Party have been strong supporters of Bills similar to that which is now before the House; and, under these circumstances, it would have been somewhat strange if no single Member were to rise on this side of the House and speak in support of the measure, now that the Conservative Party are in Office. I think, moreover, that when you look at the back of the Bill, and find among the names of those responsible for the preparation of the measure that of so illustrious a Member as the late Recorder of London (Mr. Russell Gurney). I think that it is only right that some Member of the Conservative Party should endeavour to fill his place, and recommend a measure to which he was always known to give his warmest support. When we on this side of the House were in favour of such a Bill, we were in favour of it on the ground of principle. Those were days when we had what we were pleased to call our principles; and the principle on which we supported this measure was that we were in favour of personal liberty as opposed to legislative restrictions. Those were days when persons were harassed by over-legislation; when interests and classes of people were oppressed by Acts of Parliament; and when the Conservative Party used to lift up its voice in favour of personal liberty and of leaving people to mind their own affairs themselves, trusting to their discretion, good judgment, and sense of right and wrong, rather than endeavouring to tie everybody down by Acts of Parliament. The Leader of the Conservative Party (the Earl of Beaconsfield) was always in favour of this measure on the grounds I have stated, and I have no reason to believe he has changed his mind. I have not heard it stated that he has abandoned his former opinions. But, certainly, a strong change seems to have come over the Party he leads. I believe that there are Members of the Cabinet professing Conservative opinions who give their votes, and on several occasions have raised their voices, in favour of this measure. Where are they this afternoon? The Leader of the House (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), I believe, has recommended this measure to the House of Commons. He has certainly supported it by his vote. Why is he not here to state to his Party the reasons which induced him in times past—and perhaps will induce him this afternoon—to give his support to the measure? Unless we have abandoned the principles which it was convenient to assume in Opposition, I think we ought to act up to them on an occasion like the present, or to offer to the House and the country some reason why we are prepared to put down the other sex by legislative enactments, instead of trusting to their own discretion and sense of right and wrong. That is my first excuse. My second excuse is this—that there has been of recent years so much use made of that sort of argument, which Mr. Bentham called “the hobgoblin argument.” I never found any Member who very strongly objects to the measure now before the House who did not say that what he objected to was not the measure itself so much as what it would lead to. [“Hear, hear!”] As I hear the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) cheer that remark, I presume there are still those in this House who are afraid of what it is going to lead to. Now, I always endeavour to be frank with the House, and I am bound to say that this “hobgoblin argument” has received great support from the agitation which has been carried on by the advocates of the measure in this country, and from the speeches which have been made in this House in support of it. It certainly is an argument which has had a great effect upon the House. It has terrified Members on this side, and sober-minded and intelligent Members on the other side. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) was so terrified at the prospect of what might happen if the measure passed, that he was instrumental in forming, a few years ago, a society for the protection of men. That society has, I believe, succeeded in diverting some hon. Members from the opinions they formerly entertained, and, among others, the hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Hanbury). I believe that the hon. Member for North Staffordshire was at one time a strong supporter of the Bill, and that he was induced to change his mind, and was brought round to his new mode of thinking, entirely by the use of the “hobgoblin argument.” Members who, like myself, always supported this measure upon moderate, and what some people may, perhaps, call very low, grounds, should, I think, state the grounds on which they vote, in order that they may not be confounded with the advocates of women's rights, and those who wish, as an hon. Member said just now, to turn the world upside down. Now, I am not one of the strong advocates of women's rights. I do not believe that women are much oppressed, or that their prospects, on the whole, are very bad, or that their interests are in an unsatisfactory condition. I do not myself feel that if we pass this Bill for the removal of the disabilities of women in regard to the election of Members of Parliament, there will be any great revolution at all. A Bill was passed some time ago for giving them votes for members of Town Councils. That has not altered the character of the sex. If an intelligent observer, who had been absent since this measure passed, should return to the country now, he would not think that the character of the women of England had been much altered by the passing of that measure; nor do I believe that if a Bill like the one now before the House were carried, it would have the immense effect either its friends or its enemies in some cases prognosticate. I wish to say that, in supporting this Bill, I support it on the principle I have always believed the Party to which I have the honour to belong adhered to. That principle is, that you are not to impose upon any person any legal restriction not absolutely necessary, that you are to trust not to the positive enactments of law, but to the sober and intelligent discretion of people themselves to choose the particular careers in life to which they will devote themselves. I am willing to remove every legal disability from women, not because I wish to see women embark in pursuits for which they are unfitted, or because I am desirous of seeing them become the surgeons, lawyers, or legislators of the country; but because I think you may sufficiently trust to the intelligence and discretion of women themselves to embark in such pursuits as it is desirable they should adopt. I do not want to see women sit in this House. It may be said that it is impertinent for me to interfere with their discretion in the matter, and that I should, according to my own principles, express no opinion as to whether women ought or ought not to have seats in this House. But, be that as it may, I think it is a question which might with perfect safety be left to the decision of the women themselves, and that there is no occasion to impose upon them any disability; because I do not believe that you would find that women would ever embark themselves in pursuits and positions of life for which by their character they are unsuited. I have a high opinion of the intelligence and discretion of the female sex, and I do not think that they require all this legislation. They do not require that my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Smollett) should take them under his protection, and decide for them what they are to do and what they are not to do. We should give them perfect liberty, and they could then decide for themselves. I shall vote for the Bill simply because I am in favour of the removal of restrictions. It takes away a restriction which I think is unnecessarily imposed by the law, and it leaves women in exactly the same position as that which is occupied by men. I consider that they are as fully entitled to the franchise as men, and that they should be as free as men to make such use of the franchise when they get it as they in their own discretion shall think proper. I therefore give my cordial support to the Bill as a Bill simply for the removal of disabilities, and I do it on the principle of personal liberty, and because I think you ought not tie women down by artificial restrictions, but should allow them to be free and equal with men in the eye of the law, with full discretion to act as they think fit.

MR. R. FERGUSON: Having hitherto given a silent vote against this Bill, I desire, with the permission of the House, to state briefly why I have done so. It seems to me that before entering upon the question whether women ought or ought not to have the suffrage, we should have a more distinct answer than we have as yet had to another question, and that is—"Do women want to have the suffrage?" I am well aware that there are a certain number of women—earnest and intellectual women—who have strong feelings and aspirations in that direction; and I am bound to admit that they are themselves eminently qualified for the discharge of any duties which might in consequence devolve upon them. And if any of them can be described—I should be very sorry myself to use such an expression—as "social failures," it seems to me all the more just and fair that they should have as men have, the opportunity of distinguishing themselves in another sphere. But, as far as my observation extends, there are a very much larger number of women who are most strongly opposed to this measure, and perhaps a greater number still who are profoundly indifferent. It has been said that those who do not wish need not qualify, and ought not to stand in the way of those who do. But we may be very sure that in places where party spirit runs high—and these places are by no means few—very strong pressure would be put upon women who could qualify and did not, either by the eager partizans among their friends, or perhaps even in some cases by their religious advisers, to induce them to do what they would call their duty to their country, and, between the two influences, these women would be placed in an unpleasant position. But that, after all, is only a minor objection; and the main objection is the inevitable lowering of political spirit by the introduction of an indifferent, if not a reluctant, contingent. It may be that this adverse feeling on the part of women may undergo a change; and I am not quite sure that there are not symptoms that this change has already begun. And when it appears to me that women in general desire to have the suffrage, I should be disposed to vote for it; for I think we may fairly assume that the political interest therein evinced must be accompanied by some political aptness.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: I have a few words to say on the subject of the measure now before the House, and I wish, in the first place, to refer to what has fallen from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who has chosen to speak to us in behalf of the Conservative Party. He will find, on looking back through the record of those who have sat on this side of the House, that both of us are among those Members of the Conservative phalanx who, in former times, as well as at the present moment, have been, and still are, very independent specimens of that Party; and, as I never yet have sacrificed my independence, even at the bidding of "the front Bench," I still more positively refuse to sacrifice it now at the bidding of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham. What right he has to come here and, in the deplorable state of Robinson Crusoeism in which that Bench now is, to constitute himself, for the time being, Leader of the Conservative Party, and lecture us upon our duties with regard to this Bill, passes my comprehension. I tell him to his face, as I have said in his absence, he has no right to speak for the Conservative Party, and that his historical memory is about on a par with his legal right in this matter. Some Members of our Party may have voted, and some will now, in favour of the Bill; but it is simply a vision of the hon. and learned Gentleman's own imagination, that those on this side of the House ever as a Party took up this measure. On both sides of the House this Bill has, happily, been regarded as one of the few great questions which have not been made a matter of Party warfare; and I trust and believe that it will continue so, until, ultimately, it will become a Party matter on both sides never to let this scheme become the law of the land. But my hon. and learned Friend comes forward, and projects himself upon us like an aerolite. He tells us that he is in favour of this Bill, on the principle of personal liberty; but what that personal liberty may be he does not tell us. Now, suppose any hon. Member were to bring in a Bill, say to give legislative sanction to polygamy, or anything of that sort, the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham would be—or rather, his assertion, for it is not an argument—"I am a Member of the Conservative Party; I am in favour of personal liberty, and therefore I vote for the Bill." That would be just as sound in regard to a Bill to sanction polygamy as for anything else; because when he made the assertion the hon. and learned Gentleman forgot the little ceremony of proving the connection between the assertion and the result to which it led. The only other portion of his speech, on which I feel inclined to make any remark, is the regret he expressed, that he was not present at the beginning of the discussion. Well, I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman in expressing that regret; for if he had been present when the discussion began, I do not think he would have made the speech he has just addressed to this House. I have been present all day; and I may say that very seldom has it been my lot to listen with more thorough and entire satisfaction to a speech delivered in this House than when I heard the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and I will tell the hon. and learned Gentleman why I say so. It is because I never saw a speaker more completely kick into infinite space the ladder on which he had climbed. The hon. and learned Gentleman got up to advocate a Bill which was intended to give the franchise to spinsters and to widows, but which would leave unfranchised that portion of the female world which, to use the graceful language which we have just heard of the lady Petitioners, "carries out the profession of matrimony." I do not see the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Sir Thomas Chambers) here to-day; but I would ask, how often has the hon. and learned Gentleman laboured in this House, with a zeal and energy which I can only compare to the exertions of Sisyphus, in rolling his eternal stone up-hill in endless repetition, to prove that he was merely advocating a Constitutional measure? My hon. and learned Friend has merely advocated a Bill to enfranchise the unmarried or the widowed portion of the other sex; he would be no party to anything that should establish an equality of female right. I quite believe in the sincerity of my hon. and learned Friend; and I think that never was sincerity more thoroughly proved than by the hopeless despair in which he has run away from his own Bill—that totally unworkable measure, in regard to which his own good sense has shown him the radically false position he has taken up. Well, what was the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney)? I appeal to those few hon. Members of the House who, like myself, had the advantage of hearing it, whether it was not, from first to last, an unqualified and uncompromising and logical claim for a new departure for the whole political and social system, not merely of England, but of the whole world—an assertion of rights and claims on the part of womankind which have no relation at all to the Constitution of the country, which have no relation to the franchise as it now exists, which have no relation to our form of government as it at present exists, and which have no affinity with our existing social relations; but which are merely the Utopia of a sanguine and purely theoretical philosopher? In this, I think the hon. and learned Gentleman only reflected, with a little exaggeration, the phenomenal arguments of the accomplished ladies whose brief he has taken up. If there be one fact which more than another would convince me that opposition to this Bill is the course pointed out by common sense and worldly wisdom, it is this—that the advocacy of the measure, notwithstanding all the infinite struggles of those who have laboured to push it on, has never advanced beyond a very limited and very definite circle—a circle composed mostly of women, but some of whose components are men, who have never been able to throw off the oppressive burden of the a priori, who, having come into the world with a theory of creation—a theory of human nature which is not exactly that which exists among the rest of human kind—have never been able to square their own conceptions with the accidents of the world as they find it. Those persons have created for themselves a phantasm of women's wrongs, of women's disabilities, and of women's disadvantages—they have created for themselves a theory that those disadvantages may be removed by an arbitrary, so to speak, mechanical agency, conferring on women social and political privileges such as are only to be found for a fragment of the sex in the provisions of this contemptible Bill, which is the result of this great theory. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, as I have said, has thrown away his Bill; but the arguments for it are dead against every limitation in it—dead against the disfranchisement of women, dead against the division of women with or without property, dead against everything but that doctrine of the general, the theoretical, right of women as women, on which might be based a Constitution, but one which will not be the British Constitution with which we have been hitherto familiar. Just look at the question for one moment. The hon. and learned Member for Liskeard talks of woman's career being opened up, of women meeting men on an intellectual equality—a point on which he dwelt with emphasis. I will assume that the hon. and learned Gentleman is a practical man, in spite of his speech, and I would beg of him to see how he turns the “pretty fool” into an intellectual woman. She must be a ratepayer, and she must be an occupier or a lodger. By this Bill she is to be thus turned into the intellectual equal of my hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Courtney), or my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). Well, we will assume the case of some such woman. She is well educated, she has the franchise, and some agreeable, highly-trained man, who is her intellectual equal, wins her heart. She has her choice—either to remain a blighted being, but an intellectual one, and a voter, and in all respects man's social and political equal; or to change her name, and thus to change her nature, shedding her intellect as she puts on her wedding ring, and becoming a degraded and inherently unintellectual worker of samplers and mother of children. Now, I appeal to my hon. and learned Friend, whom I know to be a man of culture, a man of intellect, and a man of experience—I ask him how he can reconcile his magnificent assumptions with the miserable limitations of this Bill, which he has inherited from that sound Constitutional lawyer, the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone? The Bill, in fact, breaks down on its own assumptions. It is to be worked on Constitutional lines; and yet its promoters only propose to work it for the unmarried women and widows! The absurdity of the thing flies in their own faces, and they will be compelled either to go further or abandon the project altogether. The hon. Member who spoke on the other side gave as an argument why we must not enfranchise a married woman, that she and her husband would probably differ in politics, and that, in that case, they would live the life of cat and dog. But, I would ask, is the unmarried woman supposed to be so totally divorced from human sympathies, human relationships, human duties, human obligations, and human difficulties, that her political independence will leave her totally free in the serene exercise of her political duties, and that not until she is married will those dreadful complications and quarrels, to which I have referred, arise? Let us suppose that she is not married, but engaged. Here is a bright young Liberal maid, engaged to a handsome young Tory. A General Election is to take place two years hence, and it will come in February, 1881—for that is the time that it must come. This young lady is versed in woman's subjects, and, in the world at large, she is a reader of every intellectual and able publication. She is engaged in January, and her marriage is fixed for March. Is it possible that, if she were to vote for the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard, and the Conservative, though good-looking young gentleman, were to vote for a man of opposite politics, and take his stand on the re-actionary side—the re-actionary side of this question—there would, on the hypothesis which I am considering, be peace and happiness between them? She will at that day be only engaged, and not married; and so, upon the theory of the hon. and learned Member, her voting would be a perfectly safe proceeding. I do hope that the hon. and learned Member for Liskeard will add a clause to the Bill, saying that, whenever it is not otherwise provided, human nature should be taken to be human nature in the sense of The Women's Suffrage Journal. Any trouble, any difficulty, any social inconvenience that may attach to the vote will be equally attached to the wife, the spinster, and the widow. I deny that there is anything like a public opinion on the part of the reasoning, intelligent, thinking wives and mothers of England in favour of the Bill. Petitions have been presented up till to-day signed by 111,000 persons in favour of the Bill; but hon. Members who know what petitioning means, who know what The Women's Suffrage Journal aims at, who know what an active organization implies, who know the meaning of meetings where women speak and attractive Members of Parliament take the chair, will well know how to estimate the value of Petitions with 111,000 signatures. What do such Petitions mean? They mean that millions of women in England are either totally unstirred by the question, or are deeply and conscientiously opposed to so listless a change as this Bill proposes. What is the Bill? It says that married women may be cruelly treated by their husbands, may be defrauded of their money, and shall not be entitled to a vote; but that any unmarried lady who drives her brougham, and who may have some difficulty in showing how she provides the money to pay the rent of the house at the door of which that brougham draws up, may have the franchise. This is the Bill which the hon. and learned Member for Chatham is so enamoured of, and which he calls on us to support in the name of the Conservative Party. I know as well the zeal for the ladies of the hon. and learned Serjeant the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Serjeant Sherlock); but I think that he and the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Blennerhassett) make this mistake—they go too far in what they say: they either prove the absolute necessity of the enfranchisement of all woman-kind, or else they prove that the measure ought not to be entertained in any shape. The hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Palmer), in his spirited maiden speech, threw in our teeth the fact that a man's personal conduct was no qualification nor disqualification for the franchise; but the difference is, that the peculiar franchise created by this Bill is one that gives a direct premium to women to follow the less creditable professions—to use the felicitous phrase of the ladies' Petition—instead of the higher and more honourable ones. This, I think, is of itself conclusive as against the Bill. I suppose we shall every year have a Wednesday given up to the discussion of this proposal; but as long as these discussions exhibit the House at 4 o'clock as it now shows itself; so long as the arguments are pressed ad infinitum by the same circle of clever and intellectual, but not very well-contented, nor very practical-minded ladies; so long as persons without any difference of political opinion merely turn to the consideration of the question on the strength of their own good sense and knowledge of the world as it is; so long, I assert, will the claim for women's franchise, consistently and creditably and conscientiously as it may be advocated, remain one of a purely artificial character. The evils it is said this Bill would remedy have no existence, or are greatly exaggerated; and it will not be able to remedy them, except on the extravagant hypothesis that women make a distinct party in the world in direct hostility to the party of man; that woman is born the natural enemy of man, and that if she be enfranchised she will be strong enough to make good the predominance of her party against that of man; that she will be able to return a Parliament of men who will do what the present Parliament has left undone, and leave undone everything which the present Parliament has done. I hold that the thing asked for is a mere phantasm, which only creates a mischievous state of agitation—calls people away from real duties and real responsibilities to sham grievances and illusory wrongs. If you pass this Bill, you will have the choice of two alternatives—you will either vexatiously, but purposely, weaken the intellectual and moral force of the electoral body, or else you will give free leave and charter to theories which may be benevolent, but which are illusory and contrary to all sound principles of law and political economy, and against all the principles of generous and strong, because reasonable and workable, morality.

MR. HIBBERT: I think the House will agree with me that my hon. Friend who has just sat down has given us a very agreeable and amusing speech; but I think they will also agree with me in saying that he has not met the arguments in favour of the Bill by any reasonable counter-arguments. I think, likewise, that he was rather hard—and perhaps a little unfairly so—on the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who, when he got up to speak in favour of this Bill, spoke, as I took it, in reference to the empty state of the Government Bench, and not on behalf of the Conservative Party. I think that we on this side of the House have a right to express our agreement with him in the remarks he made as to the empty condition of the opposite benches. We know that at least three, if not four, of the Members of the present Government have formerly voted in favour of this Bill. The first case I will mention is that of the Leader of this House—the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—who has voted on many an occasion in favour of the measure, and who I am sorry is not in his place. Then we have the noble Lord the Postmaster General, who I am happy to see in his place. He has often recorded his vote in favour of the Bill, and I trust will once more do so to-day. The Chancellor of the Exchequer last year met a large and influential deputation of ladies and gentlemen favourable to the measure, and on that occasion he said he still sympathized with the object of the Bill. But he also said the matter resolved itself into a question of expediency and opportunity. I do not know whether he meant that that opportunity would come when the present Government go out; but I should have thought that the same reasons might have been given for supporting the Bill, whether a Conservative or a Liberal Government are in power. The question is not a Party question. The Bill is supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) has rather tried to throw a slur on this question by saying it is a very small affair, and that the Bill has not created in its favour any large influence throughout the country. I entirely disagree with him in this. I remember when, in 1867, the late John Stuart Mill first brought the question before the House on an Amendment to a clause of the Reform Bill, and at that time only about 70 Members went into the Lobby to vote with him; but since then the number has been more than doubled. As I understand, it includes now between 140 and 150 Members. But I do not think that this fact alone sufficiently shows the interest felt in the country on this question. I will not say much of the Petitions in its favour, because I quite agree with my hon. Friend opposite that you may get up Petitions on almost any question; but we have also the fact that large public meetings have been held in various parts of the country, and that they have almost unanimously declared themselves in favour of this measure. We also know that many of the largest and most important Corporations throughout the country—such as those of Birmingham, Edinburgh, Manchester, and other large centres of population—have petitioned unanimously in favour of the Bill. If this be so, I do not think we can say that the measure has not grown into importance and is not worthy of the attention of the House of Commons. I think the promoters of the Bill may take heart of grace at the progress they have made, especially when they remember that it is not much more than 10 years since this question was first brought before the House. During that interval women have obtained in many ways a much better status than they had before. It was said by my hon. Friend that the admission of women to the municipal franchise was an accident; I do not agree with him. The fact is, that women were allowed municipal votes after a full discussion of the question in this House, and it happened to be on an Amendment to a Bill on the municipal franchise which I myself brought before the House. Well, again, women have been allowed to vote in the election of members of school boards, and they have exercised the power given to them in every way to the benefit and satisfaction of the country. And not only are they allowed to vote for members of school boards, but they are allowed themselves to sit on school boards, and we have several remarkable cases of ladies who have acted on school boards with the greatest ability and judgment. Besides this, they have votes for vestries and for the election of Poor Law Guardians, while they have also the right to be elected as guardians of the poor. If this be so, what reason is there why we should stop here and say that while they, equally with men, pay rates, they shall not have the privilege of voting for Members of Parliament? I confess that I can see no reason for taking this position, except it be a reason to say that they are objected to because they are women. If there is anything in the objection, it must be either because they are not fit to give a vote, or else it is that their admission would be an injury to the Constitution, or an injury to the women themselves. I cannot understand that any reason can be brought to bear against the proposal to give women votes as a matter affecting the Constitution itself. Women are allowed to enter into trade. They carry on large businesses. I have myself known women carry on large cotton-spinning concerns in a very satisfactory and successful manner. They are owners of land, and they are in many ways called upon to perform the same duties which men are called upon to perform. Therefore, I think that this Bill proposes what is only fair and just with respect to the class of women who are occupying householders. I should not support the Bill if it went further than this. Then, is there any reason why women should not have votes, looking at the question as one affecting themselves? Well, we are told that if women had votes, they would be less attentive to their domestic duties; but I want to know whether the political duties which a woman would be called upon to perform, were this Bill passed, are so onerous that they can interfere materially with their domestic duties? Men have their business duties, and women would not be in a worse position than men. But then we are told that women cannot perform the duties which attach to the privileges of men. I have heard it used as an argument against granting these privileges that women cannot serve upon juries. I cannot see any reason why, in many cases, women might not satisfactorily serve on juries. There are many cases in which women-jurors would be able to give a more satisfactory and judicious verdict than men. It was said that women could not serve their country in war. I admit they could not enter the Army; but if there is any country where that argument ought not to be used, it is this one. Ours is a paid Army. No man is compelled to serve in the Army, and that no woman could be called upon to perform duties which men are not obliged to perform is no reason for denying the suffrage to women-householders. Each sex has duties which they can perform separately to the satisfaction of the country, and their performance of different duties is no argument for the exclusion of women. In fact, there is no reasonable argument against this measure, either on the ground that it would do injury to women themselves, or that it would be injurious to the Constitution. I do not wish to use any exaggerated language as to the result of giving the vote to women-householders. I do not think myself that any great difference would be made in the Membership of this House; but a grievance felt by a large class would be done away with, and we have always legislated in this country with the object of doing away with grievances. At a time when an Election is about to take place, if women feel that they have grievances to remedy—that the law in respect to their property is not satisfactory—that the law with respect to assaults upon women is in need of improvement—or that the education of women demands legislative attention, I do not see why it should not be in their power to exercise a direct influence upon the Legislature. I think the influence they would bring to bear upon the Election would be a just and good influence, and would not be exercised to their own injury, but to the great benefit of the Constitution. The late Mr. Mill, when he brought this matter before the House, did so in a manner that made a great impression on the House. It was entirely owing to his speech that I decided at that time to vote for his proposal, which I have ever since continued to vote for. I will trouble the House with a few of his words, and I hope they will have some influence on hon. Members to-day. He said—

“There is no other example of an exclusion which is absolute. If the law denied a vote to all but the possessors of £5,000 a-year, the poorest man in the nation might—and now and then would—acquire the suffrage; but neither birth, nor fortune, nor merit, nor exertion, nor intellect, nor even that great disposer of human affairs, accident, can ever enable any woman to have her voice counted in those national affairs which touch her and hers as nearly as any other person in the nation.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxvii. 817.]

I say, then, on these grounds, let us act justly in the matter; let us place women in the same position as men, and if we do that we shall never regret the day when we gave women the same privilege as men, of voting in an Election of a Member of Parliament.

MR. GREENE: I had no intention to address the House on this occasion, because this is one of those subjects which are already very well thrashed out, and the interest in which becomes less every year. But the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) has caused me to rise. He has said it is very extraordinary why the Conservative Party while they were in Opposition should have supported this measure, and should not do so now. I, for one, have never supported this measure, whether my Party has been in power or out of power. I am told that there are weak brethren who have voted for this measure thinking it would be in the interest of the Conservative Party; but I, for one, have such strong feelings on this subject, that my Party might stay on the Opposition side of the House till the Day of Judgment before I would vote for this measure, which I believe to be contrary to true principles. I think that first impressions are generally right, and I am sure that the first impression that this Bill would create, if it were new to hon. Members, would lead them to throw it down and say “rubbish.” The hon. Member who has just sat down says he does not see any reason why women should not serve on juries. I believe there is no country in the world that at this moment gives women the vote, and I read in The Women's Suffrage Journal that the system of placing women on juries in America, after a few trials, was abandoned, and had not been revived. Arguments are used on the other side about struggling women in want of work; but I want to know whether, if women had a vote, the House would in consequence provide work for struggling women? If hon. Members would only devote half the time employed in the advocacy of this measure to the attempt to reform the laws under which they were at present alleged to be suffering evil, they would do greater service to the sex. The hon. Member who last spoke said he did not think that this measure would have any effect upon the laws at all. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham is all for the liberty of the subject now. He would be a suitable Member to sit on the other side of the House. When I hear his speeches I never quite know whether he is on this side or the other. He generally, after all, votes right, and that makes up for other shortcomings. I would ask him, is there any greater inconsistency than that involved in this Bill, which would allow a single woman to have a vote and deprive her of it directly she is married? I put this case. A man marries a widow who has children. These children have property under the mother's control, and the husband has no power over it. The widow would be unable to give a vote in the interests of her children. I confess it seems to me utterly absurd that this Bill should pass. It is a short Reform Bill that will overwhelm the votes of men, and on that ground alone it is objectionable. Now, there is one Member of this House, with whom I do not agree in politics, but who spoke on this Bill last year—the right hon. Member for Birmingham—and he said—

“I should like to ask the House whether it is desirable to introduce our mothers, and wives, and sisters, and daughters into the excitement, and the turmoil . . . . which seems in every country so far to attend a system of Parliamentary representation, whether it be in the United States, where so many systems are tried, or whether in this country?”—[3 Hansard, cccxviii. 1737.]

He further goes on to say—

“The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) referred to the Catholic question to the influence that might be exercised by Catholic priests. I will not go into that further than to say that every man in this House must be sensible, and those who are in favour of this Bill have never to me ventured to deny, that the influence of priest, parson, and minister would be greatly increased if this Bill and other measures of a similar character were passed.”—[Ibid., 1739.]

These are words which will, perhaps, have some weight on the other side. Nobody has answered them. If you pass this measure, you cannot logically deny the right of women to sit in this House. No man has a greater regard and respect for women than I have. There are a vast number of women far superior to men; but, taking them as a body, they have not the same intelligence or the same power of forming a judgment on great questions that men have. Lord Aberdare, whose name will be respected on both sides of the House, has clearly shown that women were not intended to occupy the position of men. Otherwise we should not in the 19th century be without an instance of some country in which the experiment has been tried. I have not altered my opinion on this subject, although I have had pressure put upon me. I have been told my seat would be safe for ever if I voted for this measure. But I would rather sit outside the House than sit in it on these terms. I have no idea of sitting here except on principle, and I have never given a vote unless I believed it to be for the good of the nation. I have not voted for the sake of temporary benefit to my Party, and I shall give my vote this afternoon against this measure. I do hope that hon. Members who bring this Bill forward and find their case waving will spare the House of Commons the time and Members the trouble of voting year after year on a Bill which I prophecy will never pass this House.

SIR HENRY JACKSON: I do feel to some extent that I agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, that it may not be altogether desirable that this Bill should be ventilated every year; but I think the House will only do justice to my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard in recognizing that, after what took place in the last debate, it was impossible for him to abstain from seeking a vote of the House upon the measure. He certainly was not to blame last year for the misfortune which prevented the vote of the House being taken. I cannot but feel that this is one of those measures which might be discussed at the beginning and at the end of a Parliament; but I am disposed to doubt whether a cause really gains ground by a perpetual annual Motion which does, to some extent, fatigue the House. I say that, Sir, entirely in the interests of the movement, of which I confess myself an ardent supporter. I throw out the suggestion to those in charge of the measure, not to discourage them in their efforts, but as a hint calculated, I hope, to insure their ultimate success. It is almost hopeless to say anything new on this subject. All the humour, I am bound to say, is on the side of the opponents of this Bill, and they never fail to treat this subject with a jocularly which they think takes the place of solid and serious argument and objection. If the proposal of the measure is well understood, it is perfectly simple. The promoters of the Bill practically say—“We find, as a part of the Constitution of the country, that the suffrage is given to men who satisfy a certain condition. In counties it is either property or occupation. In boroughs the basis of the franchise is the payment by the head of the family of his contributions to the State. If you find a woman in this position paying the same contributions to the State, and doing all for the State that she is allowed by law to do, in precisely the same way as a man, what is the reason why that woman, so discharging these duties, cannot have the same voice or influence in the destinies of the country as a man?" That is the simple question involved, and I have never heard any attempt to answer it except one—which is, that she is a woman. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University does not meet this question; but, as if he were the most violent supporter of the extremest claim of women's rights, pulls my hon. Friend's Bill to pieces because it does not go far enough. He says my hon. Friend is not only ungallant, but exceedingly illogical, because he picks out certain members of the female sex and proposes to endow them with the franchise, and leaves the larger proportion of the sex entirely out in the cold. It is easy to see that this is only playing with the question. My hon. Friend, in his Bill, does not attempt to take any step in the direction of establishing woman suffrage further than would be done by declaring that a householder shall not be under any disability simply by reason of her sex. I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University, would he support the Bill if it went any further? Would the Bill, in respect of which he makes the complaint that it leaves out married women, be more palatable to him if it attempted to enfranchise them? I am putting a question to which he could give but one answer. The question that really must be decided by to-day's vote is this—Is the disability of sex based on reason, justice, or expediency, or have those who assert that it ought no longer to be an impediment, made out their case? That, Sir, I take to be the real question which has to be answered by those who vote to-day; and, for my own part, I have no hesitation in saying we all lose by the infliction of disabilities. In a former debate, the hon. Member for Cambridge University said that in the beginning human beings were created male and female, and it was the will of the Creator to assign to each of them their separate sphere. The observation, though trite, was perfectly true; but who is to measure, who is to define or prescribe the limits within which the energy and power given by the Creator to the two sexes is to operate? What other reasonable limit can there be than the power which every individual feels in herself or himself to do work in their own sphere? I do not think myself that this Bill, if passed, would have a very marked effect on political Parties; but it would be another step in the recognition of the principle which, I maintain, we ought to contend for—the principle of the carrière ouverte, as the French call it, to every individual. It is said that everything woman requires is already done for them. I quite agree that great strides have lately been made in the way of opening careers to women; but whatever has practically been done has been done reluctantly. Nothing has been given at all, but everything has been obtained, as it were, at the point of the bayonet, and has been fenced about with restrictions. At the present moment, with the single exception of a limited entry into the Medical Profession, there are few careers actually open to women. Now, I shall always support every effort which seems to me to tend to the removal of these restraints. I shall do so as an act of justice to women, and because, by removing these restrictions on individual energy, I shall be doing the best service to the State and to the whole community. It seems to me that all experience tends in this direction, and there is no experience to the contrary. Has any hon. Member seriously maintained that the removal of these restrictions in the case of the municipal franchise has produced deplorable results? There is no evidence to that effect obtainable. All experience of all human work seems to show that you really are gaining for the public and the State by removing these social and political disabilities. We all remember when ladies began nursing in hospitals; and when Miss Nightingale went to the Crimea, the same people who now turn up their eyes in horror at the notion of women taking any new part in life, were as much shocked at Miss Nightingale's course, and abused her for what we now look back upon with a sense of pride, and gratitude, and satisfaction. The Conservative instinct is so strong amongst us that there is nothing more difficult than to open out a new career for women. But we have seen how well ladies have done as hospital nurses. I have no hesitation in saying, from my personal knowledge, that any lady who has once had the advantage of the attendance of a lady medical adviser will shrink very much indeed from going to anyone else. What is our experience as to the removal of the disabilities from our own sex? How long it took to obtain the admission of Jews to the House! My hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire believed that to remove this personal religious disability would be to unchristianize this Assembly; but every Member must now feel that the removal of that disability has been to the advantage of the House. All experience of the removal of restrictions is similar. Inasmuch as men and women cannot do more than their respective powers will permit, what is the danger of removing these disabilities? It is because I believe this Bill to be a step in that direction, that I shall give it my support.

MR. ASSHETON: I am glad that the hon. and learned Baronet who has just sat down has held out some prospect that we shall not have this Bill before us next year. If this debate is to make some amends to the hon. Member for Liskeard for the fate which overtook this measure last year, I hope he will also make some amends for asking us to debate it now, by not bringing the subject forward again next Session. I am quite sure that this subject is not ripe for discussion. Some reference has been made to the deserted state of the Treasury Bench. I am sure the condition of that bench is a very fair criterion of public feeling. When any subject is stirring the thought of the country, Ministers find it necessary to be in their place. But when the debate takes the form of a pleasant and interesting discussion that can lead to no results, Ministers and other hon. Gentlemen who have serious business elsewhere stop elsewhere, and merely drop down here about the time they think the division will be likely to come on. I do not know that I should have risen to speak in this debate, had not mention been made more than once of The Women's Suffrage Journal by hon. Members who sit below me here. I have also had the privilege of having this paper sent me by some fair lady. I suppose, at least, it is sent me by a lady, and being a lady, of course she is fair. I have read that paper with very considerable interest, so much so that I began to wonder what other people might think of this question. My eyes wandered down the newspapers to try and find out. Amongst other paragraphs, I saw one describing the proceedings of a certain Municipal Council, which was not at Manchester, but was within 100 miles of that town. The proceedings were headed—"Miss Lydia Becker and his Worship." I thought the account was interesting, and if the House will allow me, I will read it to them. A communication was read from Miss Lydia Becker, of the National Association for Securing the Enfranchisement of Women, inclosing a Petition to Parliament in favour of the Bill for Removing the Disabilities of Women. One Alderman says—"I think we could not do better than send our Mayor to square it up with Lydia." Another says—"I think, as a matter of courtesy, he is bound to acknowledge the receipt of the letter." Then the Mayor says, in a great hurry—"Oh, it came to the Town Clerk!" Another member says—"Will he acknowledge it personally? I think he should." Then there was laughter; then the communication was placed upon the table; then the subject was dropped. Without pronouncing any exact opinion as to what the opinion of the Corporation of Manchester, which, I understand, has petitioned in favour of the Bill, is worth, I will say that I entirely endorse the course taken by this Corporation, and I think this Bill should be laid upon the Table, and dropped. That is an opinion, also, which appears to be endorsed by the Front Bench, as shown by their non-attendance this afternoon; and that, I believe, is an opinion which will be endorsed by a large majority of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Before the House divides, I wish to call attention to one or two circumstances which occurred at an earlier period of the afternoon, when the attendance of hon. Members in the House was very small. A story is told of Mr. Wilkes during one of the Elections for Middlesex. His opponent said—"I appeal to the common sense of the constituency." Mr. Wilkes retorted—"I shall appeal to their nonsense, and I shall beat you." The result justified his prediction, and I have always thought that this little incident explains why the House of Commons dealt so roughly with Mr. Wilkes. A man who obtained his seat by a successful appeal to the nonsense—which means the prejudices and the meaner instincts—of a constituency, was in those days not looked upon as a Member returned to this House for the purpose for which this House exists. This Bill appears to me to be founded upon sentimental nonsense. Anyone who has read the history of France will have observed that one of the great characteristics of the latter part of the ancien régime was that the educated classes lent themselves to extreme democratic notions—to a philosophy so absurd and so abstract, that it violated all those rules which the Creator has established for the government of man. Such was still the distortion of opinion in France, when Mr. Wilkes took refuge in Paris, in 1796, after having been expelled from this House. The nonsense of France was then represented by a sentimentality which was none the less nonsense because it was sentimental. The attendance in the House was thin when the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) spoke. I must do him the credit to say that he cast aside all the careful reservations as to the character of this Bill, which the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) has since so carefully built up; his whole argument went to the extreme of declaring that the object of this Bill was to establish a system of self-assertion among women, which would eventually place them above those considerations which have hitherto resulted from the difference between the sexes. I will quote to the House some of the hon. Member for Liskeard's expressions. He said that he claimed the franchise for women as an absolute right, and that it rested with the opponents of the Bill to show either that any such claimant was unfit for the franchise, or that it would be dangerous to grant it. He contended that the claimant, whether man, woman, or minor, had an absolute right to the franchise, and that an unjust restriction was imposed by refusing their demand. That was one of his proposals. Next, the hon. Member said that any political recognition of the difference between men and women was a relic of barbarism—of barbarism of the most primitive form, of government by force. He further stated that the object of the Bill was to develop self-dependence in women. He then asserted that the development of self-dependence in women tends to a revolution which is most desirable. I remember quoting a declaration made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, that this Bill was founded upon a revolutionary principle; and I ask the House, when these are the declarations of the Mover of the Bill, whether the right hon. Gentleman was not justified in making that assertion? It is the statement of such objects which has induced the United States, with their democratic Constitution, to resist and repudiate successive attempts to induce them to admit women to an equality with man in the franchise, with the view of creating among women that system of self-dependence which would lead them to ignore the distinctions of nature, the relations of the family, and to discard all those safeguards which they legitimately derive from the feeling, which the Creator has implanted in the breast of every man worthy of the name, that the comparative weakness of woman establishes on her part a claim to considerate protection and to privileges which he would refuse to his fellow-man. But the hon. Member for Liskeard did not stop there. In deprecating what the hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Coventry is kind enough to call our prejudices—our respect for the difference of sex—he compared the state of opinion of this country in the 19th century with the state of opinion in China, and said that the refusal of the franchise to women was paralleled by the manner in which the Chinese pinched their ladies' toes. I shall shortly show the House some of the other extreme arguments by which the hon. Member supports his views. We are not bound, in this House, he said, to consider the end of any course that we may adopt. It is sufficient for us that, at the time, we apparently satisfy what he described as the claims of justice—his notion of justice being that we should ignore the distinction between the sexes, and do all we can to create in the women of this country a feeling of self-assertion, which the democratic experience of the United States leads that country to believe to be inconsistent with their domestic happiness. I have spoken as shortly as I can, but I wished to show the House that this nonsense is not harmless, because it is sentimental. If this House were to sanction the second reading of this Bill according to the views of its Mover, it would adopt those principles of Socialistic democracy which at this moment are disturbing Germany, and which a few years ago convulsed France. I ask, therefore, whether, for the sake of passing this petty Bill—for its advocates dare not demand anything but a modicum of its real object in their terror of having its real scope discovered—the House will sanction the ultra-democratic principles which the hon. Member for Liskeard declared this morning to be involved in the adoption of the measure?

MR. COURTNEY: The hon. Member who has just sat down has reminded the House that Mr. Wilkes succeeded because he made his appeal to the nonsense of a constituency. I think it is quite possible that the result of the division which is shortly to be taken may again prove that he who appeals to nonsense is not always unsuccessful. In the few remarks I have to make in reply, I shall adhere as closely as possible to a consideration of those arguments which appear to me to be based upon a misconception of my former remarks. I have been accused—most strangely, as it appeared to me—of adducing arguments from natural rights, and my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) and the hon. Member for Cambridge town (Mr. Smollett), both assumed that certain logical deductions were inevitably to be drawn from the logical statements I was supposed to have made. I should have thought if any thing could be inferred from my speech, it was that I based the whole of my argument—as all the philosophy to which I can lay claim is based—upon the doctrine of expediency. I am a utilitarian pur et simple, and the want of logic of which my hon. Friend accuses me arises from a misconception of his own. This enfranchisement, so far as it goes, is demanded on the ground of public benefit, and the limitation of that enfranchisement is based upon the same principle that public benefit will accrue from that limitation. So far as that public benefit goes, the principle should be carried. Where the public benefit is not certain, the principle should cease. I take the Constitution of this realm to be this. This House is called together by the votes of certain arbitrarily-distributed constituencies, by which we do secure a fair—and, to a large extent, an adequate —representation of the different interests of the country. Take any constituency. Go to any street in any borough, or to any county, and you will find shops and farms side by side, one occupied by a man and the other by a woman. Upon what ground of expediency do you give the man a vote and refuse it to the woman? The arguments upon which representative government is defended do not concern themselves in the least with the question of sex. The general reasons why you give the vote to a man must apply to a woman, except in so far as you can show particular reasons against it. It is said—"If you admit women to the franchise at all, you must admit married women;" and then this Bill is denounced as illogical, because it does not admit married women. Nothing is more ridiculous than the affectation of logic by the illogical. Why do we admit spinsters and widows? Because, by that means, you will include a larger number in the representation of the country, get a greater number of persons represented not now represented, instruct the House, develop its sense of justice, and enlarge the character of women themselves. But when you come to the question of married women, there is at once another consideration. If you give a married woman a vote, politics may become a subject of domestic dissension; and that is a sound, if not a sufficient, reason for limiting the franchise. It is no argument against the proposition, that you thus abandon the main object in view—the development of the female character. I am not so sanguine as to hope that by giving a frivolous woman a vote you will at once convert her into a sober and staid matron; but I do look forward to the probability that the alteration will after some time exercise an influence on the female character. But if you give women the prospect of the exercise of political duties, you will make the study of social and political science part of the education of all women; and, whether married or not, you secure that great interest in matters of general benefit, which it is our object to secure. It is said, indeed, that the Creator has made women weak; but some years hence we may have better views of what He has intended in that respect, and we may discover that the intentions and views we have attributed to a higher power are simply the result of notions inherited by us from our ancestors. To say that these were the intentions of the Creator, is to give our opinions a degree of permanency to which they can have no claim. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Ferguson) said he had hitherto voted against this Bill, and should continue to do so to-day, because he did not discover that women were themselves in favour of it; but that if they were, he would vote for it. I cannot allow that that is a sufficient reason for withholding a vote from those who desire it; and still less do I think it a sufficient reason, if you believe by giving a woman a vote you can develop their interests in the well-being of the community. As a mere fact, however, I can assure him that women are deeply interested in this question, and that their number is increasing year by year. I had the honour of presenting, at the opening of this Sitting, several Petitions of an extremely representative character. One was signed by Miss Taylor, Mrs. Grote, Miss Florence Nightingale, Miss Swanwick, Miss Bastock, and a great number of other ladies eminent in art, science, and philosophy—all desirous of a vote. I also presented a Petition from working women, shoemakers, sempstresses, and others. So that, going from one end to the other of the social scale, you will find everywhere a large number of women desiring a vote. I do not say every woman desires it; but does every man use the vote he has? What proportion of men do not vote in the Metropolitan boroughs? There is, however, this important consideration—that, where women have votes, they exercise their right in just the same proportion that men do. I am also told that this question ought not to be brought on year by year, as the feeling in favour of the Bill is dying away in the country. There are many reasons to be urged on both sides on the question whether a Bill should be brought forward year after year; but I can assure the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that this is by no means a settled question. I can tell him, also, that the feeling for this Bill is increasing. It is a mistake to suppose that this House entirely represents the feeling of the country outside the House. I am satisfied that the House will not fairly represent the opinion of the country until this Bill is passed. I think that that time is not so far distant as some Members seem to think, and I hope the minority in favour of the measure will go on increasing and increasing until this change is made.

(The Lord Bishop of Exeter.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER: My Lords, it will not take many minutes to explain the purpose and provisions of this Bill, which I now move should be read a second time. The measure is intended to carry into effect certain arrangements in connection with the Cathedral Churches of Exeter and Truro. The former differs from all the other Cathedral Churches, excepting only the Metropolitan Cathedral and the Cathedrals connected with the Universities, in this respect—that it has five Canonries in the Chapter instead of four; and the object with which the fifth Canonry was retained will be found defined in the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the year 1855. In that Report, it is stated that the Canonry in question was retained with a view to the foundation of a Chapter to be attached to the Cathedral Church of Cornwall, as soon as Cornwall should have been formed into a separate Diocese. Since that period Cornwall has been separated from the Diocese of Exeter, and constituted into a Diocese by itself. The time, therefore, has arrived for carrying out the original arrangement to which I have referred. In some respects, indeed, the measure has been anticipated. Already the fifth Canonry of which I have spoken has been saddled with the payment of one-third of its income to the Archdeacon of Cornwall. After the first vacancy in the Archdeaconry, the sum to be paid to the holder from the Canonry is not to exceed £200 a-year, so that the transference proposed by the Bill is really a transference of the rest of the one-third and the remaining two-thirds of the income of the Canonry to Truro. Your Lordships will find in the Bill before you the provisions which are considered necessary for giving effect to the objects I have indicated. It will be observed that it is necessary not only to transfer the Canonry; but, inasmuch as there is at present no Dean and Chapter for Truro, which is the Cathedral of the new Diocese of Cornwall, it is also necessary to create machinery for receiving the Canonry so transferred. The Bill proposes, in Clause 2, to transfer the next Canonry which shall fall vacant, other than that which is now held by the Archdeacon of Exeter; and, on such a vacancy occurring, the Archdeacon will enter upon that vacant Canonry, and the Canonry of the income of which he at present receives only two-thirds, with the exception of the residence thereto attached, will be transferred to an endowment fund for the Chapter of Truro. This fund is to be in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and by Clause 3, as soon as it is certified by the Commissioners that there are sufficient means to give an income of £1,000 a-year for the Dean, and £300 per annum for each of four residentiary Canons, it will be competent to Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to create a new Chapter, and to make it in all respects similar to the foundations in the rest of England. Meanwhile, in order that the new Diocese of Truro may not be obliged to wait for its Chapter until the full amount shall have been obtained, a provision—Clause 6 of the Bill—is introduced by which Her Majesty may also by Order in Council, create a residentiary Canonry, or Canonries, in the Cathedral Church of Truro before that time has come; and, by Clause 4, Her Majesty may make statutes for the government and for the duties of such Canonries, both in the Cathedral itself and in the administration of the Diocese. The statutes of Cathedrals, as your Lordships are aware, are not uniform, although there is a general law applicable to all alike. Every Cathedral, has, however, to a greater or less extent, statutes of its own; and it is proposed that the Chapter of Truro shall not, in that respect, prove an exception to the general rule. It will have statutes for itself; but those statutes will, as I have indicated, be made by Order in Council—no doubt after due consultation with all parties concerned—and the Order will be submitted to Parliament. The present Archdeacon of Cornwall receives £333 a-year, being one-third of the Canonry. That sum is rather more than is allowed to Archdeacons in the rest of England. As a general rule, the endowment of an Archdeaconry is £200 per annum; and, as the staff of the Cathedral in Cornwall will, for the present, be very poor, it is thought, and is provided by the 10th clause, that the succeeding Archdeacon should be put on the same level as other Archdeacons, and have £200 a-year, and that the remainder of the amount now paid to the occupant of that position should go towards the endowment fund. It is obvious that there must be several parties interested in the matter; and your Lordships will naturally ask in what way those parties have looked at the proposals contained in the Bill. I am glad to say that it has received their approval. The consent of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter has been given to the measure; the Bishop of Truro requested me to introduce it; and I need scarcely add that, by bringing it forward, I have shown that I give my own consent to it. I have only further to remark that I have liberty, I believe, to inform your Lordships that the Bill has the approval of Her Majesty's Government; and, therefore, may be considered to have also the assent of the Crown.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Bishop of Exeter.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

QUESTIONS.

METROPOLIS—COFFEE STALLS IN THE STREETS.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a recent magisterial decision (Southwark Police Court) by which it is made an offence to keep an early coffee stall in the streets; and, if he will take into consideration the policy of such decision?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have been in communication with the magistrate and also the chief magistrate on this matter; and, as I understand the decision, it has nothing like the effect attributed to it by the hon. Member's Question. There is no doubt that these coffee stalls are legal; but it is quite necessary that they should be under some regulation. Whenever a particular stall turns out to be a source of annoyance to the neighbourhood, then it may be suppressed, but not otherwise. There is no intention to re-consider the decision in question.

NAVY—SAILING REGULATIONS OF THE FLEET.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If his attention has been recently called to the regulations under which Her Majesty's steam squadrons are sailed in "grand divisions" at a distance of about three cables' length apart; and, whether he contemplates making a departmental inquiry into the practice, for the purpose of lessening the risk of collisions similar to that which resulted in the loss of the "Vanguard" in a temporary fog?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, there is no such order as sailing in grand divisions. The established order of sailing or steaming in squadrons in ordinary circumstances of cruising is in two columns, the columns being at least 10 cables apart, and the ships in column two or four cables apart, according as the Fleet is in open or close order. There is no intention of making a departmental inquiry into the subject.

THE FRANCHISE—MANUFACTURE OF FAGGOT VOTES.—QUESTION.

MR. COLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the recent wholesale manufacture of faggot votes at Exeter by the creation of thirty-two freehold rent-charges in respect of one house there, as disclosed in the proceedings of the Revising Barristers' Court, published in the "Devon Evening Express" of October 4th, 5th, and 9th, 1877; and, whether he is prepared to advise the Government to take steps to prevent such an evasion of the Act 7 and 8 Will. 3, c. 25, s. 7, in future in such boroughs as possess the right for owners of 40s. freeholds residing within seven miles of the Parliamentary Borough to be placed on the list of Voters for the Members of Parliament for such borough?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention had only been called to the matter by the Question of the hon. Member. He had had no opportunity of inquiring into the facts. He was told that the votes in question were allowed by the Revising Barrister; and he therefore concluded that, according to law, the claims were legal. Personally, he objected to faggot votes; but he did not know that there was any pressing necessity for any alteration of the present law on the subject.

MR. COLE gave Notice that, in consequence of the unsatisfactory nature of the reply, he would take an early opportunity of calling attention to the subject and move a Resolution.

MINES REGULATION ACT, 1872—THE HAYDOCK COLLIERY ACCIDENT. QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can state when or how long it is since the district Inspector of Mines visited the Wood Pit, Haydock Colliery; if he made a searching examination; and, if he will lay the notes of that inspection or inspections upon the Table of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I can only give the information I have received from the Inspector in this case. He says that the last time he was at this mine was on the 27th September, 1876. He goes on to say—

"There has not been any fatal accident at the pit since the 1st July, 1873. I am familiar with the system of management adopted by Mr. Chadwick, the general manager of the Haydock Collieries, which consist of 12 pits, several of which are working difficult and dangerous seams. I have devoted what time I could to the inspection of those which seemed to require it during the last three years. Twelve thorough underground inspections and 23 visits of inquiry have been made by myself to the pits at the Haydock Colliery, but the opinion I have formed of their management and the precautions enforced are very favourable. The Wood Pit is another seam, and one in which such a calamity is least likely to occur of any of the pits belonging to the Haydock Colliery."

ARMY—THE MEDICAL SERVICE. QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the new Warrant respecting the Medical Service of the Army will include the first batch of those gentlemen who entered the Medical Service under the ten years' system; and, if not, whether he will take their case into consideration?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that there was a Committee now sitting to inquire into the position of the medical officers of the Army, and until that Committee reported, he could not say what would be done.

CRIMINAL CODE (INDICTABLE OFFENCES) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. B. T. WILLIAMS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether an opportunity will be given for the discussion of the Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill before the Members of the Bar, who are also Members of this House, leave town for their Summer Circuits?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER), in reply, said, he had a very confident expectation that the Bill would be taken in Committee before members of the Bar left town.

POST OFFICE—POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ said, the accounts of the Post Office savings banks showed a profit of about £140,000 annually, whereas the accounts of the old savings banks showed an annual loss of between £70,000 and £80,000. He wished, therefore, to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, viewing the great annual loss sustained by the excess of interest paid to the Trustees of the Savings Banks, he is prepared to consider the desirability of taking steps to prevent future deposits except at a reduced rate of interest?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the Government had not prepared any measure bearing on this subject; and, considering the late period of the Session and the state of Public Business, they could not hold out any hope of dealing with the question this year.

THE BRITISH BORNEO COMPANY—THE CONSUL AT SINDAK.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that the Acting Governor of Labuan has appointed a

Mr. Pryer, who is agent of the British Borneo Company, to be Consular agent at Sindak, on the territory in Borneo ceded to the Company, a cession which has not been sanctioned by the British Government; and, if so, whether steps will be taken to prevent misconceptions which might arise among the natives from the agent of the Company flying the British Flag?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, it is true that Mr. Pryer, one of the agents for the British Borneo Company, stationed at Sandakar, has been provisionally appointed by the Consul General at Labuan to be Consular agent, without salary, in Northern Borneo. The Consul General reports that there exists a valuable trading connection between Labuan and the harbour of Sandakar, and he thought it desirable that he should receive official and reliable information upon this part of Borneo, which has never been penetrated by Europeans, and which is said to be a very fertile portion of the island. However, the appointment of Mr. Pryer has not been confirmed, pending the further consideration of the question which has been raised with respect to the cession of the territory. This cession of the territory has not been recognized by Her Majesty's Government, who have suspended all action in the matter pending the return to this country of the promoters of the Company, who are either on their way home or are about to start. There is no reason to apprehend any misconception arising from the use of the British flag by the acting Consular agent.

THE BOARD OF WORKS—REPORT OF THE COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. GRAY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Report of the Commission on the Board of Works, which he intimated some time ago would be in the hands of Members shortly after Easter, may be expected before the Vote for that Department is taken?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, the Report has been unavoidably delayed owing to the wide range of the subjects embraced within the inquiry. It is now ready, and I hope will be in the hands of hon. Members in the course of a very few days. I am quite prepared to postpone the Vote until the Report is in the hands of hon. Members.

IRELAND—THE DISFRANCHISEMENT OF CASHEL AND SLIGO.—QUESTION.

MR. GRAY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the continued disfranchisement of the boroughs of Cashel and Sligo, it is the intention of Government, before the next general election, to provide for the restoration to Ireland of the full number of representatives secured by the Act of Union?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Government has no present intention to propose a measure on the subject.

SCOTLAND—OFFICE OF LORD CLERK REGISTER.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the money saved by the abolition of the sinecure salary of the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland, and which is derived from registration fees, will be devoted to cheapening registration in Scotland?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the question as to how the registration ought to be cheapened was one which properly came before the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He might, however, remind the hon. Member that in 1874 no less a sum than £15,000 a-year was taken off these fees under a Treasury minute. With respect to this particular office of Lord Clerk Register, the money would, he had no doubt, be applied to the part payment of another officer who was to have charge practically of the Register Office.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL begged to give Notice that he would resist any such arrangement, and move on the next stage of the Bill that it was an extreme injustice to Scotland to treat her in this matter differently from the other parts of the United Kingdom.

SPAIN—THE "OCTAVIA" AND THE "LARK."—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What progress has been made with the claims against the Spanish Government arising out of the seizure of the "Lark" in 1872, and of the "Octavia" in 1875; whether any, and what, particular sum by way of compensation has been named, or is under consideration, in either case; and, whether there is any prospect of an early settlement of these long standing claims?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, to the demand of Her Majesty's Government for compensation to the sufferers in the case of the Octavia, the Spanish Government have replied that, considering the suspicious character of the vessel at the time of capture, they do not think that they can justly be called upon to pay any compensation whatever for her capture and subsequent detention. They acknowledge that the Octavia was illegally seized on the high seas; but they consider when they handed the vessel over to Her Majesty's Government that all claim upon them ceased. This decision has been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown. The proper amount of compensation in this case can only be ascertained on further inquiry; and, therefore, for the present, no fixed sum has been demanded as indemnity. As to the Lark, Her Majesty's Chargé de Affaires at Madrid was instructed last July to press on the Spanish Government a re-consideration of their decision not to grant any compensation to the persons who suffered from her unjust detention and the ill-treatment to which they were exposed. The Spanish Government have returned no reply to this communication, but Her Majesty's Chargé de Affaires has again been instructed to press the matter upon their consideration.

INLAND REVENUE—OUT-DOOR LICENCES.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the rapid increase in the number of out-door licences over which the magistrates have no control, and to the numerous memorials from magistrates and municipal bodies praying for a discretionary power over the granting of such licences, he will give his support to the Bill for this purpose which has already passed a Second Reading, or will introduce or support a measure suspending the further grants of such licences until the Government is able to deal with the whole question?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I do not think that the introduction of a Suspensory Bill would be wise, unless legislation was immediately contemplated; and, so far as I can now form a judgment, to pass such a Bill would take as much time as if we dealt thoroughly and practically with the whole subject. Under those circumstances, I can make no promise to the hon. Member.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—TELEGRAPHIC DEPARTMENT—COMMUNICATION WITH GRANARD.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has considered the memorial from the Grand Jury of the county of Longford, praying for the extension of telegraphic communication to the town of Granard, and can hold out hopes that such extension will be conceded?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, the question has been considered, but the revenue which it is estimated would be produced by a telegraphic office at Granard would not justify its establishment at the public expense. If the inhabitants will join in giving a guarantee against loss, the extension will be made.

POOR LAW—CASE OF ELIZA LITTLE-HALES.—QUESTION.

MR. A. H. BROWN asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been called to the case of Eliza Littlehales, a pauper receiving out-door relief, who was compelled by force to go into the workhouse of the Madeley Union on the 9th April last, by the order of the chairman of the board; whether it is true that the poor woman was so affected by this act that it became necessary to remove her into the county lunatic asylum in a few days; and, whether this proceeding was legal or not; and, if so, under what Poor Law Act or Act for the management of pauper lunatics can a person be arrested and sent into the workhouse?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH: Sir, the case alluded to in the Question of the hon. Gentleman has been brought under my notice, and I have received full information respecting it. It appears that Elizabeth Hales is a hysterical imbecile woman, who has been for some time in receipt of out-door relief in the Madeley Union, residing with her sister. The chairman of the Madeley Guardians, who had been in the habit of visiting her during the last four years, found her on a recent occasion in such a state of destitution, and so imperfectly cared for by her sister, that he thought it necessary for her to be removed at once, and gave directions that she should be taken to the workhouse infirmary, with the view of sending her subsequently to the county asylum. In this he acted, not as a Guardian or as Chairman of the Guardians, but as a magistrate; and, as he supposed, under powers vested in magistrates by the Pauper Lunatic Act. In reply to the second part of the Question, it is not the case that the removal had the effect supposed in the Question; for the district medical officer states that he would have given a certificate for the removal to the asylum from the cottage direct had the magistrate been present at the time of the removal. The removal to the workhouse infirmary was made on the Tuesday, and the further removal to the asylum on the following Friday, in strict accordance with the proper legal formalities. I may add that the woman is now discharged from the asylum greatly benefited by the treatment and good diet she there received, and is again in charge of her sister. As to the third part of the Question, I am bound to say that the interim removal to the workhouse infirmary was not in accordance with any statutory power; and, of course, there is no power under any Act by which a person can be arrested and sent into a workhouse.

SOUTH AMERICA—BRITISH CEMETERY AT MONTE VIDEO.—QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government are negotiating with the Government of Monte Video for the sale of the British Protestant Cemetery at that place as building ground; and, if so, whether Papers on the subject can be laid upon the Table before the contract is concluded?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, negotiations for the sale of the British Protestant Cemetery at Monte Video are still going on between Her Majesty's Government and that of Uruguay. One of the stipulations is that no part of the cemetery now occupied by graves shall be interfered with for, at least, five years; and the British community are desirous of removing the bodies of those who have been interred. I do not see that any object would be gained by producing the Papers, as the transaction will in all probability be completed before the Papers could be laid on the Table; but if my hon. Friend will confer with me privately, I have no doubt we shall be able to agree about the matter.

POST OFFICE—EASTERN MAIL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Postmaster General, If he is ready to advertise for tenders for the Eastern Mail Service; if he will require that the whole service now performed by the Peninsular and Oriental Company under one Contract be again done in one Contract, or if he intends to divide the service so as to induce greater competition; and if he intends to give any effect to the Memorial from Bombay asking for a time not exceeding sixteen days instead of twenty as at present, or in any other degree to require increased speed in the conveyance of these Mails?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, he was not in a position at present to advertise for tenders for the Eastern Mail Service; but he hoped shortly to be able to do so. The advertisement would be so framed as to enable parties to tender either for the whole or any portion of the service and for any rate of speed.

THE CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—APPOINTMENT OF SIR CHARLES DU CANE.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is true that Sir Charles Ducane has been appointed Chairman of the Board of Customs; and, whether any instance has ever occurred in which a person who has had no previous service in the department, and no experience of the duties, has been appointed Chairman of that Board?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, It is true Sir Charles

Mr. Bourke

Du Cane has been appointed Chairman of the Board of Customs. I have not gone back into all the records of the Board of Customs to see what was the case with regard to the early appointments. The last lamented Chairman, Mr. Goulburn, had been for a considerable time in the Department; but the Chairman before him, Lord Cottesloe, had not any previous service in the Department when he was appointed for a short time Deputy Chairman with the understanding, I believe, that he should be immediately after appointed Chairman. There have been cases in the Board of Inland Revenue, which is a cognate institution—especially the case of Sir William Stephenson, the late Chairman—in which the appointment was made of a gentleman who had not previously seen service in the Department.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.
QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. DILLWYN,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, assuming that the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill would be finished to-night, the Valuation Bill would be proceeded with to-morrow, and on Monday the second reading of the Cattle Diseases Bill.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND)
BILL—[BILL 4.]

(The Lord Advocate, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbotson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 18th June.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 58 (Intimation to creditors); Clause 59 (Revised list of debts to be made up); Clause 60 (Revised list to be open to inspection); and Clause 61 (Debts affecting counties and burghs may be compromised), severally agreed to.

Clause 62 (Valuation of debts).

COLONEL ALEXANDER, in moving, in page 32, lines 38 and 39, to leave out "said debt Commissioners" and insert "Sheriff," said, the object of his Amendment was to provide that the Sheriff of the county, who had more legal knowledge and was more competent to deal with the matter, should determine the valuation rather than the Debt Commissioners. If the Amendment were objected to, he was not anxious to press it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that this Amendment was in a much worse position than those of a similar nature which had been previously moved by the hon. and gallant Member, for this reason—that the work to be performed by the Sheriff would be purely accountant's work, and not official work at all.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER moved, in line 36, the omission of the word "generally," so as to make it incumbent upon the Debt Commissioners in every case to take into consideration every circumstance which might, in his opinion, reduce, enhance, or in any way affect the value.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not object to the omission of the word "generally," if it was not to be followed up by any other alteration of the clause. It appeared to him that the words following were necessary in order to indicate to the Debt Commissioner not only that he had a full discretion in these matters, but that he was bound to exercise it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 63 (Allocation of debts on roads in two or more counties).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved to insert, after the words "roads, highway, or bridge partly situated in," the words "or may be a burden upon two or more counties in Scotland, &c." The clause, as it stood, provided for all cases of joint bridges, except such as were under the provisions of Clause 85. That clause referred to certain exceptional bridges, and the object of his Amendment was to provide that the parties interested in those bridges should have the same power of effecting a compromise as they had in regard to other joint bridges under the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY then moved, in lines 38 and 39, to omit the words

VOL. COXL. [THIRD SERIES.]

"including a reasonable fee to the Debt Commissioners." The object of the Amendment was to provide that the Debt Commissioners should be paid by the Government, and not by the several counties. He thought it would be an exceptional proceeding for the Government to appoint an officer who was to be paid by the several counties and districts. The cost of the various arbitrations might be rendered very expensive, particularly if the Debt Commissioner was to be paid by the parties interested. A much more economical scale was likely to be adopted if the officer were paid by the Government; and it would, he thought, facilitate the settlement of the question if the officer, during the two or three years he would be called upon to act, were paid a certain sum by the Government.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not accept the Amendment. It was only right and fair that the arbitration, which involved questions in dispute between the parties, should be paid for by the parties themselves.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 64 (Allocation of debts between landward parts of counties and burghs).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, in line 2, after the words "partly within," to insert the words "or made a burden on." This was an Amendment similar to that which had been inserted in the previous clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 65 (Debts to be charged against counties and burghs, and to bear interest. Certificates of debt to be granted); and Clause 66 (Extinction of debts not charged in terms of Act), severally agreed to.

Clause 67 (Certain road debts may be charged on entailed estates by bond and disposition in security).

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in page 36, line 19, to leave out the words "under the preceding section," and insert "hereinbefore."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to,

Provisions for Payment of Debt.

Clause 68 (Payment of interest under the provisions of this Act); Clause 69 (Trustees and burgh local authority to resolve to pay off debt); Clause 70 (Payment and discharge of debts); Clause 71 (Assessment for payment of debt); Clause 72 (Trustees and burgh local authority may borrow on security of assessments); Clause 73 (Loans to be repaid out of assessments imposed under authority of Act); Clause 74 (Provision for protection of lenders on security of assessments); Clause 75 (Trustees and burgh local authority may pay off loans, and borrow money for that purpose); Clause 76 (Unclaimed instalments to be consigned); and Clause 77 (Sums payable to persons under disability may be consigned), severally agreed to.

Clause 78 (Saving as to loan to Mull district of Argyllshire).

MR. RAMSAY said, he had no wish to object to the clause, nor to any of the provisions which it contained; but as it had reference to a district of a county in which he had an interest, he thought its application should be made universal. He therefore moved, after the word "trustees," to insert the words—

"nor to any debt due by the district road trustees of any of the several districts into which the county of Argyll is divided for the purposes and under the powers and provisions of the Argyllshire Roads Act, 1864."

He did not know whether the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would accept the Amendment in this particular place; but he could not think otherwise than that he would approve of it, seeing that the several districts might incur debts which were not county debts, or debts which could be dealt with under the provisions of any general Act, such as the one now under consideration. He did not think his Amendment would in any respect invalidate or affect the rights of the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and he therefore hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would accept his proposal.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that on the first blush of the thing, he saw no objection to the proposal of the hon. Member; but as he had only just received Notice of it, he could not, off-hand, say whether this was or was not the proper point for its introduction. He would look into the matter, and it could be dealt with on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

General Provisions as to Assessments.

Clause 79 (Terms at which assessments shall be payable).

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving, in page 40, line 15, after the word "shall," to insert "subject to the provisions hereinafter contained," said, his object was to provide that the assessments should be imposed for the year subject to the provisions of the Act, according to the valuation of the lands and heritages on the valuation roll in force for the year.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. RAMSAY suggested that in line 20 the words "1st of February" should be substituted for "1st of January." The hon. Member said, the valuation roll was not made up, or, at all events, was not completed and accessible to the local authorities until the end of October; and, therefore, he felt that it would be desirable to give a little longer time than was contemplated by the Bill for the making out of the assessments and the collection of the rates.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought the suggestion a very reasonable one, and he would, therefore, accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 80 (Collection of assessments); Clause 81 (Board to hear appeals); and Clause 82 (Power to recover assessments imposed by trustees), severally agreed to.

Clause 83 (Assessments in burghs, how to be levied and recovered).

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in page 41, line 31, after the word "or," to insert the words "if there be no police assessment any."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. W. HOLMS moved, on the same page, line 33, after the word "act," to leave out to the word "and," in line 34, inclusive, and to insert the words "shall be."

MR. GRANT moved, as an Amendment to the proposed Amendment, to insert, in line 33, after the word "collected," the words "either as a separate assessment to be called 'The Roads and Bridges assessment,' or."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the Committee had already practically adopted the Amendment, but saw no reason why, in line 35, after the word "rate," there should not be inserted the words "and may be collected either separately or along therewith."

THE CHAIRMAN said, he would call upon the hon. Member at a future stage to move his Amendment.

Amendment (Mr. W. Holms) agreed to.

MR. RAMSAY moved to substitute the word "five," for "four," in line 3, page 42, in order to produce uniformity of practice.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 84 (Burgh may apply certain funds to maintenance of roads in lieu of assessments), agreed to.

Special Provisions as to certain Bridges.

Clause 85 (As to cost of maintaining, &c. certain bridges).

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in page 42, line 18, after the word "county," to insert "or counties."

Amendment agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in the same line, after the word "burgh," to insert the words "or burghs."

Amendment agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, in line 19, after the word "adjoining," to insert the words "county or."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, after line 25, page 42, to insert these words—

"The trustees of counties and burgh authorities may agree that any such bridge accommodates other traffic than that of the county or burgh in which it is situate, and may agree as to the proportions in which the debt (if any) and the cost of maintenance, and, if need be, of rebuilding such bridge, shall be borne and defrayed by the county or counties and burgh or burghs to which it is common, and such agreement, when confirmed by a resolution of the trustees in general meeting and of the burgh authorities, shall have the same force and effect as an order by the Secretary of State, as provided hereinafter."

The hon. Member said, the object of his proposal was to save the parties and the Secretary of State from a great deal of unnecessary trouble. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would be grateful to him for that provision.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. C. S. PARKER moved, in page 43, line 14, to leave out the word "and," and insert the words "or part or parts, or district or districts, of the said county or counties, and by the." The hon. Member said, he wished to provide that where only one district of a county made use of a bridge, that part of it, and not the whole county, should bear a proportion of the cost of such bridge. This would be a more equitable mode of assessment, and he did not see that any reasonable objection could be made to it.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH proposed to add these words at the end of the clause—

"And with respect to the suspension bridge across the River Ness, erected with public money under the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 66, for the accommodation of the Northern counties by the Parliamentary Commissioners, the burden of maintaining the said bridge shall in future rest upon the county and burgh of Inverness in proportion to their respective real rents as established by the valuation roll thereof."

His Amendment aimed to remedy a statutory injustice under which the burgh of Inverness suffered.

MR. CAMERON opposed the Amendment, inasmuch as the whole of the bridge was situate within the burgh of Inverness, the boundaries of which had been greatly extended since the bridge was built. It must be remembered that the Bill was one for the abolition of tolls and pontages, and to improve the general administration of the roads, and not intended to shift the burden of maintaining the bridges from the shoulders of those who had hitherto borne them to those who had not. The Amendment referred to the county of Inverness alone, while the terms clearly intimated that the cost of maintenance should be shared by the whole Northern counties. To some such arrangement the county of Inverness would probably offer no objection; but he could not consent to the Amendment as it stood. It should also be remembered that since the introduction of railways the value of the bridge, as a means of communication between the burgh and the Northern counties, had greatly diminished. Another objection to the proposal was, that it prejudiced the very question which it was intended by the clause should be settled by a scheme of arbitration.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH was glad that though the case of the county of Inverness was in such able hands, so little could be made of it. In 1851 the suspension bridge was built by Government, not for the accommodation of the burgh of Inverness alone, but for the benefit also of the four Northern counties. The expense of maintenance fell upon all alike, but in 1862, when the Commissioners for Highland roads and bridges were abolished, the maintenance was taken off the three Northern expressly, and the bridge was vested in, and became the property of, the Commissioners of Supply of the county of Inverness. The town, if it had to build a bridge for its own traffic, would not have built a bridge which cost between £20,000 and £30,000, and the annual maintenance of which averaged nearly £100 a-year. It was owing to a strained interpretation put by the Commissioners of Supply upon the Interpretation Clause of the Act of 1862, that the town was saddled with the whole cost of maintenance, and he was certain Parliament never intended this. His hon. Friend the Member for the county of Inverness (Mr. Donald Cameron) complained that by this Amendment direct Parliamentary interference was sought in this matter; but this was done because Parliament, however unintentionally, by statute committed the injustice, and the remedy provided under this section was circuitous and expensive. He had no objection to a modification of his Amendment to this extent—that the expense of the maintenance should be borne, half by the county and half by the burgh. He hoped the Committee would help the burgh of Inverness, which was in the position of being obliged to pay for a thing from which they derived no exclusive benefit. He would ask the Committee, whether it was ever heard of that the expense of maintaining the property of one person should be cast on another? He would divide on the point.

MR. CAMERON did not dispute what his hon. Friend said as to the history of the bridge. The old bridge was swept away by a flood in 1849, and the new bridge was built of stone, and the town levied pontage upon it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the present Bill was not introduced for the purpose of remedying any injustice that might or might not have been done by a previous Act of Parliament, or for the purpose of settling any point in dispute between the county and the burgh of Inverness. He thought the Amendment rather out of place, because he was calling upon this House to decide upon a question which fell within the scope of this clause, and to decide it, he thought, without sufficient information as to the nature of the case between what he might term the litigant parties. The very purpose of this clause was to deal with a bridge wholly in one county or burgh, which served as a general means of communication with the adjoining burghs and counties. It might be very proper, under these circumstances, that those who derived benefit from the existence of the bridge should contribute their share. Although the bridge was situated in a burgh, it afforded accommodation to two counties, and, therefore, accommodated traffic much larger than that carried on in the burgh. But there were no materials laid before the Committee which could enable them to judge as to what proportion should be borne by the one party and what proportion by the other. Therefore, he thought the matter should be left under the clause which was expressly made to meet such cases, and, amongst the others, the case of the bridge of Inverness.

COLONEL MURE said, that what he understood the hon. Member to mean was, that the county should pay for the bridge at Inverness. He saw no reason why, if the county of Inverness was to maintain this bridge, the counties of Lanark and Renfrew should not pay the cost of maintaining all the bridges across the Clyde at Glasgow, because those bridges afforded accommodation to the county.

MR. RAMSAY remarked, that the hon. Member simply desired that this bridge should be placed in the same position as if it was in any other part of the county. He proposed that the burgh should pay their share of maintaining the bridge corresponding to the benefit they derived from it. If the hon. and gallant Member who had last spoken wished that the county of Renfrew should take part in the expense of maintaining bridges over the Clyde, the local authority would be glad to accept the suggestion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman seemed to forget that in the case of the bridge across the Ness it was not the property of those who were called upon to maintain it, but that the property in the bridge was vested in the county of Inverness. It was not unnatural, therefore, that the hon. Member for the burgh should ask that relief should be afforded to his constituents.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY thought the hon. Member had made out a very strong case indeed. If Parliament actually had in view to put the burden of this bridge entirely on Inverness, it would have been a very different matter; but the burden of maintaining the bridge had been imposed upon the inhabitants of this burgh simply and solely in consequence of an error on the part of the draftsman of the former Bill, by which it was intended that a part, at any rate, of the cost of maintenance of the bridge should fall upon the county, because the bridge was much larger than was necessary to meet the wants of the burgh. In the Act of Parliament the word "road" was taken to include the word "bridge," whereas there should have been a separate interpretation. It seemed to him that if any bridge came within the scope and intention of this Clause 85, it was this bridge at Inverness. The bridge was the only one which connected the North of Scotland with the South, along a very considerable part of the line of the Caledonian Canal. It was, therefore, very proper to propose that the cost should be divided between the burgh and the county; but, at the same time, it might be very true that the Committee was hardly in a position to deal with the matter in the manner suggested by his hon. Friend. He did not think his hon. Friend would put the Committee to the trouble of a division, if the Lord Advocate would assure him that the bridge came within the clause which provided the means of apportioning the cost of bridges between the different localities and authorities who derived advantage from them.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could give no such assurance, for the reason that the question turned upon a disputed question of fact, which he had no means of determining. If, as the hon. Member for Inverness stated, the bridge accommodated both the county and the burgh, it seemed unfair that the burgh should be called upon to pay all the expense, as the bridge would come within the meaning of the clause.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, it would be perfectly competent at any time to make an application to the Secretary of State under the provisions of the clause to which reference had been made, and then the facts would be investigated.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that was the case, and added that the clause was introduced in the Bill in consequence of representations made by persons interested in the Inverness bridge, and other bridges which were similarly circumstanced.

MR. ELLICE observed, that this was an exceptional case. The bridge was constructed entirely out of public money, partly granted by that House, and prospectively from a grant made every year for the maintenance of the Highland roads. The maintenance of this bridge was provided for by making it incumbent on all the Northern counties, as being alike interested in this means of communication, to maintain it. It was never looked upon as a bridge belonging to the town of Inverness. Inverness had a bridge of its own, kept up by the town, lower down the river. The new bridge was undertaken, not at all as a burgh bridge, but as a county undertaking. The burgh had no voice in its construction, and had been originally expressly exempted from the liability to maintain the structure. Unfortunately, from a neglect in attending to the Act, consequent on the withdrawal of the annual grant to the Highland roads, words were used in the Interpretation Clause that had been construed adversely to the burgh. He did not approve of the Amendment of the hon. Member, because the expense ought to be borne not by Inverness-shire alone, but by all the Northern counties, as was stipulated when the bridge was built. He therefore thought it best not to press the Amendment as it stood, but to leave the matter in the hands of the Lord Advocate till bringing up the Report.

MR. HERMON said, the hon. Member seemed to forget that there were bridges in other parts of Inverness, and that those bridges were exceedingly expensive. If Inverness had contributed one-half to the maintenance of the roads in other parts of the county, he could have understood this application, but he understood Inverness did no such thing. It would be a very unfair thing if, while those living in other parts of Inverness were taxed to keep their own bridges, this should be thrown upon them also.

LORD ELCHO deprecated any division on this Amendment. The hon. Member who had moved the Amendment had now seen the feeling of the House, and it would probably be better to leave the clause as it was, and not to prejudice it by this Amendment.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, that as several hon. Members had asked him to withdraw his Amendment, he should not ask the Committee to trouble to divide. He was satisfied with the discussion so far. Hon. Members had seen that this bridge was not the property of the town of Inverness, and all he wanted was that the town should not be liable for the expense of keeping up a bridge for the whole of the Northern counties of Scotland.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to know, if the Lord Advocate would amend the clause in order to meet the case where a bridge was partly in one county and partly in another? There might be exceptional cases, which must be provided for in some way or other.

THE LORD ADVOCATE remarked, that provision of that kind was made in an earlier clause.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL understood that referred to bridges wholly in a county or wholly in a burgh. The case he desired to meet was where the bridge was partly in one county or burgh and partly in another.

Mr. Ellice

THE LORD ADVOCATE remarked, that the words fully met that.

Clause 94 (No person holding office to participate in profits of any contract); and Clause 95 (Trustee may act as sheriff or justice), severally agreed to.

Clause 96 (Moneys to be lodged in bank).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, in page 48, line 6, before the word "board," to insert the words "trustees or," in order that the trustees might have the power of naming their own bankers.

THE LORD ADVOCATE objected to the Amendment, not because he was desirous that the trustees should not have the control, but because there was a general clause giving to them full control over the board. To insert this Amendment might raise the question as to whether the general clause was to have universal application.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 97 (Cheques on bank account of trustees or board).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, as an Amendment, in page 48, line 8, to leave out the words "one member of the Board," in order to insert the words "one of three trustees nominated by the trustees." As the clause stood, the Bank accounts might be operated upon by one of a large number of trustees; and he therefore thought it would be more regular, and would give greater security, to have the cheques signed by one of three members nominated by the trustees, instead of leaving it to any one member.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it could not be feared that any of the gentlemen likely to be selected would be unfit to be trusted with the duty of signing cheques on behalf of the Boards or bodies of trustees, and he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY wished to point out that there were 30 members of the Board. Surely there ought to be some people who should be responsible for signing cheques, rather than this duty should be discharged by any one of 30 members? The clerk might take the cheques to any member who did not often attend the meetings, and who did not know what business was going on. It seemed to him it would be desirable to insert this Amendment.

MR. MARK STEWART said, the usual practice was for the Board to delegate the signing of cheques to one member of the Board and the secretary, and usually the duty was delegated to the chairman. He thought it would be more convenient to let the clause stand in its present form.

MR. RAMSAY thought the precaution of the hon. Member for Forfarshire was not an improper one, but would be in accordance with practice.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the clause should be amended by so altering it as to provide that the cheques, instead of being signed by one member of the Board, should be signed by one of five members to be selected by the Board.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he was willing to accept the suggestion.

MR. ORR-EWING opposed both the Amendment and its suggested alteration, on the ground that they were unnecessary, inasmuch as no money could be taken out of the bank without the assent and signature of some person duly authorized for the purpose.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 98 (Cheques on bank account of district committee).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, in page 48, line 13, after "committee," to leave out "for the management, maintenance, and repair of the highways within such district," and to insert "or collected on behalf of a district committee." In some cases it might be convenient for trustees to collect their own money, and put it into their own bank account.

MR. RAMSAY said, it was necessary to give power to the district trustees to dispose of the money which they had collected within their respective districts.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY next proposed to amend the clause by providing that all cheques should be signed by the treasurer and by one of three trustees nominated by the committee, instead of the signatures of the treasurer and one member of the Board only being necessary, as provided by the Bill. He thought it would be a simple precaution to take, and one which would ensure business being conducted in a regular and careful manner. As the clause stood at present, a banker would be justified in paying a cheque signed by the treasurer and any one of the district trustees. Circumstances could be conceived in which such a power intrusted to any one member might lead to serious loss. It was quite true that a bank might be instructed as to how far the account should be operated upon; but he thought the trustees ought to be directed to name certain persons who were to be authorized to operate on the banking account.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that the answer to the question was that the bank would take precious good care to know who was signing the cheques, and who had given the authority to sign them, and the Board would know what precautions to take.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he did not think the bank would take very good care, because, according to the Bill, the bank was protected if a cheque were signed by one member of the Board. In the present day they occasionally heard of treasurers who were supposed to be highly honourable men, but who had turned out to be dishonest, and there would always be members of the Board who might not be dishonest, but who would be careless. It would, therefore, be imprudent to give the treasurer power to draw the money with the aid of any one member of the Board.

MR. DALRYMPLE thought it a sufficient precaution to have the cheques signed by the treasurer and one member of the Board. It was curious that those who advocated a policy of popularising the arrangement should already begin to distrust those who were to be appointed. If anything untoward happened, it would be the fault of those upon whom the duty of election was thrown that they did not select the best possible men.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR was of opinion that every precaution should be taken against loose and irregular facilities for signing these cheques. The distrust of the popular element in these road boards was not the cause of this restrictive policy; because, looking back at the past, it would be found that men of high position and place had been guilty of making away with money; and against the repetition of such practices they were bound to guard.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that the chairman who signed cheques was authorized to do so by a resolution of the Board.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the only question now before the Committee was whether line 17 of this clause was to be left out. The discussion that had taken place would be repeated when the Amendment to which it referred was reached.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he intended to withdraw that Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. C. S. PARKER suggested that it would be convenient to provide that cheques should be signed by the treasurer, and by one member authorized by the committee.

MR. RAMSAY said, that what had just been suggested was exactly in accordance with the practice of the trusts and Boards of which he was a member. The invariable custom had been to appoint one person to sign the cheques in conjunction with the treasurer. The complaint that was made with regard to the provision in the Bill was that any member might, in conjunction with a fraudulent treasurer, embezzle the money of the Board, while the banker would be exonerated from all risk or liability for carelessness. As to the distrust spoken of by the hon. Member for Bute (Mr. Dalrymple), it was not distrust that they felt, but a desire to prevent the possibility of trust being abused.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, that what he proposed was that the cheques should be signed by one of three trustees selected by the committee. Any one of them would be available who lived in the immediate neighbourhood of the treasurer, and would have the same responsibility as himself.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would bring up a clause giving effect to the Amendment, and also giving the same direction with respect to Clause 97. He hoped the hon. Member would, under those circumstances, withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 99 (Execution of bonds and other securities); Clause 100 (Mortgages to be personal estate); and Clause 101 (Application of moneys not otherwise appropriated); severally agreed to.

Clause 102 (Audit of accounts).

MR. MARK STEWART said, he had to move an Amendment to leave out the word "Sheriff" in the clause and to insert "trustee" in its place. The clause provided that there should be an annual audit of accounts, and that the auditor should be appointed by the Sheriff. It appeared to him to be obvious that if trustees could manage their own affairs they were perfectly well able to appoint their own auditor. His proposal would assimilate the practice of these new bodies to that of local boards, such as Poor Law boards and school boards.

MR. RAMSAY hoped that the Committee would not accept the Amendment.

and that the appointment of auditor would be allowed to rest with the Sheriff.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR earnestly hoped the Lord Advocate would do nothing of the kind. He would remind the House that the Board of Trade invariably required the Sheriff to name the auditor for all accounts connected with harbour and road trusts. That was in order to give the Secretary of State the right to interfere when he found that merely a nominal examination of the accounts was taking place.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the accounting was really between the public and the trustees, and it had been thought right to put the appointment in the hands of the Sheriff.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL hoped that the auditor was to be appointed annually.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 103 (Annual reports).

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR wished to remind the Secretary of State that unless an effective control was exercised over the details of the expenditure of these bodies expenses would very largely increase. The clause provided that the trustees of counties, and local authorities in burghs, should once a year, at such time and in such form as the Secretary of State might direct, make a Report as to their income and expenditure, and such other matters as they might be directed, and that such Report should be laid before both Houses of Parliament. It appeared to him that there should be a still larger power vested in the Secretary of State of obtaining information from these bodies: as to their expenditure and as to the condition of the roads, the Secretary of State should have the right to prescribe to the counties the nature and extent of examination to be made in the details of the vouchers. Mere verifications of the entries in the accounts by the totals of the vouchers were illusory checks on improper outlay.

The LORD ADVOCATE said, that this clause gave powers to the road authorities to make reports to the Secretary of State, provided that the report should be in such a form as the Secretary of State directed. It was to deal both with their income and expenditure. If the hon. and gallant Baronet could suggest anything else that would be desirable to add he should be happy to listen to it.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that his only object was that the House of Commons should obtain all the information it required. He would have great pleasure in communicating his views to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. Indeed, he had already submitted a memorandum to the Secretary of State, but as yet without finding any good result therefrom.

LORD ELCHO said, his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir George Balfour) had a Motion on the Paper for a Return in which the length, breadth, and depth of metal in every turnpike road in Scotland would be contained. He hoped that the Secretary of State would not think it necessary to get more detailed information than the clause provided for. The cost of obtaining details as to every turnpike road in Scotland would be excessive, and some special building would soon be required to contain information so obtained.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR rose to explain, when—

MR. ORR-EWING, asked whether the hon. and gallant Member was in Order?

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he merely wished to point out that without the proper information they could not control the expenditure in counties. No one knew better than the noble Lord that there was a great danger of the road expenditure largely increasing, unless direct control was exercised. And as regarded the details to which the noble Lord referred, it was quite well known to the noble Lord that without these details it would be impossible to exercise any useful influence over the road authorities of Scotland. By abolishing the tolls and changing the statute labour roads into roads kept up by assessments, they had removed those useful checks which tolls and labour so effectually afforded. No doubt the roads might be more economically managed and better than hitherto, but the looseness of the controlling clauses gave many openings for abuses.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 104 (Repeal of Acts).

MR. RAMSAY said, he had an Amendment which was of a formal nature. The clause provided for the repeal of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 41, and 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 43, except as to certain sections. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman might be induced to incorporate these sections in the Act itself, instead of leaving them unrepealed in the old Acts. He saw no reason why district committees in country places should be obliged to refer not only to this Act but to the old ones also; and he therefore moved, in page 49, lines 15 and 16, to leave out the words "except the sections thereof incorporated herewith, as after mentioned."

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought the best plan would be to repeal the Acts by this clause—all but the excepted sections—and to consider afterwards the clause which the hon. Member proposed to add.

MR. RAMSAY would have been glad to have taken that course, but that the clauses were incorporated in the next clause, which he proposed to omit.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY supported the Amendment. The question was whether, for the sake of some 10 or 12 clauses of the Act of Will. IV., here left unrepealed, the authorities should be put to the trouble of keeping the whole of these old Acts, which were altogether defunct, except as regarded the clauses which were to be added to the new Bill?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that his hon. Friends misapprehended the effect of the clause. The first part of the clause repealed the General Turnpike Acts, except to an extent to which it reserved their provisions. The point raised by the hon. Member was whether the provisions which were retained could be left out, and afterwards incorporated as a part of the Act? That might hereafter be done; but all that was proposed by the clause was to repeal the General Turnpike Acts, except those few sections.

LORD ELCHO thought it would be a great convenience that the suggestion as to the incorporation of these clauses should be adopted.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, the only difficulty in respect to the incorporation of the clauses would be as to the interpretation. It might happen that the interpretation of the clauses of the Act of Will. IV. did not exactly correspond with those contained in the Bill. His impression was that the clauses in question, instead of being excepted and then incorporated in the new Bill, might simply have been re-numbered and added to it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that it appeared to him that it would be better to schedule these clauses to the Bill, and retain them as unrepealed clauses of the previous Act, rather than incorporate them. He said this, having regard to the decisions of the Courts of Scotland with respect to these clauses, which might be disturbed if the clauses were treated in the manner suggested.

DR. CAMERON remarked, that it would be much better to incorporate the clauses in such a way as to make the whole subject readily accessible.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, there was one inconvenience about the course proposed by the Lord Advocate, as a Judge would have to decide whether any one of these clauses was inconsistent with any part of the Act; and he thought, therefore, that it would be better to incorporate them in such a way as to make them a part of the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 105 (Incorporation of parts of General Turnpike Act).

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER moved, as an Amendment, that Clause 80 of the General Turnpike Act be not so incorporated. His objection to that section was that it gave power to the trustees to take material necessary to repair a road from the estate of any man, without permission or payment. That, he asserted, was taxing the landowner twice. If the payment of taxes in money was supposed to be the taxpayer's proportion of rates, then to take stones from his quarry was so like confiscation that he doubted very much whether the House of Commons would approve of that kind of method of levying black-mail. Under the Bill now before the Committee the law by which the roads were maintained was repealed, and fresh arrangements ought to be made to meet the altered circumstances.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not consent to the Amendment. For a very long period—he thought since the statute passed in the third year of the reign of George IV.—the system of macadamizing the rule, there had been a custom in Scotland of taking the stone necessary for the roads, the trustees being empowered to acquire that material under certain limitations and provisions. It would very seriously affect road making and road repairing in Scotland if any such alteration were to be made in the clause as had been suggested. There would be extreme difficulty in getting the roads metalled except at very considerable cost, and consequently he could not accept the Amendment. But under the existing statute there was no limit as to the length of road which might be repaired by material taken from the land of one proprietor, and consequently metal for five, 10, or 15 miles of road might be drawn from one place. That appeared to him to be carrying the power given under the Act a little too far; and he considered the quarries from which metal was taken ought to be somewhat nearer than the distances he had mentioned. Consequently, by the clause before the Committee he had restricted the length of the road to be metalled from one place to three miles. The right to take stone, however, he regarded as a very material feature of the Act.

MR. RAMSAY regretted the remarks of the Lord Advocate, because he could not believe the House would sanction a practice which was sought to be perpetuated by the clause—the taking for public use the property of private individuals without compensation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said it had been the practice for a long period so to act, and there was no doubt that was the case. But were they to continue robbing private persons for the purpose of benefiting the public in the shape of making roads at a cheap cost? The law was not so framed to facilitate the making of railways, or canals, or any other public work; and he could not conceive that there could be the slightest justification for perpetuating such a system. He hoped the clause would be struck out; and then he would move, as a substitute, a clause to the effect that no stone should be taken for road purposes without the owner of the land from whence it was obtained being compensated. He did not believe that the people of Scotland generally had any desire to save expense at the cost of private individuals; and therefore he hoped the Committee would strike out the section in order that they might consider the full effect of the amended clause he would propose, providing for compensation.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he could quite understand the force of the objection if the materials were of any value; but they knew perfectly well that the rock and stone of which the roads were composed in Scotland were of no earthly value. There might be a few cases where it was of value, but in 9 cases out of 10 it was not; and that being the case, as landed proprietors could not sustain much damage, he thought it would be absurd to disturb an arrangement which had lasted so long.

MR. M'LAREN expressed his thanks to the Lord Advocate for not agreeing to the prohibitory Amendment. Roads made through a landed estate added immensely to its value; and, having rendered these estates so much more valuable by the making of the roads, it was nothing but right that materials should be obtained free of charge to keep them in repair. There was nothing fairer than the General Turnpike Act, which gave power to the trustees to pay for all surface damage; and he thought the landowners of Scotland, who had got their estates vastly improved by the making of roads, the cost of which practically came from the people, should be content with this, and not ask to have the road metal paid for in addition. He agreed that a limit should be put to the length of road to be repaired from one quarry; but he considered three miles too small. Frequently, the particular metal required could not be obtained within a radius of three miles; and, therefore, he thought the Government would be conferring a great boon on the country if they altered the word "three" to "six." He would move that the word "six" be substituted for the word "three" in reference to the length of road to be kept in repair from one quarry.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Amendment could not be put. The Question before the Committee was that the incorporation of section 80 of the General Turnpike Act should be struck out of the clause.

MR. MARK STEWART said, this was not a landowner's, but a public question. The difficulty was this—that whereas when the General Turnpike Act was passed, which authorized the taking of stone from land, for the purpose of metalling the roads, there was an abundance of stone to be had; at the present time that supply had very much diminished, and in some parts now there was great difficulty in obtaining the required material. On some parts of the land no material of the kind required could be found at all; while in another part, which the hon. Member who spoke last must have been thinking of, there was any amount of the stone, and it would be no robbery to take any quantity of stone for the highway. But he considered that to go into a man's field, open a quarry, and take stone to metal a road, even within three miles on either side of the place, was inflicting an injustice on the owner of the land, for a field was frequently spoiled in that way. That being so, he thought the clause should be struck out, and he hoped the Government would be able to make some proposal in the shape of a compromise, which should be considered on Report. He was quite sure that the House would not sanction a continuance of the present state of things.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, a custom which had existed for 80 or 100 years might very safely be assumed to be a fair arrangement. If any charge were allowed to be made for stone it would be in the power of certain landowners to exact a considerable sum for it, because they might have a monopoly of the article. Why should this be allowed, when the material to be used was to be devoted to keeping roads in order, and which roads greatly improved their own estates? He thought the proprietors of the soil had no cause to complain of having the stone taken without compensation, seeing that they had the benefit of the roads made, and he did not believe many such complaints were made. What was objected to was the distance to which metal was taken from an estate. There was a case which came under his notice in the county which he represented, where the stone was taken from one quarry to repair nine miles of road. He had had a representation made to him on the subject by the owner of the land, in reply to which he pointed out the Government limit of three miles. His correspondent quite agreed to the alteration, and he (Mr. Barclay) thought the proposal of the Government might be accepted as doing away with the injustice of taking the material so far.

MR. VANS AGNEW said, he thought many hon. Members were under a misapprehension as to the effect of Clause 80 of the General Turnpike Act. It certainly provided that materials for maintaining roads might be secured without compensation, but only from uncultivated or unenclosed land, and if removed from enclosed or cultivated land all surface-damage had to be paid for. Therefore, there was not that injury done to property which hon. Gentlemen assumed. He had never heard of any inconvenience arising in consequence of stones being taken for road purposes from landed estates. The one evil which remained was, that a quarry might be opened in the neighbourhood of a residence; but he rather thought that the influence of anyone whose residence was likely to be in that position would be sufficient to provide that no damage was done in that respect. He thought if hon. Members would look fairly at the whole clause, the difficulties which many hon. Members thought might occur would not arise.

MR. RAMSAY said, he had looked at the whole clause and studied it with the best attention he could bestow; but he could not observe that clearness about it which the hon. Member who had just spoken had hinted at. As to the argument that no damage was done, as the stone was of little value, he replied that in fairness compensation should be given, and if the stone was not worth much the less the sum which would have to be paid. What he wanted to be informed of was, why any private property should be dedicated to the public use without compensation? The views which had been enunciated on the other side of the House as to the public rights and interests were not such as were generally heard coming from that quarter. At a subsequent stage of the proceedings he would propose that full power be given to the trustees to take such land and material as might be required for the purpose of making and maintaining roads on the terms prescribed by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, which applied to cases where land was taken for railway or other purposes. He did not see why the public should be dealt with differently from railway or canal companies, or why they should not pay for metal to be used in making and maintaining roads. The hon. Member for Wigton (Mr. Vans Agnew) had said that stone was only taken, without compensation, from unenclosed land. But he (Mr. Ramsay) would remind the Committee that in many counties in Scotland, the land, though cultivated, was not enclosed, and was it desired to give power to the trustees to enter such land without compensation? He did not believe the majority of those who sat on the Liberal side of the House would consent to the present practice being adhered to, and he hoped the Government would assent to the adoption of a course which would put an end to the existing state of things.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON was of opinion that some alteration ought to be made. It ought to be remembered that when the Turnpike Act was passed Scotland was in a very different condition to what it was now. It was very easy to get the material for roads then; but since then the country had been greatly enclosed, and the difficulty of obtaining requisite material was greater than before. Some portions of the country were very highly cultivated and yet not enclosed, and the first part of the section applied to uncultivated and waste land; but there was also a proviso for entering enclosed land under certain circumstances; but the word "enclosed" did not protect owners of land which was very highly cultivated but not enclosed. There were many complaints in his county as to the working of the General Turnpike Act, and he was of opinion that some change was absolutely necessary.

COLONEL MURE said, it had been the custom in Scotland from time immemorial to take stone for the maintenance of roads, and there was now an immense number of quarries open. What he desired to know before he committed himself to any particular decision was, what was done for the maintenance of roads in England?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the English General Turnpike Act was almost word for word the same as that which affected Scotland.

COLONEL MURE said, as the same arrangement applied to England, he scarcely thought the House would be justified in making any alteration in so far as the case of Scotland was concerned.

This arrangement had never, to his knowledge, caused any discontent in his country. He was surprised to find his hon. Friend the Member for the Falkirk Burghs holding the views he had expressed, especially as the case of England and Scotland was identical.

MR. MUNTZ said, he had desired to mention to the Committee that the English and Scotch practice was the same. Under the English Turnpike Act he had known cases where the trustees had taken possession of cultivated fields to obtain stone; and although this was not a pleasant proceeding, yet it was one which must be submitted to for the public welfare. He wished the Lord Advocate would extend the three mile area for which stone and gravel was to be supplied to England; because, in that country, one particular spot was liable to find stone for the whole of the trust, which very often extended over many miles. Therefore, England would very greatly benefit by the three mile limit being adopted.

MR. M'LAGAN said, as it had been the custom from time immemorial to take the material, he did not see how it could be objected to now. He was glad that the whole question had been mooted, for he thought the time had now come when the House ought to decide how far stone should be taken for road purposes without payment, as in many districts the supply had become very scarce. He knew one locality, where a hill had been practically demolished for the purpose of supplying stone to roads at a considerable distance from that quarry; and it was now necessary that the supply for that neighbourhood should come from a distance. Therefore, he thought the distance should be limited; but the three mile limit, as suggested by the Lord Advocate, should be somewhat extended. He considered the Act should expressly provide for compensation being given to the proprietors of unenclosed, yet cultivated, lands which were entered for the purposes of providing material for the maintenance of roads, and even of uncultivated lands though unenclosed, because such land was becoming very valuable in Scotland.

MR. ANDERSON thought a very strong evidence that no inconvenience resulted from the present custom was to be found in the fact that, in the Acts which had been voluntarily obtained by counties, no attempt had been made to change the practice under the General Turnpike Act. That being so, he considered no great inconvenience could have been felt from the old custom.

LORD ELCHO said, he had been curious to hear the discussion, because the county he had the honour to represent was peculiarly situated both as regarded the carrying of metal for a long distance and also the hardship inflicted on proprietors by the compulsory taking of the stone. Much had been said about there being no right of entry, without compensation, on enclosed land; but he knew a case in East Lothian where a farm had been nearly severed by a quarry. This had been carried out in consequence of the difficulty of getting good metal elsewhere. He objected to metal being carried a long distance; yet he knew one case in which a quarry on an estate had been so worked out that the owner of the soil would soon be unable to get from his estate metal for his own roads, and he would have to draw it for a very long distance. This fact showed that the power to take stone over a large area bore hard in some cases; on the other hand, it was evident that the metal must be got from somewhere. That being so, the Government had acted apparently with a desire to draw what they considered to be a fair line between the two alternatives. Whether that limit should be three miles was matter for consideration—at any rate, he did not think the proprietors in his county would object to the power being retained.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that the right existed under the former system, and then it might just as well have been argued that the proprietors who furnished metal for the roads should not pay tolls. The Bill abolished tolls, and the assessment imposed was in lieu of tolls. It was a somewhat strange thing that the extreme doctrines of the rights of private owners as against those of the public should be advanced from his as well as the other side of the House; but he did not believe the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) would have much support from the Liberal benches. The landlords suffered no real injustice by the provision for taking stone, as compensation was given for actual damage. It had been argued that the metal should be paid for as the supply was getting scarce; but if stone were becoming less, it would be dangerous to deprive the authorities of the power to compulsorily take it, as otherwise the landowners might fix an enormous price for the article of which they had the monopoly. Therefore, he hoped that the Amendment would not be accepted. Also, he was inclined to think that it would be dangerous to limit the right to three miles, as was proposed in the Bill. As to the argument, that so great had been the demand for stone that one of the Scotch hills had been nearly demolished, he could only say that as they had so many hills in Scotland they could well spare a few.

MR. RAMSAY said, he had known cases of very great hardship which had come upon small proprietors by the operation of the Turnpike Act. He was in no way interested in the matter. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) was in error in supposing that local Acts contained no provisions on this point. An Act, which he then held in his hand, provided that the trustees should have power to acquire land and such material as was needed, subject to the terms fixed by the "Lands Clauses Consolidation Act." This would prevent an extravagant price being charged—and, in fact, it really became a matter of arrangement. He feared that the conferring of a compulsory power on the trustees would place one great obstacle in the way of the adoption of the Bill. With regard to the cost of the material, he had never known any charge to be made by landowners for the stone used. He would have liked that the law in this particular should be that the Land Clauses Act should be the guide for determining the cost of material.

MR. M'LAREN said, it had not been shown that the rule that obtained in Argyllshire, where the material could be found by the side of the roads, was that which the Committee were bound to follow. Everyone knew that there were hundreds of miles of road where good metal was not to be got at all.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, although the subject was worthy of attention, he hoped that the Government would not accede to the Amendment. He was sure the proprietors would not object to the stone on their property being used in their own neighbourhood.

Mr. Anderson

He thought that the taking away of the power of the trustees to take material from the roads would raise a very serious question. There was a quarry on the Glasgow and Carlisle road which had been cut almost through a hill, and had become not only an eyesore, but a danger to the district where it was situated. But if power was given to carry stone to a considerable distance, it might be taken 50 or 100 miles to districts where there was a want of materials. He hoped the Government would retain the clause, and that his hon. Colleague would not press the Amendment.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER said, in deference to the feeling of the Committee, he would beg leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendment was made:— In page 50, line 4, to leave out "is consistent," and insert "inconsistent."

Amendment, in page 50, line 17, to leave out from "be" to end of clause (Sir Windham Anstruther), by leave, withdrawn.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to ask the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, whether the road trustees were to be left to drive a bargain with persons who might happen to have a monopoly of material? He moved, as an Amendment, to omit that portion of the clause which contained the limit of three miles beyond which material was not to be removed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, with regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Lanarkshire (Sir Windham Anstruther), he had already intimated that the Government considered the limitation of three miles an exceedingly reasonable one, and that under an improved system of road making it would not be right to permit road material to be carried from the land of one proprietor to a road that he had nothing to do with, without compensation for the injury sustained.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had given previous intimation of his intention to move a similar Amendment to the clause.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, in that case, he was quite ready to withdraw his Amendment in favour of that of the hon. Member for Edinburgh.

MR. M'LAREN begged to move, as an Amendment, that in line 22, page 50, the word "three" be omitted, and the word "six" inserted. It was the case that some proprietors would possess harder road metal than others, and the clause would enable them to obtain for it a higher price, the effect of which would be an inducement to the trustees to put worse metal on the roads. Another consequence would be a greater expense in the end, as the roads would be more expensive to keep up with inferior metal than with good. The operation of this part of the clause would increase the burden on the particular district concerned, while the favoured individual who sold the metal would get a high price for it at the expense of the rate-payers and the other landowners. He considered that the radius of six miles, which was fixed by the Amendment proposed by him, was a much more reasonable one than that contained in the clause.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL did not think any sufficient reason had been shown for changing the existing law, and he considered that in that respect the Lord Advocate was proceeding illogically. Either there was a custom on the footing of an old servitude, or there was not. If there was, the existing law should be maintained; if there was not, he did not see why there should be a compromise by a restriction to three miles. It was true the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) was a compromise; but it was also one of a very reasonable character—a large portion of the metal used had to be carried more than three miles. He trusted that the Amendment would be considered, seeing that otherwise the clause would make a very great alteration in the existing law and practice.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had already indicated his views of this part of the subject. The real practical question of limitation, which he thought to be reasonably fixed at three miles, was one that the Committee should be quite ready to deal with, without having to make comments on the system of macadamising the roads. One very strong reason for the limitation was, that if they did not make it they enabled trustees to prey on one proprietor for the benefit of others who might have long frontages on roads on which he never set foot.

LORD ELCHO wished to know, whether a proprietor was to be allowed to place whatever price he chose on the metal, or whether it was to be settled by the trustees, or by some other mode of reference? It might be that where a proprietor had a monopoly, he would exact a price that would be unreasonable; and, in view of that, he could not help thinking that some power should be vested in the Sheriff, or somebody else, of fixing a reasonable one.

MR. RAMSAY said, the question was not an important one. Had the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate proposed to confine the use of materials to the estate from which they were taken, he could have understood what was intended.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 106 (Recovery and application of penalties).

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE begged leave to move, in page 50, line 27, the insertion of the words "or continued in force hereby," after the word "herewith."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he quite agreed to this addition.

Amendment agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

On the Motion of The LORD ADVOCATE, the following Amendment made:—In page 51, line 23, to leave out "immediate," and insert "immediately."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Postponed Clause 54 (Power of road authority to recover expenses of extraordinary traffic).

COLONEL ALEXANDER moved, as an Amendment, to omit, from line 24, page 28, the words "by the certificate of their surveyor or district surveyor," on the ground that the trustees ought to be allowed to act quite independently of any such certificate, which would have to be given by their own servant.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he objected to the Amendment, considering that the powers intrusted to the Board under this clause were of a delicate character, and that damages ought not to be recoverable unless the surveyor was in a position to certify that they had been sustained by the road.

Amendment negatived.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, as an Amendment, to insert after the word "by," in line 29, page 28, the words "excessive weight passing along the same, or by." The damage that was intended to be prevented by the Amendment was not that resulting from ordinary traffic, but from enormous cars, laden with bales of goods drawn by traction engines, which were not only of themselves too heavy for the roads, but broke down culverts and bridges, for which damage there was no redress.

MR. VANS AGNEW thought it would shorten the discussion if the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would state what he proposed to do with regard to the passage of heavy weights, traction engines, &c., along the public roads. A great many Notices had been given by hon. Members with the object of removing evils which were likely to arise therefrom, and their course would be made clearer by the expression of the intentions of the Government.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, if it was the intention of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to accede to the clause which would be proposed by the hon. Member for South Lanarkshire it would meet the case.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had understood that the question was to be dealt with separately by a Bill regulating the use of engines on highways. A series of clauses had been proposed by the hon. Member for South Lanarkshire (Sir Windham Anstruther), the terms of which were the same in effect as those contained in the Highways Bill for England, promoted by the Government. He, therefore, had no objection to those clauses being inserted, and made applicable to Scotland; but, at the same time, it was to be remarked that, while regulating, they did not provide for damage occasioned through the overloading of engines. He thought the Amendment was not in the least inconsistent with those clauses.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he was a member of the deputation which waited upon the Home Secretary and the late Lord Advocate a few years ago with reference to this question of locomotives, when a Road Bill was introduced which contained provisions affecting them. The objections to those provisions were so strongly urged that the Home Secretary withdrew the clauses, and they had not been re-introduced. If those who were interested in the use of locomotive engines had known that there was any intention on the part of the Government to introduce such a regulation giving the trustees power to tax engines, he thought they would have made representations that would have produced the same effect as before. As locomotives were in common use all over the country, they ought to be dealt with by a special Act, and it was clear that a regulation for taxing them would be a revival of the toll system. How was the case of locomotives to be dealt with that, perhaps, went only once or twice a-year a distance of two or three miles in a county? The clauses proposed to be introduced with regard to extraordinary traffic would be very difficult to work. He hoped the Government would not commit themselves to deal in this Bill with the question of road locomotives, seeing that it was generally understood by those interested that they would not do so.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he was quite impartial on this question. He was not at all willing that any undue taxation should be imposed on these engines; but, at the same time, no one could shut his eyes to the fact that the mischief and destruction caused by them was enormous and almost incalculable. Not long since, a case was brought to his notice of a traction engine that was rented for £5, doing damage to the extent of £500 during the first year of its use. The strong point in favour of traction engines was their great advantage to the farmer, who could not only by their use thrash his crop wherever he chose, but in a far better way than under the old system. Looking from that point alone, it would be a great loss and injury to the country if a stop were put to the use of traction engines on the roads; but it was a great grievance that persons should use traction engines for the purpose of transporting hundreds of tons of lime, coal, or bricks, thereby rendering the roads practically impassable. It was only fair that some step should be taken; and if the matter were left to the road trustees he felt quite satisfied that, as they were connected with the tenantry of the district and anxious to promote their welfare, they would be able to make equitable arrangements for the protection of the roads. While taking precautions for that purpose, they would have in their own hands the power of making regulations for the proper management of traction engines. There were several points connected with the question which, no doubt, must crop up again; meanwhile, he was glad to support the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Alexander Gordon) who moved the Amendment.

COLONEL MURE urged that the matter should be deferred until the new clause dealing with it was brought up.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE pointed out that the framework of the clause was not adapted to deal with this particular question. The particular clause was meant to give power to trustees to bring people before the Sheriff in cases where they caused extraordinary damage by extraordinary traffic. He, therefore, joined the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) in urging that they could better deal with the subject in a new clause.

MR. RAMSAY thought the disadvantage of discussing the question at that moment, and, indeed, in connection with the Bill at all, arose from the fact that those who were interested in the use of traction engines were under the impression that the subject was not to be dealt with by the measure. It was certainly a question of importance, but the public had not had it under their consideration. To no one, he might add, was it of more importance than to agriculturists who employed steam power in their farming operations. He would suggest, that if a separate clause dealing with the matter were to be introduced at a subsequent period of the discussion on the Bill, it would be better to remove all reference to it in the clause before the Committee.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, his Amendment did not necessarily apply to locomotives.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he was of opinion that it would not be wise to insert the Amendment in the present clause. It would be much better to make the question which it raised the subject of a separate clause. He would remind the Committee that, besides traction engines, there might be other heavy weights employed in the traffic upon the roads, and their case, he contended, the Amendment would not meet. If the operation of the clause were to be made to extend to "building operations, haulage of wood, and construction of works," a great injustice, he could not help thinking, would be done, and much strife in almost every district would be the result. What was the meaning, he would ask, of the words "haulage of wood?" Did they not apply to the case of a proprietor who cut down his own wood? If so, was it fair that under such circumstances a proprietor should be called upon to pay additional taxation for the temporary use of the roads.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will excuse me for interrupting him. The words "haulage of wood" have already been dealt with, and are included in the Bill.

MR. ORR-EWING maintained that there should be in the Bill no provision for the purpose of compelling a proprietor to pay additional taxation who might not have used a road for the "haulage of wood" more than, perhaps, once in a period of 50 or 60 years. Let him suppose, too, the case of a gentleman in a villa, who had no house, who went by railway to and from his residence, and who at last thought fit to build another house—why should he, he would ask, be subjected to additional taxation for the temporary use of the roads? He could not regard the position in which the Bill would place a man so situated as a fair one. The result would be litigation without any corresponding advantage; and he hoped, therefore, that such cases would be excepted from the operation of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he wished to propose the omission from the clause of the words—

"Arising from working of quarries, building operations, haulage of wood, construction of works, or other exceptional or temporary cause," which had reference to the question of "extraordinary damage."

Mr. Orr-Ewing

MR. VANS AGNEW said, he had an Amendment to propose which came before that of the hon. Baronet. It had, in the course of the discussion which had just taken place, been stated that it was not desirable to deal with locomotives until the new clause which had been referred to came before the Committee. He must, however, point out that that clause, while it was proposed by it to regulate the traffic of locomotives, would give no remedy for "extraordinary damage" done by them. The clause before the Committee, however, was one which provided a remedy for such damage, and there was no doubt that the greatest injury which had of late been sustained by the roads in Scotland was due to the passing over them of traction engines. He had received from a gentleman residing in the county which he had the honour to represent, an account of an enterprising individual who had started as a carrier in the town of Stranraer, and who took goods about on a traction engine over roads which were utterly unsuited to such traffic. Eight or 10 tons of manure or lime were at a time conveyed in that way; and although, in consequence, a farmer might be saved 10s. or 15s. in the shape of carriage money, the roads were broken up to so great an extent by the traffic that more than £10 worth of damage was done to the roads by the engine—which was running daily—in a single trip, for parts of the roads in the particular district to which he was referring formed merely a thin crust over a mossy sub-soil. That, however, was a comparatively small matter, for considerable danger and annoyance to ordinary travellers was caused by those engines, because a great many of the less important roads were not wide enough to admit of a cart or carriage passing a traction engine; and the result was that it was no uncommon thing to see an engine break through the crust, and sink up to the axle, thus completely stopping the traffic until it was dug out at the expense, not of the owner, but of the road trustees. As the present clause was that which applied to the payment of damage to roads, he thought it afforded the proper opportunity to enter upon the question of the regulation of the traffic of locomotives, and on that of the remedy which should be given for the damage done by them when used by their owners for their own profit on roads which were unfitted for them. As matters now stood, there was no law in existence to prevent the owner of a locomotive from employing it over any road in any county in Scotland; and although, if it broke down a bridge, he could be made to pay for the damage, yet it might damage any number of miles of road and he would not be liable to the payment of a single farthing. He begged, therefore, to move the insertion in the clause, after the words which had been last inserted, of the words "passing of traction engine or other locomotive, or by."

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he did not approve of the clause at all, but he thought it would be made worse if the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman were adopted. An Amendment which had already been agreed to by the Committee would, it seemed to him, meet the case, because it applied to excessive weight passing along the roads.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that so far as he could see, the only advantage which could result from assenting to the Amendment would be that it would have the effect of making the clause somewhat more plain.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he did not see why he should have been forestalled by the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Mr. Vans Agnew). His object was the same as that which the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) had in view. His hon. and gallant Friend wished to move to increase the number of cases to which the clause should be made applicable, and to specify them. Now, in his opinion, any attempt to define the particular cases which might arise under the operation of the clause would only serve to land the Committee in difficulties. It would be far better, he thought, to have the clause simply general, so as to leave the power of applying a remedy to unforeseen cases of extraordinary traffic. He himself had experienced serious difficulty in the endeavour to draft a clause to provide for exemptions in a Bill which he had introduced in that House last year. There were a number of cases which were governed in the end by the same authority; and if a new case arose, though the traffic might be extraordinary, and the damage done very great, it could not be dealt with unless it was specified in a clause which professed to be specific. He would put it to his hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire (Mr. Vans Agnew) whether it would not be better to leave the clause general, so that the road authority might be enabled to recover for damage done, in a summary manner, before the Sheriff. He claimed the support of Her Majesty's Government for that appeal, because in the Highways Bill, which had lately been amended, the words "temporary cause" had been omitted. The interpretation of those words was a matter of some difficulty, because there would be no remedy where the excessive use was not temporary; and, as he had pointed out, there would be great difficulty in defining the word "temporary." His Amendment, if adopted, would exclude from the clause the words—

"Arising from working of quarries, building operations, haulage of wood, construction of works, or other exceptional or temporary cause."

He hoped the Government would agree to the omission of those words.

THE LORD ADVOCATE wished to say at once that he was quite prepared to accept the Amendment of the hon. Baronet.

MR. VANS AGNEW said, he had no wish to insist on the words which he had proposed, provided it was made perfectly clear that the damage done by locomotives was to be taken into account.

Amendment (Mr. Vans Agnew), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (Sir Edward Colebrooke) agreed to.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved the insertion before the word "traffic," page 28, line 37, of the words "or excessive weight."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had no objection to accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ANDERSON moved that the following words be added in page 28, at the end of the Clause:—

"And similarly, in exceptional cases, where it can be shown that mines, quarries, and other works convey their products or goods by rail or canal and not by road, it shall be competent to the authority to make reductions in the uniform assessment, and also to enter into agreements for the payment of a composition of said assessment of from one-fourth to one-half in respect of such limited traffic, and thereafter the person so paying such composition shall not be subject to any proceedings for the recovery of any further sum."

The object, he said, of the Amendment was to provide for another exception in a different direction. Personally, he was not in favour of introducing exceptions into the Bill; but as the Government had made exceptions providing extraordinary taxation for extraordinary traffic, he thought they were logically bound to provide diminished taxation for diminished traffic. There were a great many properties in Scotland of which the rateable value was exceedingly high, yet they would not use the roads at all. In the case of mines, quarries, and a great number of other industrial works, all the goods and products were carried either by railway or by canal. They would, therefore, receive from the roads benefit to nothing like the extent of the money which they would be called upon to pay for their maintenance under the operation of the Bill. The hon. Baronet the Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) had an Amendment on the Notice Paper, the terms of which were similar to his; while it fixed more exactly the amount of the impositions to be paid. It was, however, entirely a matter of indifference to him whether the proportion was fixed at a quarter, or as in his, varied from a quarter to a half; but there should, at all events, in his opinion, be some such reduction made as he proposed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 28, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "and similarly, in exceptional cases, where it can be shown that mines, quarries, and other works convey their products or goods by rail or canal, and not by road, it shall be competent to the authority to make reductions in the uniform assessment, and also to enter into agreements for the payment of a composition of said assessment of from one-fourth to one-half in respect of such limited traffic, and thereafter the person so paying such composition shall not be subject to any proceedings for recovery of any further sum."—(Mr. Anderson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Mr. Anderson

THE LORD ADVOCATE rose merely to say that he could not accept the hon. Gentleman's Amendment. He could not see that there was any similarity between the exceptions made in the clause as it stood, and those which the hon. Gentleman wished to introduce into it. The principle of the Bill was that all lands and heritages should be taxed for the use of the roads, and the exceptions in the clause were not exceptions in favour of anyone in respect of that use, but in respect to the abuse of the roads. It was only that exception which was provided for in the clause.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE could not agree with the right hon. and learned Lord in the opinion that there was no similarity between the two cases to which he had just referred. The proprietors of mines and quarries had, he thought, some claim to consideration in those cases in which their traffic was carried over railways constructed by themselves. Unless that consideration was extended to them, great injustice, he contended, would be done by the Bill as between man and man in several instances. From the first, he had maintained that the toll system possessed certain advantages for those who used the roads, and that that system could not be changed, and the cost of keeping the roads in repair thrown upon the rates without causing great inequality and injustice. That was a state of things which it was, he thought, the duty of the Committee to face. If a case were shown in which it was desirable to make an exception, they were bound to deal with it. For his own part, he had based his case mainly on the question of mines and minerals. Public works were as a rule, no doubt, rated pretty heavily; but still at a rate far less in proportion to their value than many other descriptions of property in their immediate vicinity. Mines, on the other hand, were taxed not merely on the full rental, but upon an annually decreasing profit. He knew of cases in his own county in which mines were actually worked out, and had yet been rated as if their value had undergone no diminution. But that upon which he chiefly rested the case of iron and coal mines in the present instance was that ample provision was made for carrying on their traffic quite independently of the roads of the country. Indeed, it was only upon such conditions that mines could be properly worked, and if they were taxed for the carriage of minerals which were conveyed upon their own roads, an injustice would undoubtedly be done so far as they were concerned. He was quite aware that a strong prejudice existed against making any general exemptions; but the facts relating to mines were so staggering that they were entitled to be fully considered by the Committee. The question was one which had been considered by a Royal Commission, although in a different sense, and that Commission proposed that as the traffic of minerals cut up the roads very much, an extra tax should be imposed whenever it was proved that it had had that effect. That was virtually what was proposed to be done by the present Bill; but he contended that if it were only once generally known that, so far from unusual traffic on the roads being caused by the carriage of minerals, they carried on their traffic independently of those roads, it would unhesitatingly be admitted that they had a strong claim to exemption. The case he was endeavouring to lay before the Committee had been so very fairly put in a Petition which had been laid before the House within the last two or three Sessions, that he need do nothing more than remind the Committee of a remarkable fact which it stated, and that was that in the case of one of the largest ironmasters in Scotland, only 243,000 tons of minerals, out of a gross total of 10,168,000 tons—or less than an average of 2½ per cent—had been carried along the public roads in Scotland during a given period, the rest having been conveyed along roads which had been constructed by iron, coal, and other mining proprietors themselves. There were, of course, mines the traffic of which was worked by means of country roads; but with these he did not propose to deal. He would only add that if there were any doubts entertained with respect to the facts of the case, it was the plain duty of Parliament to cause an inquiry to be instituted into the matter. The result of any such inquiry would be, he firmly believed, to substantiate the view of the case which he had deemed it to be his duty to lay before the Committee.

COLONEL ALEXANDER expressed a hope that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would re-consider the decision at which he had arrived with regard to the Amendment. It seemed, he must say, to be a very fair proposal. He represented a county which was very similarly situated to that which the hon. Baronet who had just sat down represented, and he could bear testimony to the fact that the mineral proprietors of Ayrshire made no use of the public roads inasmuch as they had constructed private railways; while the increased taxation to which they would be subjected if the clause were to pass in its present shape would be something enormous.

COLONEL MURE said, he also stood very much in the same position with respect to the question as the hon. Baronet the Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke), and was strongly of opinion that it was most desirable the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate should reconsider his decision in regard to it. The Committee were aware that the iron trade of Scotland was not at the present moment in a very satisfactory condition—a fact which was, no doubt, to be, to a great extent, attributed to the general depression of trade throughout the country; but it must not be forgotten that the mining interests in Scotland had also been greatly burdened by the action of labour, and by those imposts which had already been placed upon it for the protection of labour. In order to show the condition to which, in consequence, the iron trade had been reduced, he might mention that he was informed Scotch builders were procuring the iron which they required from Belgium, and that the iron used in the construction of the magnificent new railway station in St. Enoch Square, Glasgow, had to be got from Belgium, owing to Scotch ironmasters not being able to compete with their foreign rivals. The present, therefore, was not a time when the Government should refuse to accept so reasonable an Amendment as that of the hon. Member for Glasgow. He would call the attention of the right hon. and learned Lord to a few figures which had been supplied to him by one of the great ironmasters in Scotland. He would quote those figures in order to show the great increase of burdens that would be caused to that particular firm if the Bill were allowed to pass in its present form. He would not mention the name of the firm, but would state that the approximate cost of one of the sidings and the railway to their ironworks and collieries was between £70,000 and £80,000. The length of the railway was 40 miles, and the cost of its maintenance was £4,200 per annum; whilst the amount of the yearly rent upon the minerals for which they were liable was £33,728. At present the company paid £150 a-year; but they calculated that, under this Bill, they would be mulcted in charges to nearly six times that amount—that was to say, they would have to pay to the amount of £870. He thought that this was, at least, a case for inquiry, and that more notice should be taken of it than had been done by the right hon. and learned Lord. He knew that the Committee laboured under a difficulty when discussing questions of this kind in an almost empty House, and when hon. Members came rushing in from the dining rooms to vote against an Amendment, of the principle of which they actually knew nothing; but he ventured to say that, as far as mercantile interests were concerned, more notice ought to be taken of the provisions of the clause than had been shown by hon. Gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House. He hoped sincerely that the Home Secretary and the Lord Advocate would not set aside the claims of the mineral interest in Scotland, but would grant them those advantages to which they were entitled.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY thought that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) opened up a wide question. It might be true that the minerals from the quarries might not pass over the roads; but surely machinery, provisions, and other things necessary for their working were at times conveyed over them. They could not expect in a Bill of that kind to make all interests even. Were there no inequalities in the case of agricultural land and sheep farms? Take a sheep farm with a rental of £2,000 or £3,000 a-year. The farmer in such a case never used the roads except once or twice a-year; the sheep were never passed over the road if the farmer could possibly help it; and yet the sheep farmer was to be taxed in the same way as the ordinary agriculturist who was using the roads every day. If they once got into this question of exceptions, there would be no end to them. He hoped the Government would stand firm upon the point.

COLONEL MURE said, the point of the whole thing was, that the ironmasters had made their own roads; whilst the owners or the tenants of the sheep farms had made no roads at all. They had made nothing except their sheep-walks. What he wanted to point out was, that a very large amount of capital had been expended in making roads for mineral purposes, and if the proprietors were not to obtain some advantage for the expenditure of their capital, a great hardship must ensue.

LORD ELCHO begged to dispute the view taken by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Mure). He did not think that the amount of money which had been laid out by mineral proprietors at all affected the question of principle. They had laid out their capital for their own good. He had no doubt the sheep farmer also did not use the roads; but that did not affect the general principle, whether all property should be assessed at the same rate or not. There were thousands of people who did not injure the roads at all. They only walked along them. Every little village in Scotland had a general interest in the roads; and it might just as well be said that their inhabitants should be exempted, because they did not use the roads except to get their meat and bread. In the same way, as had been pointed out, the people belonging to the mine used the roads for getting their tea and bread and a hundred other things. If these mines caused extraordinary damage to the roads, they would be rated at a higher figure; but if they did not damage them, they would only be in the position of every poor body in Scotland who did not use the roads, but was yet taxed on his £5 of rent to maintain them. If there was hardship in the one case, there was also in the other. There was another description of property to which the argument applied. He had been asked by a gentleman interested in the salmon fisheries to say that he did not send his fish over the roads, and therefore he considered it a hard thing that he should have to pay for them. All property, however, was interested in the roads of the country generally, and the argument of his hon. and gallant Friend opposite, he thought, was not one that should be adhered to. It appeared to him that the Bill of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate did substantial justice to all interests.

MR. RAMSAY could not agree with the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho), nor with the clause. If there was any infringement of the principle of the Bill, it was that the Government had introduced a clause enabling them to charge for extraordinary traffic. He thought the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) was a logical and equitable sequence to that clause. In the majority of cases the proprietors of minerals did not use the public roads at all. They used their private roads, made at their own expense, for the purpose of having their goods conveyed to their destination, without ever passing over the public roads at all. He should have preferred the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Lanarkshire to that of the hon. Member for Glasgow; but the principle of either the one or the other was exactly the principle of the clause. He did hope, therefore, that the Amendment proposed should be agreed to—namely, that a reduction should be given—a corresponding reduction—where it could be shown that any mineral owner was not using the roads. Unless that was done, the Bill, if agreed to, would be the means of inflicting a positive injustice, because it would give power for the mineral owners to be assessed at the full rate. Supposing a man had two mines, one of which he approached by a public road and the other was reached by means of a railway, and a public road was not used at all. According to the Bill he would be assessed on both mines for his use of the public road; and no corresponding reduction would be made in respect to the mine that was approached by the railway. It was obvious that in such a case injustice would be done. He thought it was quite obvious they might use the term injustice without any abuse of language in such a matter as that; and he hoped the Committee would agree to the Motion of the hon. Member for North Lanarkshire.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was impossible to disguise the fact that the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Anderson) raised a very important question—one of far greater importance, if the Committee examined the principle of it, than had ever yet been suggested; because, if they were to take the test of absolute fairness and equality in the matter of assessment imposed upon lands and heritages in Scotland, it would lead to a revisal of almost every local and public burden in Scotland. It would not do to depart from the principle of the Bill. He ventured to say, however, in many cases—in all cases since the valuation roll was established by the Act of 1854—the ownership of lands and heritages of whatever kind, except in one or two cases, had been taken as the basis of taxation. The hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) introduced the present state of trade in reference to the question, and he (the Lord Advocate) ventured to say that they would get into the greatest difficulties if that matter were entered upon. They could not stay to inquire what a person was making in relation to the valuation on which he was assessed. If the case of two householders was taken, one living on one side of the road and another on the other side, in the one case there was a small rental and a large establishment, and the man used the roads. The other man paid a far larger rental and never used the roads. He contended that in those cases the assessment could not be made to differ. If there were works in that district which used the railways, those works could not be carried on without local supplies; and there were hundreds of other cases on behalf of which the same argument could be advanced—such as railways and canals—but in these cases they made their own roads, for in effect they were roads and competing roads. In this matter the principle of the Bill should be adhered to, and the question of differential rates should not be taken up. The hon. Member for Glasgow said the Government had departed from the principle of the Bill, but that he (the Lord Advocate) denied. He could not accept the Amendment proposed.

MR. M'LAREN considered that some allowance should be made; and, therefore, he would suggest that the words

"one-fourth to one-half" in the Amendment should be omitted, and that it should be left to the authorities to allow such reductions as, in their opinion, the circumstances called for. It seemed to be assumed that it was the traffic alone that destroyed the roads. It had not been shown that frost and rain would create injurious effects, even if there was no traffic at all. There were many roads which, if they were left for four or five years, without even a cart going over them, would require to be repaired in that time. The owners of the ship-building yards on the Clyde might say that factories behind them, valued at the same amount as themselves, would only pay one-fourth; whilst they, in respect of their yards, would be charged at the full rate, and yet they never used the roads at all. There would be no justice in making exceptions in the cases of mines and not extending it to all other cases. The Amendment stated—

"And similarly, in exceptional cases, where it can be shown that mines, quarries, and other works, convey their products or goods by rail or canal, and not by road."

It would require very close investigation to make out every class of cases which ought to come under the exception; consequently he would say nothing about the "one-fourth or one-half," but would leave it to the authorities themselves to decide the extent of the allowance.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, there must be equal rules for assessment as far as concerned the rates for the use of the roads all through the country. It was absolutely impossible they could say A should pay so much and B so much. They would never be able to arrive at any accurate conclusion. The only thing was, that everyone must pay alike, as they all paid taxation alike, in order that the roads might be kept up. A man was called upon to pay taxes, although he might not get the benefit of the actual particular tax which he paid; but when the question of excessive use was come to, that was another matter. The maintenance of the roads fell upon all alike. A and B might not use the roads for any purpose whatever; but they might prevent others from using them by absolutely destroying them. Hence it was absolutely necessary that all should contribute. He should, therefore, vote against the Amendment.

Mr. M'Laren

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR thought the Committee could not possibly agree to the Amendment, as there were so many classes of property—shootings, fishings, sheep farms, and the like, which would claim exemption, and consequently great difficulties would arise.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, that notwithstanding the important principles laid down by the Lord Advocate and the Home Secretary, he should support the Amendment. It seemed to him that the objections made to the Amendment were not valid ones. They would be answerable as against a proposal to exempt owners of mines and others from payment; but the Amendment asked for a reduction only, and he could not see why it should not be conceded. The fact that the mineowners, and the owners of quarries, and other works, had made roads for themselves, was conclusive that they abstained from the use of the public roads, and thereby spared them. It might be said that the existence of such centres brought a population around them who used the roads; but it must be known to everybody that they only used the roads for walking upon, or for having provisions brought to their homes. He maintained, therefore, that in certain cases a reduction in the assessment should be made.

MR. M'LAGAN said, that notwithstanding what had been said by the Government, he should support the Amendment. The sheep farmers, who never made a road, used those made by the counties; whereas, in many cases, the mineowner did not use them at all, but passed his goods over his own railway. Under such circumstances some exceptions should be made; for it was most unjust to assess at the full assessment. An abolition of the tax was not asked, but they simply desired to effect a reduction. If the clause was passed, mineowners would be made to pay not only on the value of their buildings, but on the railways by which the tear and wear of the public roads would be saved, and on the fixed rents or royalty of the minerals which were being exhausted, and thus the assessment would be raised enormously.

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME although fully admitting the strength of the arguments used by the right hon. and learned Lord below him (the Lord Advocate), did not feel inclined to oppose the Amendment, seeing that it was of a permissive character — the road trustees having power to make the proposed reduction, or not, as they thought fit. In that respect, it seemed to him that the Amendment compared very favourably with other Amendments moved to the same effect by the hon. Member for North Lanarkshire, who left the question to be decided by the Sheriff of the county. Perhaps, as this was a mere permissive power, the Lord Advocate would see his way to grant it.

MR. ORR-EWING hoped the right hon. and learned Lord would not yield to the Amendment. He believed it would work unfairly, because the traffic passing along roads from mines was really very great indeed compared with the ordinary traffic. So far from lightening, this Bill added considerably to the burdens of the landowners; and he thought it would be very unfair to that class, and to small burghs, to allow the exemption proposed. He knew that the argument was that mineowners had not hitherto paid much toll, but they had shown that they had suffered very largely by changes that had been made. It was very true that they had hitherto paid many tolls. It seemed to him it would be unfair, when Parliament was making this great change, if they made any exemptions—they should all sail together. Landowners, mineowners, and manufacturers all sailed in the same boat, and he was sure the benefits they would all derive from improved roads would make up for any immediate inconvenience which the Bill might entail upon them.

COLONEL MURE said, there seemed to be an impression in the House that they wanted these parties exempted. They wanted nothing of the sort. The principle of composition in the matter of value had always been recognized, and the Amendment provided nothing more than that it might be resorted to in certain cases.

MR. ANDERSON remarked that the arguments of the right hon. and learned Lord (the Lord Advocate) would have been very good indeed, if he had never introduced the clause at all; but that, having introduced the clause, he had set an example for exceptions and had entirely cut away the ground from under his own feet. The right hon. and learned Lord said the two cases were not analogous, because he said he only allowed an extra charge for "abuse of the roads." Now, one so-called abuse was the "construction of buildings or works." That, surely, could not be properly called an abuse. Instead of being an abuse, it was only a temporary extra use for the purpose of creating new rateable subjects to pay for the roads. He was aware the words "construction of buildings or works" had now been struck out of the clause; but the Government intentions must be judged by the clause as they introduced it. He contended that it was extra use, not amounting to abuse; and if an allowance ought to be made for that, it equally ought to be made for "reduced use," which was the principle of the Amendment. The case of railways had been so well argued that he need not mention that the railways were evidently fed by the roads. All the railways touched upon the roads, and the traffic was supplied by them. He asked for no complicated exemptions, but for a small reduction, in the fixing of which considerable latitude would be allowed. He was not wedded to his own words, and if the principle he contended for were conceded, he would accept any reasonable form of Amendment which the Government might propose. Failing that, he should feel it his duty to take the sense of the Committee on his claim, which appeared to him a perfectly just one.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE maintained that, in placing an Amendment on the Paper for a modification of valuation in certain cases, he was not proposing any new principle; but was only asking for some modification of valuation in special cases, in order to adapt the valuation to the special circumstances of the case. It was notorious that such modifications had been made in the General Police Improvement (Scotland) Act, and in various other measures relating to canals, railways, gas, and water, &c. Indeed, he did not see that his opponents had a leg to stand on. The railways actually benefited by the roads. There might be cases in which a road was a rival to a railway; but they were exceptional, the rule being that roads were the feeders of railways.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR denied that the proprietors of sheep farms were unlike the proprietors of mines in this respect—that they did not make roads. He knew many proprietors of sheep farms who had made roads at their own expense, and he himself had constructed upwards of 20 miles of roads for his tenants.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY warned the Committee that if the exemptions now asked for were granted, he should claim a similar one on behalf of manufacturers whose establishments were connected with railways by sidings, and not by roads.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 81; Noes 59: Majority 28. — (Div. List, No. 178.)

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander), who had the next Amendments on the Paper, that these Amendments scarcely came within the scope of the clause.

Amendments, by leave, withdrawn.

On Question, "That the Clause be agreed to,"

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE rose to move that the following words be added to page 29, at end:—

"Provided also, That, where it is proved to the satisfaction of the sheriff that any mines or minerals are connected directly, or by private railways or canals, or by railway sidings, with any railway or canal constructed or maintained under the authority of any Act of Parliament, or with any public river by which such minerals are conveyed, or with any works at which such minerals are manufactured, the annual value of such mines or minerals shall, for the purposes of all assessments under this Act, but subject to the other provisions of this section, be held to be one-fourth part of the annual value thereof as entered in the Valuation Roll."

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Amendment appeared to him to embody the principle upon which the Committee had just pronounced its opinion.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that under these circumstances he would not move it.

Amendment not proposed.

Question put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of the LORD ADVOCATE, the following clause was agreed to, and added to the Bill, after Clause 45:—

Sir Tollemache Sinolair

(Burgh within county where Act not in force may, by agreement or otherwise, assume management, &c. of highways within it.)

"In any county in which tolls and statute labour have been abolished or are not exigible, and in which this Act is not in force, it shall be lawful for the local authority of any burgh situated therein, being a burgh within the meaning of this Act, at a meeting summoned for the purpose on not less than one month's notice, by special advertisement, to resolve to undertake the management and maintenance of the highways within the burgh; and it shall thereupon be lawful for such local authority to agree with the county road trustees or other authority having the charge of the highways within the county as to the terms upon which the highways within the burgh, together with a proportionate part of the debt, if any, affecting the highways within the county, shall be transferred to such local authority, and, failing agreement, the said terms shall be settled on summary application by the sheriff, whose decision shall be final, and upon the parties agreeing as aforesaid, or upon the terms of transference being settled as aforesaid, the highways within the burgh shall be transferred to and vested in the local authority thereof who shall have the entire management and control of the same, and shall possess the same rights of assessments and other rights, powers, and privileges (including the appointment of a clerk or clerks, surveyor or surveyors, and other necessary officers), and be subject to the same liabilities in reference to the highways (including the construction of new roads and bridges) therein, and debt, if any, affecting the same, as the burgh local authority of any burgh under this Act possess and are liable to in reference, roads, highways, and bridges (including as aforesaid), and also in reference to the streets within such burgh: Provided always, That any such resolution of the local authority of a burgh may be rescinded, with the consent of and on such terms as may be agreed upon with the County Road Trustees or other authority as aforesaid, and thereupon the original rights, powers, privileges, and liabilities of the said County Road Trustees or other authority in regard to the highways within such burgh, and the debt, if any, affecting the same, shall revive in full force and effect."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not think it would be necessary for him, in now addressing the Committee, to enter in detail into the circumstances which had led to the introduction of the clause he was about to propose. There was no doubt that the position of the City of Glasgow towards the adjacent counties of Lanark and Renfrew was a very peculiar one. After the Bill of last Session had been withdrawn, he took occasion to institute inquiries into this subject; and after the Report which was made to the Home Office had been communicated to those who were interested on both sides, effect was given in the clause he was about to move to the recommendations which had been made. He did not think it was necessary for him to say any more on the subject, and therefore he would content himself with simply moving the clause, reserving to himself the right to make further observations upon it, in case he should deem it right to do so. He moved, after Clause 85, to insert the following Clause:—

(Special provisions for highways in counties of Lanark and Renfrew.)

“Whereas it is expedient to make special provision in this Act in regard to the highways within the counties of Lanark and Renfrew: Be it enacted as follows:

“This Act shall commence to have effect within the counties of Lanark and Renfrew (including the burghs situated or partly situated therein) on the first day of June, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, but subject to the provisions following (that is to say):

“(1.) The debts affecting the turnpike and statute labour roads within the counties of Lanark and Renfrew, including the burghs therein situated, after having been valued as hereinbefore provided, shall be charged, and are hereby allocated upon the said counties and the burghs therein situated, in the proportion of their respective valuations at the commencement of this Act, as appearing from the valuation rolls then in force. The debts so allocated shall in all respects be deemed to be debts allocated in terms of this Act, and all the provisions of this Act with respect to debts which have been valued and allocated shall have effect with reference thereto;

“(2.) The city of Glasgow, and the burghs of Rutherglen, Govan, Partick, Maryhill, Hillhead, Crosshill, Kinningpark, Pollockshields, and Govan Hill, shall jointly contribute the sum of twelve thousand five hundred pounds annually towards the cost of maintaining the roads, highways, and bridges within the counties of Lanark and Renfrew. The said sum shall be a charge upon and be paid by the said city and the said burghs, in the proportion of their respective valuations at the commencement of this Act appearing as aforesaid, and shall be divisible between and be paid to the said counties, or any districts into which the same may be divided in terms of this Act, in the manner and in the proportions which shall be determined by a Commissioner appointed for the purpose by the Secretary of State, and shall be applied towards the maintenance of the roads, highways, and bridges within such counties or districts respectively, and in diminution, pro tanto, of the assessments for such maintenance leviable therein in terms of this Act. The amount falling to be paid by each such city and burgh to each such county or district respectively shall be payable at the expiration of one year from the date at which tolls shall cease to be exigible within such county or district, and at the expiration of each successive year thereafter; and if not paid when due, may be recovered with expenses in the Court of Session, at the instance of the County Road Clerk of the county. The Secretary of State may make orders as to the remuneration and travelling or other expenses of the said Commissioner, and as to the parties by whom such costs shall be paid, and the funds or assessments against which they shall be charged; and the Court of Session may interpose their authority to any order made by the Secretary of State as to such costs, and may grant decree conform thereto, upon which execution and diligence may proceed in common form;

“(3.) If it shall appear to the local authority of Glasgow, or of any of the burghs mentioned in this section, that any road, highway, or bridge, within two miles of their respective boundaries, is not, in whole or in part, maintained in a sufficient state of repair, having regard to the traffic passing over the same, it shall be lawful for the clerk of such local authority to apply, in a summary way, to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in the Court of Session, and the Lord Ordinary, after inquiry, may make such order as to him shall seem proper to remedy the evil complained of, and may ordain the said order to be carried into effect by, and at the sight of, such persons as he may think fit, and at the expense of the county, or district, as the case may be, and such order, which may also dispose of the expenses of the application, shall be final and not subject to review. The sums expended in terms of this section shall be deemed to be sums expended in the execution of this Act;

“(4.) From and after the date at which the annual contribution mentioned in this section shall commence to be payable, the sum of eight hundred and sixty pounds now payable by the lord provost, magistrates, and council of Glasgow as coming in place of the board of police of Glasgow to the statute labour road trustees of the barony parish of Glasgow, and the sum of sixty pounds now payable by them to the statute labour road trustees of the parish of Govan respectively, shall cease to be so payable;

“(5.) The populous places of Govan, Partick, Maryhill, Hillhead, Crosshill, Kinningpark, Pollockshields, and Govanhill shall, irrespective of their population, be deemed to be burghs within the meaning and for the purposes of this Act.”

New Clause—(Special provisions for highways in counties of Lanark and Renfrew,) — (The Lord Advocate,) — brought up, and read the first time.

Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. ANDERSON rose to object to the clause being read a second time, and to move its rejection. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had stated that it was founded on a private Report which had lately been sent to him; but he (Mr. Anderson) could refer to a much better document than that Report—namely, the Report of the Commission of 1859, which had taken no such absurd view of the relative positions of towns and counties. No such thing had ever been heard of as the proposal to saddle Glasgow with such exceptional legislation as that. But some unknown individual had been sent down from the Home Office to make some secret inquiry, and though he did not wish to say anything against him, he must remark that that individual had been marvellously deficient in common sense, and had allowed himself to be hoodwinked by the counties of Renfrew and Lanark; for he had reported to the Government to such purpose that they had brought in a clause which was absolutely unjust to Glasgow. By the Bill, as it originally stood, it was proposed to add an additional burden of 10 miles of roads to Glasgow, which at present were maintained by the county trusts, in addition to Glasgow having to keep up her own roads and streets. Glasgow did not object to these 10 miles, on the footing that the counties keeping up those roads at present would have to give up the tolls with which the maintenance of the roads to Glasgow were at present paid. Glasgow would gain nothing by it, and it only consented to take over the roads for the purpose of getting rid of the tolls. So much for the Bill itself; but he now had to deal with the new clause which proposed to put a far more severe and additional burden on Glasgow. When this measure was discussed on the Motion for going into Committee, the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) said that this new burden was imposed on Glasgow because at present the city was encircled by toll-bars. [Lord ELCHO: I did not say so. It was said by someone else.] In that case, his memory must be entirely astray. Certainly, some hon. Member said that the reason for imposing this new burden upon Glasgow was that Glasgow was encircled by toll-bars which raised some £30,000. [Lord ELCHO: Oh, I did say that.] He was glad to find that the noble Lord was beginning to remember what he said. The noble Lord forgot, however, that it was not Glasgow that paid these tolls. Since the time when railways were introduced, people going to and from the city travelled by rail. the tolls were principally paid by county traffic going into Glasgow. However, the people of Glasgow, no doubt, paid some part of the tolls — perhaps one-third, or £10,000 a-year; but they did not pay anything like the whole of them. And now they took over 10 miles of road that would cost them £10,000 a-year to keep up. This, then, was a fair compensation for getting rid of the tolls. As for this new clause, it would deal with the counties of Lanark and Renfrew in a totally exceptional way. They were quite content with the Bill as it stood; but this practice of introducing exceptions led to discussion. It was now actually proposed to saddle Glasgow with an extra burden of £12,500 a-year in perpetuity, to keep up the county roads with which Glasgow had nothing to do—except, perhaps, that some of her citizens occasionally went out into the country. It was true that Glasgow was formerly encircled by toll-bars. It had been the practice of many counties to hem in burghs by means of toll-bars, so that no citizen could get out without paying tolls. That system had prevailed in the counties adjacent to Glasgow, and he did not complain of it; but the present proposal to saddle Glasgow with the payment of £12,500 in perpetuity towards the upkeep of the county roads he considered to be a gross injustice.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER pointed out that the sum to be paid by Glasgow was only £10,000, and not £12,500, as the hon. Member had stated.

MR. ANDERSON said, the total amount was £12,500, which was divided between Glasgow and the little satellite burghs that surrounded her. About £2,500 a-year would have to be paid by them, and £10,000 by Glasgow proper. Over and above that, it was proposed to saddle Glasgow with the payment of the debt on the county roads with which the city of Glasgow had nothing whatever to do. If one proposal could be more unjust than the other out of two extremely unjust proposals, this was, perhaps, the more unjust of the two. The counties of Lanark and Renfrew had not paid their debts on the road trusts, but had gone on accumulating them, and had never paid the first cost; Glasgow, on the other hand, having made streets at an enormous expense, had paid for them, and had given the counties the free use of those streets all along. A great deal of the traffic in the streets of Glasgow was county traffic purely. Coal, iron, stone, and farm produce passed through Glasgow to go to the railways or the Broomielaw district and elsewhere, and it did not contribute anything at all to Glasgow for the use of the streets; and to ask the city of Glasgow to pay £10,000 a-year to the county roads and to pay the county debt, because the county chose to accumulate it, he held to be a proposal altogether unjustifiable. There was, indeed, a small debt of about £140,000 on the Glasgow streets; but that was a mere trifle compared with what the streets had cost. If the proposal had been to throw the two debts together, and to enact that the city and the counties should pay equally, there might have been some approach to justice in it. His hon. Colleague (Dr. Cameron) had placed on the Paper an Amendment to that effect. They would accept that, if they could not get the proposed arrangement done away with altogether. If the Government would not regard the rights of the people of Glasgow, they could, of course, beat them easily on a division; but he hoped the Government would reason the matter out fairly, and would endeavour to show some good reason why the inhabitants of Glasgow should pay any share of the county debt. They did not object to pay it jointly, if the counties also paid the town debt jointly, and there was on the Paper a Motion by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) which they would be willing to accept; but they wished to endeavour, in the first place, to stop this injustice altogether, and to be dealt with in the same way as the rest of Scotland. He believed that the only reason for this unjust taxation was, that there would be an exceptional amount of taxation on the roads near Glasgow for the upkeep of the roads on which there was a great traffic near the city. But it must be remembered that the very proximity to Glasgow had raised the value of those lands; and therefore it was perfectly fair that the counties ought to pay for, as well as reap, the advantage of being so near Glasgow. It would be quite as reasonable for Glasgow to say to the counties of Lanark and Renfrew—"We provide you with miles of fine streets, and you send through them your coal, your iron, and your farm produce. Up to the present time we have not charged you anything for the use of our streets; but in future we will charge you £10,000 a-year for their upkeep." This would be just as fair as the present proposal of the Government that Glasgow should pay £10,000 a-year for the upkeep of the county roads. He should certainly take the sense of the Committee on the clause. The fact was, that the tolls outside Glasgow were not paid by Glasgow, therefore the counties ought to pay for the roads, and not Glasgow.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he would not go into all the questions which had just been raised by his hon. Friend (Mr. Anderson), because; if he did so, he should have to occupy the time of the Committee with a very long argument. The greater part of the allegations adduced by his hon. Friend had been over and over again made and controverted in the House of Commons. The roads referred to benefited not only the country districts, but also the towns; and therefore it was right that the latter should contribute to their maintenance. It would be in the power of any local authority or burgh, if they felt themselves aggrieved by the provisions of the Bill, to go to the Home Secretary and get a Provisional Order for redress. The Government had, however, thought it right to deal with the difficulties presented by the case of Glasgow by introducing a new clause. If the Commissioner who was sent down to inquire into the circumstances had determined in favour of Glasgow, his hon. Friend, instead of impugning the decision, would have asked the Committee to confirm it. Under all the circumstances, he should support the proposal of the Government. Throughout his argument his hon. Friend had represented this as the case of Glasgow only. His hon. Friend forgot, apparently, the important suburban burghs, some of which contained between 40,000 and 60,000 inhabitants. It was an extraordinary fact, which he begged the Committee to bear in mind, that all those burghs had acquiesced in the decision of the Commissioner. It was only Glasgow that stood out. The counties of Lanark and Renfrew were perfectly content with the arrangement. On the whole, he thought the proposal of the Government to lump together all the burghs connected with turnpike trusts was an equitable one; and he should, therefore, be prepared to give it his support.

LORD ELCHO wished to make an explanation, in consequence of what had fallen from the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson). He had thought at first that the hon. Gentleman was referring to the last discussion in Committee. It now appeared, however, that the hon. Gentleman was alluding to some observations which fell from him (Lord Elcho) on the second reading or on the Motion to go into Committee. What he said on one of those occasions was that Glasgow was surrounded by toll-bars; that about £44,000 a year was levied for those tolls; and that if Glasgow were relieved from this circle of toll-bars, it ought to pay a certain sum towards the payment of the debt. That was the remark he made and he still adhered to it, notwithstanding the speech of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. M'LAREN said, he considered the clause which was now under discussion to be the great blot on the Bill. The clause ought, in his opinion, to be resisted to the very uttermost by the inhabitants of Glasgow. It was one of pains and penalties such as hon. Members could not point to in any other measure, unless they went back to the days of the Stuarts. Here was a large sum fixed upon; but nobody knew how, or upon what principle. All that was known was that it was the result of the inquiries of a Commissioner appointed by the Home Office, who had conducted these inquiries in secret. He (Mr. M'Laren) had been one of the Royal Commissioners appointed nearly 20 years ago to investigate these subjects, and in that way he had acquired some knowledge of the matter now under consideration. That Commission, he found, on looking back to its printed Reports, sat for eight days in Glasgow. It examined 33 witnesses connected with Lanark and Glasgow. It summoned all the leading officials of the county and the city, and it took the evidence of men of all classes upon the subject, who offered themselves as witnesses. The result was a Report which showed that the Commissioners then appointed had arrived at an entirely different conclusion from that to which the secret Commissioner appointed by the Home Office had come. It was very important to contrast the recommendations of the two Commissions and the reasons upon which they were founded. The result of the inquiries of the Home Office secret Commissioner, who took his evidence in private, was that the city of Glasgow should pay £12,500 for ever to maintain the roads in the county of Lanark. The Report of the Royal Commissioners, who examined 33 witnesses, and who had sat for eight days in open Court, stated that Glasgow should not pay one shilling for maintaining the roads of Lanarkshire. The secret Commissioner had also said that the debt of Lanarkshire should be paid in proportion to the valued rental of the city as compared with the county; and the effect of that would be that about one-half of the whole debt of the county would be paid by Glasgow alone, whilst the Royal Commissioners said that Glasgow should pay only a proportion of the debt on those trusts which entered into the city, and according to the mileage within and without the city boundaries. These were remarkable discrepancies, and he left the Committee to judge whether one man or five men were most to be trusted in the matter. He did not mean to say one word in disparagement personally of the secret Commissioner appointed by the Government. Although little was known of that gentleman's proceedings, he would assume that he was as well qualified as anyone in London could be for the task to which he had been appointed; but no man, however great his talents, being a stranger to the subject, could compete successfully with others who possessed valuable local knowledge on a question of this kind. Who were the Commissioners of 20 years ago? He was one of the number; but he put himself out of the case, except as a witness, who knew something of what had been done. Well, then, the Chairman was Mr. Smythe, of Methven Castle, Chairman of the Commissioners of Supply, Perthshire—a county in which he believed there was the largest number of trusts of any county in Scotland—a man of great experience, formerly connected with the Poor Law Board, and a man enjoying the confidence of the great county in which he held this important position. Had no other man than Mr. Smythe been upon the Commission his Report alone, from his local knowledge and experience in the management of roads, would have greatly outweighed the Report of any secret Commissioner. But Mr. Smythe was not alone. One of his Colleagues had been Sir John M'Neill—a man so distinguished as to have been selected to go to the Crimea, to investigate into the difficulties and abuses which had existed there, who made a Report, which was received with great satisfaction, and for which he received high honours from the Crown—having refused to accept of any pecuniary compensation. A third Commissioner was Sir James Fergusson—a gentleman who was long a Member of the House of Commons, who had occupied the position of an Under Secretary of State, and who had afterwards been appointed by Her Majesty's Government Governor of two of their greatest Colonial Dependencies. Sir James was a man of known experience and ability, and he had no doubt that if he were again fortunate enough to secure a seat in the House, his services would be taken advantage of in some important Office by Her Majesty's Government. A fourth Commissioner was Sir Andrew Orr, who had been chief magistrate of Glasgow, and who was a landowner in the county of Stirling; and all the four were large landowners. These gentlemen concurred in the Report to which he had referred, and the clause at present in debate, emanating from the secret Commissioner, was, therefore, backed with a very small amount of weight as compared with that which was against it. As he had said, 33 witnesses had been examined by the Commissioners, and all those witnesses, with one exception, were in favour of Glasgow maintaining its own streets and its own streets only, while paying only the proportion of the debt which he had already stated. The one exception was Mr. Graham; but even that gentleman was not in favour of the "pains and penalties" plans, but approved of a settlement similar to what the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) shadowed forth, but with a zone of five miles beyond the city. Again, one of the witnesses who were at that time examined was the clerk to the Lanarkshire Commissioners of Supply, and that gentleman gave strong evidence in favour of the views which the Commissioners had expressed. He laid before the Commissioners two Reports which had been made by large Committees of the county gentlemen appointed in two successive years to consider this subject. What occasioned the appointment of those Committees was that a Bill had been brought into the House in 1858 for the abolition of tolls, and Lanarkshire took up that measure, and appointed a Committee to examine and report upon it. Another Committee was appointed in the following year, and both those bodies reported in favour of the plan which had been afterwards adopted in substance by the Royal Commission. On the back of the Bill which was introduced in 1858, he found the names of Lord Elcho, Mr. Moncreiff, and Sir Edward Colebrooke. He had not had the pleasure of hearing the speech of the hon. Baronet that evening; but he hoped that he had advocated before the Committee the views which were embodied in Clause 20 of the Bill—namely, that Glasgow should pay for the support of its own streets only. He found a statement in one of the County Reports, copied into the Blue Book issued by the Commissioners, to the effect that the whole roads and bridges within burghs should be placed under the charge and management of magistrates and town councils, and that the roads in counties should be placed under the administration of County Boards; and that statement was signed by Lord Belhaven officially, as convener of the county of Lanark. And Lord Belhaven had himself given very strong evidence to that effect when examined as a witness. He had also stated that the abolition of the toll system would effect a saving of from 25 to 30 per cent in the county. Another gentleman, Mr. Scott—factor to Lord Douglas—had followed in a similar strain. [An hon. MEMBER: Agreed, agreed!] He heard an hon. Member cry "Agreed;" but he would tell that hon. Gentleman that he intended to go on until he had finished. There was always one alternative for hon. Gentlemen who did not care for certain speeches—they could retire from the House; or, if they did not do that, it was open to those whom they interrupted to move the adjournment of the House until they came to a more docile temper. He had been referring to gentlemen who had been examined before the Commissioners, and, amongst others, to Lord

Belhaven, who had been convener of Lanarkshire, and who represented the Crown at the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland—an appointment which showed the opinion entertained of him by the Government of the day. It was important that the Committee should consider the views on this subject of such men as he had mentioned, especially when those views had, as it now appeared, to be weighed against the slender opinion of one who was a stranger to Glasgow and to Scotland, and the reasons for whose report could only be guessed at. He would also remind the Committee that the Commission of 20 years ago was no Radical Commission, nor appointed by a Radical Government. It was appointed by a Conservative Government, and its proceedings were conducted in such a manner that no man could have told what the politics were of those who composed it. Although, as a matter of fact, these Commissioners comprised three Conservatives and one Liberal, politics never showed themselves in any shape or way. There could not, therefore, have been any prejudice against the counties and in favour of the burghs in a Commission so constituted. The thing was utterly impossible. Had there been any bias at all, the bias would have been shown in favour of counties and against burghs, but no such bias existed. In addition to the gentlemen whom he had already named, Lord Provost Galbraith, chief magistrate of Glasgow for the time being, had said in effect—and he recollected his statements well—that the traffic on the streets of Glasgow for county purposes—of goods passing through the city to the county, or from the county through Glasgow to other counties and for shipment—was such that the wear-and-tear of Glasgow roads by county people was very much greater than the wear-and-tear of the county roads by Glasgow people—in other words, suppose that the county traffic through the streets of the city might represent £5,000, the traffic of the city through the county would not represent nearly so large a sum. It had been stated by the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr-Ewing), that the tolls around Glasgow yielded about £42,000 a-year. But the Return recently obtained by the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure), showed that the total expense of maintaining all the turnpike roads in the county of Lanark was only £23,616, together with £2,485 for management, including in these sums the maintenance of roads within certain new burghs and populous places. It had been computed, on good authority, that this total amount of £26,101 would be reduced to £21,000 when these burghs maintained their own roads, as they were bound to do by the Bill. The total rental of the county being now £2,060,927, a rate of 2½d. in the pound would more than suffice, even if no saving of the expenses of management, or otherwise, took place, to maintain all the turnpike roads within the county. He did not refer to the statute labour road question, because Glasgow was not interested for or against the new arrangement; but the effect of it, manifestly, would be to relieve the agricultural interest of a large part of the present statute labour taxation which fell upon them, by throwing it on other interests within the county. These being the facts, and being perfectly cognisant of them after hearing the evidence and taking part in the examination of witnesses, he had felt it his duty on the present occasion to protest with all force and energy which he could command against a gross injustice which, as he conceived, would be perpetrated if this clause were to be passed into law. He hoped that such a clause would never be allowed to pass, and he thought that those who were opposed to it would be justified in using every means in their power to prevent its adoption.

MR. RAMSAY said, he was not surprised that the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) should have addressed the Committee at some length on that important question. There could be no doubt that the clause proposed by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate violated the principle of the Bill, which was, that the money levied in each county should be expended within the county itself, and should not be drawn from extraneous sources. The Committee had, however, by a majority, violated the principle of the Bill in the postponed clause which had just been passed, by imposing additional assessments for extraordinary traffic, and now it was proposed to aggravate the injustice of that clause by imposing upon Glasgow a sum admitted to be so large as £10,000, not for the purpose of being expended on roads within the city, or for the behoof of the citizens; but for the purpose of being expended on roads which were within the county, and which were administered by the county trustees as they thought fit. He considered that no greater violation of the principle of the Bill could possibly be conceived, and hoped the Committee would agree to reject the clause; but, if not, he should hereafter propose an Amendment, the nature of which he would not occupy further time by discussing.

DR. CAMERON said, he thought the citizens of Glasgow could not be too fully indebted to the hon. Member for Edinburgh for the exceptionally calm and lucid speech which he had delivered on that occasion. He did not think that the Committee could be entirely aware of the injustice proposed to be done to the city of Glasgow if the clause of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate were adopted. It was proposed to cause the city of Glasgow to pay to the counties of Lanark and Renfrew a sum of over £400,000, in direct opposition to the recommendations of the Royal Commission. That, in short, was the meaning of the Government proposal, and it was one against which he must also emphatically protest. The people of Glasgow did not object to bear their fair share of the cost of the up-keep of the roads; but the Government wanted them to pay besides the sum of £12,500 a-year, in perpetuo, to the counties of Lanark and Renfrew. It was proposed, further, that Glasgow should pay nearly half the entire road debts of Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire, while they were obliged to pay their own road debt into the bargain. His hon. Friend the Member for North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) had said the road debt of Glasgow was a statute labour debt, and that statute labour debts were not taken into consideration by the Bill. Of course, the debts of Glasgow were statute labour, for the streets of Glasgow were all supported by assessment; but it arose in this way—as they took over the turnpike roads they were converted into statute labour roads, and therefore the debts of Glasgow were as much turnpike debts as were those of the county. An exhaustive inquiry had been held, and the Government last year sent down a Commissioner; but he held his Court in secret, and when the production of the Report was asked for, it was denied, and he had never seen it. They were now asked to take the dictum of this one Commissioner against that of the very important Commission which was held a considerable number of years ago. The hon. Member for North Lanarkshire had further said that the burghs around Glasgow did not object to this proposal. Their case, however, was not so hard as that of Glasgow, because they had no debts of their own to pay; while Glasgow was asked not only to pay its own debt, but that of the county also. They were willing to make some sacrifices to get rid of tolls; but he did not think they ought to be called upon to go to the extent of the proposal in this Bill, seeing that the traffic brought into Glasgow from the counties outside wore out the streets as much as the traffic of the city itself. To tax them to the extent of a capitalized sum of £400,000 was what they protested against; and he hoped the Government would re-consider the matter, and not treat Glasgow in this exceptional manner. If the Bill was not altered, a most flagrant and palpable injustice would be committed.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER said, the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) was perpetually quoting the Report of the Commission of 1859. Now, if the hon. Member had consented to the carrying out of the recommendation of those Commissioners, this Roads and Bridges question would have been settled long ago. In 1861, a Bill was brought in by the then Lord Advocate which was a Permissive Bill, and again, in 1865, a Permissive Bill was introduced; but that measure was opposed by hon. Members on the ground that it was permissive, and it did not pass. In regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member who had just spoken (Dr. Cameron), he begged to remind the Committee that the great proportion of the roads out of Glasgow were made not for the benefit of the county of Lanark, but for the benefit of the city of Glasgow—as, for instance, the Glasgow and Carlisle road, the debt for which was contracted in order to improve the connection between Glasgow and the South. When hon. Members talked about roads, they must not merely think of the land through which they passed, but must take into consideration where the road began, where it went to, and the large towns it connected. Judged by that standard, they would find that the great proportion of these Lanarkshire roads were made for the benefit of Glasgow. From what had been said by the hon. Member, it would appear as if he thought Glasgow had had no opportunity to state her case before the Commissioner. Now, the Lord Provost of Glasgow, the Lord Dean of Guild, the City Treasurer, the Chairman and Vice Chairman of the Parliamentary Bills Committee, the Chairman of the Glasgow Statute Labour Commission, an ex-senior magistrate of Glasgow, the town clerk, and clerk to the magistrates and administration of the Police Act, the city architect, and two bailies, were all heard before the Commissioner appointed by the Home Secretary. The case of Glasgow was most ably argued before him, and the result of the evidence which he heard was that he decided against the city. One reason why Glasgow should contribute this sum was because the roads in the agricultural districts of the country were maintained at something like £32 per mile, while the roads in the immediate vicinity of Glasgow cost £260 per mile and more. Why should Lanarkshire be subject to this increased taxation for the benefit of Glasgow, unless Glasgow was prepared to bear her share of the burden?

MR. J. W. BARCLAY thought the Government ought to state the reasons which had induced them to propose this exceptional legislation with regard to Glasgow, because it could not be denied that it was an exceptional proposal in favour of Lanarkshire at the expense of the city of Glasgow. It had not been attempted to be proved that the burden of maintaining roads in the counties of Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire would be greater than it was in other counties. No doubt, if this Bill passed, the burden of maintaining the roads in those two counties would amount to £49,000; but that amount would be made up by an assessment over the valuation of the two counties of not more than 5d. in the pound. Now, in the county which he represented they paid as high as 9d., and, in some cases, 1s. in the pound for the maintenance of the statute labour roads apart from the turnpike roads. In Aberdeenshire the assessment was 6d. in the pound. This was an argument, he considered, in favour of there being no exceptional legislation with regard to Glasgow. He was surprised to hear the attempt which had been made to prove that Glasgow had profited most by these roads. It should be remembered that the principal outlet of Glasgow was by way of the Clyde, and it was the counties of Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire which had benefited by the existence of Glasgow in their neighbourhood, thus giving them an outlet for their minerals and coals. The enormous rental which was derived in those counties from coals and minerals was wholly due to the roads connecting them with Glasgow. In the course of the discussion on this measure, it had been said that this was a landlord's Bill; and that, to his mind, was conclusively proved, when they found a clause introduced to the prejudice of the city of Glasgow, and wholly in the interests of the counties of Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire. He again called upon the Government to give the Committee some reasons for the course they had adopted in proposing this exceptional legislation.

MR. M'LAREN said, it had been stated that the tolls immediately around Glasgow amounted to £42,000. That was the statement; now for the fact. At the time when the Commissioners made their Report, the whole expenditure for all the roads in the county of Lanarkshire was £29,162. That was exclusive of the roads within burghs, which were maintained by the county, and those amounted to £9,500. Now, according to a Return which had been since made of the tolls taken in the counties of Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire, it appeared that the total expenditure for the county roads of Lanarkshire had been reduced to £23,000. Many hon. Members might be surprised that the amount had not increased, instead of diminished to the extent of £6,000; but that was due to the fact of the multiplication of branch railways, and those had taken away a good deal of the traffic which formerly went along the public roads. The expenses paid by the counties for roads within the burghs was now £6,100. At the time of the Commission the rental of the county was £1,014,000; it was now £2,066,000. Whatever sum, therefore, was required to maintain the roads of Lanarkshire, only half of what was then needed ought to be taken now. Even if the whole £29,000 were required, a rate of 3½d. in the pound would be sufficient.

COLONEL MURE, lest the Committee should be carried away by the statistics of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren), would like to tell them what was the fate of the Commission to which allusion had been made. The Commissioners went down to Glasgow, and inquired into the whole circumstances connected with Glasgow and Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire, and after they had reported to Parliament, a Bill was introduced by the Lord Advocate of that day. That measure recommended that tolls should be abolished, and that there should be no exemptions; but a Committee of that House made it permissive on Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire, because it appeared unfair to them that those two counties and Glasgow should be placed upon the same footing. Lord Elcho subsequently introduced a Bill, and the county of Renfrew was entirely exempted from its operation. This question had therefore been considered by Commissions, Select Committees, and by that House, and it had always been held that Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire stood in a different position to Glasgow. As to the impartiality of Mr. Smith, the last Commissioner, he might mention that when he heard that he had been appointed to inquire into the question, he wrote and asked to see him; but Mr. Smith replied that as he (Colonel Mure) was interested in one of the counties, he did not think it would be right to see him, unless he desired to be examined as a witness.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was quite impossible to say that any of the arguments which had been used in the course of the debate had the merit of novelty. During the last 10 years this question had been before the House on several occasions, and it had always been admitted that the case of Glasgow in relation to the two great counties of Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire was exceptional. Two objections had been taken to the proposal made in this clause. It had been maintained that it did not embody a fair settlement between the parties; and secondly, that it was against the principle laid down in the recommendations of the Commissioners in their Report of 1860. Now, he was happy to say that the iron rule for the treatment of all burghs in reference to a county, laid down in the Report of the Commission, had been deliberately departed from in this Bill already; for the Committee, foreseeing that such cases would arise, had provided by the 9th clause of the Bill for their future determination by means of a Provisional Order to be obtained from the Secretary of State, subject to the conditions contained in such Order as to debts for highways in the neighbourhood of any burgh; the effect being to confer on the Secretary of State the power of a Provisional Order to make the county pay part of a burgh debt, or a burgh pay part of the county debt, and to make one contribute to the other, as the case might be. Various other clauses had been inserted, for the purpose of enabling burghs, at present having the maintenance of their own roads, to make common cause with the county, where the assessment was burdensome to the burgh, upon such fair and equitable terms as should be settled by the Sheriff of the jurisdiction. On the questions of disputed fact, the conclusion of the Government was, on the whole, that the people of Glasgow had been using to a large extent the roads for a considerable distance outside the city, and not only that they had been users of the roads, but that they were the persons who had paid for the roads. The Government, therefore, without much hesitation, had come to the conclusion that the substitution of this payment for the tolls they had been in the habit of paying would be a pecuniary advantage to the city.

MR. ANDERSON took entire exception to the last statement of the right hon. and learned Lord, that the inhabitants of Glasgow would gain any pecuniary advantage by this arrangement. The statement begged the whole question, and he (Mr. Anderson) claimed to know on what facts the right hon. and learned Lord had based his conclusions. A Royal Commission, consisting of probably the best men that could be selected for the purpose, had made an inquiry on this subject. They heard evidence in open court, so that the value of the conclusions at which they arrived was capable of being estimated, and their Report was totally opposed to the arrangement which would now be made by the clause. That was what they complained of, and also that the Government, in the face of that Report of a Royal Commission, had preferred the secret report of a Treasury clerk. ["No!"] An hon. Member said "No." Well, he might not have been a Treasury clerk, but he was some person sent by the Government to make a secret inquiry. He wanted to know the grounds upon which that person came to his decision? but these the Government declined to give. He certainly took evidence, but in what way he hardly knew. The evidence was not taken in open Court. The Report ought to be laid on the Table, so that the grounds of the Government decision might be known. The Ministers, however, seemed to have intrusted a copy of the Report to the hon. Member for North Lanarkshire. They were bound in his (Mr. Anderson's) opinion, therefore, to lay it on the Table before inflicting upon Glasgow this most unjust legislation. The right hon. and learned Lord adduced no argument worth a straw to prove that those roads were made for the benefit of Glasgow. The county Members who supported the clause likewise gave no arguments of any weight; the only one he had noticed was that of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Lanarkshire, who said that three carriages left Glasgow for every one that came in. He (Mr. Anderson) should like to know what would become of all the Glasgow carriages in course of time, if that were the case? The roads were made for the benefit of both city and county, so were the streets of Glasgow, and the county people used those streets freely, sending their goods over them to the Glasgow harbours and railways. For this use they paid nothing; and it was unfair to make Glasgow pay £500,000 for the benefit of the counties over and above all that the city had to do for themselves.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was certain that it was not the fact that no one had seen this Report; but he did not like to interrupt the hon. Member, without refreshing his memory by referring to the Gentleman who usually advised him in these matters. He found that the Report was read over to the two deputations who waited upon him in the earlier part of the Session at the Home Office on the same day in separate rooms, and it was explained to them at those meetings, and it was given to them on the same day. By his orders, a great number of copies were sent to the town of Glasgow as well as to the counties interested. He also gave orders that copies should be sent to everybody who desired them.

MR. ANDERSON: Was it a complete Report, with the evidence?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It was a complete Report.

MR. ANDERSON: No.

MR. RAMSAY remarked, that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate seemed to ignore the fact that the traffic from the county going into Glasgow would benefit from the abolition of the tolls equally with the city. He could understand the statement that both town and county would benefit from the abolition of the tolls; but he could not understand how it was reasonable and fair to say that Glasgow was to derive a pecuniary advantage from the abolition of tolls so great as to justify a fine of this nature in perpetuity.

DR. CAMERON said, he had never seen the Report referred to by the Home Secretary, and he understood that it had been refused to some people. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had argued that the Report of the Royal Commission having been departed from in the Bill, the argument of the hon. Members for Glasgow fell to the ground. The complaint was, however, not that the Report of the Royal Commission had been departed from, but that the whole principle of the Bill was departed from in the case of Glasgow alone. The other burghs and other counties were asked by the Bill to submit to arbitration. Glasgow was not asked to submit to arbitration, the result of which might be either favourable or unfavourable—it was favourable in the case of the Royal Commission and unfavourable in the case of the Mr. Smith—but had to submit expressly to an adverse decision, which could not be exceeded in injustice.

MR. O'DONNELL took a special interest in the question, owing to his close connection with a section of the population of Glasgow who owed much to the opportunities that city afforded them, and to whose hard labour Glasgow, he trusted, knew it owed something. Glasgow had been of immense benefit to the Irish immigrants to Scotland. It had been of much more benefit to the immigrants from those country districts which were now being so unfairly favoured at the expense of Glasgow. From Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire crowds of persons came in from year to year and found occupation in Glasgow who might be otherwise a worthless burden on the country districts. From Glasgow every year wealth descended upon a hundred districts of Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire. He did not wish to delay the Committee with any special reflections on the extraordinary manner in which the judgment of a Royal Commission had been set aside on behalf of that of the secret Emissary of the Home Office, and giving that Emissary the benefit of every doubt, he assumed that he received no special instructions; but it was traditional on the part of the Conservative Party to favour county interests. It was surprising that Glasgow should be singled out for this treatment by a Government which, when it was looking for Office, seemed to have such a warm admiration for the great principle of sanitation. Glasgow had been making a noble use of its resources. It had put its Civic funds to the best uses. Its sanitary work had been immense; and yet it was this town, which was an example to so many others in this respect, that was singled out by a sanitation Government in order to impose upon it extra burdens approaching £500,000 sterling, in order most unjustly to favour county interests. The clause was most unjust, and he would not be earning any portion of the favour of a very large section of the inhabitants of Glasgow, if he did not join his voice with those of other Scotch Members in protesting against it.

MR. BIGGAR said, he knew well that the Government was much disposed to favour counties at the expense of the burghs; but why they should have selected Glasgow for treatment of this kind he could not imagine. It was one of the best managed towns in the three Kingdoms, and confidence might have been reposed in its discretion. He suggested to the hon. Members for Glasgow that, unless some very material reason for the exceptional treatment of Glasgow was given, and until the full text of the secret Report alluded to had been given, they should set their faces in the most determined manner against the further progress of this Bill, which really did not reflect very much credit on its promoters.

Question put.

MR. RAMSAY, in moving an Amendment to the clause just passed, said, that the clause provided that a sum of money should be paid by the city of Glasgow and other burghs for the purpose of maintaining the roads in the counties of Lanark and Renfrew. No good reason had yet been shown for this being done. At the present time, the roads in the county of Lanark cost £114,555; while the valuation of the county amounted to the sum of £1,718,393, irrespective of the burghs within the county. An assessment on that valuation of 6*d.* in the pound would meet the whole of that expenditure. If, in the county of Lanark, roads could be maintained for less than 8*d.* in the pound, half of which was paid by owners and half by the occupiers, he thought that that fact was sufficient to show that there was no good reason why any exceptional legislation should be provided for the relief of ratepayers in those counties. Taking the two counties of Lanark and Renfrew together, 6*d.* in the pound was sufficient to maintain the roads within them, and he could not conceive on what ground it was justifiable to take a large sum of money from the citizens of those burghs and expend it in maintaining the roads for the relief of the ratepayers of the counties. The roads were, moreover, such that the ratepayers in the burghs had no control over them. In such circumstances it would require some special reasons, or some strong arguments, to justify any such course of procedure as that proposed. But no such arguments had been adduced in the present case, and no such reasons had been shown. It had, however, been stated by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate that the citizens would receive great relief from being relieved from toll. But the right hon. and learned Lord had forgotten to recognize the fact that the roads were principally used for the conveyance of agricultural produce from the counties to the burghs. Therefore, it was very desirable that a proposal such as he now made should be adopted, and that a district should be formed around these cities and burghs in order to give powers of self-management to the district in connection with the maintenance of the roads. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had suggested that the Amendment he proposed had been copied from a Royal Commission. He could not claim it as having any such good authority, because the idea occurred to him many years ago as a means of settling the differences between the county and the municipal authorities in the burghs of Glasgow. He would not occupy the time of the Committee on dwelling upon the matter; but he would point out that what he proposed was in accordance with the principle of the Bill—namely, that expenditure on the roads within a district should be under the management of the ratepayers who paid the assessments. Unless the compromise he suggested were carried into effect, people would be coming annually to Parliament to seek redress. He hoped that the present opportunity of settling the question would be taken, and with that view he proposed his Amendment. The principle upon which it was based was that the ratepayers in the extended area outside these burghs should form a separate district which should bear an assessment equal to that levied within the city for the repairs of the streets and roads, and that any excess which might be required should be levied equally from the ratepayers of the extended district and from the city. As to the limits of the district, he was not particular whether it was one, one and a-half, or two miles; the principle for which he contended being that the roads in that area, whatever it might be, should be under the management of those who paid for their maintenance and not under any county authority whatever.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "the," in line 4 of the proposed new Clause, in order to insert the words "limits of the said counties (including the burghs situated or partly situated therein), on the first day of June, one thousand eight hundred and eighty, subject to the following provisions (that is to say):

- (1.) Within three months after the passing of this Act the Secretary of State shall, by a writing under his hand, appoint a person who shall be called the Glasgow Roads Boundary Commissioner. The appointment of the Glasgow Roads Boundary Commissioner shall be published in the 'Edinburgh Gazette,' and may be recalled by the Secretary of State at any time by a writing under his hand, which shall be published in the same manner."—(Mr. Ramsay.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'counties of Lanark and Renfrew' stand part of the Clause."

DR. CAMERON, in giving an unqualified support to the Amendment, said, it was considered by the local authorities of Glasgow to be an extremely good arrangement.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was not prepared to assent to the Amendment. It was framed on a different principle to the clause which had just been read a second time. The proposal was, that outside the boundaries of the city there should be a sort of neutral zone a mile in width, and that a local authority should be established there to hold the balance as it were between the county and the town. When they came to consider the terms of the proposal, he thought it would be found that they were rather artificial, and that they would not attain the object in view. Anything more unfair to the inhabitants of the neutral zone than what was proposed, he could not conceive. The Bill dealt only with highways and statute labour roads, and did not in any burgh in Scotland deal with what might properly be called streets. Streets were often formed by people for their own convenience; but it frequently became convenient for the authorities to maintain them, not for the purposes of highways, but with the object of getting access to the dwellings and places of business adjoining. That class of street assessment was of a totally different character from that of highways. The result of the proposed clause would be to assess the inhabitants of such a street for highways and roads; and at the same time, as frequently happened, the inhabitants of houses not in any public road would have to make and maintain their own street. Moreover, a further difficulty would arise from the highways in some places being maintained by one authority and the streets by another.

COLONEL MURE observed, that his county had carefully considered the proposal made by Glasgow, and entirely disapproved of it. He hoped the Lord Advocate would not agree to it.

MR. RAMSAY could not see any force in the objection taken by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. The only ground upon which it was reasonable or requisite that such a provision as he (Mr. Ramsay) had proposed, should be inserted in the Bill, was that a complaint was made by the surrounding counties that the roads in the immediate neighbourhood of Glasgow were very costly. While roads in the rural parts of the counties could be maintained for £40, those in the neighbourhood of Glasgow cost £260. The property to be assessed in the vicinity of Glasgow was so great, that he hoped no part of the district to be formed under his proposal would have a greater assessment than existed in counties.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that what he meant to have stated was, that it would be a singular mode of applying the assessment of property within the city to devote it to making and taking over new streets without the city.

MR. RAMSAY replied, that there was no obligation to make an assessment for the purpose of forming new streets. The case of taking over a new street after it had been formed at the expense of the proprietor was different.

MR. ANDERSON said, Glasgow was willing to accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Ramsay) as a compromise offered by a neutral party, and because the injustice under it would be less than under the clause as it stood.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER stated, that several of the suburban burghs had repudiated this proposal, and had urged him to do all in his power to oppose it.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE observed, that the difficulties between Glasgow and the neighbouring counties had been going on for several years. The city of Glasgow was invited by the Home Secretary to make some proposal on the matter, and the result was a proposition of a most unworkable description. Its adoption would lead to endless litigation, and would be unjust to the counties. In his opinion, the proposal of the Government was a fair one, and met the justice of the case.

Question put.

DR. CAMERON moved, as an Amendment to the Lord Advocate's new clause, in line 6, to leave out "eighty-two," and insert "eighty." He thought that if this change were to be made, it was desirable it should come into operation as soon as possible.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the new tax would, undoubtedly, fall very heavily upon certain classes hitherto exempt, and if it was such a burden on Glasgow, he did not see why they should be so anxious to bring it into operation.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. CAMERON said, his next Amendment was a much more important one. He proposed, in sub-section 1, line 3, after "provided," to insert "and the statute labour debt of the city of Glasgow." Its effect was, that instead of, as the clause proposed, Glasgow being left to pay the entire road debt itself, it should contribute half the road debt to the county, and the two should be thrown into one common account. He wanted an equal assessment for town and country.

Amendment proposed, in line 10 of the proposed new Clause, after the word "provided," to insert the words "and the statute labour debt of the city of Glasgow."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That these words be there inserted."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, his clause was either a reasonable clause, or it was not. If it was the first, it did not require this Amendment; and if it was the latter, it wanted a much greater alteration. He could not accept the Amendment.

MR. ANDERSON wanted to pay the joint debt jointly with the county. Their debt covered all the streets and roads, and they were willing to take in the county statute labour debt as well.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE thought the dispute had reference to the roads debt alone, and the words of the clause should be confined to that.

DR. CAMERON pointed out, that the Bill wanted them to pay their own debt, and half the county debt as well. He found the county statute roads were included, and they were expected to pay the turnpike trust debt. That, in his opinion, was not fair.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 68 ; Noes 129: Majority 61.—(Div. List, No. 181.)

DR. CAMERON moved, as an Amendment, in sub-section 3, lines 3 and 4, to leave out "the sum of twelve thousand five hundred pounds annually," and insert "one hundred thousand pounds." The people of the city of Glasgow could not agree to the Government proposal that they should pay £12,500 a-year in perpetuity towards the maintenance of the roads. What he proposed—and he did so with the sanction of the local authorities of Glasgow—was, instead of making this an annual payment of £12,500, they should make it a special payment of £100,000. Of course, such a proceeding would be of considerable advantage to Glasgow; because, if they capitalized an annual payment of £12,500, it would amount to between £300,000 and £400,000. What the people of Glasgow wished to do, was to cut down such an enormous and unjust impost.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the amount fixed represented 1*d.* in the pound upon the rateable value of Glasgow and the surrounding burghs. He could not accept the Amendment.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY protested against so many divisions being taken on one clause, all having the same object in view. He was quite willing to support the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), if he intended to obstruct the Bill; but he should like to know what course he was going to pursue? If the hon. Member wanted to prevent the Bill passing through Committee that night, the proper course for him to pursue was to move that the Chairman report Progress with leave to sit again; but, by moving these repeated divisions on the same question, he did not see what was to be gained. The Government were determined not to make a concession, and he thought hon. Members on that side of the House had vindicated their position sufficiently. At the same time, if they were prepared to oppose the proposal with regard to Glasgow, to the extent of holding the Bill over for a night or two more, to give the Government time for consideration, he would support them.

MR. ANDERSON said, the present Amendment was different from the one decided upon last. Then, the Committee divided in reference to the debt; now, the protest was made against the proposal to make Glasgow pay £12,500 a-year in perpetuity for the maintenance of county roads with which the city had nothing to do. Already the city had taken over 10 miles of road, which would cost £10,000 a-year, and which at present the county kept up. Surely, that was a sufficient infliction, without the extra charge proposed to be made by this new clause? The Amendment of his hon. Colleague (Dr. Cameron) was an offer on the part of Glasgow simply to have done with an obnoxious thing, and to avoid the injustice which must be felt year by year if the annual charge were made. To prevent the recurrence of unpleasantness in reference to such a charge, Glasgow preferred to pay £100,000 down, and put an end to the whole thing.

MR. BARING said, he could have seen some reasonableness in the desire of Glasgow to get rid of what was called an obnoxious charge, if the hon. Member (Dr. Cameron) had offered to pay £250,000 or £300,000 down. But he could not make out how it was that he proposed only a payment of £100,000 down rather than £12,500 a-year, unless the rate of interest in Scotland was much higher than any which he (Mr. Baring) had ever been able to get there.

DR. CAMERON moved, as an Amendment to sub-section 3, line 22, after the word "county," to insert these words—

"Provided, That in the event of the assessment for the maintenance of roads and bridges within the counties of Lanark and Renfrew, or either of them, or of any road districts adjoining Glasgow into which the said counties may be divided, not exceeding the amount of the average assessment laid upon Glasgow and the burghs adjoining, the payment of the twelve thousand five hundred pounds before provided for shall cease."

The object of the Amendment was to provide that if ~~the~~ <sup>an</sup> opinion arrived at by the Commissioner proved to be erroneous, and if it was proved that it cost Glasgow more to maintain its streets and roads than it did the county, then the city should no longer have to bear a tax which had been imposed by the Committee under an erroneous impression.

Amendment proposed,

After the word "county," in line 39 of the proposed new Clause, to insert the words "Provided, That in the event of the assessment for the maintenance of roads and bridges within the counties of Lanark and Renfrew, or either of them, or of any road districts adjoining Glasgow into which the said counties may be divided, not exceeding the amount of the average assessment laid upon Glasgow and the burghs adjoining, the payment of the twelve thousand five hundred pounds before provided for shall cease."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Government could not accept the Amendment.

MR. ANDERSON observed, that the proviso would not affect the clause, unless the event happened which he and others believed would occur, and the information on which the Government had proceeded should be found to be wrong.

MR. RAMSAY said, the Home Secretary had all the power which was necessary to obtain information for the proper working of the proviso. A clause already agreed to provided that the right hon. Gentleman might require to be supplied by the county authorities and road trustees with every fact, and it became an easy matter to ascertain whether the assessment in the counties exceeded that of the city of Glasgow or not. Until that was ascertained, the proviso would be inoperative.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought it hardly fair to take the average assessment of the city of Glasgow and compare it, not with the average assessment of counties, but with the assessment of any one county, or one district of any county. If the average assessment of Glasgow were compared with the average assessment of counties, then the proposal would be a fair one.

DR. CAMERON said, he did not stand out for the actual words of the Amendment. One of the injustices of which he complained was that the sum to be paid by Glasgow was not to be devoted to the maintenance of roads in the district around the city, but all over the county. It was on that account that he proposed the proviso. If the Government would promise to take the matter into consideration, and make a more equitable provision on Report, he would withdraw the Amendment.

MR. ANDERSON believed the data on which the Government had acted, and which was afforded by the secret Commissioner, was totally wrong; therefore, his hon. Colleague wanted to insert the proviso to prevent the city paying an unfair tax if it turned out that the Commissioner was wrong.

Question put.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved, as an Amendment, to add the following sub-section to the clause:—

"(6.) From and after the date at which the annual contribution hereinbefore provided to be made by the city of Glasgow and adjoining burghs towards the cost of maintaining the highways and bridges within the counties of Lanark and Renfrew shall commence to be payable, the sum of one hundred and five pounds now payable yearly to the lord provost, magistrates, and council of Glasgow, as coming in place of the police and statute labour committee of the town council of that city, by the trustees of the Glasgow and Garscube turnpike roads, out of the tolls leviable on those roads, towards the expense of maintaining and repairing those portions of the said roads which lie within the municipal boundaries of the said city, under the provisions of section twenty-six of 'The Glasgow, Kirkintilloch, and Baldernock Turnpike Road Trust Act, 1855,' shall cease to be payable, and the said trustees shall not be liable for payment of the principal sum, of which the said annual payment of one hundred and five pounds is the interest, but they shall continue the said annual payment until the date at which the said annual contribution by the city of Glasgow and adjoining burghs shall commence to be payable."

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought that having regard to the entirely new distribution of liability with respect to Glasgow, it would be only reasonable to assent to the sub-section proposed by the hon. Baronet.

MR. ANDERSON considered that Glasgow was being most unfairly treated; and, therefore, it would be better to report Progress.

THE LORD ADVOCATE considered that all payments of this character would cease under the Bill. If that were so, instead of the proceeding being an aggravation to Glasgow, it would place the city in a better position.

DR. CAMERON protested against the Lord Advocate rejecting all the Amendments that were calculated to mitigate the case of Glasgow and accepting one which would aggravate it. The Committee had now been sitting a long time, and he considered it would not be inopportune to postpone the sub-section until the Report.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE agreed to the proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE MARQUESS OF LORNE, after Clause 5, moved to insert the following Clause :—

(Certain existing districts to be deemed counties.)

"In every case where, at the passing of this Act, any county in which tolls and statute labour have been abolished or are not exigible, and where such county has been divided under any local Act or Acts into two or more separate districts as respects the maintenance and management of roads, highways, and bridges, and the road trustees qualified within each of such several districts have the management of the roads, highways, and bridges therein, together with the power of imposing, levying, and collecting the assessments requisite for making, repairing, and managing the same, each of such several districts in all time after the passing of this Act shall form and shall be regarded as a separate county for the purposes of this Act, and all the provisions of this Act relating to counties shall apply to each of such several districts, and the whole powers and obligations conferred by this Act on county road trustees shall be vested in and may be exercised by the road trustees who may be appointed within each of such districts in terms of this Act: Provided that where necessary for giving effect to the provisions contained in this section 'convener of county' shall be held to mean and include district chairman and convener, and 'clerk of supply' shall be held to mean and include district road clerk appointed and acting under the local Act."

If the Committee would look at the clause, they would see that it only referred to those counties which were in the exceptional position of having been divided into districts under Local Acts. Each of these districts was self-governed to the extent that assessments raised within them were not devoted to general county purposes. It was only the geographical position of the districts which made them have these different interests; and as it might be for the convenience of counties so situated that one district or more should be able to adopt a special Act, he moved the insertion of the clause, deeming certain existing districts to be counties.

MR. MARK STEWART moved to substitute the word "two" for the word "three," in line 3 of the clause as standing on the Notice Paper.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that in the clause, as proposed by the noble Lord, that Amendment had already been made.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. GRANT said, he had given Notice of certain new clauses with respect to roads within the burgh of Leith; but he would postpone those clauses until the stage of Report.

Clauses, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. C. S. PARKER moved, in page 18, after Clause 33, to insert the following Clause :—

(Rate may be levied within burghs in lieu of petty customs, &c. abolished.)

"It shall be lawful for the magistrates and council of any burgh in which the petty customs, or any sum or duty payable or leviable in lieu or satisfaction thereof, or in respect of any exemption therefrom, by this Act provided to be abolished are payable or leviable, to levy from and after such abolition from the occupiers of lands and heritages within such burgh, in lieu of such customs or sum or duty payable or leviable as aforesaid, a rate or rates by way of assessment calculated to yield in the whole in the year an amount equal to the net yearly amount of such petty customs and sum or duty payable or leviable as aforesaid, and no more, but not exceeding in the whole for any one year the amount of one penny in the pound sterling on the valuation of the assessable property within the boundaries of such burgh, and such rate may be levied either as a separate rate or as part of and in addition to and under the same conditions, and subject to the same restrictions and exemptions as any police or burgh rate levied or leviable within such burgh: Provided that the rate or rates to be levied in lieu of such petty customs, and of the sum or duty payable or leviable as aforesaid shall, ipso facto, come in place of any security held by any creditor or creditors of such burgh over such petty customs and such sum or duty:

"Provided also, That the said magistrates and council shall not be bound under this section to impose any rate other than a rate of one farthing, or an entire number of farthings, in the pound."

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN was sorry to in any way delay the passing of the clause; but he was instructed by his constituents to move that the limit should be increased in amount from 1*d.* in the pound to 3*d.* in the pound. He did not think the former sum would be sufficient for the purpose in view.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that representations on this subject had been made from several places, and he thought that the proposition of the hon. Member was quite reasonable.

Amendment agreed to; word substituted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and added to the Bill.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY moved, in page 26, after Clause 49, to insert the following Clause:—

(Borrowing powers of trustees.)

“When in any county or district the cost of remaking (of which the trustees shall be sole judges) and of maintaining roads within such county or district is greater than would be met by a rate of nine pence per pound on the lands and heritages liable to such rate, the trustees may, if they see fit, borrow from time to time part of such cost, provided that the sums so borrowed, together with the interest thereon, be repaid within twenty years, and that the whole assessment for maintaining the roads and the repayment of such sum or sums shall not in any year exceed one shilling and six pence per pound, or, until the money borrowed is repaid, or be less than one shilling per pound, on the lands and heritages liable to the assessment; and the trustees may grant bonds to secure repayment of such sums, of the same description and with the same rights over the assessment for maintenance as the bonds for extinction of debts have over the assessment imposed for that purpose.”

The hon. Member said, he proposed by the clause to give to the trustees certain borrowing powers to be limited in this way. The sums borrowed were to be repaid within 20 years, the assessment caused by the exercise of the borrowing powers was not to exceed 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound per annum; and whilst the borrowing powers were exercised, the trustees must raise by assessment not less than 1*s.* in the pound. There would thus be no temptation to the trustees to place a burden upon their successors, and the borrowing powers would only be exercised in exceptional and necessary cases. The safeguards he proposed would effectually protect the borrowing powers from being abused.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL should have had no objection to the clause, had the powers that it proposed to confer been limited to borrowing money for the construction of new roads. There was a difference between making roads and maintaining them, and he did not think that the powers should be extended to borrowing money for the maintenance of old roads.

MR. ORR-EWING thought that the assessment of 1*s.* in the pound required to be made before the borrowing powers could be exercised under the provisions of the clause was excessive, and that no harm could result from reducing it to some extent.

COLONEL MURE hoped that the Government would not give way upon this clause. There was a great difference between borrowing powers to be exercised only for the construction of new roads and those which were to be used merely for the maintenance of old ones. One of the great objects of the Bill was to enable counties to get rid of debts in an equitable manner; but the result of this proposal would be simply to get out of the frying-pan into the fire—to get out of debt in one quarter, but into it in another.

Clause negatived.

MR. MARK STEWART, who had given Notice of his intention to move, in page 28, after Clause 54, to insert the following clause:—

(Bye-laws as to licences to locomotives.)

“The county road trustees may from time to time make, alter, or repeal bye-laws for granting annual licences to locomotives used within this county, and the fee (not exceeding pounds) to be paid in respect of each licence; and the owner of any locomotive for which a licence is required under any bye-laws so made who uses or permits the same to be used in contravention of any such bye-laws shall be liable to a fine not exceeding forty shillings for every day on which the same is so used; the fees received under this section shall be carried to and applied for the use of the particular roads in the parish as part of the annual assessment.”

said, that, as he understood the principle of the clause would be brought forward in a more extended form in other clauses, he would not press this one upon the Committee.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ORR-EWING moved, in page 43, after Clause 85, to insert the following clause:—

(As to certain bridges and ferries in Dumbartonshire.)

“Upon the expiration of six months after the commencement of this Act in the county of Dumbarton, the bridges and rights of ferry over the River Leven, at the ferries of Balloch and

Bonhill respectively, and the pontages or duties leviable thereat, shall vest in the county road trustees of that county, and those bridges shall be maintained and managed by them, and the right of the proprietors of the said bridges and ferries to levy such pontages or duties shall thereafter cease; and the said county road trustees shall, at the said date of vesting, pay to such proprietors respectively the values of the said bridges, rights of ferry, pontages, and duties, as at the date of the commencement of this Act in the said county, with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum from and after the said date of commencement until payment, under deduction of the net proceeds of such pontages or duties during the said period of six months, of which the said proprietors shall keep an account; and such values shall, failing agreement, be determined in the option of the said proprietors respectively by arbitration, or by jury trial, conducted in either case in manner provided by 'The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,' and that Act, so far as the same regulates procedure with respect to arbitrations or jury trials, is incorporated with this Act for the purposes of this section, and in construing the clauses of that Act so incorporated, with reference to this Act, the expression 'the Special Act' means this Act; the expression 'the Promoters of the Undertaking' means the said county road trustees; the word 'lands' means the said bridges, rights of ferry, pontages, and duties; and the word 'compensation' means the values of such bridges, rights of ferry, pontages, and duties respectively as at the date of the commencement of this Act in the said county, but shall not include any allowances in respect of compulsory purchase or sale. The values so ascertained and determined shall be provided for by the said county road trustees as follows, that is to say:—One half thereof in the same manner as is by this Act provided with respect to road debts; and the other half by means of the pontages or duties levied at the said bridges as specified in the existing tables of charges, but subject to the modifications thereof allowed prior to the commencement of this Act in the said county, and those pontages and duties shall be levied by the said trustees until the moneys which they shall have borrowed in terms of the provision hereinafter contained so far as required for the purpose of paying such last-mentioned half to the said proprietors with interest thereon, together with one half of the expense of maintaining the said bridges, and the whole expense of collecting the said pontages and duties shall have been paid and discharged out of such pontages or duties, whereupon the said bridges shall become highways, and be free of toll. The said county road trustees may borrow the whole or any part of the money required for paying the said values and interest to the said proprietors on the security of the said pontages or duties, and of the assessments by this Act authorized, or any of them."

The hon. Member said, the bridges and ferries in Dumbartonshire did not come within the provisions of Clause 35, and it was, therefore, necessary to introduce the proposed clause into the Bill.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Mr. Orr-Ewing

SIR WILLIAM CUNINGHAME moved, in page 43, after Clause 85, to insert the following clause:—

(Ayr Bridge Act, 1877, reserved.)

"Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, 'The Ayr Bridge Act, 1877,' and the powers of taking tolls thereby conferred, shall continue in force until the first day of November, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, or until such earlier time as the bridge by that Act authorized to be constructed shall, in manner therein directed, be declared free from toll, and no longer; and from and after the time at which this Act is adopted, or commences to have effect, in the county of Ayr, the persons who are then the Trustees for carrying 'The Ayr Bridge Act, 1877,' into execution, shall continue to act as such Trustees so long as the last-mentioned Act shall continue in force, and, after that Act shall cease to be in force, the said bridge shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be vested in and maintained and managed by the local authority of the burgh of Ayr."

The hon. Baronet said the objects of the clause were of a peculiarly local character, which, if he were to enter into, it would take him some time to explain; and, therefore, he would content himself by merely moving that it be added to the Bill.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved, in page 43, after Clause 85, to insert the following Clause:—

(Saving annuity by North British Railway Company to burgh of Burntisland.)

"Nothing in this Act contained shall affect or prejudice the right of the magistrates and town council of the burgh of Burntisland to the annuity of two hundred pounds secured to them by the North British Railway Company under an agreement between the said magistrates and town council and Railway Company, dated the sixteenth and eighteenth days of September, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, and confirmed by 'The North British Railway Act, 1873.'"

The hon. Member said, the clause had been, happily, arranged by agreement, because it related to such a complicated matter that it would have been very difficult to explain its object fully and intelligibly to the Committee. He would, therefore, merely say that it would have been difficult to have settled the matter in any other way. He begged to move that the clause be added to the Bill.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER moved, in page 43, after Clause 85, and the Lord Advocate's New Clause, to insert—

(County of Lanark to be deemed and taken to be three counties in the sense of this Act.)

“For all the purposes of this Act in connection with which the county of Lanark is not specially named, the Lower Ward, Middle Ward, and Upper Ward of the county of Lanark shall each be deemed and taken to be a county in the sense of this Act, under the designations of the ‘County of the Lower Ward of Lanark,’ the ‘County of the Middle Ward of Lanark,’ and the ‘County of the Upper Ward of Lanark,’ respectively, and the convener of the county of Lanark shall for the purposes of this Act be the convener of each of such three counties, and it shall not be obligatory upon, but only permissive to, the trustees of such counties to divide them into districts for the purpose of managing the highways under their control, or for any other purposes under this Act. A certified copy of the list of commissioners of supply of the county of Lanark, made up as before-mentioned, shall be delivered as above provided to the county road clerk of each of such three counties, and each commissioner of supply whose name appears upon such list shall be a county road trustee in such of these three counties in which he may have the qualification of a commissioner of supply, but subject to the provision that no factor whose name appears on such list shall be entitled to act or vote except in the absence of the proprietor.”

DR. CAMERON suggested that the clause should be postponed, on the ground that considerable diversity of interest between different wards existed, and it was desirable that the opinion of the local authorities, in reference to the clause, should be ascertained before it was embodied in the Bill.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER explained that at the county meetings the principle of the clause had been approved by the local authorities interested.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved, in page 43, after Clause 85, to insert the following Clause:—

(Special provision as to Glasgow and Garscube Road.)

“Whereas the turnpike road leading from Glasgow to the Milnford of Garscube, which, with the exception of a portion of the bridge over the River Kelvin at the northern termination thereof, is situate entirely within the burgh of Maryhill, is carried under the Forth and Clyde Navigation by a very low and narrow bridge, and the trustees of that road have accumulated certain funds for the purpose of improving the same by constructing a diversion of the said navigation, and a bridge of ampler dimensions under such diversion, for which improvement powers have already been obtained from Parliament but are about to expire, and it is expedient that the funds accumulated as aforesaid should be applied towards the execution of such improvement: Therefore if within five years after the passing of this Act the powers for executing the said improvement shall be renewed, or new powers for a similar object shall be granted by Parliament, the said funds so far as necessary for the purpose shall be applied in carrying such powers into effect, by the said trustees until the improvement be completed, or until the Acts under which those trustees are constituted cease to be in force, and after those Acts cease to be in force (if the improvement be not then completed, and if the said funds or any part thereof remain then on hand) by the commissioners of police of the burgh of Maryhill, to whom the trustees shall, upon the said Acts ceasing to be in force, hand over such funds or the balance thereof then on hand, if any, as the case may be.”

DR. CAMERON inquired whether the clause had received the approval of the Glasgow authorities? If not, he should suggest that it should be postponed in order to give them an opportunity of expressing an opinion with regard to it.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE explained that the Glasgow authorities were in no way interested in the clause, which was purely of a local character. The object of the clause was to prevent the funds accumulated by the trustees of the turnpike road leading from Glasgow to the Milnford of Garscube for the purpose of its improvement, by the diversion of the Forth and Clyde navigation, and the construction of a bridge of ampler dimensions, being lumped into the general funds of the county on the expiration of the improvement powers already obtained from Parliament.

DR. CAMERON said, that notwithstanding the explanation of the hon. Baronet, he hoped that he would postpone the clause for the present.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER moved, in page 45, after Clause 86, to insert the following Clauses:—

Bye-laws by Board.

(Power of Board to make bye-laws.)

“The Board may from time to time make, with respect to all or any highways within their jurisdiction, and, when made, may alter or repeal bye-laws for all or any of the purposes following (that is to say):—

“(1.) For prohibiting the use of any waggon, cart, or carriage, drawn by animal power, and having wheels of which the felloes or tires are not of such width in proportion to

Mr. J. W. BARCLAY objected to the Amendments being taken at that stage of the proceedings.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL observed that at one time the Government had shown itself rather stiff in accepting Amendments and suggestions with regard to this Bill; but now they appeared to have fallen into the other extreme, and were willing to swallow anything. This clause containing the Amendments was a very complicated one, and ought to be carefully considered by the Government before it was accepted by them.

MR. VANS AGNEW remarked that the clause had been carefully considered by a Committee of that House on the Highways Bill, and that not a single word of it had been changed. It could not be said, therefore, that the clause had taken the Committee by surprise. All that was asked by those who approved the principle of the clause was that the provisions of the Highway Bill, already approved by the House, should be embodied in this Bill. The Committee had had an assurance from the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, in the earlier part of the evening, that the principle of these provisions would be accepted in reference to the measure.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL understood that the provisions of the Highway Bill to which the hon. Member referred were those which were to be approved by the House, not which had already been approved by it. He hoped that the hon. Baronet would postpone the clause.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER was sorry that he could not accede to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman to postpone the clause.

DR. CAMERON thought that it would be preferable to extend the provisions of the English Highway Bill to Scotland, instead of to introduce the clauses of the Bill into the measure before the Committee.

THE LORD ADVOCATE thought that under the circumstances it would be preferable that the clause should be postponed. Either the clauses of the English Highway Bill would be extended to Scotland, or else they would be inserted in the Bill.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER said, that under the circumstances he begged to withdraw the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE moved, in page 50, after Clause 105, to insert the following Clause:—

(Continuing in force provisions of local Acts with respect to buildings, &c. on sides of roads.)

“Notwithstanding the hereinbefore contained enactments that the local Acts now in force relating to turnpike roads and statute labour roads shall cease to be in force at the respective times hereinbefore provided, all the provisions of such Acts which provide that houses, walls, or other buildings shall not be erected, or that new enclosures or plantations shall not be made within certain distances therein specified from the centre of such respective roads which are greater than the distance prescribed by section ninety-one of the Act first and second King William the Fourth, chapter forty-three, applied by this Act to those roads, are hereby continued in force; and the trustees, boards, district committees, and burgh local authorities having the management of such respective roads and their officers, may enforce such provisions in the same manner as the trustees having the management of such respective roads under such local Acts and their officers might now enforce the same.”

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON moved, in page 57, after Clause 106, to insert the following Clauses:—

(Section 54 to be incorporated with “The Aberdeenshire Roads Act, 1865.”)

“107. Section fifty-four of this Act shall be deemed to be part of, and is hereby incorporated as part of, ‘The Aberdeenshire Roads Act, 1865,’ twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth Victoria, chapter two hundred and forty.”

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. and gallant Member could not move the clause. It was incompetent to move a clause which had such reference to a Local Act. It would be a departure from the Standing Orders to make such an alteration in a Private Act without giving the necessary Notices; and, therefore, he must ask the hon. and gallant Member to move the second of his new clauses, but not before the first.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON accordingly moved the following new Clause:—

“108. In counties having local Acts under which tolls and statute labour have been abolished or are not exigible, and the assessments for the maintenance and repair of the roads and bridges therein are payable, one-half by the proprietor and the other half by the tenant or occupier of the lands and heritages on which the same are imposed, but the rates at which such assessments may be imposed are limited to a maximum, it shall be lawful for the trustees of such counties, notwithstanding anything in such local Acts contained, to increase the rates the weight carried by, or to the size of, or to the number of wheels of such waggon, cart, or carriage, as may be specified in such bye-laws; and

"(2.) For prohibiting the use of any waggon, cart, or other carriage, drawn by animal power not having the nails on its wheels countersunk in such manner as may be specified in such bye-laws, or having on its wheels bars or other projections forbidden by such bye-laws; and

"(3.) For prohibiting the locking of the wheel of any waggon, cart, or carriage, drawn by animal power when descending a hill, unless it is locked in such manner as to prevent the road from being destroyed or injured by the locking of such wheel; and

"(4.) For prohibiting the erection of gates across highways except under regulations specified in such bye-laws.

"Penalties to be recovered summarily may be imposed by any such bye-laws on persons breaking any bye-law made under this section: Provided, That no such penalty exceeds for any one offence the sum of two pounds, and that the bye-laws are so framed as to allow of the recovery of any sum less than the full amount of the penalty."

Clause agreed to; and added to the Bill.

SIR WINDHAM ANSTRUTHER moved a Clause containing a series of Amendments, as follows:—

(Weight of locomotives and construction of wheels.—24 and 25 Vic. c. 70; 28 and 29 Vic. c. 83.)

"Section three of 'The Locomotive Act, 1861,' and section five of 'The Locomotive Act, 1865,' are hereby repealed so far as relates to Scotland; and, in lieu thereof, Be it Enacted, That it shall not be lawful to use on any highway a locomotive constructed otherwise than in accordance with the following provisions (that is to say):

"(1.) A locomotive not drawing any carriage, and not exceeding in weight three tons, shall have the tires of the wheels thereof not less than three inches in width, with an additional inch for every ton or fraction of a ton above the first three tons; and

"(2.) A locomotive drawing any waggon or carriage shall have the tires of the driving wheels thereof not less than two inches in width for every ton in weight of the locomotive; and

"(3.) A locomotive shall not exceed nine feet in width or fourteen tons in weight, except as hereinafter provided; and

"(4.) The wheels of a locomotive shall be cylindrical and smooth-soled, or shod with cross-bars of not less than three inches in width nor more than three-quarters of an inch in thickness, and the space intervening between each such cross-bar shall not exceed three inches.

"The owner of any locomotive used contrary to the foregoing provisions shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds: Provided, That the local authority of any burgh and the Board of any county may, on the application of the owner of any locomotive exceeding nine feet in width or fourteen tons in weight, authorise such locomotive to be used on any highway within such burgh or county as the case may be, or on any part of such highway, under such conditions (if any) as to them may appear desirable."

(Amendment of section 3 of Locomotive Act, 1865.)

"The paragraph numbered 'secondly' of section three of 'The Locomotive Act, 1865,' is hereby repealed, so far as relates to Scotland, and in lieu thereof the following paragraph is hereby substituted: namely,

"'Secondly, one of such persons, while the locomotive is in motion, shall accompany the locomotive on foot, and shall in case of need assist horses, and carriages drawn by horses, passing the same.'"

(Steam locomotives to be constructed so as to consume their smoke.)

"Section eight of 'The Locomotive Act, 1861,' is hereby repealed so far as relates to Scotland; and, in lieu thereof, Be it enacted, That every locomotive used on any highway shall be constructed on the principle of consuming its own smoke; and any person using any locomotive not so constructed shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds for every day during which such locomotive is used on any such highway."

(Power to local authorities to make orders as to hours during which locomotives may pass over roads.)

"Section eight of 'The Locomotive Act, 1865,' is hereby repealed so far as relates to Scotland; and, in lieu thereof, Be it enacted, That the local authority of any burgh and the Board of any county may make bye-laws as to the hours during which locomotives are not to pass over the highways situate within such burgh or county, as the case may be, the hours being in all cases consecutive hours, and no more than eight out of the twenty-four; and any person in charge of a locomotive acting contrary to such bye-laws shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds."

(Power of Board to licence locomotives.)

"The Board may from time to time make, alter, and repeal bye-laws for granting annual licences to locomotives used within their county, and the fee (not exceeding ten pounds) to be paid in respect of each licence; and the owner of any locomotive for which a licence is required under any bye-law so made, who uses or permits the same to be used in contravention of any such bye-law, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every day on which the same is so used.

"All fees received under this section shall be applied as the bye-laws shall direct."

(Duration of five preceding sections.)

"The five immediately preceding sections shall remain in force so long only as 'The Locomotive Act, 1865,' continues in force."

Sir Windham Anstruther

MR. J. W. BARCLAY objected to the Amendments being taken at that stage of the proceedings.

(Continuing in force provisions of local Acts with respect to buildings, &c. on sides of roads.)

The right of property in Linlithgow Bridge shall be vested in the road trustees of the county of Linlithgow and in the road trustees of the county of Stirling, who shall jointly and severally in the proportion of the valuation of their counties respectively, be bound to pay to and reimburse the said bridge, together with compensation for the loss of the surplus of the forsworn dues, as the amount of the same may be ascertained and determined by arbiters, one of whom shall be appointed by the road trustees of the counties of Linlithgow and Stirling at a joint meeting of said trustees, to be convened for that purpose within three months after the commencement of this Act, and one by the said magistrates and town council; and such arbiters, when so appointed, and before proceeding to consider the questions referred to them, shall elect an overman, and, failing the appointment of an arbiter by the forsworn road trustees, it shall be competent for the said magistrates and town council to apply to the sheriff of the county of Linlithgow to appoint a person to perform the duty of such arbiters, and the decision of such arbiters, or overman, or person appointed by the sheriff, shall be final.

The hon. Member asked the leave of the Committee to make a few brief remarks in reference to the clause.

The hon. Member said:

He felt it to be his duty to proceed, and he expected that he would receive the support of the right hon. and learned Lord opposite, when he had heard what he had to say on the subject.

trates and town council of the burgh. The magistrates and the town council of the burgh had, it appeared, been very seriously plundered during the time of the Commonwealth. When Cromwell visited the burgh, he found it in possession of considerable wealth, and he took away a great part of it. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, if they pleased; but it was no laughing matter. The Corporation presented a Petition to the Scotch Parliament, and after considering the whole subject in the year 1685, they recognized the transfer of the property in the bridge to the town council of the burgh, and confirmed their title and their right to apply the revenues accruing from the dues to the maintenance of the bridge, the surplus to be devoted to any public use for the benefit of the town. Under those rights the corporation from that time to this had continued to collect those dues which amounted now to nearly £200 per annum. The bridge was not within the burgh, but about a mile beyond its western boundary, and the burgh was entirely dependent for many of the purposes of local government on the revenue accruing to it from that source. In his judgment, the corporation had the same right to that revenue that any private individual had to his estate if held under a Parliamentary title; and he regarded with some distress the proposition contained in the present Bill, by which the corporation could be deprived of these estates without compensation. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cross) and the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would not perpetrate such an injustice, but would cause the road trustees of the counties which were to take the bridge to pay the corporation the fair value of the surplus revenues they had enjoyed for the last 190 years. In his judgment, no landlord had a better title than the corporation of Linlithgow had to the bridge dues. He himself held lands taken by the Crown in the same century, and he had no other title than the corporation had—a Parliamentary title. If the Government took away the property of a corporation held by a Parliamentary title, the next step might be to take away his estate. He did trust the right hon. and learned Lord would recognize the equity of the claim he was advancing.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should forbear to criticize the title by which his hon. Friend (Mr. Ramsay) held his lands, because he did not know the particulars of it. But, because he did intend to adopt the principle laid down in the Bill, he was unable to concede the claim advanced by his hon. Friend. He entirely demurred to the statement that the bridge was the property of the corporation of Linlithgow. It was built by the Earl of Linlithgow, and he obtained from the Crown—which had then the power to grant them—a grant of the customs for 19 years. As distinctly appeared in the Act, the sum paid was not for the bridge, but was for the right to take customs for 19 years. The bridge was leased to the corporation, and when their lease came to an end, they went and got a grant in their own favour to levy sufficient to keep the bridge in repair, and were authorized, "if there were any surplus," to apply it to the use of the burgh. That was, indeed, a description of through customs in every part of Scotland. They were levied on people passing, who were taken by the neck and despoiled of a certain amount of coin of the realm. He had looked at the matter very closely, and he could not see what right the corporation had to claim compensation.

MR. RAMSAY was sorry that the right hon. and learned Lord had felt it necessary to distort the facts in order to throw ridicule upon the claim. The price paid in 1685 was not for the dues for a certain period; but, as he could testify from a careful examination of the documents in possession of the corporation, for the bridge dues for ever. Not only was the bridge the property of the burgh, but he believed no action would lie against them if they were to take it down. If anyone bought a bridge with right to pontage and paid for it, and held it for nearly 200 years, it was a very strong measure, especially as coming from a Conservative Government, to treat the claim with derision as if it were destitute of any foundation whatever. This burgh might seem a very insignificant place to Her Majesty's Government; but, notwithstanding anything said, its claim to the surplus of these dues was as good as that of any Gentleman in the House to his estate. The Committee were asked to sanction a very gross injustice. The road trustees of Linlithgowshire and Stirlingshire were to use this bridge; if a new one were required their ratepayers were charged with its cost, and yet the right hon. and learned Lord said there was no right of property in the bridge itself. Whose was the bridge? It did not belong to the public, for they were divested of any of their rights in favour of the town council of Linlithgow. There was ample evidence in the right hon. and learned Lord's hands to show that the Government would be guilty of confiscating the private property in order to satisfy the ratepayers of Stirling and Linlithgow, if this bridge were taken.

THE LORD ADVOCATE was sorry the hon. Member had felt it necessary to use such strong language in advocating his claim, if it were such a good one. The facts in his possession showed as clearly as could be that the bridge was not the property of the corporation. The Act of Parliament stated that whereas His Majesty had granted to his trusty and well beloved cousin the Earl of Linlithgow the customs for 19 years, that for the loving kindness he bore to the town, he did give them, not the bridge for the use of the town, but the customs for 19 years, with all right and title which the said Earl or others claimed with the aforesaid customs. There was not one word about the right or property in the bridge. He found, also, that the sum mentioned was paid for the right to take the customs during the remaining 19 years of the Earl's grant. He had not distorted the facts.

MR. M'LAGAN said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Ramsay) wanted not only to lay the burden of maintaining this bridge upon the counties of Linlithgow and Stirling, but he wanted them also to pay for this revenue of £200, for which they had never received any benefit whatever. The bridge was made, not for the people resident in those counties, but for persons passing from Edinburgh to the North and West. The county of Linlithgow was abolishing all tolls, and did not ask anybody unconnected with the county to pay for keeping up its roads. Surely the burgh authorities ought to do the same. On the contrary, they asked the county not only to keep up the bridge, but to pay compensation besides. He quite sympathized with the effort his hon. Friend was making, and he should be glad if he could get compensation anywhere else. He should advise him to try the Consolidated Fund.

ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE said, if the claim for compensation were granted, it would be a great injustice to the county which he had the honour to represent.

MR. RAMSAY did not see how he could, with any propriety, ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a grant. It never presented itself to him as a case in which he could fairly ask for compensation from the Government. If this bridge were taken away from the burgh, it would be equivalent to saying that the burgh should cease to exist; for the town council would have no money with which to carry on their affairs. He would move to report Progress, that Her Majesty's Government might consider what they were proposing.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Ramsay.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Government considered the question months and months ago, and the Lord Advocate had come to the deliberate conclusion that the claim ought not to be set up. Therefore, they would be no wiser if Progress were reported, and he hoped the Motion would be withdrawn.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Ramsay) had fought the case of the burgh very gallantly; but he did not see how he could expect to make out a better case at a future time. He hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw, and let them get on with the Bill.

MR. RAMSAY said, he had supported the Bill at every stage, but he could no longer accept a measure which perpetrated such an injustice. If the Government had carried out the principle of the Bill they would have assented to his Motion; and he, therefore, must think the worry of the long discussion had led them to refuse to entertain it. ["No, no!"] Well, he felt that very strongly. It was true he had brought the subject under the notice of the Government months ago, but he had a prejudice in favour of the Bill. It was a case of interest to his constituents, and he brought the matter forward simply from a sense of the equity of the claim. If, then, it were dismissed in that way, rather than see the Bill pass, he would obstruct it at every stage.

DR. CAMERON said, he had been so struck with what had been done in the case of Glasgow, that he could believe the Government would do anything. He fully sympathized with his hon. Friend (Mr. Ramsay), but still he thought the matter might be postponed till the Report.

MR. M'LAGAN hoped the Motion would be withdrawn. If there were an injustice done at present, it was to the counties; while, if this demand were granted, it would open up any number of other cases, and would overthrow the Bill altogether. There was a bridge in Musselburgh in the very same position, and if Linlithgow had compensation, it would be asked for that burgh also.

MR. RAMSAY said, what his hon. Friend had said had very little influence upon him, because he really felt that that was an injustice. It might be a very humble and insignificant burgh; but it was suffering under an injustice, and therefore he protested against it. Of course, if he were seeking a remedy in an improper way, he should be glad if he were told so; but at present it seemed to him he was following out the principle laid down in the Bill; therefore, he did not think he was guilty of anything like obstruction when he tried to prevent an improper Bill from passing. He would like to ask, however, whether it was open to him to discuss this matter on the Report, after having discussed it in Committee? If it were in accordance with the Rules of the House, he would like to take the opinion of the House on the question when the benches opposite were fuller than they were now, and then he felt that he would not be treated as he had been.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member would not be prevented from bringing forward the matter on the Report, by the fact that he had discussed it in Committee.

MR. RAMSAY said, then he would bring up the subject again on the Report.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN asked, if the hon. Member proposed to move the following clause which stood in his name:—(Power to acquire land and materials)?

MR. RAMSAY said, the matter had already been fully discussed, and the Committee had come to a decision adverse to his views. Therefore, he would not propose the clause. As to his next proposal, to insert Sections 87 to 92, both inclusive, and also Sections 94, 96, 97, and 98, and 100 to 108, both inclusive, of 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 43, he understood the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had agreed to incorporate them in a Schedule.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay), that the next new clause which stood in his name (Application of Act in the county of Forfar) was open to the same objection as that which he had a little while ago pointed out in the case of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon).

MR. J. W. BARCLAY, said, he would withdraw the clause, and see if anything could be done in the matter before the Report.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he wished to move the Amendment that stood in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for the Haddington Burghs (Sir Henry Davie). There was no objection to the principle.

LORD ELCHO said, he hoped the Government would do the same thing in another way.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedules read, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday next, and to be re-printed. [Bill 224.]

PUBLIC HEALTH (IRELAND)

(re-committed) BILL—[BILLS 1-199.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

The following Amendments were made, and the clauses, as amended, were agreed to:—

Clause 107, line 6, all the words after the word "place" in that line, down to the word "house" in line 8 were left out; Clause 191, page 69, line 6, to insert after the word "situated," "any such clerk, &c."

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, in moving, after Clause 229, to insert the following Clause:—

(Incidence of rate.)

"Where the person occupying property out of which any money is payable under the two hundred and twenty-fourth and two hundred and twenty-seventh sections of this Act shall be liable to pay a rent in respect of the same, he may deduct from such rent, for each pound of the rent which he shall be liable to pay, one half of the sum which he shall have paid under the said sections in respect of each pound of the net annual value (whether such rent shall be greater or less than such net annual value), and so in proportion for any less sum than a pound: And be it further enacted, That where any person receiving rent in respect of any rateable property shall also pay a rent in respect of the same, he shall be entitled to deduct from the rent so paid by him a sum bearing such a proportion to the amount of rate deducted from the rent received by him as the rent paid by him bears to the rent received by him;"

said, it had reference to the mode of raising taxation in towns for the purposes of the Act. In rural districts sanitary rates were to be paid partly by the owner and partly by the occupier, while in towns they were to be paid entirely by the occupier. This was manifestly very unfair, for sanitary improvements in towns were far more permanent than they were in the country; and they were, therefore, of far more value to the owner than to the occupier, for the latter's interest was usually of a very transitory character, seeing that he might reside in the town only for a very short period. If owners of property had to pay some of the rates, they would be likely, also, to take far greater interest in municipal affairs. It had been suggested to him that it would be better to raise this question in the Committee which was sitting on Local Government and Taxation of Towns in Ireland; but he contended that it was properly raised on that Bill, which was an amending, as well as a consolidating, Bill. In the towns, the owners were a far wealthier class than the occupiers, and this added to the injustice of saddling the latter with the entire of the rates. Another effect which the Amendment would have would be, that it would induce owners, who were usually of the higher class, to take a practical interest in the working of municipal institutions, to which they would be freely elected if only they became candidates.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, this was a most important question, and he could not at all dispute the right of his hon. and learned Friend to raise it. At the same time, he ventured to think the Amendment went beyond the general frame and scope of the Bill. This was essentially a Consolidation Act, bringing into a reasonable compass and united form about 20 Acts for the use of those who had to administer the law. It was true it was also, in one sense, an amending Act. When it was apparent that certain matters required amendment, and the change did not interfere with the important principles which lay beneath the sanitary system of Ireland, then amendment had been made. But, though several changes had been made in machinery, few alterations had been made in principles. The Amendment, on the other hand, involved the gravest issues that could be suggested, and, if carried, it was obvious the matter could not be left there. There was a broad and obvious distinction between the country and the town. In the country the landlord paid part of the rate, but then he had a large voice in the distribution of the money. That was not the case in the towns; and if the occupiers had to pay the entire rate, they also had the privilege of spending it. If the Amendment were adopted, it would practically involve the withdrawal of the Bill, which, he was sure, was not the desire of his hon. and learned Friend. He therefore trusted the Motion would not be pressed. He thought that the question would be more properly discussed before the Local Government and Taxation of Towns Committee, and on the Bill, which might be the outcome of their labours.

MR. GRAY felt that the arguments were entirely in favour of his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. O'Shaughnessy); but he trusted, nevertheless, that he would not press the Amendment. No good could possibly be served by it, for this was part of a very wide question, which could scarcely be settled at the moment. He did not agree with the argument that owners were not represented in towns. They were represented even at present indirectly, and they might be much more adequately represented if they were not so apathetic, and if they did not abstain from taking any part in municipal government. The Amendment would remove one anomaly, but it would create another, by making a difference between new urban districts and the old ones. The question was a very wide one, and could be far better discussed by the Committee then sitting. His hon. and learned Friend desired to see the Bill pass, and he must be aware that his Amendment would serve no practical purpose. Therefore, he would appeal to him not to press it.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he had no desire to interfere with the passing of the Bill, and therefore he would withdraw the Amendment. At the same time, he protested against the idea that in these Consolidation Bills they were to renew all defective principles, and no one was to be allowed to discuss them, but that they were always to be told that they must pass new amending Acts. If owners of property in boroughs were not represented, it was entirely their own fault; and one object he had in view in proposing this new clause was to rouse them out of their apathy, and make them take seats on the municipal councils. Only by indirect means could they induce owners to take an interest in local affairs, and one of the best was to make them pay money out of their own pockets, and so to give them an interest in its expenditure.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.
